(1) Beza in Iconibus.

(2) Louis Rabus, in his 4th book of the Hiſtory of Martyrs; Budæus, Σαγατολ. p. 38. Hondorf, Prompt. p. 64. Juſtus de Academiis, pag. 45, place him in the ſame year that Buchanan does. See Jacobi Thomaſii Oration. de Alexandro Aleſio, pag. 307.

(3) Buchanan. Rerum Scoticarum, lib. 14.

(4) Expoſit. in Pſalm. 37. folio 164. See alſo his Anſwer to Cochleus, p. 9.

[B] He was perſecuted with ſo much violence that he was obliged to retire into Germany.] This perſecution was raiſed againſt him becauſe he had preached before the Provincial Synod, in 1529, a very ſevere Sermon againſt Prieſts who were guilty of fornication: Now the Provoſt of St. Andrews, whoſe lewd intrigues were known to every body, knew that he himſelf was laſhed in this diſcourſe, and imagined it was on purpoſe to expoſe him to all the audience; he therefore reſolved to revenge himſelf the firſt opportunity, and being of a diſpoſition a thouſand times fitter for a ſoldier than a Canon, he choſe to make uſe of violent means. Being informed that the Chapter was aſſembled in order to ſend complaints againſt him to King James V, he repaired to the Aſſembly with a great number of armed men, and ordered them to ſeize Ales, who deſired him to moderate his paſſion; but he anſwered this juſt remonſtrance no otherwiſe than with ſword in hand. This poor Canon was ſtruck with ſo much terror, that he caſt himſelf at the Provoſt's feet, and beſought him to ſpare his life. He eſcaped with his life, but received ſuch a kick that he remained ſenſeleſs for ſome time; after which he was conducted to priſon, as were all the other Canons; but the King hearing of the matter ordered them to be ſet at liberty; Ales was the only one who was not diſcharged, but on the contrary ſhut up in a diſmal dungeon for twenty days. After this he was ſet at liberty, but he did not continue ſo long; for having acquainted the Magiſtrates with his hard treatment, which he thought he ought not to conceal, the Provoſt, who had forbid him to mention the thing to them, ſent him again to priſon, and repreſented him to the Archbiſhop as a man who had broached his hereſy in a Sermon before the Synod, and well deſerved ſuch puniſhment. He was ſo enraged once, becauſe they had releaſed Ales out of priſon while he was abſent upon a journey, that he had deſigned to force him back again, without ſo much as permitting him to finiſh a Maſs that he had begun; but he was ſoftened by the prayers of the Canons, and prevailed upon to ſtay till Maſs was over before he ſhould recommit him; but as they were ſatisfied he deſigned to have him put into the dungeon the next day, they adviſed him to flee all night, and to leave Scotland. He took their advice and fled into Germany in the year 1532 (5).

(5) Jacob Thomaſius, in Oratione de Aleſio.

[C] He maintained the doctrine of George Major, concerning the neceſſity of good works.] The title of his work is, De Neceſſitate & Merito bonorum Operum Diſputatio propoſita in celebri Academia Lipſica ad xxix Novemb. 1560. This Diſpute is the fifth inter

with regard to religion, after the marriage of Henry VIII with Ann of Bolen, was the reaſon that Ales went to London in 1535. He was very much eſteemed by Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by Latimer and Thomas Cromwel, who was at that time in great favour with the King, and he even taught his opinions publickly. The fall of theſe favourites obliged him to return to Germany, where the Elector of Brandenburg, made him Profeſſor of Divinity at Franckfort upon the Oder in 1540. Ales had a diſpute there two years after, upon the queſtion whether the Magiſtrate can and ought to puniſh Fornication [D]? He maintained the affirmative with Melancthon. I do not know whether he inter Anti-Tapperianas; and here then is an Anti to be added to the Collection of Mr. Baillet. To ſave the trouble of doing it again, we will here ſet down the titles of his principal works: Commentarii in Evangelium Johannis, & in utramque Epiſtolam ad Timotheum; Expoſitio in Pſalmos Davidis; De Juſtificatione contra Oſiandrum; De Sanctâ Trinitate, cum confutatione erroris Valentini Gentilis; Reſponſio ad triginta & duos articulos Theologorum Lovanienſium, &c.

[D] He had a diſpute upon the queſtion, Whether the Magiſtrate can and ought to puniſh fornication?] It is obvious that this diſpute did not turn upon adultery, but only ſimple fornication; for though the puniſhment of adultery is a thing as uncommon, as the crime is frequent, yet nevertheleſs it paſſes for lawful with the Chriſtian Doctors. So that Ales had nothing to do but contend with an antagoniſt, who maintained that the Magiſtrate neither can nor ought to puniſh fornication; they deferred pronouncing upon this queſtion; and it is very probable that this delay gave ſuch diſguſt to Ales, that he would not ſtay any longer amongſt a people that declared themſelves ſo favourable to the impunity of fornicators. Cum A. 1542, ſays Thomaſius, inter ipſum & alium quendam exorta eſſet controverſia de queſtione, poſſitne ac debeat Magiſtratus Politicus ſcortationem punire? veramque ſententiam, hoc eſt affirmantem, ac Philippi quoque Melancthonis calculo approbatam †, defendente Aleſio, nihilominus hujus diſputationis deciſio juberetur differri. Offenſus, ut apparet, hâc bonæ cauſæ procraſtinatione Aleſius, non expectato Principis adventu diſceſſit. i. e. "There was a con-
"troverſy (6), in 1542, between Aleſius and another
"perſon on the queſtion, Whether the Civil Magi-
"ſtrate can and ought to puniſh fornication? Ale-
"ſius defended the true ſide of the queſtion, that is,
"the affirmative, and which Philip Melancthon had "declared to be his* opinion; however the deciſion
"of the diſpute was ordered to be put off. Ales,
"as appears, was ſo offended at the protracting ſo
"good a cauſe, that he went away without waiting
"for the coming of the Prince." Indignation did not ill become a Profeſſor of Divinity on ſuch an occaſion, who had ſeen the birth of the Reformation, and conſequently ought to hope never to live to ſee morality reaſſume its former ſlackneſs. Nothing could do more honour to the Proteſtant Religion, than the ſeverity of its maxims with regard to chaſtity; for the obſervance of theſe maxims is the moſt difficult victory to be obtained over nature, and that which the beſt teſtifies our union to God by the reciprocal ties of his protection and of his love. It was therefore one great ſubject of ſcandal, that ſo early as the year 1542, a Proteſtant Divine, who maintained that Magiſtrates both might and ought to puniſh fornicators, ſhould meet with any oppoſition, and in ſome ſenſe be cruſhed under it: but now-a-days we are ſo accuſtomed to the toleration of this crime, that ſcarce any one is offended at it. A man of great probity aſſured me lately, that the Magiſtrates of Strasburg ſhew ſo much indulgence to any young woman that has been got with child, that provided ſhe comes to them and pays the fine at which all ſuch ſort of crimes are taxed, they reſtore her to her former reputation, and fix puniſhments for all ſuch as ſhall dare to reproach her the leaſt with it. This is without all doubt a more ſingular privilege, than that of giving letters of reinveſtment to families which have diſgraced their nobility; and if it were allowable to be merry on ſo important a ſubject, one might ſay that the Magiſtrates of Strasburg ought expreſly to have ſtipulated for the conſervation of this privilege, when they capitulated with France; and again after the peace of Ryſwick, when they demanded a renewal of their capitulation (7). I am very well aſſured that they don't think that by this prerogative of theirs they give the lie to that certain and inconteſtable axiom of the ancients,

——Nullâ reparablis arte,
Læſa pudicitia eſt; deperit illa ſemel.

"No art can chaſtity once loſt reſtore
"The ſpotted maid muſt ne'er be virgin more.

Indeed they don't pretend to reſtore loſt virginity, phyſically ſpeaking; for this would be contradicting the true ſenſe of the axiom; but morally ſpeaking they do pretend to it, ſeeing they take the reputation of a lewd woman into their protection, and skreen her from ſcandal, ſo that ſhe may be allowed to go any where as fearleſs of ſhame as the moſt virtuous: nay they ſay farther that the efficacy of their ſentence is ſo great, that women, who have had children and obtained a grant to enjoy their former privileges by paying the tax, find it as eaſy a matter to match themſelves, and as advantageouſly as if they had never treſpaſſed this way. But I ſhould impute this to the want of delicacy of taſte in the men, rather than to their being perſuaded of the efficacy of the ſentence (8). However, we may apply to thoſe, who ſuppoſe that crimes of this nature may be atoned for by paying a fine, what was once ſaid to them, who imagined that a little fair water could wipe away the ſtains of homicide.

Ah! nimium faciles, qui triſtia crimina cædis
Flumineâ tolli poſſe putatis aquâ (9).

"Fond men to fancy that the cryſtal flood
"Could waſh away the crimſon ſtains of blood.

The ſame honeſt man has aſſured me, that what he knew for certain of the cuſtoms of Strasburg, he had heard ſpoke of a great many other places in Germany. Such Laws as theſe might well provoke the rage of the Divine, who is the ſubject of this article; for ſo far is this from being a puniſhment for fornication, that it is in ſome meaſure rewarding it, if we conſider that the advantage of being allowed to appear in all places without any fear of ſcandal and reproach, is far ſuperior to the puniſhment of paying a fine, which ſometimes does not amount to one half of the profit gained by proſtitution.

I have heard it ſaid by perſons of very good judgment, that the cuſtom of a vaſt number of countries rather gave a reward than inflicted a penalty on fornication; and the cuſtom is that they who father the child are ſentenced to keep it, and to pay the mother a certain ſum of money. Now the obligation to provide for the child can in no wiſe be looked upon as a puniſhment, ſince even the law of nature has evidently founded this obligation; nor can we judge the money which is given to the woman to be a puniſhment, or if it may be called a ſlight one on the father's ſide, it is properly ſpeaking a recompence with regard to the mother. "Now
"it is ſurprizing, ſaid theſe Gentlemen, that "Chriſtian Courts of Judicature ſhould aſſign re"wards to women for having loſt their honour by "ſcandalizing the Public." One might reply, that the loſs they had incurred by having brought themſelves into a condition wherein they would find it ſo difficult a matter to get husbands, ought, in juſtice, to entitle them to ſome reparation. "No, replied they, "it is not a point of juſtice, but mere favour
"and grace: Juſtice is not concerned in indemniſying
"perſons who have ſuffered by a voluntary tranſ-
"greſſion

† Phil. Melancht. Epiſt. ad Camerar. pag. 413, 414.

(6) Ibid. p. 318.

* In Epiſt. Reſponſoriâ ad Academiam Francofordianam, quam leges, Part. 1. Conſil. Theol. Phil. Melancth. p. 523.

(7) See the Hiſtorical Mercury for the month of June 1698.

(8) I have been aſſured that they are the foremoſt in ridiculing, and don't ſtick to ſay that offences of this kind are very harmleſs and innocent; probably in imitation of thoſe who begin firſt with themſelves, in order to ward off the raillery of others. See the beginning of the remark [B] on the article AGESILAUS II.

(9) Ovidius, Faſt. lib. 2. ver. 45.

he was offended that they deferred deciding this diſpute, and whether this diſcontent was the cauſe of his going from Franckfort in a hurry, but it is certain that the Court of Brandenburg complained of him and wrote to the Univerſity of Wittemberg, to have him chaſtiſed. His attachment to Melancthon had made it believed that he was retired to Wittemberg [E]; however he choſe rather to go to Leipſic; whilſt he was there he refuſed in 1543 a Profeſſor's Chair in the Univerſity, which Albert Duke of Pruſſia deſigned to erect at Koninſberg, and which was erected the year following. It is not well known, whether about that time he had a Profeſſorſhip at Leipſic, or whether they only promiſed him that of Divinity, which he afterwards

" greſſion of the laws of God and of honour plain-
" ly promulgated; and if the Sovereign pleaſe to
" diſpenſe his favours, let him make choice of more " worthy objects. Can there be any obligation on " men to make a woman ſatisfaction who had maim-
" ed a leg or an arm in committing a robbery for
" their ſake, and at their inſtigation? ſo far would
" the Judge be from allowing her any damages,
" that he would ſentence her to corporal puniſhment.
" The caſe would be the ſame in all puniſhable acti" ons in which ſhe ſhould chance to loſe a limb in " carrying on any man's deſigns: " Fornication is
" the only exception to this rule, let us ſtyle it
" therefore, The common Treſpaſs and the privileged
" caſe. Terms ſeparately appropriated to other " things (10), upon which was printed a book at Paris
" in 1611 (11)." A certain perſon upon that alledged that the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam were peſter'd with ſuch numbers of women ſervants, who were continually laying their big bellies to ſome young man in the family, that they made a law, that for the future this ſort of creatures ſhould be allowed no more than 25 Guilders, upon the payment of which they ſhould be obliged to keep the child; that they deſigned by this to curb debauchery, for they ſaw that the profit they drew from their looſe courſes inticed them to make advances, or at leaſt to comply with the firſt importunity, and that in ſhort their lewdneſs ought to be ſuppreſſed by cutting off all proſpect of gain, and not encouraged by the hopes of ſuch ſums as were adjudged them by the Courts. But there were ſome who made anſwer, that it was not certain that ſuch laws were enacted at Amſterdam, altho' it was very much talk'd of in the other cities of the country. Whether this be true or falſe, this is a certain proof that the world is not ignorant that the laws are too favourable to fornication, and that they rather encourage than lay a reſtraint on debauchery; and it appears very plain that Sovereigns whoſe buſineſs it is to provide puniſhments for the violators of the Decalogue, don't make the anger of God, but the temporal prejudice of the ſtate, the rule of their conduct. For this reaſon they puniſh robbers and homicides; but becauſe fornication ſeems rather ſerviceable than prejudicial to the State, they connive at it, and give one reaſon to think by their conduct that they are not at all diſpleaſed that their towns ſhould be peopled tho' per fas & nefas. If they had at heart the practice which the Law of God enjoins upon this head, they would rather heighten the fear of diſgrace than make it leſs; they would impoſe heavy fines not to be applied to the uſe of the women who were joint offenders, but to the hoſpitals; they would brand with infamy as well him who had been the tempter, as her who had weakly reſiſted the temptation: and becauſe ſhame amongſt people in low life, is not of force ſufficient to reſtrain a certain wantonneſs, which animates the tempter, encourages him, and aſſures him of finding an eaſy conqueſt, they would make uſe of a more effectual puniſhment, which they might eaſily find ways to do.

Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline is almoſt fallen into as great a degree of remiſsneſs. It is but a few years ago (12), that a Tutor to a Gentleman in a town of... laid ſiege to a young coquette, and carried his point. When her relations perceived that ſhe was big with child, they ſet their heads to work how to oblige her gallant to marry her; but he was very ſhy of coming into the propoſal, for beſides that the eaſineſs of his conqueſt proved no great charm to allure him to matrimony, he believed himſelf not to be the only perſon who (as we ſay) had had a finger in the pye, and that he had no greater ſhare in the child than ſome body elſe. The only way left to bring him to the lure was to threaten him, that unleſs he married the woman he ſhould loſe the benefice which he had in England; with that he married her, and kept his benefice. We ſee in this inſtance how wantonneſs was rewarded, and that in the higheſt and moſt ſcandalous degree of it. What would the ancient Fathers ſay were they at this time to riſe from the dead? How could they forbear crying out, when they caſt their eyes upon the church, O domus antiqua, quam diſpari dominaris Domino! It is the fate of all Religions as well as of all bodies politic to grow worſe as they grow old. Men are more corrupted in their youth, than in their old age; but it is quite otherwiſe with Commonwealths. There is nothing like new laws (13). Laws are like bread and eggs, pan d'un di, ovo d'un' hora, i. e. " bread one day old, an egg one " hour." The flouriſhing ſtate of a code, (I mean the practice and obſervance of it) is that of its infancy. The Poet's complaint, who had been ſpeaking of the corruptions of the age in Auguſtus's time, is very pertinent, and is not unlike what was ſaid by Jeſus Chriſt, From the beginning it was not ſo (14).

Non ita Romuli
Præſcriptum & intonſi Catonis
Auſpiciis, veterumque norma (15).

" Far otherwiſe it was ordain'd,
" When Romulus the ſcepter ſway'd.
" Theſe vices Cato's rules reſtrain'd,
" When his unpoliſh'd maxims were obey'd.

In this reſpect, Sects and Communities, &c. may be compared to a man who is only innocent in his cradle and hanging ſleeves.

It muſt be obſerved that there are notwithſtanding ſome Proteſtant countries (16), where there are kept up ſome remains of ſeverity againſt fornication as well with regard to the women as the men: But I am very ſure that our Alexander Ales would deſire that they were ſtill more rigorous; and what would he ſay then of other countries?

We muſt not diſmiſs this remark without obſerving, that the Legiſlators who adjudge a pecuniary profit to lewd women, or condemn thoſe who debauched them to be their husbands, have done this in order to avoid further inconveniences; but notwithſtanding the goodneſs of the deſign, it is certain that ſuch a conduct tends to the ſpreading the contagion of laſciviouſneſs, for every ſentence they pronounce upon a caſe of this nature is doing a real piece of ſervice to one perſon, and encouraging twenty others to hope for the ſame; and every wench that gets herſelf a husband by theſe means, raiſes a curioſity in many more to try the ſame experiment. They have been ſenſible of this abuſe in France, nor is the new Code there ſo favourable in this reſpect as the old, to that ſort of women who make a gain of the privileges of matrimony. It is a Sacrament which has in it retroactive virtues, and like that of penitence is a ſafety after ſhipwreck: It conducts us back again to the port of honour, it repairs old breaches, and confers legitimacy on children which were not entitled to it (17); not to ſpeak of the thick veil it caſts over new tranſgreſſions, current faults, and daily treſpaſſes.

[E] His attachment to Melancthon had made it believed that he was retired to Wittemburg.] Melancthon in his 290th Letter to Camerarius, ſeems to doubt if Ales did not diſtruſt his friendſhip; and in his 288th Letter he confeſſes that he had obſerved in him ſome ſudden ſtarts and ſallies, παραβόλως & παραλόγως ὁρμάς.

(10) Common Treſpaſs is when the miſdemeanors of an Eccleſiaſtick are judged by Eccleſiaſtical Courts; and a Privileg'd Caſe is when the faults of an Eccleſiaſtick are ſubmitted to the Secular Juriſdiction.

(11) It was written by Benjamin Millet Counſellor in the parliament of Dijon.

(12) This was written in 1698.

(13) See the Remark [M] on the article Neſtorius, at the beginning.

(14) Matth. xix. 8.

(15) Hor. Od. 15. lib. 2. ver. 10.

(16) At Geneva, and ſtill more in the Canton of Berne.

(17) See the remark [A] on the article ARIOSTA.

terwards exerciſed till his death, which happened on the 17th of March 1565 [F]. His life had been miraculouſly preſerved in his youth [G]. The eſteem and authority he enjoyed may be known by the number of conferences at which he was preſent [H]. He married an Engliſh woman, by whom he had two daughters and one ſon. He had but one daughter alive when he died. This was taken from an oration of James Thomaſius Profeſſor at Leipſic, printed there with many others, in the year 1683 in 8vo. All that he ſaid here is accompanied with quotations, but I did not think there was any occaſion to copy them, becauſe thoſe who will have recourſe to originals, may very eaſily find the oration which refers to them.

[F] He died the 17th day of March 1565.] Paul Eber in his Calendar places the death of Ales the 18th day of March 1565, aged 75 years. The firſt error is very ſmall being but of one day, but the ſecond being of ten years is very conſiderable. Ales wrote himſelf, in the Matriculation book of the Univerſity of Leipſic, born in 1500. Bucholcer (18), and Reuſnerus (19), make him as old as Paul Eber. All this remark has been taken from Thomaſius. One might blame Bucholcer alſo for another thing, for having ſaid Ales lived and taught in Germany after his arrival at Wittemburg, which was after the year 1533.

(18) Chronolog. p. 613.
(19) Iſagog. Hiſt. p. 636.

[G] His life was miraculouſly preſerved in his youth.] He tells us in one of his books (20), that he often calls to mind, though not without a ſhivering over all his body, that as he was once rolling upon a very high mountain near the brink of a precipice, he found himſelf tranſported to another place without knowing either by whom or how; which he attributes to the faith of his parents and not to any virtue of the amulets which he carried about him, containing ſome verſes of St. John, according to the cuſtom of children in thoſe days.

(20) Epiſtola Dedicatoria Commentar. in Joannem. Vide & Præfat. in alteram ad Timotheum, apud Jacobum Thomaſium, in Oratione de Aleſio. p. 305.

[H] He was preſent at a great number of Conferences.] When Melancthon was deſired 1555 by the people of Nurenberg to come and put an end to the diſſenſions which the diſciples of Andrew Oſiander created in their city (21), he brought Ales with him, who maintained his ground very well in the diſputes he engaged in (22): Melancthon was well acquainted with his abilities in this way, for he had already had him for his aſſeſſor, in 1554, in the Conference of Naumbourg, where they met to appeaſe ſome troubles occaſioned by theological differences in Pruſſia. Camerarius upon this occaſion gives Ales a very great encomium. Alexander Aleſius, patriâ Scotus, valde charus Philippo Melanchthoni, rei theologicæ intelligentiſſimus, & artifex excellens congruentium diſputationum, & vir dignitate atque doctrinâ exquiſitâ præſtans (23). i. e. "Alexander Ales, a Scot, was highly in favour with Philip "Melancthon; he was a very great Divine, a ſubtle "Diſputant, and a Man of great worth and learning." He has remarked in another place, that Granvelle, who was appointed by Charles the Fifth to preſide at the Conference of Worms, in 1541, would not allow Ales, who was Deputy there from the Elector of Brandenbourg, to ſpeak. Qui quidem & paratus erat & cupidus conflictûs: ſed huic obſtitit juſſum Præſidis, qui & Aleſium ad pugnam inſtructum ſciret, & talem adminiſtrationem rei vicioſam eſſe animadverteret. i. e. "Who came both armed and eager to "enter the liſts, but was excluded by an order of "the Preſident, who knew that he came prepared "for the fight, and foreſaw that ſuch a conduct "would ruin his cauſe.

(21) Camerar. in vitâ Melancthonis. Thomaſius in Oratione de Aleſio, p. 321.

(22) Beza in Iconibus.

(23) Camerar. in vitâ Melanct.

☞ALEXANDER NECKAM, an Engliſh eminent writer in the 12th and 13th Century, was born at St. Alban's in Hertfordſhire. Having finiſhed his ſtudies in his own country he went abroad, according to the cuſtom of that age, to the Univerſities of France and Italy, where he applied himſelf to learning with prodigious vigour (a). He reſided particularly at Paris, which was the moſt celebrated Univerſity of Europe at that time, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he was eſteemed a prodigy for genius and learning. He was conſidered as an excellent Philoſopher, a profound Divine, and a polite Rhetorician and Poet for the age he lived in. He read Lectures at Paris about the year 1180 with ſuch general applauſe, that his ſchool was not large enough to contain the number of his ſcholars (b). About the year 1186 he returned to England, and the year following deſired Guarinus Abbot of St. Alban's to give him the care of the ſchools belonging to that Abbey, having left that which he had before taught at Dunſtable. He was afterwards made Canon of Chicheſter, and then removed to Exeter, where he became a Canon-Regular of the order of St. Auguſtin, In 1215 he was made Abbot of Exeter, and died in 1227. We ſhall give his Epitaph in a note [A]. He wrote ſeveral works which were never publiſhed, but continue in manuſcript in the Libraries of England and other countries, eſpecially France. We ſhall mention ſome of them [B].

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Literaria, Sæc. 13. p. 623. edit. Coloniæ Allobrogum. 1720.

(b) Oudin. Comment. de Script. & Scriptis Eccleſiaſt. tom. 3. Sæc. 13. col. 4. edit. Francofurti 1722.

ALEXANDER

[A] We ſhall give his Epitaph in a note.] John Bale has mentioned it in his book De Scriptoribus Britanniæ; and it is written after the old monkiſh manner in Latin rhimes.

Eclipſin patitur ſapientia, Sol ſepelitur;
Cui ſi par unus, minus eſſet flebile funus.
Vir benè diſcretus, & in omni more facetus.
Dictus erat Nequam, vitam duxit tamen æquam.

It is no eaſy matter in a tranſlation to do juſtice to theſe verſes, becauſe the ſtupidity of ſome performances is as difficult to be expreſſed as the elegance of others. But the ſenſe of it is to this purpoſe:

Learning's eclips'd, the Sun himſelf's obſcur'd.
Our loſs were leſs, had he left one ſuperior.
Accompliſh'd was his mind, his manners pleaſing;
And tho' his name (1) was ill, his life was good.

(1) Nequam, as his name is ſometimes written, ſignifies a Wicked Man.

[B] We ſhall mention ſome of his works.] Comment. ſuper quatuor Evangelia; i. e. "Commentaries up-"on the four Goſpels (2)." Expoſitio ſuper Eccleſiaſten; i. e. "An Expoſition of Eccleſiaſtes (3)." Expoſitio ſuper Cantica; i. e. "An Expoſition of the "Canticles." Elucidarium Bibliothecæ, containing an explication of ſeveral difficult paſſages of Scripture; and among the reſt that of St. John chap. vi. ver. 51. If any man eat of this bread, he ſhall live for ever: upon which place he has ſome remarkable words, quoted by Dr. Cave, which ſeem inconſiſtent with the modern notion of Tranſubſtantiation. Laudes Divinæ Sapientiæ; i. e. "The Praiſes of the Di-"vine Wiſdom." This work is the ſame with that De Naturis Rerum; i. e. "Of the Nature of things," as Oudin aſſures us from his own reading (4). It is a large poetical work, and treats of various ſubjects as well profane as ſacred; of Angels, the heavens, of natural things, particularly birds, beaſts, trees and plants,

(2) Cave, ubi ſupra.
(3) Id. ibid.
(4) Ibid. Col. 5.

ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO [A], a Neapolitan Lawyer of great learning, flouriſhed towards the end of the fifteenth Century, and the beginning of the ſixteenth [B]. He applied himſelf ardently to the bar, firſt at Naples, and afterwards at Rome (a); but he devoted to the ſtudy of the Belles Lettres all the time he could ſpare from his Law buſineſs: and at laſt he entirely forſook the bar, that he might lead a more eaſy and agreeable life with the Muſes. The reaſon he gave for renouncing the profeſſion of the Law is as follows [C]: He ſaid it was becauſe of the ignorance or iniquity of thoſe who adminiſtred juſtice, and becauſe he had rather live in quiet, than take a great deal of pains to ſtudy the Law well, ſince this trouble was of no uſe againſt the raſhneſs of a bad Judge (b). He had ſeen at Rome a great many examples of this diſorder, as he told Raphael Volaterrani, who had aſked him the reaſon of his retreat. It is a little ſtrange that among the great number of learned men who lived in his time, or who have praiſed the learned men of that age, there is hardly plants, which are diſcourſed of in a phyſical and moral way. It was intitled Of the Nature of things, becauſe it treats for the moſt part of the nature of created things; it was likewiſe called The Praiſes of Divine Wiſdom, becauſe the explication of the natural world ſhews the infinite wiſdom of the Deity. This work conſiſts of a great many verſes, which have no ſmall ſhare of elegance and harmony, if we conſider the barbarous and Gothic age, in which they were written. In this piece the author gives a large account of the three cities, which were moſt eminent for learning, Athens, Rome, and Paris. John Brompton, or rather the anonymous author of the Chronicon Jorevallanſe, has tranſcribed a great many things from this work, where he ſpeaks of Alfred, the Founder of the Univerſity of Oxford; and ſays, that "the riches of every kingdom were prodigiouſly "great, as long as arts and ſciences flouriſhed in "them; and that ſuch nations were able to repel "the moſt formidable enemies, as appears from "Greece, while learning was cultivated at Athens, "and from Rome, and the kingdom of the Franks, "ſince learning flouriſhed in them. For victory in war "and the glory of Philoſophy concurred as it were "together; and there is the greateſt reaſon for this, "ſince true Philoſophy teaches men to govern in "the beſt manner." Cujuſlibet regni opes creviſſe in immenſum, quamdiu artium ingenuarum in ipſo floruerunt ſtudia, & hoſtibus regni reſtitiſſe; ut patet de Græciâ, quando floruerunt ſtudia Athenis; de Româ; de Regno Francorum, ex quo floruerunt ſtudia in illo. Victoria enim militiæ & gloria philoſophiæ quaſi ſimul concurrerunt; & hoc meritò, quia philoſophia vera docet juſtè & verè regulare. The reader may ſee the titles of the reſt of his works, and the Libraries where they are to be found in MS. in Oudin's Commentarius (5).

(a) Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dier. lib. 2. cap. 1.

(b) Ibid. lib. 6. cap. 7.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

T.

[A] Alexander ab Alexandro.] I give him his Latin name according to the rule of the Grammarians. They who tranſlate it Alexander of Alexandria (1), commit a miſtake. Our author was of a Neapolitan family, the name of which was Alexander. It is ſaid to have produced other illuſtrious men before, as Moreri relates after Lorenzo Craſſo. Every one knows the banter of Balzac. Was there not once, ſays he (2), in the kingdom of Naples a Grammarian and Civilian who called himſelf ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO? Can any thing be imagined more grand and noble than to be doubly Alexander, to have Alexander for his name, and alſo for his title (3)?

(1) Simon Goulart has done it in the verſion of Philip Camerarius.

(2) Balzac, Preface to the Socrate Chrétien.

(3) To ſpeak properly he ſhould have ſaid, that Alexander was both his chriſtian and ſirname. We ſee inſtances of the ſame in other perſons. See Mollerus in his treatiſe De Scriptoribus Homonymis.

[B] He flouriſhed about the end of the 15th Century, and beginning of the 16th.] What makes me ſay thus, is that our author, ſpeaking of the calamities of the kingdom of Naples, has brought them down to the death of Frederic, ſon of Ferdinand I (4), that is, to the year 1504; beſides he mentions Jovianus Pontanus, as one that was dead (5). Now Jovianus Pontanus did not die before 1505. They who place the death of our Alexander in 1494, have not took notice of this, in which point Moreri rather approves their account, than doubts of it.

(4) Alex. ab Alex. Genial. Dier. lib. 3. cap. 15. ſub fin. pag. 736.

(5) Id. ibid. l. 1. cap. 1.

[C] This is the reaſon that he alledges for renouncing the profeſſion of an Advocate.] I believe that in order to ſhew the full force of this reaſon, I muſt relate it in the author's own words: Quæ cum viderem, ſays he (6), patroniſque contra vim potentiorum aut gratiam nihil præſidii eſſe, nihil opis, fruſtra nos in legum controverſiis & ediſcendis tot caſuum varietatibus tam penſiculate editis, tantum laboris & vigiliarum ſuſcipere, tantoque nos ſtudio fatigari dicebam, cum ad ignaviſſimi impuriſſimique cujuſque temeritatem, qui juri dicendo præſideret, quem leges virum bonum eſſe volunt, non æquo jure ſed ad gratiam & libidinem judicia ferri, decretaque legum tanto conſilio edita convelli & labefactari viderem. i. e. "When I ſaw "that the advocates could not defend nor aſſiſt any "one againſt the power or favour of the mighty, I "ſaid it was in vain we took ſo much pains, and "were fatigued with ſo much ſtudy in controverſies of law and learning ſuch variety of caſes ſo "exactly reported; when I ſaw the judgments given, according to the temerity of every blundering "and corrupt perſon, who preſided over the laws, and "ought by the laws to have been a good man, and not "according to equity, but by favour and affection; and "the decrees which were made with ſo much conſideration, ſtrained and weakened." He did much better in forſaking the bar, than he would have done in imitating ſome other Advocates, who having loſt ſeveral good cauſes, reſolved to undertake the worſt. I read the other day, that one of the moſt famous Advocates of this age, whom his brethren asked why he took bad cauſes in hand, anſwered them laughing, that it was becauſe he had loſt many good ones. It is a ſorry excuſe, continues the author: an Advocate, who, after having examined a cauſe, finds it not juſtifiable, ought to give it up (7). I have found another place in the work of Alexander ab Alexandro, that ſhews the uprightneſs of his heart (8). One of his friends, ſeeing that he did not puſh his fortune, adviſed him to make uſe of expedients, which had ſucceeded ſo well with ſuch and ſuch as he named; they were all perſons, who had been raiſed by favour, to honours and prelacies, notwithſtanding the merit of their opponents, and who had obtained thoſe favours by unlawful means. Our author was no ſtranger to theſe examples, and he knew ſome ſtill worſe. He had ſeen, in his youth, a very honeſt man, learned both in Latin and Greek, who having done nothing but ſtruggled with an extreme poverty whilſt he truſted to his virtue and learning, took a reſolution of trying another way: he fell into a ſhameful employment, not fit to be named; and ſoon after grew rich and powerful, and obtained good benefices. Eo veſaniæ proceſſit, ut coactus inopiâ obſcœnis & libero homine indignis artibus vacaret, (quibus verò artibus non libet dicere: ita fœdæ & pudendæ ſunt,) confectaque fuit ſibi res ex ſententia, namque haud multo poſt & ſacerdotio & opibus auctus, affluens & beatus tranquilliſſimè vitam egit (9). But theſe examples could not ſhake our Advocate: he choſe rather to be contented with his mediocrity, than to risk his conſcience. Longè igitur multumque præſtat, ſatiuſque fuit uti ingenio meo, vacuumque his moleſtiis modico civilique cultu contentum eſſe, neque in ambitionem non neceſſariam incurrere, quam bona animi, ſi qua ſibi homo ſtudio & labore paravit, ea turpi quæſtu peſſimo exemplo fœdare (10). i. e. "It was "a great deal better to follow my own inclination, "and being free from theſe troubles to live con"tented with a moderate fortune, and not run into an "unneceſſary ambition, than to defile, with ſordid "gain, the goods of the mind, if a man has obtain"ed any by ſtudy and labour." The advice which was given him, is very like this:

(6) Id. ibid. l. 6. cap. 7.

(7) Journal des Savans 1690, p. 301 of the Dutch edition.

(8) Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dier. lib. 6. cap. 16.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris & carcere dignum,
Si vis eſſe aliquis. Probitas laudatur & alget (11).

(11) Juven. Sat. 1. ver. 73.

"Would'ſt

hardly one who mentions him [D]. We ſhould know very little of his life, if he had not related himſelf ſome particulars of it in his work (c). We read that he lodged at Rome in a houſe which was haunted (d). So that here we have a witneſs to quote to our unbelievers; a witneſs, I ſay, who boaſts of having ſeen, and who relates ſurpriſing particulars of the ghoſt that haunted this houſe; he ſays alſo, that when he was very young, he went to the Lectures of Philelphus, who explained at Rome the Tuſculan queſtions of Cicero (e). We may gather from the 21ſt chapter of the 4th book that he was at Rome when Nicholas Perot and Domitius Calderinus read their publick Lectures upon Martial [E]. I do not remember that he ever mentions the office of Protonotary of the kingdom of Naples, which ſome pretend he exerciſed with great reputation (f). I do not know when he died, but I know that they buried him in the Monaſtery of the Olivets (g). Every body has blamed him for the affectation he has ſhewed in not quoting the Authors who furniſhed him with what he wrote (h). Tiraqueau has remedied this defect by a learned Commentary which was printed at Lyons in 1587 (i). It was reprinted at Leyden in two volumes 8vo in 1673, with the notes of Denis Godfrey, Chriſtopher Colerus, and Nicholas Mercerus, upon the ſame text. I learn from Geſner's Bibliotheca that the edition which was printed at Paris of this work of Alexander ab Alexandro in 1532, was more correct than the others, and that Gerrard Morrhius of Campen who corrected it had collated the places, which the Author had taken from others, with the original. He muſt then have collated a great many things; for the ſix books of The Genial Days are hardly any thing but patched-work. It is a mixture of a multitude of collections concerning the hiſtory and cuſtoms of the ancient Greeks and Romans: There are alſo many grammatical queſtions in it: exactneſs is not there in its perfection [F]. I believe the French tranſlation which Bernard de la Roch made of it (k), has never yet been printed. The Author of the Bibliotheca Neapolitana has by no means ſucceeded in the article of our Alexander [G]; but the additions of Leonard Nicodemus are very curious upon this ſubject [H].

(c) Intitled, Genialium Dierum, lib. 6.
(d) Alex. ab Alex. Dier. Gen. lib. 5. cap. 23.
(e) Eum ego adoleſcentulus ſenem inter cæteros coævos meos colui & obſervavi. ib. lib. 1. c. 23.
(f) Panzir. de claris Leg. Interp. lib. 2. cap. 122.
(g) Leand. Albert. De Script. Ital. p. 277.
(b) Barclaius, de Regno, lib. 6. cap. 5. Cypræus, de Sponſal. cap. 13. num. 61; Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. p. 609. Meibomius, de vitâ Mæcenatis, pag. 138.
(i) Under the title of Semeſtria in Genialium Dierum Alexandri ab Alexandro lib. 6. It is a folio. It was reprinted at Francfort in 1594, in folio.
(k) La Croix du Maine, p. 476.

Alciat

"Would'ſt thou to honours and preferments climb,
"Be bold in miſchief, dare ſome mighty crime,
"Which dungeons, death, or baniſhment deſerves:
"For Virtue is but dryly prais'd and ſtarves.
Dryden.

He dedicated his book to the Duke of Atri. This Duke was very learned, as we ſhall ſee under AQUAVIVA.

[D] There is hardly any author of his time that makes mention of him.] However, if we may believe Moreri, all the great men of that age, as George of Trebizond, Theodore Gaza, Domitius Calderinus, Pontanus, &c. were his friends and admirers. All that we can gather from his own book, is that he heard in his youth the Lectures that Philelphus, who was then old, read at Rome (12); and that he was ſometimes with ſeveral learned men at the table of Jovianus Pontanus (13), Hermolaus Barbarus (14), Sannazarius (15), Gabriel Altilius (16), &c. It requires a more ſolid foundation than this to affirm that ſome perſons admire others. See the following note.

(12) Alex. ab Alex. l. 1. c. 23.
(13) Id. ib. l. 1. c. 1. See alſo lib. 3. c. 8.
(14) Ibid. lib. 3. cap. 1.
(15) Ib. l. 2. c. 1.
(16) Ib. lib. 5. cap. 1.

[E] He was at Rome, when Nicholas Perot and Domitius Calderinus read public Lectures there upon Martial.] This is all we can gather of what he reports concerning Nicholas Perot and Domitius Calderinus; for as to the great familiarity, that Panzirolus pretends he had with them (17), we muſt look for it elſewhere: and I cannot tell whether it is poſſible to find proofs of it. I queſtion if Panzirolus did not ſay it at random and upon his memory, without being aware that the memory is a mould wherein objects change their form very eaſily.

(17) Admodum familiaris fuit. Panzirol. de Claris Leg. Interp. lib. 2. cap. 122.

[F] The exactneſs of his work is not in its perfection.] I had rather ſay it on the teſtimony of one of his Commentators, than on my own word. Here follows what Nicholas Mercerus ſays: Eſt profectò, mi Linoceri (18), verum quod aiunt. Fuit Alexander vir eruditus & multæ lectionis: multa ad utilitatem publicam ſcripſit eleganter, multa tamen, ut hominum eſt infirmitas, minus accuratè vel memoriæ vitio, vel imprudentia lapſus. Quæ lectoribus indicari magni interfuit. i. e. "What they ſay, dear Linocer, is "true; Alexander was a learned man and of much "reading: he wrote many things elegantly for the "public good, but at the ſame time in many things, "as human nature is weak, he failed in accuracy, "either thro' the fault of his memory, or inadvertently, which it was neceſſary to apprize the reader of."

(18) This is he to whom he dedicated his notes.

I am not the only one, that finds fault with thoſe who give us Variorum editions, for retrenching the dedicatory Epiſtles and Prefaces (19). They ought all to do as is done in the laſt edition of Diogenes Laërtius (20). If this had been done in that of Alexander ab Alexandro, I could have given a better account of this author and his book.

(19) See Crenius, in the 1ſt chapter of the 1ſt Part of the Animadverſiones Philologicæ, and the note [R] of the article MAROT, at the end.
(20) That of Amſterdam in 1672. There are in it moſt of the Prefaces, &c. of the foregoing edition.

[G] The author of the Bibliotheca Neapolitana has not ſucceeded in the article of our Alexander.] He has contented himſelf with referring his readers to three or four other books (21); and did not know that Alexander Juriſconſultus Neapolitanus, author of the four Diſſertations of which he gives the title (22), is the ſame with Alexander ab Alexandro: ſo that he ſpeaks twice of the ſame man, without knowing that he is but one author. This is the title of the four Diſſertations: Alexandri, Juriſconſulti Neapolitani, Diſſertationes quatuor de Rebus admirandis, quæ in Italia nuper contigere: id eſt, de ſomniis, quæ à viris ſpectatæ fidei prodita ſunt, inibique de laudibus Juniani Maii ſomniorum conjectoris: de umbrarum figuris & falſis imaginibus: de illuſionibus malorum Dæmonum, qui diverſis imaginibus homines deluſere: de quibuſdam ædibus, quæ Romæ infames ſunt, ob frequentiſſimas lemures, & terrificas imagines, quas author ipſe ſingulis ferè noctibus in urbe expertus eſt: Romæ in 4to, abſque anno, nec apud quem. i. e. "Four Diſſertations on the wonderful things that have lately happened in Italy, viz. the dreams which have been related by credible perſons, and therein of the praiſes of Junianus Maius the Expounder of dreams: of the forms of ghoſts and of falſe apparitions: of the illuſions of evil Dæmons, that have deluded mankind with various apparitions: of ſome houſes at Rome, that are remarkable on account of frequent ghoſts, and terrible ſpectres, which the author himſelf has been witneſs of almoſt every night: printed at Rome in 4to, without any date or Printer's name." We ſhall ſee in the following note, that they are pieces which have been incorporated with the Dies Geniales.

(21) Nicolo Toppi, Bib. Napolet. pag. 6.
(22) Ib. p. 7.

[H] The additions of Leonard Nicodemus are very curious on this ſubject.] It is proved there that Alexander ab Alexandro is the author of the four Diſſertations, becauſe the greateſt part of the things they contain are to be read in the Dies Geniales: for example, what concerns the praiſes of Junianus Maius, and the preſages of dreams (23), is in the 11th chapter of the 1ſt book, where this Junianus is

(23) Its title is, Miracula de Somniis apud nonnullos cognita & comperta, & quæ ipſe expertus fui. i. e. "Miraculous dreams known and diſcovered by "my ſelf and "ſome others.

Alciat was of opinion that Alexander ab Alexandro was alive in 1521. I ſhall give his words, becauſe they contain the judgment that he made upon this writer [I].

is repreſented as a man, that had a croud of dreamers every day at his houſe, to whom he explained their dreams; and that after a very intelligible manner, that cauſed ſeveral to eſcape death, or great troubles. Read the 23d chapter of the 5th book (24), where you will find what regards the ſpectres and hobgoblins that tormented the author's own houſe. We have in Nicodemus's Additions the title of an edition in folio of the Dies Geniales, which I ſhould take for the firſt, if a paſſage of Alciat (25) did not hinder me. This is the title: Alexandri ab Alexandro Dies Geniales. Ne quis opus excudat denuo infra ſeptennium, ſub diris imprecationibus Apoſtolica autoritate interdictum eſt. At the end is, Romæ, in ædibus Jacobi Mazochii, Rom. Academiæ Bipliopolæ. Anno Virginei partûs 1522. Kalend. April. Pontif. S. D. N. de cujus nomine pontificali adhuc non conſtat, anno primo. Nicodemus relates a fragment of a letter of Jerom Niger (26), which is not very obliging, either to the Neapolitans in general, or our Alexander in particular. Quel libro d'Aleſſandro de gli Aleſſandri è intitolato Dies Geniales, a ſimilitudine delle Notti Attiche d'Aulo Gellio, e dè Saturnali di Macrobio, coſe cavate di quà e di là. Ed in vero ha molto del Napoletano, con ſopportazion del Sannazaro parlando. Vendeſi ſei carlini, al parer mio troppo caro. i. e. "Which book of Alexander ab Alexan- "dro is intitled Dies Geniales, in imitation of the "Noctes Atticæ of Aulus Gellius, and of the Satur- "nalia of Macrobius, compoſed of things pickt up "here and there. And in truth it has much of the "Neapolitan in it, to uſe Sannazarius's expreſſion. "If they are ſold for ſix Carlini*, in my opinion they "are too dear. I ſhall make an article of JUNIANUS MAIUS, the Artemidorus of his age.

(24) Leonar. Nicodem. has the 9th, which is wrong.

(25) I quote it in the note [I].

(26) This letter is dated from Rome, the 26th of June 1522.

* Carlino is a Neapolitan piece of money, whereof nine make four ſhillings ſterling.

[I] I ſhall give Alciat's words, becauſe they contain the judgment that he made of Alexander ab Alexandro.] I take them from a Letter, which was written from Milan the 6th of May 1521, and was printed in 1697 (27). Alexandri Juriſconſulti Neapolitani librum, quem ad nos miſiſti, diligenter legi. Vir eſt doctus & diligens, & non parum ſtudioſos adjuvabit. Suſpicor tamen eum quandoque falli..... Si is aliqua tecum familiaritate junctus eſt, velim ab eo exquiras, ut Alpheni juriſconſulti vetuſtiſſima ſcripta, commentarioſque ſenatus conſultorum, quæ vidiſſe ſe, emiſiſſeque Romæ ait, commodato det. Eorum autem mentionem facit capite quarto & ſeptimo primi libri: ſuſpicor enim neſcio quid Parrhaſianum, quem ſcis eos authores plerumque adducere ſolitum, quos nunquam viderat. i. e. "I have read diligently the book of "Alexander the Neapolitan Lawyer, which you "ſent me. He is a learned and diligent man, and "will be of no ſmall uſe to the ſtudious: I ſuſpect "however that he is ſometimes miſtaken.... If you "are acquainted with him, pray deſire him to lend "me Alphenus the Lawyer's moſt ancient writings, "and the Commentaries of the Senate's decrees, "which he ſays he has ſeen and put out at Rome. "He mentions them in the fourth and ſeventh chap- "ters of the firſt book; for I ſuſpect Parrhaſianus a "little, who you know is accuſtomed to quote au- "thors whom he has never ſeen.

(27) Epiſt. Gu- dii, &c. p. 91.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, King of Macedon. See MACEDON.
☞ALEXANDER VI, Pope. See BORGIA.
ALEXANDER VII, Pope. See CHIGI.
ALEXANDER VIII, Pope. See OTTOBONI.

☞ALEXANDER (NOEL or NATALIS), a Dominican Friar, and one of the moſt laborious writers of the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Roan in Normandy the 19th of January 1639. His parents, who were more remarkable for their probity, than for the circumſtances of their fortune, obſerved in him even from his infancy ſuch a ſtrength of judgment and memory, and ſo ſerious a turn of mind, as induced them to give him a learned education. After he had compleated his firſt ſtudies at Roan, he entered himſelf into the order of Dominican Friars, and was profeſſed there on the 9th of May 1655 (a), when he was but ſixteen years of age. Soon after this he was ſent to Paris in order to go through a courſe of Philoſophy and Divinity there in the Great Convent, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo particularly, that when he had compleated theſe ſtudies, he was appointed to teach Philoſophy in the ſame Convent. His merit now became known abroad; for being obliged to preſide in public acts and diſputations, he raiſed himſelf a reputation, which grew every day more illuſtrious. His employment in teaching Philoſophy and Divinity for twelve years together, did not ſo abſolutely engage his attention, as to make him neglect that of preaching, which is the chief deſign of the order he profeſſed. Several ſermons which he preached procured him no inconſiderable character; they were ſolid and extremely well compoſed; but as he had not that eaſe and volubility of ſpeaking which is expected in a Preacher, he ſoon diſcontinued his exerciſe of that function. His ſuperiors were of opinion, that it would be more proper for him to apply himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of the Scriptures and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. He fixed upon this employment, and was created Doctor of Sorbonne the 21ſt of February 1675, and the year following was choſen one of the Conventuals of St. James. Mr. Colbert gave him a conſiderable ſhare of his eſteem; and as that great Miniſter omitted nothing to compleat the education of the Abbé Colbert his ſon, who was afterwards Archbiſhop of Roan, he formed an aſſembly of perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed learning, whoſe conferences upon Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory might be of advantage to him. Father Alexander was invited to this aſſembly, and exerted himſelf ſo eminently in it, that he gained the particular friendſhip of that Prelate, who ſhewed him the utmoſt regard as long he lived. Theſe conferences give occaſion to our Author's deſign of writing an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. For being deſired to reduce them to writing, he performed it with ſo much accuracy, that the learned men, who compoſed that aſſembly, adviſed him to undertake a compleat body of Church Hiſtory. This he executed without any aſſiſtant or amanuenſis; he collected the materials and digeſted them himſelf, and wrote even the tables with his own hand. His firſt work was that in which he endeavours to prove againſt Mr. de Launoi, that St. Thomas Aquinas is the real Author of the Sum aſcribed to him, and attacked ſeveral of that Divine's maxims concerning uſury. This was printed at Paris 1675 in 8vo. The year following he publiſhed in Latin the firſt volume of a large work upon the principal points of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory [A]. It is intitled, Selecta Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ Capita, & in loca ejuſdem inſignia diſſertationes Hiſtoricæ, Chronologicæ, Dogmaticæ. This work contains twenty ſix volumes in 8vo, the

(a) Memoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 3. edit. de Paris 1727, p. 339.

[A] The principal points of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.] The firſt volume of this work contains the Hiſtory of the firſt age of the Church, and gives an account of the perſecutions, which it ſuffered, the ſucceſſion of Popes, the hereſies which aroſe, the Councils which condemn'd them, the writers in favour of Chriſtianity, and the Kings, and Emperors, who reigned during the firſt Century. To this are ſubjoined Diſſertations upon ſuch points as have been the occaſion of diſpute in Hiſtory, Chronology, Criticiſm, or Doctrine. The author writes in an eaſy ſtyle; the paſſages are quoted at length, and the objections propoſed and reſolved by arguments and diſtinctions after the ſcholaſtic manner. And he has obſerved the ſame method in all the reſt of his work. There are twenty eight Diſſertations in the firſt volume. Some of them are hiſtorical, upon the Birth, Baptiſm, Life, and Death of our Saviour. He aſſerts that St. Paul planted the firſt Church in Spain, and proves that St. James was never in that country. But he maintains the arrival of Mary Magdalen, and Martha, and Lazarus in Provence, and the miſſion of St. Dionyſius the Areopagite in France, either becauſe he had not yet diveſted himſelf of thoſe popular opinions, as Mr. Dupin obſerves (1), or becauſe he did not think proper to declare himſelf. In his critical Diſſertations he rejects the Liturgies of St. Peter, St. James, St. Matthew, and St. Mark, and the falſe Decretals of the Popes, and ſeveral ſpurious writings, and even the Sibylline Oracles, which we have at preſent, but not thoſe quoted by the Fathers, which he ſuppoſes to have been different from ours. The laſt ſix Diſſertations are a collection of what the Fathers wrote againſt the errors of Simon Magus, Saturninus, Baſilides, Cerinthus, Ebion, and the Nicolaitans. The Hiſtory of the ſecond Century was publiſhed the ſame year 1677, in two volumes. He has employed three Diſſertations in confuting what Mr. Daillé has written with regard to faſting, lent, confirmation, and the uſe of the Fathers. He examines in another Diſſertation what relates to the famous queſtion concerning the time of celebrating Eaſter, which began in this Century. He affirms that Montanus and the pure Montaniſts never advanced any thing contrary to the orthodox notion of the Trinity. He defends the doctrine of Juſtin Martyr, Irenæus, and Clemens Alexandrinus. He owns that Tertullian was a Montaniſt. He treats of the verſion of the Septuagint, and approves of the opinion of thoſe, who affirm, that tho' theſe interpreters were confined to different cells, yet their ſeveral verſions agreed in all reſpects. The third Century was not publiſhed till 1678. We find there a defence of Pope Zephirin againſt thoſe, who have accuſed him of favouring the Montaniſts. The author treats very largely of public penance, and is of the ſame opinion with Father Morin, that it was uſed even for private faults in the firſt ſix ages of the Church, and never diſcontinued till the ſeventh Century. He likewiſe anſwers the authorities, which Mr. Petit had alledged to prove the contrary in a Diſſertation, which he had ſubjoined to his edition of the Penitential of Theodorus. He examines into the origin and progreſs of the famous diſpute between Pope Stephen and St. Cyprian concerning the rebaptizing of thoſe, who had been baptized by heretics. He ſhews that St. Cyprian and the Biſhops of Africa never conſidered this queſtion as a point of faith, and affirms, that Pope Stephen never pretended to authorize the validity of the Baptiſm of Heretics, when it was adminiſtred in a different form from that preſcribed in the Goſpel. He has collected in three Diſſertations what relates to the life, manners, ordination, fall, errors, and Defenders of St. Cyprian. The Hiſtory of the fourth age is ſo very extenſive, that it is no wonder that our author could find matter ſufficient to compile three volumes, and ſubjects for five and forty Diſſertations printed at Paris in 1679 (2). In the three following years he publiſhed his Hiſtory of the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th Centuries, and that of the 11th and 12th Centuries in 1683. In theſe volumes are ſeveral Diſſertations againſt Mr. Daillé. He treats in ſome of them of thoſe queſtions, which relate to the diſputes between the Princes and the Popes, and he rejects the opinion of Cardinal Baronius and Bellarmin in thoſe points, and adheres to the ſentiments of the Divines of France. This expoſed him to the reſentments of the Court of Rome, which iſſued out a Decree againſt his writings in 1684. However he publiſhed the ſame year in three volumes the Hiſtory of the 13th and 14th Centuries, in which he continued to defend the rights of Kings againſt the pretenſions of that Court; but he declares himſelf very ſtrongly in favour of thoſe Princes, who employed fire and ſword againſt the Albigenſes. Our author at laſt compleated this work in 1686 by publiſhing four volumes, which contain the Hiſtory of the 15th and 16th Centuries. He appears in theſe volumes equally averſe to the pretenſions of the Court of Rome, and attached to the maxims of France, as in the former. He obſerves, that Pope Julius II paſſed the limits of his authority, when he put the city of Lyons under an interdict on account of the Council of Piſa, and endeavoured to remove the fair, which was kept in the city of Geneva. He pretends, that this Pope never made any Decree for diveſting John d'Albret of the kingdom of Navarre; and tho' he had done it, yet that would not be a juſt title for the Kings of Spain to claim it. He ſhews likewiſe, that no advantage can be drawn in favour of the Pope's power over the temporalities of Kings from the conduct of Paul III againſt Henry VIII of England, that of Pius IV againſt Joan of Navarre, that of Pius V againſt Queen Elizabeth, and that of Sixtus V againſt Henry * then King of Navarre; nor from the Monitory of the ſame Pope againſt Henry III of France, nor the Acts of Gregory XIV againſt Henry the Great. He mentions the Edict, which the Emperor Sigiſmond gave in the general Diet at Ulme in 1534, by which he declared, that the Church, even when it is aſſembled in a general Council, has no right of judging cauſes relating to Fiefs. He applies this to the queſtion concerning the Regale, and defends Lewis XI againſt Gobelin, who accuſes that King of having incroached upon the juriſdiction of the Church. He gives likewiſe an account of the doctrines of the Huſſites, Lutherans, Calviniſts and Socinians. The ſubject of his moſt conſiderable Diſſertations is the ſchiſm of the Popes, which gave occaſion to the Councils of Piſa and Conſtance, with the Hiſtory of theſe Councils and thoſe of Baſil, Florence, the Lateran, and Trent, and an account of the pragmatic Sanction and Concordat. He pretends that during the ſchiſm of the Popes, thoſe, who obeyed one or other of the parties, were not ſchiſmatics any more than the Popes of the two Sees. He commends the zeal and endeavours of the Gallican Church, and eſpecially of the Sorbonne, for the extinction of the ſchiſm. He proves that the Councils of Piſa, Conſtance, and Baſil, were general. He treats of the authority and ſenſe of the 4th and 5th ſeſſions of the Council of Conſtance concerning the authority of general Councils; and adhering in that point to the ancient doctrine of the Gallican Church and that of the Sorbonne, as Mr. Dupin obſerves (3), he refutes what had been advanced upon that ſubject, not only by Bellarmin and his followers, but likewiſe by the anonymous author of the book intitled De Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, printed at Liege in 1624. He maintains the independence of the power of Kings with regard to the temporalities of their kingdoms; and he explains the opinion of the Council of Conſtance upon that point, and anſwers a book, which a Licentiate of Lovain, whoſe name was Enghien, and

(1) Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 19. p. 194. edit. Amſterd 1715.

(2) Dupin, ubi ſupra, p. 95.

* He is the ſame with Henry the Great mentioned hereafter.

(3) Ubi ſupra, p. 97.

the four laſt of which were not publiſhed till 1686. There have been ſeveral editions of it (b). In 1689 he publiſhed a work of the ſame kind upon the Old Teſtament [B], in ſix volumes in 8vo. While he was engaged in theſe works, there was a Critique upon and who was a Monk of his own Order, wrote againſt him, intitled De Auctoritate Sedis Apoſtolicæ in Reges, i. e. "Of the Authority of the Apoſtolical "See over Kings." The Hiſtory of the Council of Trent takes up a great part of the laſt volume. He endeavours to prove it to have been an œcumenical or general Council, and to anſwer the objections of Father Paul and Du Moulin.

(b) The P. 345.

[B] Upon the Old Teſtament.] This work extends from the Creation of the world to the Birth of Chriſt. He divided this period of time into ſix ages; the two firſt of which he treats of in the firſt volume. The firſt age extends from the creation to the deluge. Father Alexander gives the Hiſtory according to three different ſchemes, that of Moſes, Joſephus, and the Heathen Writers; but the firſt is the only true one, the other two having been mixed with the ridiculous imaginations of the Jewiſh Doctors, or the groſs errors of the Pagan Theology. To this he has ſubjoined ten Diſſertations. In the third Diſſertation he confutes the ſyſtem of Peyrere, who affirmed that there were men and women before Adam: in the fourth he vindicates the polygamy of the Patriarchs: in the fifth he ſhews in oppoſition to ſome Rabbins, that Enoch's tranſlation is not to be underſtood of death; and he mentions the book aſcribed to that Patriarch. In the 8th he prefers the Chronology of the Hebrew text to that of the Septuagint, and defends it againſt the author of the book entitled, The Antiquity of Times reſtored. He ſhews in the laſt Diſſertation, that according to the dimenſions which Moſes has given to the Ark, it was capable of containing all the ſeveral ſpecies of animals, with the food neceſſary to ſupport them during the flood. The ſecond Age extends from the flood to the calling of Abraham. The author gives the Hiſtory of it in the ſame method as in the former, and ſubjoins ſix Diſſertations. But he has not obſerved exactly the ſame method in the ſecond volume as in the firſt. He gives in the firſt chapter the Hiſtory of the 430 years, which followed the calling of Abraham to the Iſraelites departure from Egypt, as it is repreſented in the Scriptures; and he endeavours to reconcile Moſes's account with what St. Stephen ſays in the Acts of the Apoſtles concerning Abraham's ſepulchre. In the ſecond chapter he repreſents the changes and alterations, which the Jews and Heathens made in the Hiſtory of that Age. He ſhews the error of Juſtin the Hiſtorian, who ſays that Abraham reigned in Damaſcus. The account, which the Jewiſh Doctors give of his ſacrificing Iſaac is full of prodigious fables. They tell us, that while Abraham was leading his ſon to offer him up, the Devil ſtood by Iſaac's ſide, and endeavoured to diſſuade him from ſubmitting to death; but that Iſaac in order to expiate the crime, which he had committed, of diſobedience to his parents, reſigned himſelf to that puniſhment, and that his ſubmiſſion in ſuffering his father to bind him, was conſidered as very meritorious in him before God. They add, that when Sarah heard, that Abraham had carried away her ſon in order to ſacrifice him, ſhe expired with grief. They imagine likewiſe, that the ram, which was offered in the room of Iſaac, was as old as the world, and was created the evening of the ſixth day. The Pagans, ſays our author, ſeem to have had ſome knowledge of this ſacrifice, and to have copied it in their ſtories of Iphigenia, Helena, and Valeria Luperca. The Mahometans have alſo mentioned Abraham in their manner, and pretend that he was born in a miraculous way, and profeſſed their Religion, and diſputed with Nimrod concerning the Unity of God, and the reſurrection of the body; and at laſt he left his own country and ſettled at Mecca, where he laid the foundations of a temple. The ignorance of the Heathens with regard to the father and mother of Melchiſedeck, occaſioned them to affirm, that he was the ſon of Heracloes and Aſtarte, that is, of the Sun and the Earth, of whom all mankind are in ſome meaſure the offſpring. They had likewiſe heard ſome account of the burning of Sodom, and the change of Lot's wife into a pillar of ſalt, which ſeems to have given riſe to the fable of Niobe. In the third chapter he treated of the origin of thoſe kingdoms, which were raiſed during the third Age of the world. He enlarges much more upon that of Egypt, than thoſe of Greece. He gives an ample account of the Studies, Religion, and Government of the Egyptians. They applied themſelves particularly to Arithmetic, Geometry, Aſtronomy, and Phyſic. Their Religion was full of exceſſive ſuperſtitions, which prevented their form of government from being very exact and rational, and render'd the adminiſtration of juſtice among them not ſo equitable as it ſhould be. Their Judges uſed to wear an image of truth in a diamond, which hung upon their necks by a gold chain. In treating of the Theology of the Egyptians, he rejects the opinion of a learned man, who affirms, that Moſes was rank'd by thoſe people among the Gods, under the name of Oſiris and Apis; and he thinks there is no foundation for ſuppoſing with other writers that Apis and Serapis were the ſymbols, under which the Egyptians honoured Joſeph as a God. Theſe three chapters are followed by ſixteen Diſſertations upon ſeveral queſtions relating to the ſacred Hiſtory of that time. He endeavours to confute the opinion of thoſe who follow Herodotus, and aſcribe the origin of Circumciſion to the Egyptians; and he affirms, that we are not to aſcribe to the cuſtoms of the Canaanites Abraham's reſolution to ſacrifice his ſon, or the law, which obliged a man to marry his brother's widow, when he died without children. He likewiſe refutes Rabbi Maimonides and Sir John Marſham, upon the ſubject of fornication, which he ſhews to have been always prohibited among the Jews. The following volumes upon the Old Teſtament were publiſhed in 1689. The 3d and 4th contain the Hiſtory of the fourth Age of the world, with ſeveral Diſſertations. This Age begins with the Jews departure from Egypt, and ends with the building of the temple. He gives firſt the Scripture Hiſtory of this Age, and then ſhews the alterations, which the Jews have made in it. Joſephus ſeems to doubt whether the paſſage thro' the Red Sea is to be aſcribed to the miraculous interpoſition of God, or to mere natural cauſes. Some of the Rabbins were of opinion, that the Jews did not croſs the ſea, but only juſt enter'd it, and then took a circuit about, and ſo gained the oppoſite ſide. Aben Ezra imagined, that the ſea open'd twelve different paſſages thro' it for the twelve tribes. Joſephus takes no notice of the Jews worſhipping the golden calf; and Philo extenuates the crime as much as poſſible, by transferring it from the people in general to a ſmall number of them. Rabbi Solomon aſcribes it to the Egyptian proſelytes alone; and Tanchuma accuſes only Jannes and Mambres. The Life of Joſhua, and the Hiſtory of the Judges and Kings, have received no leſs alterations from the Jews, than the Life of Moſes, as Father Alexander ſhews in many inſtances. The changes, which the Heathens have made in this Hiſtory, are ſtill more enormous. The departure of the Jews from Egypt is ſurprizingly diſguiſed in the accounts of Manetho, Appion, Symmachus, Juſtin, Tacitus, and other profane Hiſtorians. Some of them tell us, that the Jews were baniſhed by the King of Egypt on account of the leproſy. Appion writes, that after ſix days journey they found ſuch dreadful ulcers in their lower parts, that they were obliged to ſtop and reſt themſelves; and from thence came the day of reſt, and the inſtitution of the ſabbath. The Heathens have likewiſe applied what the ſacred writings ſpeak of Moſes to Mercury, Bacchus, Typhon, and their other Heroes. Our author has alſo given us the profane Hiſtory of this fourth Age: and particularly the Chronology and Hiſtory of the Kings, who reigned at thoſe times in Egypt, Phenicia, Aſſyria, Argos, and Crete. He fixes the time, when letters were firſt introduced into Greece; when the Iſthmian games were inſtituted; when the Amazons diſtinguiſhed on the firſt volumes of his Selecta Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ Capita undertaken, which was afterwards ſuppreſſed [C]. He met likewiſe with another difficulty from the Court of Rome, which publiſhed in 1684 a decree againſt his writings [D]. In 1678 he publiſhed ſtinguiſhed themſelves by their prodigious exploits; when Troy was taken; and when Carthage was founded, which ſhews that Æneas and Dido never ſaw each other. He has given us likewiſe twenty ſix Diſſertations; in the third of which he endeavours to prove in oppoſition to Sir John Marſham and Dr. Spencer, that the Jewiſh ceremonies were not derived from the Heathens, and that the Urim and Thummin were not Teraphim. He treats at large in another Diſſertation upon the Government, Laws, Judgments and Magiſtrates of the Jews; and in others he examines who were the authors of the Pentateuch, the Pſalms, and other ſacred books, which were written in that Age, and he attempts in two others to adjuſt the points of Chronology, which relate to the books of Joſhua and Judges. The fifth volume contains the fifth age of the world, which begins with the building of the temple, and ends with the captivity of the Jews in Babylon. He endeavours to reconcile as far as poſſible the ſeeming contradictions in the Scriptures with regard to the years of the reigns of the Kings of Iſrael and Judah. He mentions the fictions of the Egyptians concerning the Queen of Sheba, who, as they affirm, had a ſon by Solomon, whoſe name at firſt was Nulich, and afterwards David, and who founded the kingdom of the Abyſſins. He likewiſe quotes another Fable concerning that Queen from Peter Comeſtor's Hiſtory, which is to this purpoſe; that this Queen having informed Solomon that there was a tree in a foreſt in Paleſtine, upon which a man was to be fixed, whoſe death would occaſion the deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation; Solomon, in order to avert this misfortune, ordered this tree to be buried very deep under ground, where it communicated to the water of the pool a ſecret virtue of healing diſeaſes; and that it is thought, our Saviour's Croſs was made of this tree. Solomon's letters to Vafres King of Egypt, and Suren King of Phenicia, with their anſwers, are ſpurious, as appears from the difference of the times, when Solomon and Vafres lived, ſince the latter was contemporary with Zedekiah. Father Alexander has given a ſhort account of the Hiſtory of the World, with the ſucceſſion of the Kings of Egypt, Aſſyria, Chaldea, and Tyre, and of the Archons of Athens, Corinth, Lacedemon and Argos. We are informed there of their wars, and eſpecially of thoſe, which ſome of theſe Princes had with the Jews, with the different ſucceſs of their arms, and the progreſs and decay of their ſtates. The origin of the Olympiads is diſcovered, with a diſtinction of the true Olympiads, the Epocha of which is the ſame with that of Iphitus, who inſtituted the Olympic games, from the Vulgar, the Epocha of which is taken only from the time when the Chronologiſts begun to reckon by Olympiads. The laws of Solon are explained in a very ample manner, with the motives, which induced him to compile them. As the Roman Empire eſtabliſhed itſelf upon the ruin of that of the Greeks, our author has only given an account of the riſe of the Romans, and the firſt attempts of their arms under five of their Kings, the laſt of whom was Tarquin the Elder, who reigned at the end of the fifth Age, when the Jews were carried into captivity. To this Hiſtory are ſubjoined eleven Diſſertations. In the firſt he endeavours to ſhew againſt a modern writer, that Solomon in building of the temple, did not imitate the Egyptians or other idolatrous Nations, but followed the expreſs command of God. St. Chryſoſtom in one of his Homilies does not ſcruple to ſay, that God permitted Solomon to take his model from the temple in Egypt, in order to accommodate himſelf in ſome meaſure to their weakneſs. But our author rejects this opinion. He examines in the ſecond the queſtion concerning Solomon's ſalvation; and in the third what the books are which he was the author of. He proves in the fifth Diſſertation that the golden calves were not either ſymbols of the true God, or monuments erected in honour of Joſeph's memory, but idols formed upon the model of thoſe in Egypt. In the ninth he reconciles the Books of Kings and Chronicles with the Goſpels of St. Matthew and St Luke with regard to the Genealogy of Chriſt. The tenth is employed in giving an account of the lives of the Prophets, eſtabliſhing their authority, and explaining the accompliſhment of their propheſies. The laſt volume is upon the ſixth Age of the world. It contains the Hiſtory of the ſeventy years of the Jewiſh captivity, and of what paſſed till the time of the Maccabees, and under the Maccabees and Herod till our Saviour's Birth. Our author has purſued the ſame method as in the former volumes, and added ten Diſſertations. The firſt is upon the Prophets, who wrote in this ſixth Age, and particularly upon Daniel, whom he proves to be the author of the book under his name, of which he pretends the Hiſtory of Suſannah and of Bel and the Dragon are genuine parts. In the ſecond he explains the prophecy of the ſeventy weeks of Daniel, and endeavours to ſhew its accompliſhment in the perſon of Chriſt. In the third he fixes the beginning and the end of the ſeventy years captivity. In the fourth he treats of three queſtions concerning Eſdras. 1. Whether he renewed the ſacred writings? 2. Whether he was the Author of the points in the Hebrew language? and 3. Whether the Cabala was invented by him? With regard to the firſt he is of opinion, that Eſdras did not compile the ſacred books anew, but only reviſed and corrected them. As for the ſecond queſtion, he ſuppoſes that the points are much later than him, and were invented by the Maſſorites. And with reſpect to the third, that Eſdras underſtood the Cabala, if we mean by it the myſtical ſenſe of the Scripture; but if we mean the Cabaliſtic art of the modern Jews, which conſiſts in changing and throwing together in their manner the different letters of the ſacred writings, it is ridiculous to aſcribe the invention of it to Eſdras. He treats in the other Diſſertations of the Authors of the books of Scripture which were written in the ſixth age, and of the verſion of the Septuagint. In the ninth he treats of the country of Herod, and aſſerts that he was an Idumean, and therefore might be conſidered as a ſtranger among the Jews. He ends with a criticiſm upon the paſſage in Joſephus concerning Chriſt, which he affirms to be genuine.

[C] A Critique upon the firſt volume of his Selecta Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ Capita, undertaken, which was afterwards ſuppreſſed.] Several perſons had a deſign to make critical remarks upon this work, and to treat of the greateſt part of the ſame queſtions, but in a more conciſe manner, and with greater freedom, and without any ſcholaſtic terms, retrenching what ſeemed to them of leſs importance. A Doctor of Paris and a young Gentleman, who was then but a Batchelor of Divinity, but very converſant in the ancient Fathers and the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the firſt ages, proceeded upon this ſcheme; and having finiſhed the three firſt Centuries, and begun the fourth, gave their copy into the hands of a perſon who begun to print it at Roan, with the approbation of the Doctors and the permiſſion of the Magiſtrates, under this title, Animadverſions upon the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Father Noel Alexander. This being known alarmed Father Alexander's Bookſeller much more than the Author himſelf. He applied to ſeveral perſons in power, in order to prevent this work from being publiſhed and continued. There was no refuſing them a thing which they had a right as it were to demand; and the Bookſeller took upon him the payment of the charges of the impreſſion. All the ſheets which were printed, and which made a moderate volume in 8vo, were deſtroyed in his preſence, and the work ſo effectually ſuppreſſed, that there remained only one or two imperfect copies, which were ſaved by ſome curious perſons from the ſheets which had been given to the Grocers (4).

(4) Dupin, ubi ſupra, p. 95.

[D] A decree againſt his writings.] Theſe books of his being publiſhed at a time when there were great conteſts between the Court of Rome and the King of France, concerning the Regale and the propoſitions ed three Diſſertations, the firſt concerning the ſuperiority of Biſhops over Preſbyters againſt Blondell; the ſecond concerning the celibacy of the Clergy, and reconciling the hiſtory of Paphnutius with the Canon of the Council of Nice; and the third concerning the vulgate verſion of the Scriptures. The ſame year he printed a diſſertation concerning ſacramental confeſſion againſt Mr. Daillé in 8vo. In 1682 he wrote an apology for his Diſſertation upon the vulgate tranſlation abovementioned againſt father Claudius Fraſſen. He publiſhed likewiſe in 1680 three Diſſertations in defence of St. Thomas Aquinas, the firſt againſt Henſchenius and Papebroch, to ſhew that the Office of the holy Sacrament was written by him; the ſecond in the manner of a Dialogue between a Dominican and a Franciſcan, to confute the common opinion, that Alexander of Hales was St. Thomas Aquinas's maſter, and that the latter borrowed his Secunda Secundæ from the former; the third is a Panegyric upon Aquinas. In 1693 he publiſhed his Theologia Dogmatica & Moralis ſecundum ordinem Catechiſmi Concilii Tridentini in quinque libros tributa. i. e. "Poſitive and moral Divinity according to the "Order of the Catechiſm of the Council of Trent in five books," printed at Paris in ten volumes in 8vo, and at Venice in 1698. But the Author having added in 1701 another volume, they were printed together at Paris in two volumes in folio in 1703, with a collection of Latin Letters, which had been printed ſeparately. In 1703 he publiſhed a Commentary upon the four Goſpels [E] in folio, and in 1710 he publiſhed at Roan another upon St. Paul's and the ſeven Canonical Epiſtles. He wrote likewiſe a Commentary of the ſame kind upon the Prophets Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and Baruch, which was never printed (c). We ſhall mention the reſt of his works in note [F]. In the year 1706 he was made Provincial for the Province of Paris. His whole life was ſpent in the moſt intenſe application to his ſtudies, ſo that he very ſeldom went out of his Convent upon any occaſion. Towards the latter part of his life, he was afflicted with the loſs of his ſight, a very diſtreſsful circumſtance to a man, whoſe whole delight was in ſtudy, yet he bore it with great calmneſs and reſignation. He died merely by a decay of nature the 21ſt of Auguſt 1724, in the eighty ſixth year of his age (d). His piety, humility, and diſintereſtedneſs rendered him the object of general eſteem. He poſitions of the aſſembly of the French Clergy in 1682, it is no wonder that writings, which aſſerted ſo openly the rights of France, that they would undoubtedly have been put into the Index Expurgatorius at another time, ſhould be condemned by a decree of Pope Innocent XI dated the 13th of July 1684. No particular error is pointed at, but all the writings of Father Alexander in general are condemned with a prohibition againſt reading, keeping, or printing them, &c. under pain of excommunication ipſo facto, reſerved to the Pope. What is moſt extraordinary is, that the Court of Rome was not ſatisfied with condemning only thoſe volumes of his hiſtory, which might appear offenſive to it, and even all the ſixteen volumes intirely, from the firſt to the twelfth Century inclufively, but it likewiſe fulminated its cenſures expreſly againſt ſix other Diſſertations, and even that which he had written in favour of that Court againſt Mr. de Launoi's book concerning Simony (5). However we find that his Hiſtory was eſteemed at Rome, and the Cardinals Cibo, d'Eſtrees, Urſini, Noris, and ſeveral others wrote to him letters in very obliging terms, and full of the higheſt commendations. And this cenſure did not hinder his works from being extremely valued and read in Italy (6).

(c) Ibid. p. 351.

(d) Ibid. p. 343.

(5) Id. ib. p. 96.

(6) Id. ib. p. 97.

[E] A Commentary upon the four Goſpels.] Upon every chapter he gives the literal and the moral ſenſe ſeparately. His method is to compare theſe paſſages which have relation to each other, and to give from the Fathers the explication of thoſe paſſages. He pretends to advance nothing of his own. He follows the vulgate tranſlation, and never quotes any profane Authors, or even any Catholic writers, who have given a new ſenſe to any paſſages of Scripture. He dedicated this work to the Pope, and ſubmitted in his preface to the judgment of the holy See all the works which he had hitherto written.

[F] We ſhall mention the reſt of his works in Note [F.] Statuta Facultatis Artium Thomiſticæ in Collegio Pariſienſi Fratrum prædicatorum inſtituta, at Paris, 1683, in 12o. Inſtitutio Concionatorum tripartita, ſeu præcepta & regulæ ad prædicatores informandos, cum ideis ſeu rudimentis concionum per totum annum. This piece concerning rules for preaching was enlarged and corrected from the firſt edition in 1701, and publiſhed at Paris 1702 in 8vo. Abregé de la Foy & de la Morale de l'Egliſe tirée de l'Ecriture Sainte; i. e. "An Abridgment of the Faith and "Morality of the Church taken from the holy Scrip-"tures." Paris 1686, in 12mo, and 1688 in two volumes. Eclairciſſement des pretendues difficultez propoſees a Monſeigneur l'Archevêque de Rouen ſur pluſieurs points importans de la Morale de Jeſus Chriſt, 1697 in 12mo. Mr. Colbert Archbiſhop of Roan having recommended to his Clergy among other books, the Theologia Dogmatica & Moralis of Father Alexander, a Divine of his dioceſs propoſed ſome objections to him relating to that work, which obliged our Author to publiſh an explanation of his doctrine in the book abovementioned. He wrote likewiſe ſix Letters in anſwer to ſix others written by Father Daniel, in which he drew a parallel between the doctrine of the Jeſuits, and that of the Thomiſts concerning morality and grace. A Letter to a Doctor of Sorbonne upon the diſpute concerning probability, and the errors in a theſis in Divinity maintained by the Jeſuits in their College at Lyons the 26th of Auguſt, printed at Mons 1697, in 12mo. A ſecond Letter upon the ſame Subject 1697, in 12mo. An Apology for the Dominican Miſſionaries in China, or an Anſwer to a book of Father Tellier the Jeſuit intitled, A Defence of the new Chriſtians, and to an Explanation publiſhed by Father Gobien of the ſame Society, concerning the Honours which the Chineſe pay to Confucius and to the Dead, printed at Cologne 1699, in 12mo. With a Latin Tract intitled, Documenta controverſiam Miſſionariorum Apoſtolicorum Imperii Sinici de cultu præſertim Confucii Philoſophi, & progenitorum defunctorum ſpectantia, ac Apologiam Dominicanorum Miſſionis Sinicæ Miniſtrorum adverſus R. R. P. P. le Tellier & le Gobien, Societatis Jeſu confirmantia. i. e. "Inſtructions relating to the Contro-"verſy of the Apoſtolical Miſſionaries in the King-"dom of China, concerning the worſhip of Confu-"cius the Philoſopher and their dead anceſtors, and "confirming the Apology of the Dominican Miſſi-"onaries in China, againſt the books of Father le "Tellier, and Father le Gobien, of the Society of "Jeſus." This work was tranſlated into Italian, and printed in that language at Cologne in 12mo the ſame year. The Conformity between the Chineſe Ceremonies and the Greek and Roman idolatry, in order to confirm the Apology of the Dominican Miſſionaries in China, 1700, in 12mo. Tranſlated into Italian, and printed at Cologne in 8vo. He wrote likewiſe ſeven Letters to the Jeſuits Le Comte and Dez upon the ſame ſubject, which were tranſlated into Italian, and printed in that language at Cologne in 1700, in 8vo, with this Title, Lettere intorno alle Idolatrie & Superſtizioni della Sina; i. e. "Letters "concerning the Idolatry and Superſtitions of "China. T.

He was honoured with the friendſhip of the moſt learned Prelates of France. His opinion was always conſidered as of great weight upon the moſt important ſubjects, which were debated in the Sorbonne. He was likewiſe highly valued at Rome; the learned Cardinals Noris and Aguirre diſtinguiſhed him upon ſeveral occaſions. Pope Innocent XI ſhewed the regard which he had for his works, by a letter which Cardinal Cibo wrote to him in his name. There were likewiſe preſerved fourteen letters from Pope Benedict XIII, which he wrote when he was Cardinal; in one of which he tells him, that the earthquake, which happened at Benevento the 5th of June 1688, had demoliſhed his archiepiſcopal palace, and deſtroyed his Library; but that he had very fortunately recovered father Alexander's works, which were worth a whole Library to him (e).

(e) Ib. p. 343, 344.

ALEXIS, a Piedmonteſe. There is a book of Secrets, which for a long time has gone under the name of this Alexis. It was printed at Baſil in 8vo in the year 1563, tranſlated out of Italian into Latin by Wecher (a). It has alſo been tranſlated into French, and printed ſeveral times with additions. There is a preface to it, where Seigneur Alexis ſhewed the publick that he was born of a noble family, that from his childhood he applied himſelf to ſtudy; that he had learnt Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabick, and ſeveral other languages; that having had above all an extream paſſion to know the ſecrets of nature he had gathered as many of them as he could during his travels, which laſted fifty ſeven years; that he piqued himſelf upon not communicating his ſecrets to any body, but that when he was eighty two years and ſeven months old, having ſeen at Milan a poor ſick man die, whom he could have cured, if he had communicated his ſecret to the Surgeon who took care of him, he was touched with ſo great a remorſe of conſcience, that he became almoſt an Hermit; and it was in this ſolitude that he placed his ſecrets in ſuch an order as to make them fit to be publiſhed. The Hawkers carried them through the country fairs, with their other little books covered with blew. It is true they have only the ſelect remedies of Seigneur Alexis of Piedmont; the entire collection would be too big a volume for them.

(a) Mercklin. in Lindenio renovato, p. 23.

☞ALEXIIS (ALEXIUS DE) an eminent Phyſician in Italy in the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Rome, and educated in polite Learning; after which he applied himſelf to Philoſophy and Phyſic, which latter art he ſtudied under Marſilius Gagnatus, an excellent Phyſician. Having finiſhed his ſtudies, he obtained a licence to practiſe Phyſick from the College of Phyſicians at Rome, which employment he proſecuted with great vigour. However he was diverted from it not long after by an accident, which gave an unaccountable turn to his mind. He had received a conſiderable injury from one of the Pope's guards, which he reſented ſo highly, that he threw off the habit and practice of a Phyſician, aſſumed a military dreſs, in which he went about the country, and committed a thouſand ſtrange frolicks [A]. Janus Nicius Erythræus (a) who relates this ſtory, has a remarkable obſervation upon it [B]. But at laſt he broke through this extravagant humour, and returned to his former employment, which he proſecuted with ſo much application, that he aton'd for the intermiſſion which the fire of his youth had occaſioned. He became ſo eminent in the art of Phyſic, that he had a great many ſcholars, who afterwards were celebrated in that faculty. He always carried them with him when he viſited the ſick, that they might learn from experience as well as from precept, and ſee the practice, which is infinitely more inſtructive than the theory alone. He lived in a very noble and ſplendid manner;

(a) Pinacotheca III. c. 60. pag. 767. edit. Lipſ. 1712.

[A] Committed a thouſand ſtrange frolicks.] He collected a company of young fellows of proſtitute characters, and became their Captain. He went with them from Rome, and ranged all the country round; and when he came to any town, he immediately called the people together, and made a ſpeech to them; being Maſter of a copious and flowing eloquence, and an exquiſite talent of wit and humour. By this means he ſo highly charmed the populace, in every place which he went to, that they crowded to hear him, and never left him, till he was tired of haranguing them. He uſed likewiſe to entertain them with acting of ſeveral low characters; which he performed ſo naturally, that he was eſteemed ſuperior to the beſt mimicks of that time. Beſides he was endowed with a prodigious memory; which was of great advantage to him in repreſenting the characters, which he thought proper to act; ſo that he could eaſily repeat any ſpeech which he had heard, with the utmoſt exactneſs, even to a word. Of this he afterwards gave a remarkable inſtance in the convent of the Capuchins, when he was Phyſician to them. A Father of that Order had preached that year at Rome, and was frequented by multitudes of people of every age and rank, who were charmed with his ridiculous manner of ſpeaking and his geſtures, which were copied from the theatre. Alexius had been preſent at one of the moſt remarkable of his ſermons, which he ſoon after repeated to the Fathers of that convent for the ſake of diverſion; and this he did to ſuch perfection, that he not only preſerved the order, method, and even the words of his diſcourſe, but likewiſe repreſented the very voice, and look, and action of the Preacher; ſo that every one was aſtoniſhed at his memory, and applauded his wit. Conciones, eo anno Romæ ad populum habebat F. Cappuccinus quidam Aquilanus, magno hominum omnis ætatis atque ordinis concurſu; quem concurſum & dicendi ridiculum genus & geſtus ab ſcenâ & hiſtrionibus faciebat. Hujus cum inſignem quandam concionem auribus accepiſſet, paulo poſt, joci & hilaritatis causâ, eandem patribus illis habuit; in quâ referendâ non ſolum rerum ordinem ac numerum, iiſdem planè verbis, quibus ille, ſervavit, verum etiam ita Aquilanum ipſum oculis, voce, geſtu, imitando effinxit, atque ita expreſſit, ut memoriam admirarentur omnes, ingenium agnoſcerent (1).

(1) J. N. Eryth. ubi ſupra.

[B] A remarkable obſervation upon it.] It ſeldom or never happens, ſays he, according to Petronius's remark, that diſtinguiſhed wits are exempt from ſome little mixture of folly. By folly I do not only mean ſuch expreſſions or actions, which are ridiculous on account of the extravagancies of them, but even real defects and vices. For the wiſe man, who is oppoſed to the fool, never recedes in the leaſt from the path of right reaſon; as thoſe do, who give up themſelves ner; he was a perſon of great humanity, politeneſs and generoſity, of a gay, facetious temper, and agreeable converſation [C]. He was prodigiouſly converſant in the writings of Hippocrates, from whoſe method he never in the leaſt receded in his practice. He was always cautious of pronouncing upon the event of his patient's caſe, unleſs upon ſome very probable conjecture; though he ſeldom failed in the cure of thoſe whom he undertook. He died in the forty ſecond year of his age (b).

(b) Eryth. ubi ſupra.

themſelves to vicious purſuits. But where do we find a man of an excellent and lively genius, eſpecially if he be poſſeſſed with the poetical faculty, who does not generally involve himſelf in the moſt abandoned and irregular conduct? So that Ludovico Arioſto had the greateſt reaſon in one of his Satyrs, where he laments the miſerable condition of the age he lived in, to ſay, that virtue is very rarely found pure and not tainted with the mixture of ſome vice or other. And this complaint is equally true of almoſt every age as well as his. There is ſomething ſo ſevere in this reflection of Erythræus upon the men of wit, that we ſhall give his own words, to ſhew, that we have not the leaſt aggravated it. Admodum raro, vel nunquam, ut Petronius ait, præclara ingenia ab aliqua ſtultitiæ admiſtione ſejuncta cernuntur; ſtultitiæ autem nomine, non ſolum hominum ineptias, eorumque omnia dicta vel facta, quæ ob deformitatem aliquam rideantur, intelligo, verum etiam vitia atque peccata complector. Nam ſapiens, qui opponitur ſtulto, nunquam à rectâ rationis viâ deflectit; quod faciunt ii, qui vitiis poſſidendos ſe tradunt. Quemnam enim præſtanti ingenio virum invenias, ex Poëtis præſertim, in quibus ingenii vis major elucet, qui turpiſſimis plerumque vitiis obligatus conſtrictuſque non detineatur? Ut non immerito Ludovicus Areoſtus in quadam Satyra, deplorans miſeram temporum ſuorum conditionem, dixerit, raro virtutem à vitiorum flagitiorumque ſocietate diſtractam inveniri. Verum hæc querela non magis ſuorum erat temporum, quam noſtrorum, atque ætatum fere omnium. One of our Engliſh Poets has likewiſe a reflection upon the extravagance of conduct, which men of genius are ſometimes guilty of;

Great Wits to madneſs ſure are near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide.

[C] Agreeable converſation.] He was a man of extenſive knowledge, and maſter of all the topics of converſations; and this, added to the native ſprightlineſs and gaiety of his imagination, neceſſarily rendered him a perfectly pleaſing companion. The qualifications of good ſenſe and learning, without the more engaging ſallies of wit, however valuable they may be, do not appear to the ſame advantage, as when they meet together in the ſame perſon, and the latter give a luſtre to the former. But our Alexius was accompliſhed in both theſe reſpects; and Erythræus relates a ſtory of him to this purpoſe. A man of great quality and fortune and merit, had one evening invited to his houſe a company of both ſexes, who were perſons of the higheſt rank; Alexius who was preſent, was ſilent at firſt, out of regard perhaps to their ſuperior quality, and did not exert himſelf with his uſual freedom; but at laſt being urged to entertain the company, he did it with ſuch incomparable fluency and wit, and run thro' all the various ſallies of his boundleſs imagination, that he diffuſed the utmoſt mirth and gaiety over the whole aſſembly, and ſtruck every one with admiration of his agreeable talents. Narrat vir quidam genere, opibus, divitiis, ac præſtantiâ dignitatis, longè multis excellens, nocte quadam, domum ſuam, multas mulieres nobiles, ac præſtantes dignitate viros, animi ſcilicet causâ, conveniſſe, adfuiſſe etiam Alexium, qui aliquandiu, credo, ob eorum, qui aderant, dignitatem, non erat auſus ſermones cum illis miſcere, neque ullam partem orationis perſequi ea libertate, qua ſolitus erat; ſed tandem provocatum illum vel potius coactum, ex tempore, eâ facundiâ, eâ venuſtate atque lepore, cœpiſſe dicere, ut omnium, qui audierant, admiratio conſequeretur, ac nobiliſſimus ille conventus redundaret hilaritate & joco. T.

ALFENUS VARUS (PUBLIUS) a native of Cremona, firſt a ſhoemaker, and afterwards a diſciple of the celebrated Lawyer Servius Sulpicius (a), and at laſt Conſul, was a very ſkilful man in Law affairs [A]; his funeral was made at the expence of the publick. This is all that one of Horace's old Scholiaſts tells us of him, in his notes upon a paſſage which relates to our Alfenus [B], whoſe Conſulſhip ſome pretend fell on the 754th year of Rome (b). I would not ſwear to it. Alfenus had writ forty Books of Digeſts, of which mention was made in the Index of the Pandect, and ſome books of Collections, Collectaneorum. Aulus Gellius quotes both theſe works, and although he refutes what he quotes of them, he nevertheleſs aſcribes to the Author a genius for ſearching into antiquities [C]. Paulus the Lawyer has made an abridgment

(a) Acron calls him Marcus, but it muſt be Servius, according to William Grotius, Vit. Juriſc. p. 86. See Aulus Gellius, l. 6. cap. 5. and Pomponius in lib. 2. D. de Orig. Juris.

(b) See Cruquius in Horat. Sat. III. lib. 1.

[A] He was a very ſkilful man in Law affairs.] The following paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus againſt the Lawyers of his time, Hi ut altius videantur jura callere, Trebatium loquuntur, & Caſcellium, & Alfenum, & Auruncorum Sicanorumque jamdiu leges ignotas (1), i. e. "Theſe, that they might appear to have a higher knowledge of the laws, ſpeak of Terbatius, and Caſcellius, and Alfenus, and the long forgotten laws of the Aurunci and Sicani," is ſufficient to convince us of the great authority the name of Alfenus had in law. Add to this the teſtimonies alledged by Bertrand in his firſt Book of Law (2).

(1) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 30. c. 4. p. 594.

(2) Pag. 56, 57, edit. Lugd. Bat. ann. 1675.

[B] There is a paſſage in Horace relating to our Alfenus.] The words of Horace are worth ſetting down;

Alfenus vafer, omni
Abjecto inſtrumento artis, clauſâque tabernâ,
Sutor erat: ſapiens operis ſic optimus omnis
Eſt opifex, ſic Rex ſolus (3).

(3) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 1. ver. 130.

"Shuffling Alfen, tho' he loſt his awl,
"And threw away his laſt, and ſhut his ſtall,
"And broke his threads, yet was a cobler ſtill.
"Thus ev'ry tradeſman, if he hath but skill,
"Is wiſe, and therefore only King. Creech.

[C] Aulus Gellius who refutes it, ... praiſes him nevertheleſs for his careful inquiries into antiquity.] This relates to the ſignification of theſe words, Argentum purum putum, which were in the treaty of peace concluded between the Roman and Carthaginian Republics. The Romans were to receive annually a certain tribute of ſilver purum putum, that is, of good alloy. Moreri imagines, that the proper name of this tribute was purum putum; which is a very pleaſant fancy. Aulus Gellius does not without reaſon contemn the ſenſe that Alfenus has given to theſe words (4); and if we were thence to form our judgment of the lights which this Lawyer has given the world, we might juſtly degrade him from the firſt rank. He thought that purum putum had been derived from purus, as novicius and propicius were from novus and proprius, to give the greater force to the ſignification of the primitive word. Aulus Gellius refutes this opinion ſolidly, and ſhews that putum ſignifies what has had all its ſuperfluities retrenched. He does not quote the ſame book with Moreri, namely the four and thirtieth of the Digeſts; nor that to which Bertrand refers, namely the thirtieth of the ſame Digeſts; but the thirty fourth. As to the other work that he quotes, it is entitled Conjectaneorum, in Henry ment of the books of Alfenus (c). If it were true, that amongſt the Counſellors of the Emperor Alexander Severus, there was an Alfenus [D], a diſciple of Papinianus, as ſome ſay relying upon a very intricate paſſage of Lampridius, he might have been of the poſterity of the other; although it muſt be confeſſed that there were ſome Alfeni different from the diſciple of Sulpitius. There is an ALFENUS of whom Cicero ſpeaks in his oration for Quinctius, and an ALFENUS VARUS, General under Vitellius, and Præfectus Prætorio, who did not ſhew the reſolution of a brave man, when his party was conquered by that of Veſpaſian (d). Donatus in the life of Virgil, ſpeaks of an ALFENUS [E], who, with ſome others, exempted this Poet's lands from the fate to which thoſe of the neighbours were expoſed, when after the defeat of Brutus they were aſſigned to the ſoldiers. Some very able men are of opinion that he who did this good office to Virgil, is the ſame Alfenus who had been a ſhoemaker; and the ſame Alfenus of whom Catullus ſpeaks (e). This is not without difficulty [F]. See our notes where Moreri is ſometimes corrected in his miſtakes.

(4) Aulus Gellius, l. 6. c. 5.

(c) Guil. Grotii Vitæ Juriſconſ. p 86.

(d) Tacit. Hiſtoriar. lib. 2. cap. 29. and 42. lib. 3. cap. 36, 55, and 61; lib. 4. cap. 11.

(e) Dacier ſur Horace, Sat. 3. liv. 1.

Henry Stephen's edition; but I perceive that Bertrand and William Grotius have read Collectaneorum. This laſt title ſeems to agree better with the paſſages of the Pandects, where Servius is quoted upon the teſtimony of Alfenus: Servius apud Alfenum notat, putat. But it would be very wrong on this account to prefer the laſt title to that in Henry Stephens. Bertrand puts words in Aulus Gellius's mouth that he did not ſay, namely that the work intitled Collectanea comprehended four books. But the words of Aulus Gellius are: In libro Digeſtorum trigeſimo & quarto, Conjectaneorum autem ſecundo, in fœdere, inquit, &c. (5). I make no doubt but that, ſeeing Bertrand has ſaid that Aulus Gellius has quoted the thirtieth book of the Digeſts, he thought that the words & quarto belonged to the following word; and that, without minding what followed, he concluded that the fourth book of the Collectanea was quoted: from whence however he had no room to conclude that the work contained but four books, and that Aulus Gellius had ſaid ſo. Neither the critical remarks upon this work of Bertrand, inſerted in the Leyden edition, nor William Grotius have given us notice of theſe little miſtakes. I have put in the margin the good that Aulus Gellius has ſaid of Alfenus (6).

(5) Aulus Gellius, l. 6. c. 5.

(6) Alfenus Juriſconſultus, Servii Sulpicii diſcipulus, rerumque antiquarum non incurioſus. i. e. "Alfenus a Lawyer, diſciple of Servius Sulpicius, and not unacquainted with antiquities," Aulus Gell. l. 6. cap. 5.

[D] It is not certain whether there was not an Alfenus among the Counſellors of the Emperor Alexander Severus.] The paſſage of Lampridius, as it is printed, is ſo falſe in ſome reſpects, that one can conclude nothing from it for the exiſtence of an Alfenus under Alexander Severus. See Caſaubon upon this paſſage. But however, Moreri ought not to have quoted Horace to us, nor Aulus Gellius, for his Alfenius ſurnamed Junior, who lived, ſays he, under the reign of the Emperor Alexander Severus, [E] Donatus .... ſpeaks of an Alfenus.] Moreri, making an article of him, in pag. 170, calls him Alphenius Varus a Roman Knight, and quotes Donatus in vita Virgilii; but Donatus does not advance him to that dignity; and, beſides, the beſt editions (7) have it Alphenus, Varius, as two perſons, and not Alphenius Varus, as one. However, it muſt be acknowledged that theſe verſes of the 9th Eclogue of Virgil, ver. 26.

(7) That of Hackius at Leyden, in 1680.

Immo hæc quæ Varo necdum perfecta canebat, Vare tuum nomen (ſuperat modo Mantua nobis, Mantua væ miſeræ nimium vicina Cremonæ)
Cantantes ſublime ferent ad ſidera cygni;

" Or what unfiniſh'd he to Varus read;
" Thy name O Varus (if the kinder pow'rs
" Preſerve our plains, and ſhield the mountain tow'rs,
" Obnoxious by Cremona's neighb'ring crime,)
" The wings of ſwans, and ſtronger pinion'd rhyme,
" Shall raiſe aloft, and ſoaring bear above
" Th' immortal gift of gratitude to Jove.
Dryden.

are applied by Servius the Grammarian to an Alfenus Varus, who was ſent by Auguſtus beyond the Po, to command there, after Pollio had loſt that government. The ſame Grammarian obſerves that there are ſome who have applied to the Lawyer Alfenus Varus, the ſucceſſor of Servius Sulpicius, theſe other verſes of Virgil;

Nam neque adhuc Varo videor, nec dicere Cinna
Digna, ſed argutos inter ſtrepere anſer olores (8).

(8) Virgil. Eclog. 9. ver. 35.

" I nor to Cinna's ear, nor Varus dare aſpire;
" But gabble like a gooſe, amidſt the ſwan-like quire.

Their reaſon was, that Alfenus Varus the Lawyer had compoſed ſome verſes. Servius refutes them, by ſhewing that this elogy muſt be applied to the Poet Varius, whom Horace has ſo much extolled.

[F] It is thought that the Alfenus of Virgil, ... Catullus, and the ſhoemaker are the ſame. This is not without difficulty.] A man who applies himſelf to the Law with ſo much ardour, that he not only wipes off by his progreſs the ſhame of the mechanical trade that he had followed in his native country; but ſucceeds alſo the greateſt maſter of the Law that was at that time in the Roman Republic, is probably too grave, to enter into the ſtricteſt ties of debauchery with a Catullus, and ſuch other effeminate gallants. But the Alfenus, of whom Catullus ſpeaks, was one of this immodeſt band,

Alphene immemor, atque unanimis falſe ſodalibus (9);

(9) Catull. Epigram 31. Dacier upon Horace, Sat. 3. book 1. quotes the 27th Epigram of Catullus.

" O Alphenus, unmindful of your unanimous com" panions, and falſe to them.

He carried Catullus to his wench:

Varus me meus ad ſuos amores
Viſum duxerat, è foro otioſum,
Scortillum ut mihi tum repente viſum eſt
Non ſane illepidum nec invenuſtum (10).

(10) Catul. Epig. 10.

" As I was loitering in the market place
" My Varus met me, and conducted me
" To ſee his love, as ſoon as I beheld
" The little wench, no froward aukward thing.

It is not very probable therefore that he was the diſciple of Sulpitius. Muretus has been cenſured, for ſaying that the Varus, who carried Catullus to his miſtreſs, was Quintilius Varus; and this cenſure is founded upon there being at leaſt fifty ſeven years between the defeat of Varus's three legions, and the viſit mentioned by Catullus (11): Here follows my proof. There muſt have been between this viſit and the Conſulſhip of Alfenus (12) fifty years more or leſs; therefore it is not very probable, that if the ſhoemaker of Cremona was Conſul in the 754th year of Rome, he had ſo ſtrict an alliance in pleaſures and debauches with Catullus fifty years before; for a country ſhoemaker, who renounces his trade to go and ſtudy in the capital city, can be no young boy, when he is an intimate friend of people of conſequence. Add to this, that he who did ſo good an office to Virgil, commanded beyond the Po forty years before the Conſulſhip in queſtion (13). There is room then to queſtion whether Alfenus, who was Conſul in the 754th year of Rome, is the ſame with Virgil's benefactor; for it is a rare thing for a man to arrive at great dignities, when the uſual time of obtaining them has been long paſt. Such was the caſe at Rome with thoſe, who, after having governed a Province, ſpent forty years without obtaining the conſular dignity.

(11) Scalig. in Catull. Epig. 10.

(12) It is put in 754th year of Rome.

(13) Servius in Ecl. 9. ver. 29.

ALFONSUS. See the Kings of this name under that of their Kingdom.

☞ALFRED or ÆLFRED the Great, the glory of the Saxon Kings, was the fifth and youngeſt ſon of Æthelwolf King of the Weſt-Saxons by Oſburg daughter of the famous Earl Oſlac, whoſe anceſtors were made Governors of the Iſle of Wight by Cerdic, firſt King of the Weſt-Saxons (a). He was born in the year 849 at Wantage in Berkſhire. The ſweetneſs of Alfred's diſpoſition and the pregnancy of his wit even in his infancy endeared him highly to his parents, who educated him at court, contrary to the general cuſtom of the Saxons, who in imitation of the Gauls (b), never uſed to admit their children to their preſence, till they were able to bear arms. Æthelwolf, who by his natural diſpoſition and education had a great regard for religion, and was extremely devoted to the See of Rome, thought proper to ſend his ſon thither, when he was but about five years old, in order to receive the Pope's benediction (c), who, according to ſome writers, gave him the Royal Unction [A]. Soon after his return home, Æthelwolf reſolved upon a voyage to Rome in perſon, and took Alfred with him, who was not then above ſeven years old. They continued there the ſpace of a whole year, employed in exerciſes of devotion, according to the genius of that age (d). In their return through France Æthelwolf married Judith (e) the daughter of Charles the Bald, a young Princeſs of twelve years of age. This conduct of his occaſioned great diſcontent among his own Nobility, and was made a pretence for a conſpiracy, which was formed againſt him. Æthelbald his ſecond ſon, who became heir apparent of the crown upon the death of Æthelſtan his elder brother, obliged him to deliver up the Kingdom of Weſt-Saxony, and to content himſelf with that of Kent. He died about two years after, and left his Kingdom to his two eldeſt ſons, and his private inheritance among his children and near relations. Æthelbald, after a ſhort reign of five years and a half died a violent death, and left his part of the Kingdom to his next brother Æthelbert, who being poſſeſt of the other part from his father, the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom and that of Kent were united again. Having reigned about five years he died, and the Kingdom came to Æthelred, the fourth of Æthelwolf's ſons (f). With regard to Alfred, the greateſt part of his minority was ſpent in hunting and other diverſions of the field; which exerciſes were very cuſtomary to the Saxon Nobility; becauſe by ſuch a diſcipline the youth were trained up to fatigue and hardſhip, and rendered more reſolute and enterpriſing. Alfred having paſſed through this courſe of education, was thought qualified to make a campaign at eighteen years of age. His brother, King Æthelred, having a great opinion of his courage and conduct, perſuaded him to ſerve under him; and in order to encourage him propoſed, that all the country recovered from the enemy ſhould be equally ſhared between them. Theſe articles were accepted by Alfred, who made it his buſineſs to deſerve the reward, and ſerved the King with the utmoſt hazard and application. However theſe employments

(a) See the Life of Ælfred the Great by Sir John Spelman, publiſh'd by Thomas Hearne, M. A. Oxon. 1709, p. 16.

(b) Cæſar. Comment. de Bello Gallic. l. 6.

(c) Rapin, Hiſtory of England, l. 4. See Aſſerius Menevenſ. p. 7. edit. Oxon. 1722.

(d) Spelman's Life of Alfred, p. 23.

(e) She is called Leatheta in the Saxon Annals.

(f) Spelman, p. 28.

[A] In order to receive the Popes benediction, who, according to ſome writers, gave him the Royal Unction.] Sir John Spelman (1) tells us, "that Leo IV, "then Pope, whether carried with the reverence "of the thing, (he underſtanding it an eſpecial miſ"ſion from God, which the extraordinary ſpirit "and genius of the child, promiſing a fortune be"yond the condition of a common perſon, did con"firm him in,) or whether moving upon advice, "that the favour ſued for (were it available to the "ſuit or not) did well enough conduce to his own "affairs, his authority receiving more in conferring "the honour, than the party himſelf in accepting "of it, in thoſe his tender years, in his father's life"time, and while three of his elder brothers were "yet living, anoints him for a King, crowns him, "ſtiles him his Adopted Son, and plentifully beſtows "his apoſtolic bleſſings on him." He then obſerves, that ſome writers have been of opinion, that this unction was not the ſame with the ceremony of anointing Kings at their coronation, but the chriſm uſed in confirmation, and by miſtake of the Monks repreſented as the Regal Unction. But he thinks it very improbable, that Aſſerius Menevenſis (2), a Biſhop of conſiderable learning then living, and William of Malmesbury (3) a judicious Monk ſhould not diſtinguiſh between the Regal Unction and the Chriſm, which was a ceremony of the church at that time very common. Beſides it was by no means agreeable to the practice of the Church, that Alfred, who was ſo very young, ſhould receive confirmation, which was never adminiſtred but to thoſe, whoſe age enabled them to give a diſtinct account of their faith. Nay Ethelwerd expreſly tells us (4), that after "Leo had conſecrat"ed him for a King, he from that act ſtiled Al"fred his Son, as we after confirmation uſe to "call the children our Sons:" Quem & ſanctificat in Regem, & Filium a chariſmate nominavit, ut modo ſub manu Epiſcopi ſolemus accipientes parvulos filios nominare. So that this Hiſtorian takes expreſs notice of both ceremonies, and comparing them, concludes that Alfred's anointing was regal. However Mr. de Rapin Thoyras (5) ſeems to pay no manner of regard to theſe authorities, and others, which might be urged (6), and declares, that this appears to have no foundation, unleſs it is pretended, that the Pope knew by revelation, that Alfred ſhould ſome time or other come to the crown, tho' he was the youngeſt of four brothers. Beſides he had not the title of King till long after, when the crown devolved to him by the death of his three elder brothers. If the remark of the annotator upon Sir John Spelman's Life of Ælfred, publiſhed in Latin at Oxford in 1678, be admitted, the difficulty may be tolerably well removed (7). In theſe notes (8) it is obſerved, that Æthelwolf making a conqueſt of the greateſt part of North Wales ſettled thoſe new acquiſitions with the county of Suſſex upon his youngeſt ſon Alfred. It is true, this ſettlement was not to take place, till after the death of his elder brother Æthelſtan; but then this Prince dying in 852, Alfred was in poſſeſſion of this royal inheritance a year before his firſt voyage to Rome. From hence it is ſuppoſed that Æthelwolf ſent his ſon Alfred to Rome to be anointed King of South-Wales, and to receive the ſolemnity of coronation from the Pope. This ſuppoſition is confirmed by Alfred's having the command of the Welſh in the reign of his brother (9). Nay ſome writers, as Rudburn reports, make the rebellion againſt Æthelwolf to proceed from Æthelbald's being offended with his youngeſt brother Alfred's coronation, which was performed by the Pope at his father's deſire.

(1) Life of Ælfred, p. 19.

(2) De Rebus Geſt. Ælfredi, p. 7. ed. Oxon. 1722.

(3) De Geſtis Reg. Anglor. l. 2. c. 2. fol. 20.

(4) Chronic. l. 3. fol. 478.

(5) Hiſtory of England, lib. 4. vol. 1.

(6) See Mr. Hearne's notes upon Spelman, p. 19, 20.

(7) See Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. 1. lib. 3. p. 161.

(8) Pag. 3.

(9) Saxon. Chron. and Ælfredi Magni Vita, p. 3. edit. Oxon. 1678.

ments did not extinguiſh his love for learning [B]. In the year 866 a great Fleet of the Danes under the command of Hinguar and Hubba, ſons of Lodebroch, a Daniſh King, came to invade England, and the next year ſeized York, and in 871 marched to Reading in Berkſhire, where they were reinforced by another conſiderable body of Danes under the conduct of Bagſeg and Haldone, and took that town and caſtle. But Æthelred and his brother Alfred came with an army to Reading within ſeven days after it was taken, and killed a great number of the enemy: however the latter obliged the beſiegers at laſt to retire, who rallying their forces again at Aſhdown near Reading, reſolved to engage the Danes in battle. Æthelred divided his army into two bodies, the one for himſelf to lead againſt the Kings, the other for his brother Alfred to conduct againſt the Daniſh Earls. But while the King was employed in his devotions (g) in his tent, Alfred being provoked by the Daniſh army joined battle with them, and though he was very diſadvantageouſly poſted, yet he alone maintained his ground againſt them for a conſiderable time. However he was at laſt obliged to give way to the ſuperior force of the enemy, when Æthelred arrived to his aſſiſtance, and defeated the Danes with prodigious loſs. But the Saxons ſoon after met with an overthrow at Baſing in Hampſhire, and at Mertune (h) or Merden by the Deviſes in Wiltſhire. And to add to their misfortunes Æthelred died of a wound which he received at Merden, after he had reigned five years, and exerted all the qualities of a brave and magnanimous Prince, joined with the warmeſt devotion and piety (i). Upon his death Alfred ſucceeded to the crown, by the will of King Æthelwolf his father, and likewiſe by the appointment of Æthelred [C]. This happened in the year 871, and (g) Aſſerius Menevenſis, Annal. Rerum Geſt. Ælfredi Magni. edit. Oxon. 1722. p. 22.

(h) Some ſay at Merton in Surrey, and others at Mertune in Oxfordſhire. See Hearne's notes upon Spelman's Life of Ælfred, p. 43.

(i) Spelman, p. 44.

[B] Did not extinguiſh his love for learning] He had a ſtronger inclination for Literature, than to all the ſplendor and magnificence of ſovereign power. But he ſecretly lamented the unhappineſs of the country and age which he lived in, and which were ſo barren of Men of letters, that he could not procure a ſingle perſon to inſtruct him in the liberal arts and ſciences (10). Britain at that time was ſunk into the loweſt barbarity and ignorance, ſo that we can find but eight writers, which it produced in that Century, as appears from Bale and Pits. But what gave Alfred the greater regret, was to compare the ſtate of his own country with regard to learning, with that of Rome, which he had ſeen, where letters at that time ſeemed to have fixed their ſole reſidence; for in imitation of the old Romans, who were eminent for their great reſpect to learning, (and after the decay of it in Egypt and Greece were only celebrated for it,) there were in that city divers ſtatutes for encouragement of all thoſe, whether natives or ſtrangers, who were ſtudiouſly inclin'd. Upon which account we do not find, that there was ever any great interruption ſince it was firſt profeſſed; however ſome of the Emperors and Popes were enormouſly ignorant, and made it their buſineſs to deſtroy Literature (11). Aſſerius Menevenſis tells us (12), that Alfred had the ſtrongeſt inclination to learning even from his infancy, but that thro' the neglect of his parents, and thoſe who had the care of him, he was at leaſt twelve years of age, before he could read. However he uſed to commit to memory the Saxon Poems, which he heard repeated by others. The occaſion of his learning to read was this: His mother one day ſhewing him and his brothers a book of Saxon Poetry beautifully adorned, and telling them, that ſhe would give that book to him, who ſhould firſt get it by heart, Alfred applied himſelf ſo vigorouſly to the book, that he never left off till he could read and repeat it to his mother. We ſhall give this ſtory in Aſſerius's Latin, that the learned reader may form an idea of that Hiſtorian's ſtyle. Cum ergo quodam die mater ſua ſibi & fratribus ſuis quendam Saxonicum poematicæ artis librum, quem in manu habebat, oſtenderet, ait: "Quiſquis veſtrum "diſcere citius iſtum codicem poſſit, dabo illi illum:" quâ voce, immo divinâ inſpiratione inſtinctus, & pulchritudine principalis litteræ illius libri illectus, ita matri reſpondens, & fratres ſuos ætate, quamvis non gratiâ ſeniores anticipans, inquit; "Verene dabis "iſtum librum uni ex nobis: ſcilicet illi, qui citiſſi-"mè intelligere & recitare eum ante te poſſit?" Ad hæc illa arridens & gaudens, atque affirmans, "Da-"bo, inſit, illi:" tunc ille ſtatim tollens librum de manu ſuâ, magiſtrum adiit & legit; quo lecto matri retulit & recitavit. But the author of the notes upon Sir John Spelman's Life of Alfred, who was the famous Obadiah Walker, Maſter of University College in Oxon (13), obſerves (14), that there muſt be ſome miſtake in Aſſerius's account, that Alfred was 12 years of age before he learned to read, ſince his mother died before his ſecond journey to Rome, when his father married another wife, and Alfred was but ſeven years old at that time. Beſides Ethelred or Ailred Rhievallenſis affirms, that he was fond of reading and learning even from his infancy.

(10) Spelman, Life of Alfred, p. 29.

(11) See Middendorp, de Academiis, l. 3. p. 415. edit. Colen. 1694. apud Hearn, Notes upon Spelman, pag. 29.

(12) Pag. 16.

(13) See Mr. Tho. Hearne's Appendix to his edition of Spelman's Life of Alfred, p. 225.

(14) Not. in Vit. Ælfredi Magni, p. 10.

[C] By the will of King Æthelwolf his father, and likewiſe by the appointment of Æthelred.] Before Æthelred came to the crown there had been a treaty between him and Alfred concerning their reſpective eſtates. And Æthelred in the preſence of divers of the Nobility, acknowledging Alfred's right to certain demeſns left him by his father, which were then, as it appears, withheld from him, promiſed him in a ſolemn manner, that if ever he came to be King, he would not only permit Alfred to enjoy quietly the lands bequeathed to him, but likewiſe give him a ſhare of all the territories which they ſhould gain from the enemy. But when the crown fell to Æthelred, and he by Alfred's aſſiſtance had recovered ſeveral lands, being required to perform his agreement, he abſolutely refuſed, alledging that he could not divide his dominions, but would leave them entire to Alfred, if he ſhould ſurvive. Alfred, tho' prevented from enjoying his right, yet notwithſtanding afforded his brother all the aſſiſtance in his power; and upon his death, was deſired by the Archbiſhop, and Nobles, and Commons of Weſt-Saxony, to take the government upon himſelf; which he would willingly have avoided, but at laſt preferring the neceſſity of the ſtate to his own particular inclination, he accepted of it; and was crowned at Wincheſter *. Malmesbury tells us, that "the Engliſh vo-"luntarily gave the government to Alfred, being "glad, that they had ſuch a man amongſt them, "who was able to aſſert their liberties." Volentes Angli in poteſtatem Ælfredi conceſſerant, gaudentes ſe talem virum edidiſſe, qui poſſet eos in libertatem evehere (15). And Goodricius (16) informs us, that "the kingdom being freed from civil contentions "by the coming of a more formidable enemy, and the "reſt of the competitors being either deſtroyed in the "common fate, or voluntarily reſigning their pre-"tenſions, and thinking Alfred to be the only fit "perſon to reſcue their country from its calamities, "he took upon him the government as King:" Regnum malis civilibus hoſtis potentioris acceſſu jam liberum, æmulis cæteris vel fato communi abſorptis, vel ſponte cedentibus, ſolumque Ælfredi dominatum rebus ſuis afflictis utiliorem cenſentibus, Ælfredus monarchico prorſus jure adiit. But Mr. Walker (17) is of opinion, that Spelman has deduced Alfred's title to the crown much more juſtly from his father's will, and his brother's appointment. And this is confirmed by Alfred's own will, which is publiſhed at the end of the edition of Aſſerius Menevenſis,

* Spelman, p. 44.

(15) Vide Notas in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 19.

(16) Ibidem.

(17) In Notis in Vitam, &c. ibid.

and in the 22d year of Alfred. Having thus accepted of the Kingdom, he found himſelf involved in a dangerous war with the Danes, and placed amidſt ſuch circumſtances of diſtreſs, that he had the greateſt occaſion imaginable for the valour, reſolution, and all the other virtues which he was adorned with. The Danes were already maſters of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, and had penetrated into the very heart of the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons; and notwithſtanding the battles which Æthelred had given them, they had got poſſeſſion of ſeveral towns, and had the ſtrongeſt reaſon to hope they ſhould ſoon complete the conqueſt of that country. Alfred was obliged before he had been a month upon the throne to take the field againſt theſe formidable enemies, who were advanced as far as Wilton. Thither he marched to attack them for the firſt time after his brother's death (k), but he was defeated. However the Danes having loſt a conſiderable number of men, he endeavoured immediately to rally his army in order to give them battle. They were aſtoniſhed at his expedition, and ſued for peace, offering to depart out of his dominions. Upon this they retired to London, and then to Torkſey in Lindſey in the North-part of Lincolnſhire, within the Kingdom of the Northumbrians; and in the year 874 they went to Repton in Darbyſhire, and expelled Burrhed King of Mercia from his Kingdom. They purſued their conqueſts ſo vigorouſly, that they became maſters of Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland, and being ſtrengthened with freſh troops from Denmark under the command of Halfdene in 875, they reſolved to attack Weſt-Saxony, and accordingly ſeized upon Warham Caſtle in Dorſetſhire. This reduced the King to ſo dreadful an exigence, that he was obliged to ſue for a peace with them, which they granted, and ſwore to him by the holy relicks of the church [D], that they would depart out of his Kingdom, and never enter it again. But they broke through this treaty immediately; and as they were marching towards Mercia, they met a body of Engliſh horſe who were advancing in a careleſs manner, by reaſon of the treaty being concluded, and ſlew the greateſt part of them, and ſurpriſed Exeter [E]. Alfred finding it was in vain to truſt ſuch a perfidious people, was reſolved to take more effectual meaſures to ſecure himſelf. For which purpoſe he conven'd a general aſſembly, and in a pathetic ſpeech ſhewed them, that they had nothing to depend upon but their valour, and therefore there was a neceſſity of venturing their lives in defence of their country, and of ſacrificing part of their eſtate to preſerve the reſt. Theſe remonſtrances having produced the effect he expected, an army was levied, with which he engaged the enemy ſeven times in one campaign, and obliged them at laſt to ſubmit to this article among others; that the Danes ſhould permit no more of their nation to enter into the Iſland (l). In 876 [50].

(k) Æthelwerd lib. 4. c. 3. ſeems to intimate, that Alfred, being employed about his brother's funeral, was not in this battle.

(l) Spelman, p.

nevenſis, wherein, having called together the Nobles of all Weſt Saxony, he explains his title both to the kingdom and to his private inheritance. Our ancient Kings held their crown as in Fee-ſimple, and had a full right of diſpoſing of it as they thought proper. In conſequence of which, a brother often ſucceeded his brother, and excluded the ſon of the former. So Æthelred the brother of Wulfer ſucceeded before Kenred the ſon of Wulfer; and Kenred before Alred the ſon of Æthelred: Bertulph before Weſtan the grandſon of Withlaf; Eadred the brother of Edmund before Eadwig the ſon of Edmund; and Edward the Confeſſor took the government upon him, during the life of Edward the ſon of his elder brother, and of Edgar the ſon of the former, whom he had notwithſtanding brought up with hopes of the kingdom. We have many inſtances of this kind among the Saxons, eſpecially in caſe they were unqualified for the crown by their minority or any other defect (18). Thus the younger ſon was ſometimes preferred to the elder; as Ercombort the ſon of Rudbald or Edbald mounted the throne, tho' his elder brother Ermenred and his two ſons were living. Nay ſometimes the natural ſon had the advantage over the lawful ſon. Thus Edward the ſon of our Alfred preferred Æthelſtan, whom he had by the daughter of one Berker, to his legitimate ſon. Upon which account, as Malmesbury tells us, Æthelred raiſed a ſedition againſt Æthelſtan. But to return to Alfred, the people were extremely rejoiced to ſee him accept of the crown; but as for his own part he conſidered it as no other than an inevitable diverſion from the ſatisfactions of a calm and ſtudious life, and the cultivation of his nobler faculties in profound contemplation. A kingdom in itſelf had no charms for him, much leſs ſuch a kingdom, as was involved in all the circumſtances of diſtreſs imaginable. For conſidering the ſtrength of the enemy, the poſſeſſion of it was more to be expected from his virtues, than from the favour and election of the people. However when the public good called upon him, he diveſted himſelf of all private and ſelfiſh conſiderations, and exerted that invincible reſolution and magnanimity, and all thoſe other virtues, which have made his name venerable to all future ages.

(18) See Radulph. de Diceto. p. 454, quoted in the notes in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 19.

[D] Swore to him by the holy relicks of the Church.] It ſeems a little ſurprizing, that Alfred ſhould inſiſt upon their ſwearing by theſe relicks, who, being as yet Pagans, could not think themſelves more firmly bound by that, than by the oath they uſed to ſwear by their bracelets. For the moſt ſolemn manner of ſwearing amongſt the Danes, and other Northern Nations, was by their arms, as appears from M. Adamus (19), and Olaus Magnus (20), and the Annals of Fuld (21). Theſe relicks, ſays Aſſerius Menevenſis (22), were the great confidence of the King; and tho' he did not imagine, that the Infidels would pay much regard to them, and had never till then admitted them to ſwear upon them; yet being now in ſo dreadful an exigence, and not expecting any other help, his only hope was, that if they broke their faith with him in this, God himſelf would puniſh ſuch a ſolemn perjury even in them (23).

(19) Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 33.
(20) L. 8. c. 2.
(21) Ad ann. 873. p. 73.
(22) P. 28.
(23) Spelman, p. 48, 49.

[E] Slew the greateſt part of them, and ſurprized Exeter.] Aſſerius Menevenſis (24) and Florence of Worceſter relate the ſtory in the manner abovementioned; but Huntingdon (25) and the Saxon Annals give us a more true relation, and inform us, that in the year 876 that part of the army, which conſiſted of cavalry, rode to Exeter, and the reſt, which remained at Wereham, were in the beginning of the year following for the moſt part deſtroyed by ſhipwreck at Swanawie, now Sanwick in Hampſhire; and the reſt eſcaped on foot to Exeter, whither they came before the King could overtake them. But upon his arrival he laid cloſe ſiege to the city, which reduced the Danes to ſuch extremity, that they were forced to ſurrender and retire into Mercia, which they took poſſeſſion of, and gave part thereof to Ceolwolf. Yet they did not keep the articles long; for immediately after the feaſt of Epiphany, they encamped at Chippenham, one of the King's ſeats, and laid waſte almoſt all Weſt-Saxony.

(24) P. 28.
(25) Fol. 200. b.

876 a new ſwarm of Danes arrived under the command of Rollo, the famous Norman General, who became afterwards the ſcourge of France; but meeting with a vigorous oppoſition from Alfred, he went into that Kingdom, in order to ſettle himſelf there. After his departure Alfred began to fit out a good fleet to engage the Danes before they landed; for which purpoſe he cauſed a conſiderable number of long boats and gallies proper for ſervice to be built along the coaſt. This gave him a prodigious advantage over the Daniſh ſhips, which were only tranſports, and of little uſe in ſea fights. Alfred animated by this, reſolved to attack the Danes in the Weſt; which deſign was executed with ſuch vigour, that he obliged them to give him hoſtages, and entirely abandon Weſt-Saxony. Upon this they retired into Mercia, and incorporated themſelves with their countrymen, who were in poſſeſſion of that Kingdom; and others of them had the year before ſeized upon the Kingdom of Northumberland, and divided the land among themſelves. But tho' the Danes were in poſſeſſion of three of the antient Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, yet there was not room enough for all thoſe who were already in England, and for thoſe who were continually coming over with a deſign to ſettle. They formed therefore a reſolution to invade Weſt-Saxony, and carried on their deſign with the utmoſt ſecrecy and expedition. On a ſudden there appeared in the field a more formidable army of Danes than had ever yet been ſeen, before Alfred could poſſibly put himſelf into a poſture of defence. They marched directly to Chippenham in Wiltſhire, one of the ſtrongeſt cities of the Kingdom at that time, and they took it in a few days; which ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Weſt-Saxons, as deprived them of all courage to defend themſelves. Some fled into Wales or beyond Sea, while others revolted to the Danes, and ſwore allegiance to them. Alfred was entirely abandoned, except by a few of his domeſticks, who were unwilling to forſake him in his diſtreſs. But as they were chargeable to him, and could do him but little ſervice, he diſmiſſed them all, that he might with the greater eaſe ſhift for himſelf. He concealed himſelf in the Iſle of Æthelingey or Athelney in Somerſetſhire [F]. Theſe misfortunes were conſidered by ſome writers as a judgment of God upon him [G]. However [F] He concealed himſelf in the iſle of Æthelingey or Athelney in Somerſetſhire.] Alfred ſeeing his ſubjects fly, the enemy in the midſt of the country, and no means left either to unite or ſollicit the few that remained, diveſted himſelf of all his regal ornaments, and diſpoſed of his family according to the preſent exigence, and taking the diſguiſe of an obſcure and common ſoldier, he at firſt committed himſelf to the care of one, who, agreeably to the cuſtom of thoſe times, had the charge of keeping the King's cows. It does not appear whether he diſcovered himſelf to this man, or not. The place where he lay concealed was ſurrounded with a large moraſs, thro' which there was no paſſage but one narrow foot-path leading to the Neat-herd's cottage, which was hid by briars and thorns. The iſle was formerly called Athelingey, or the Iſle of Nobles, and it lies near Taunton, where the Thone and Parret join. The firm ground is not above two acres. In this place the King concealed himſelf for ſome time from his ſubjects as well as his enemies, without being ſo much as known to the Neat-herd's wife, who employed him about her little houſhold-affairs. With regard to which we have an agreeable ſtory related by Aſſerius Menevenſis (26). She having one day ſet a cake before the fire where the King ſat fitting his bow and arrows and other weapons, the cake happened to be burnt; upon which ſhe fell into a paſſion with the King for his careleſsneſs in not looking after it, which ſhe told him he could eat faſt enough:

(26) P. 30, 31.

Heus homo!
Urere quos cernis panes gyrare moraris,
Quum nimium gaudes hos manducare calentes?

[G] Theſe misfortunes were conſidered by ſome writers as a judgment of God upon him.] Sir John Spelman tells us (27), that "upon this great depreſſion of "ſovereignty in ſo brave a Prince, the religious of "thoſe times have given their judgments, as if it "had not befallen him without his apparent deſert, "and that God, having been greatly offended by "him, and therefore in juſtice neceſſitated to call "him to account for it, out of an eſpecial mercy "toward him, took in this ſort that ſevere account "here by way of acquittal in the world to come." For, as Aſſerius Menevenſis informs us (28), tho' he was a man of diſtinguiſhed virtues and merit, yet as he had no ambition for the crown, he would not in the beginning of his reign attend ſufficiently to the execution of that important charge. His ſtrong inclination to learning, his deſire of knowledge and experience in all the branches of Literature, and his indulging himſelf in the exerciſes of hawking and hunting and in other ſports, to which his youth and the vigour of his mind rather than of his body inclined him, and in which he was ever inventing or experimenting ſomething or other; theſe avocations of his ſo much engaged his mind during that interval of eaſe, which he had enjoyed for a year or two after the battle of Wilton in the beginning of his reign, that he attended but very little to the affairs and complaints of his poor ſubjects. Quam ſi quidem adverſitatem præfato Regi illatam non immerito ei eveniſſe credimus, quia in primo tempore regni ſui, cum adhuc juvenis erat, animoque juvenili detentus fuerat, homines ſui regni ſibique ſubjecti, qui ad eum venerant, & pro neceſſitatibus ſuis eum requiſierant, & qui depreſſi poteſtatibus erant, ſuum auxilium ac patrocinium implorabant; ille verò noluit eos audire, nec aliquod auxilium impendebat, ſed omnino eos nihili pendebat (29). And tho', as Aſſerius tells us, he was often admoniſhed concerning this by one Neotus, a kinſman of his, very eminent for his exemplary character and ſanctity, yet this had ſo little effect upon him, that Neotus having extremely lamented the King's averſeneſs, his ſorrow reſolved itſelf into a ſpirit of prophecy, and he foretold Alfred what a ſeries of calamities he ſhould inevitably ſuffer on that account; that he ſhould be deprived of his kingdom, and live as it were an exile in his own country (30). But ſome writers are of opinion, that Alfred received this reproof of Neotus, before he was King, and while he acted under his brother, having been a little remiſs in his duty. Others refer it to the time, when he was appointed King of North-Wales and Suſſex by his father. But if it happened after his brother's death, as Sir John Spelman thinks, when Alfred was engaged in eight or nine battles in one year, and conſequently had very little opportunity for hunting; we muſt neceſſarily conclude, that his negligence could not have been very conſiderable; and that Neotus only endeavoured to urge him to the utmoſt degree of perfection, which he was capable of, in order that he might diſcharge the important office, which he was inveſted with in the beſt manner poſſible (31). However in the midſt of all his diſtreſſes, while he was obliged to ſhelter himſelf from the ſuperior force of the enemy, he ſhewed

(27) P. 55.

(28) P. 31.

(29) Aſſer. ubi ſupra.

(30) See Spelman p. 55.

(31) Vide Not. in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 27.

However he had not been a year in this retreat, before a more happy ſcene began to open itſelf; for being informed of the defeat of the Daniſh troops under Hubba, and the death of the General, he ſent word to his friends where he was, that they might come and conſult together what was to be done in this juncture. After he had conferred with them, he gave them orders to draw together in ſeveral parts of the Kingdom ſmall bodies of troops, which at a minute's warning might be ready to join each other. And in order to gain intelligence of the poſture of the enemy, he put himſelf into the diſguiſe of an Harper, and went upon the diſcovery. This appearance made him paſs without ſuſpicion, and procured him admittance even into the Daniſh King's tent, and gave him the opportunity of a full information (l). Having ſtaid in the enemy's camp ſeveral days, he returned to his troops at Æthelingey; and at a council of war made a report of the negligence and ill condition of the enemy. He appointed the Great Wood (now Selwood Foreſt) in Wiltſhire for the general rendezvous of all his troops. This affair was tranſacted ſo ſecretly and expeditiouſly, that in a little time the King at the head of an army appeared near the Danes before they had the leaſt intelligence of it. They were in the utmoſt conſternation, when they ſaw on a ſudden the Engliſh army approaching to attack them. Alfred was unwilling to give them time to recover out of their ſurprize, and therefore drew out his ſoldiers, and made a ſpeech to them [H], and gained an entire victory over the enemy at Eddington. The few forces that eſcaped fled to a caſtle, where they were immediately beſieged, and obliged to capitulate. The terms he granted them were more advantageous than they had reaſon to expect. He agreed to give up the lands of Eaſt-Anglia to thoſe who were willing to turn Chriſtians, but required the reſt immediately to quit the Iſland, and never to return to England; and to give hoſtages for the performance of theſe ſhewed himſelf as inexhauſtible in courage, as they were in numbers, and very frequently ſallied out upon them ſecretly, ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another. "Alfred, ſays William of Malmesbury, even when he was overthrown and caſt down, was ſtill to be encounter'd with again; ſo that when he might have been imagined entirely deſtroyed, like a ſnake ſlipping out of the hands of thoſe who held him, he would on a ſudden from his hiding-places fall upon the enemy in the midſt of their triumphs; and even after an overthrow his fury was for the moſt part inſupportable." Cum Ælfredo enim victo, etiam jacente, luctandum; adeo ut, quum omnino contritum putaris, velut anguis lubricus de manu tenentis elapſus, è cavernis ſubitus emergebat, ſponte inimicos inſultantes adoriens; plerumque poſt fugam importabilis, &c. His ſituation likewiſe gave him great advantage over the enemy; for the country at that time abounded with vaſt woods and fens, the paſſages of which were ſcarce known to any but the natives, and the iſle of Ethelingey, where he lay concealed, was ſcarce acceſſible but in boats. This place he found ſo fit for his purpoſe, that with ſome little help, he made himſelf a ſmall hold, from whence he iſſued out privately upon the Danes (32), and performed ſuch actions, as deſerved to have been delivered down to poſterity, if they had not been loſt with many other particulars of his life; becauſe they were in the opinion of the Monks inextricabiles laborum labyrinthi, as Malmesbury expreſſes it, which it would be in vain to attempt to give a diſtinct account of. We may obſerve however, that ſince all writers generally follow the firſt, and yet not one of them but has ſome particulars not mentioned by others, many more of his actions ſurvived for a long time in fame and tradition, than what are contained in all their writings together (33). How much is it to be regretted, that the Alexanders and Cæſars, the tyrants and oppreſſors of mankind, ſhould meet with ſuch noble writers to perpetuate their memory, when an Alfred, whoſe ſuperior abilities were entirely directed to the good of the world, has the misfortune to be recorded by the loweſt and moſt inſufficient of all writers!

(l) Malmsb. de Geſtis Reg. Ang. l. 2. Aſſerius and Æthelwerd do not mention this ſtory.

(32) Aſſer. Men. p. 33.

(33) Spelman, p. 57.

[H] Made a ſpeech to them.] We are told in a MS. Collection of Aſſerius (34), that the night before this battle of Eddington, St. Neotus his friend and kinſman appeared to him in a dream, and bid him not be afraid of the multitude of the Barbarians, becauſe God would aſſiſt him on the morrow; that he had ſuffered ſuch a variety of afflictions, on account of his arrogance in his youth; but he aſſured him, that the next day he ſhould march before his ſtandard, that Alfred might fight more ſecurely againſt his enemies, and that God would fight for him and his people. We have not this account in any of the MSS. of Aſſerius; and therefore we muſt ſuppoſe, that there were formerly ſome of them different from what we have at preſent; or elſe, that the writers of Annals having extracted ſome things from Aſſerius, publiſhed others under his name; or that the modern writers have falſely put his name to what they had taken from other authors. Brompton (35) has quoted many things from Aſſerius concerning Offa King of Mercia, which are not to be found in the preſent MSS. of that Hiſtorian. But with regard to the dream abovementioned, we find the Monks ſo exceſſively fond of intermixing miraculous ſtories in all their accounts of things, that very little regard can juſtly be paid to them. To return to Alfred's ſpeech to his ſoldiers; when he had drawn them out, he told them, "How thankful they ought to be to God for affording them patience and courage to ſtruggle with ſo great difficulties, and continue reſolute after ſo long a trial; that they ought to look upon their misfortune as a puniſhment for their misbehaviour; that it was their ſins, that had given their enemies this advantage over them; and that reforming their lives would undoubtedly alter the face of affairs. That God had not dealt with them otherwiſe than as a kind and indulgent father, whoſe chaſtiſements once over, he would the readier receive them into his favour. That he had already begun to lay his hand upon the enemy, and confounded them with fear and amazement. That they ought to recollect the juſtice of their cauſe, and depend upon the protection of heaven; that they were to conſider the advantages of their own ſide, and the neceſſity of engaging; that Chriſtians were to encounter Heathens, and honeſt men pirates and robbers; men, who without any provocation had deſtroyed their country, ſeized their fortunes, and murthered vaſt numbers of their friends and relations, without any regard to age, ſex, or condition. We are to fight thoſe, continued he, who have nothing of faith or juſtice in their character; who have violated the moſt ſolemn engagements, and frequently broken their articles. That this was no conteſt of ambition, or for the enlargement of Empire; that their ſwords were drawn for no other reaſon, but merely to ſecure themſelves, and recover their rights; to preſerve their parents, their wives and children from the hardſhips of ſervitude, and from all the barbarous inſults of an haughty and licentious enemy; and, which was a ſtronger motive than all this, they fought for the honour of God, and to prevent the Chriſtian Religion from being extirpated to make room for Pagan impiety (36)."

(34) In the Cotton Library, Vit. E. 14. Vide Notas in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 34.

(35) Vide p. 753

(36) Malm. de Reb. Geſt. Reg. Ang. l. 2. fol. 23. and Harpſfield Hiſt. Eccleſ. Ang. Sæcul. 9. c. 4.

theſe articles. Guthrum the Daniſh General, with thirty of the chiefeſt of the army, and many of the common ſoldiers, were ſoon after baptized, and Guthrum received the name of Æthelſtan from Alfred his godfather, who in order to oblige that General, gave him the Kingdoms of Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland, to hold of him by fealty and homage. The gift of theſe Kingdoms occaſioned a treaty and articles to be drawn up between the King and Guthrum, for the regulation of the government of them, part of which are ſtill extant [I]. Several years after this pacification the Danes returned from their depredations in France, and landed in England. During this interval, the country had been very happy and undiſturbed under the government of Alfred, who had now all England for his dominions, except that part of the country aſſigned to the Danes by the treaty abovementioned. But now the war revived, and a new ſcene of blood began to open. However the caſe was ſomewhat altered, and the Engliſh had the advantage in this new quarrel. The King was always in the heat of action, and exerted himſelf with the utmoſt bravery and reſolution. A defeat ſerved only to awaken his caution, and make him more impatient for revenge. His ſucceſs was chiefly owing to his fleet; and his ſtrength at ſea was an advantage of his own creating. The gallies invented by him were longer, and more manageable by the helm than thoſe of the enemy (m). Having ſecured the ſea-coaſts, he fortified the reſt of the Kingdom with caſtles and wall'd towns, and beſieged and took the city of London [K]. He entirely ſubdued the Danes; and that nothing might be wanting to render him abſolute Monarch of England, the Welſh ſubmitted to his government. To proceed now from his martial to the civil part of his adminiſtration; he drew up an excellent body of Laws for the government of the Nation [L]; he (m) Spelman, p. 151.

[I] Part of which are ſtill extant.] They are publiſhed among the Laws of the Saxon Kings by Mr. Lambard, in two diſtinct capitulations. The firſt of theſe, which is entitled Fœdus Aluredi & Guthrumni, is only a ſhort proviſion for the preſent ſtate of affairs, until ſome further regulation might be fixed upon for a more compleat union and ſecurity between their people. Having mark'd out the bounds and diviſion of their diſtinct territories it provides then, that there ſhall be but one and the ſame eſtimation of the perſons of the Engliſh and Danes, and the mulct for killing of them both alike. That a Thane or Baron belonging to the King being queſtioned for man-ſlaughter, or any offence above four marks, ſhall be tried by twelve of his Peers, and others by eleven of their Peers and one of the King's men. That no purchaſe of men, horſe, or oxen ſhall be juſtifiable without a voucher of the ſeller, and his acknowledgment of the ſale. And laſtly that there ſhall be no licentious intercourſe between the ſoldiers of one army, and thoſe of the other. The other capitulation, which ſoon followed the former, is called by Mr. Lambard, Fœdus Edovardi & Guthrumni. The deſign of it is chiefly to give Laws to the Danes, and to oblige them to obſerve the rules of Chriſtianity; tho' (as the great licentiouſneſs at that time required) they were made general, including the Saxons as well as the Danes, and the former for the moſt part in a greater penalty. The ſum of them is to this purpoſe; that abandoning Heatheniſm, they ſhould worſhip one God, and him alone. That the peace of the Church ſhall be inviolate, and the King's peace unbroken. That if any perſon ſhall renounce Chriſtianity, or promote Heatheniſm, he ſhall according to the offence be puniſhed with a fine, ranſom, or confiſcation. Then follow ordinances againſt miſdemeanours in the Clergy, againſt inceſt, refuſing the payment of tithes, buying, ſelling, or working on ſundays, breach of the faſts of the Church, trials of men on holy-days and ſolemn faſts, and executing of men on ſundays, againſt witchcraft, perjury, &c. (37). Tho' this ordinance is called by Lambard Fœdus Edovardi, yet it is Alfred's Law, and not Edward's, tho' for giving it a greater ſanction and authority Edward joined in making it. For the title in the Saxon Original is, The Ordinance that firſt K. Elfred and K. Guthrum, and then K. Edward and K. Guthrum made &c. when the Engliſh and Danes united in perfect peace and friendſhip. This was in Alfred's life-time, and Guthrum died at leaſt ten years before Edward came to the crown; whoſe joining in this Ordinance occaſioned the miſtake (38).

(37) Spelman, p. 67, 68.

(38) Id. ibid.

[K] Beſieged and took the city of London.] We have no certain account of the original of this city. But as it does not appear, that there was any ſuch place in Cæſar's time, though it was a great town in Nero's, it is probable, that it was founded in the reign of Claudius, and inhabited by the Britons and Romans together, being a trading tho' not a military Colony from the very beginning. The walls are ſaid to be built by Conſtantine the Great, at the requeſt of Helena his mother, containing within them an oblong ſpace of three miles. Cæſar's telling us, that the Britons called the places which were fenced round with woods and groves, cities or towns, occaſioned Cambden to conjecture, that London was named ſo from Llhron, which ſignifies in Britiſh ſuch a town, as if we ſhould ſay by way of eminence, The City (39). This city having in Æthelwolf's time been taken and laid waſte by the Danes, and now oppoſing Alfred, he recovered it by a vigorous ſiege; and judging it to be a proper bulwark to his dominions againſt the rovers, who came up the river, or being extremely pleaſed with the advantageous ſituation of it, he added very much to its ſtrength and beauty. The Government of it he committed to Æthelred, who had married his daughter Elfleda, or rather gave it him in fee with the title of Earl of Mercia. Some writers tell us, that he conferred upon him the title of King; but this is advanced upon very little grounds.

(39) Cambden, Addit. to Middleſex.

[L] He drew up an excellent body of Laws for the government of the Nation.] He made an enquiry into the conſtitution of foreign countries, collected thoſe of his predeceſſors Ina, Offa, and Æthelbert, and inſerted ſeveral of the judicial Laws of the Old Teſtament, with the Decalogue at the head of them. To theſe he added ſeveral of his own, adapted to the circumſtances of thoſe times. John Harding in his Chronicle (40) gives the following account of his Laws, upon the authority of Geoffry of Monmouth. We ſhall give it the reader in his old Engliſh:

(40) Fol. III. b. See Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 96, 97.

King Alurede the Laws of Troye and Brute,
Laws Moluntynes and Mercians congregate,
With Daniſh Lawes, that were well conſtitute,
And Grekiſhe alſo, well made and approbate.
In Engliſhe tongue he did them all tranſlate,
Which yet bee called the Lawes of Alurede,
At Weſtmynſter remembred yit indede.

He is ſuppoſed to have drawn up a complete body of Law; but if ſuch a ſyſtem was compiled, it is now loſt, for the Fragments in Lambard, Spelman, and the Engliſh Hiſtorians, and thoſe lately publiſhed by Dr. Wilkins, (who has given us all the Laws extant from Æthelbert, the firſt Chriſtian Lawgiver in England, down to the Magna Charta of Henry III.) fall ſhort of an entire ſyſtem of the Law. But if we may credit the Mirrour of Juſtice written by Andrew drew Horne *, who lived in the reign of King Edward I, not only his Laws, but an Hiſtory of his Judgments likewiſe were extant in that King's time; and it appears from the paſſage of John Harding quoted above, that his Laws were made uſe of at Weſtminſter in the reign of Edward IV. Thoſe Laws of Alfred, which are extant, are rank'd under three heads; the firſt of which only in Mr. Lambard's Collection bear the title of Alfred's Laws. The other are the abovementioned conſtitutions entitled Fœdus Ælfredi & Guthrumni, & Fœdus Edwardi & Guthrumni. Theſe Laws, tho' in compariſon of later ages they ſeem plain and ſimple, yet are of the ſame tenour and as elaborate as any of the Laws of the times, in which they were made, as appears from thoſe of the ancient Saxons, Goths, Longobards, and other Northern Nations inhabiting the Weſtern parts of Europe (41). "And this we muſt note by "the way, ſays Sir John Spelman (42), that the cu"riofity and intricacy of Laws grew not till ſettled "peace and increaſe of falſhood and contention ex"tended the Laws to the regulating of the courſe "of ſuits, and to the determination of divers things "concerning intereſt, whether poſſeſſory or of in"heritance; whereas at theſe times the Laws for "the general extended only to manners, to matters "criminal, to force, and to treſpaſs. And certainly "as to that point, the rule of equity has in theſe "been well purſued; neither have ſucceeding ages "receded from them, (for they were once the Laws "of this kingdom) upon any better advice of what "was more equal, but rather upon the ſole conſi"deration of the conſequence of things; wherein "fear being the agent has for prevention ſake often"times enacted more ſeverely, than equity for mere "puniſhment of the fact would of itſelf have done." We may obſerve therefore in theſe Laws, that a greater regard was had of life, than in thoſe of later ages, which for a remedy of ſmall offences have too ready a recourſe to blood; whereas in the former the ſevereſt puniſhments were the cutting out the tongue for falſe and ſeditious ſpeeches, the loſs of the hand for ſacrilege, the loſs of life for the attempts of treaſon, whether it were high treaſon againſt the Prince, or inferior treaſon againſt the perſon of an Earl or a Lord of a lower rank. Fighting or drawing a weapon in the King's hall was forfeiture of life unto the King's mercy. But the puniſhment of all theſe offences might be commuted for a ranſom. For the rule of juſtice in thoſe times was this: The perſon of every one from the King to the bondman, and every limb and member of every perſon, was valued at a certain eſtimation. Whoever therefore killed a man, or offered violence to him, was obliged to make recompence according to the valuation of the perſon killed or injur'd. And in caſe of ſlaughter that recompence or mulct was called Weregild, which if the murderer paid, the King had the firſt part, which was called Frith-bote, for the breach of his peace, and the loſs of his ſubject. The Lord had another for the loſs of his man, which was called Man-bote. And the relations of the perſon who was killed, the third part, for their loſs, call'd Mag-bote or Cengild. If this was not paid, the life of the delinquent was expoſed to the kinſmen of the perſon killed, as to the avengers of blood, according to the Law of Moſes. And as the kindred had reparation for their loſs, ſo they were obliged to pay for their kinſman, if, when he had killed a man, he was not able to pay the Weregild; for then he fled for his own ſafety, and the kindred, or ſometimes, as the caſe ſtood, the neighbourhood or houſhold paid the relations of the perſon killed a third part of the Weregild, and ſometimes the half. If the forfeiture of an inferior offence, which was leſs than manſlaughter, was not paid, the final puniſhment was, according to the Law of Taliation, limb for limb, and tooth for tooth; and ſometimes impriſonment; and the moſt frequent, or rather only puniſhment for bondmen was the whip (43). There is but one Law, which relates to right or inheritance, and that is the 37th, which ſecures the entail of eſtates, and enacts, That thoſe, who had book-land or eſtates in land left them by their parents or relations, ſhould not alienate them from their heirs, provided there could be proof made, that he, who firſt granted the eſtate, ſettled it upon condition of non-alienation. Another Law forbids the buying of a man, an horſe, or an ox, without a voucher, to warrant the ſale (44). From hence we may conclude, that villainage was in the height of diſadvantage in Alfred's time, and that a man's ſlave was as much his property, as his cattle. He, who perjur'd himſelf, and refuſed to make good the obligation of a lawful oath, was to deliver up his arms, and ſurrender his eſtate into the hands of ſome of his friends. After this he was to be impriſoned forty days, and ſubmit to the penalty impoſed on him by the Biſhop. If he made any reſiſtance, and refuſed to ſubmit, he was to forfeit his whole eſtate. If he fled from juſtice, he was to be deprived of the protection of the Law, and excommunicated. And if any perſon had been ſurety for his good behaviour, the ſurety, in caſe of failure, was to be puniſhed at the Biſhop's diſcretion (45). If any perſon debauched a man's wife, the valuation of whoſe eſtate amounted to twelve hundred ſhillings, he was obliged to pay an hundred and twenty ſhillings to the huſband. If the fortune of the perſon injured was leſs, the fine was ſet ſomewhat lower. And here, if the adulterer happened not to be rich, he was obliged to ſell his eſtate to make ſatisfaction. From Alfred's inſtitution likewiſe is the original of obliging men to find ſureties for their good behaviour, and of committing them to priſon for want of ſureties. We may obſerve, that in the Laws, which were made upon occaſion of the Daniſh ſubjections, which in every article are religious, as particularly for maintaining the true worſhip of God, the peace of the Church, and the rights of it, it is ordained, that if any perſon in holy Orders ſhall fight, perjure himſelf, or commit fornication, beſides his penance and ſpiritual ſatisfaction according to the Canons, he ſhould make temporal ſatisfaction according to the Law by Weregild, Fine, and Law-ſlight, as the caſe required, and ſhould find ſureties for his good behaviour, or elſe be committed to priſon. And if a Prieſt committed any abuſe in bidding of faſts or holy-days, or failed in preparing the Chriſm, or denied Baptiſm, if he was an Engliſhman, he was obliged to pay a conſiderable Fine to the King, and if a Dane, to pay his Law-ſlight. It appears from theſe Laws, that even in thoſe times the Saxon Kings, Alfred and Edward conſider'd themſelves as the proper Sovereigns of the Clergy as well as of the Laity, and that the Church in their dominions was not conſidered as a diſtinct body, ſubject only to an univerſal Eccleſiaſtical Sovereign abroad, and exempt from the juriſdiction of the State at home, as Anſelm, Becket, and others afterwards contended; but that as the Clergy were part of the King's ſubjects, ſo their perſons and fortunes were under his protection only, and anſwerable to the King for the breach of his Laws. They did not imagine, that to queſtion a Clergyman according to the King's Law, was the leaſt infringement of the peace of the Church. For in the firſt article of their Law they ſolemnly confirm the peace of the church, and yet in the ſubſequent articles ordain what we have mentioned above (46). Beſides he and his ſucceſſor Edward were ſufficiently convinced of the incroachment of the Pope in claiming a ſuperiority over the Emperor and all other Chriſtian Princes, there being no ground for it in Scripture, and the pretended donation from Conſtantine the Great being a mere forgery, and never inſiſted upon till after the time of Gregory VII. This has been evidently proved by ſeveral eminent Proteſtant Writers; and Cardinal Bellarmin himſelf after all his great learning ſhewn in behalf of the Pope, has been obliged in divers places to acknowledge the ſovereign power of Kings and Princes over the Biſhop of Rome as well as over other Biſhops (47). The original of the Law, that perſons excommunicated ſhould not be permitted to ſue or claim property, is aſcribed to Alfred by Hollingſhed (48). And there are many other particulars in the forms of the Law, and the Government of the kingdom, which had their firſt inſtitution from his Ordinance. "And I know not, ſays Sir John Spelman "(49), whether I may well omit, that in all proba"ble conjecture, the very name of Common Law "originally ſprung from his conſtitutions. For whe"ther it were ſo called, becauſe it was made a com"mon Law to all the inhabitants of the ſeveral "kingdoms of the Heptarchy, now expired and "grown into one kingdom, or whether it was ſo "called, becauſe it was made a common Law to "the two ſeveral Nations then reſiding in the King"dom,

* Some writers tell us this book was written in the Saxon times, and was reviſed, and had ſome things added to it by Andrew Horne.

(41) A body of theſe Laws was publiſhed in folio, firſt by Heroldus at Baſil in 1557, and afterwards by Lindenbrogius at Francfort in 1613.

(42) Pag. 100.

(43) Spelman, p. 101, 102.

(44) Lambard. Archaionom. Fœdus Alur. & Guthron. p. 36.

(45) Lambard, Leges Alut. fol. 22, 23.

(46) Spelman, p. 103, 104.

(47) Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 103.

(48) Deſcription of Britain. fol. 121.

(49) Pag. 107.

he inſtituted the method of trials by Juries [M], which is beſt fitted for the impartial adminiſtratoin of Juſtice; he divided the Kingdom into Shires, or Counties, Hundreds and Tythings [N]; he regulated the Militia in ſuch a manner, as was moſt proper for the ſecurity of the Nation [O]; he gave all imaginable encouragement to Trade

" dom, that is to ſay, the Saxon and the Dane, Æl-
" fred (that was the Lawgiver) was in both caſes the " author of that common Law. And tho' the Danes
" had Laws, that endured to the Confeſſor's time,
" to which the Saxons were not ſubject, and was " therefore called Dane-Law, yet was that Law of
" an after-growth, and differing but in ſome things;
" for the main they had one common Law given to
" them." Alfred was very exact in obſerving, that the Magiſtrates adminiſtred juſtice impartially; and it is ſaid, that within the compaſs of one year he executed four and forty Judges for not doing juſtice *.

* Miroir aux Juſtices. c. 20. & alib. Malmesb. l. 2. fol. 25.

[M] He inſtituted the method of trials by Juries.] This valuable branch of our Engliſh Law we derive from him. Being ſenſible that the ſpirit of oppreſſion naturally grew upon men in authority, he ſought for means to prevent the effects of it. For which purpoſe he ordered that the Kings Thanes or Barons ſhould be tried by twelve of their Peers, and other Thanes by eleven of their Peers, and one of the King's Thanes, and a Borſholder by twelve Borſholders (50). Tacitus obſerves (51), that among the Germans, and conſequently our old Saxons, judgment was given by the Prince with the aſſiſtance of an hundred men of the ſame town, who gave their opinion vivâ voce, or by rattling of their arms. But this method was diſcontinued by degrees, or by the command of ſome of our Kings, after the Chriſtian religion was received among them. And at firſt the number was reduced from an hundred to twelve, though they retained the ſame power and juriſdiction, and were equal in authority to the Governor and Biſhop. The ſame cuſtom was obſerved among all the northern people. But afterwards the men of buſineſs and quality, as the twelve men generally were, very often not finding any thing worthy of their labour and attention, grew negligent of their office, and ſo the cuſtom gradually declined. But Alfred ſubſtituted in the room of it that method, which is ſtill maintained among us; that twelve freemen of the neighbourhood having taken a ſolemn oath, and heard the depoſitions of the witneſſes, ſhall give judgment, whether the perſon accuſed is guilty or not (52). Alfred ſeems to have extended this form of trial, which was before uſed only in criminal cauſes, to diſputes concerning property.

(50) Spelman, p. 106.
(51) De Moribus German.
(52) See Alfred's Law, Si quis Miniſter Regius. Camb. Britan. fol. 499. Lambard fol. 45. ap. Walker in Notis in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 72.

[N] He divided the Kingdom into Shires, or Counties, Hundreds and Tythings.] The wars had cauſed ſuch diſorders and licentiouſneſs in the Kingdom, that vagabonds and vagrants every where abounded, who committed all manner of crimes with impunity, their poor and mean condition ſcreening them from juſtice. To prevent theſe inconveniences, he divided the Kingdom into Shires or Counties (53), the Counties into Hundreds or Wapentakes, and the Hundreds into Tythings (54). He likewiſe made a diviſion of the Counties into Tribings. For ſuch matters as could not be adjuſted in the Hundred or Wapentake Court were referred to a ſuperior one, conſiſting generally of three Hundreds, the Heads of which were named Tribingerefas. This diviſion indeed was almoſt diſcontinued upon the Norman Conqueſt; however there are ſome remains of it to this day in the Ridings of Yorkſhire, Lathes of Kent, and the three parts of Lincolnſhire, viz. Lindſey, Reſteven and Holland (55). Theſe diviſions were made, that every man might be more directly under the notice and juriſdiction of the government, and more certainly anſwerable to the Law for any misbehaviour. The Tythings were called ſo, becauſe ten houſholders and their families were formed into a diſtinct body. Theſe ten men were all bound to the King for the good behaviour of each other. The more particular circumſtances of this proviſion were theſe: the Lords were to anſwer for their ſlaves; husbands for their wives; fathers for their children till fourteen years of age. And generally the maſter of the family was to be ſecurity for thoſe who lived with him. If any one of the ten fell under ſuſpicion of any treſpaſs, he was obliged to give ſecurity for his good behaviour; but if he could find none, the Tything committed him to priſon, to prevent their being liable to the puniſhment he ſhould incur by his faults (56). Thus the Houſeholders being reſponſible for their Families, the Tything for the Houſeholders, the Hundred for the Tythings, and the Counties for the Hundreds, every one was watchful over his neighbour's actions. If a ſtranger guilty of any crime made his eſcape, information was taken of the houſe where he lodged, and if he had been there three days, the maſter of the family was condemned to pay the fine. But in caſe he had not ſtaid ſo long as three days, the Houſeholder was acquitted upon the oath of himſelf and two of his neighbours, that he was not privy to his crime (57). Some writers have been of opinion, that Alfred was not the firſt who divided the Kingdom into Shires, but that it was done by others before his time. But Sir John Spelman rejects this notion upon very ſtrong and convincing reaſons, and particularly the expreſs authority of Ingulphus, Huntindon, and William of Malmesbury, which is much ſuperior to that of any later writers (58). When the King had diſtributed the Kingdom into diſtinct Shires, Hundreds, and Tythings, and by that means taken a ready method to diſcover delinquents, he took away the Vidomes or Vice-domini, who were deputies to the Earls, and inſtead of them ſubſtituted the Sheriff or Reeve of the Shire, who from that inſtitution have ever ſince continued, firſt as a deputy to the Earl, and ſince as an immediate officer of the Crown. And beſides the Sheriff he appointed in every Shire peculiar Juſtices, whoſe name and juriſdiction are not at preſent very certainly known, but Sir John Spelman (59) ſuppoſes them to have been the ſame with the King's Aldermen, and Aldermen of the Shire, who as Mr. Hearne is of opinion (60) were thoſe who were ſtiled in the Saxon Laws Wites or Wiſemen (61). Theſe were the ſupreme Judges in the Shire-Gemot or County-Court, and took cogniſance of the greater cauſes, which were not determinable in the Hundred Courts. By this means he divided the juriſdiction of the Vidome into the offices of a Judge and a Sheriff; the firſt of which ſeems to have had a mere juridical function, the other only a miniſterial or mixed one. When he had thus reduced the quality of the officer to a condition more agreeable to the due execution of juſtice, he ſettled likewiſe the method of ſuit, and ready proſecution of right; ordaining, that for the better eaſe of the ſubject (62), original writs ſhould, without any ſpecial petition to the King, be of courſe granted by the Officer, as things of duty and not of favour (63). Theſe inſtitutions produced ſo ſurprizing an alteration in the Kingdom, that though before there was no poſſibility of travelling without arms, all places became now ſo ſecure, that when the King for the trial ſake cauſed golden bracelets to be hung up in the croſs-ways, no man ventured to touch them. Virgins might ſafely travel every where alone (64); nay Ingulfus tells us, that if a perſon left his money all night in the highway, he might find it untouched the next morning.

(53) Ingulph.
(54) Malmeſbury, lib. 2.
(55) Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 108. and Walker's Not. in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 74.
(56) There is much the ſame regulation in China. See the Hiſtory of Menaca.
(57) Spelman, p. 109, 110.
(58) Id. p. 111, 112, 113.
(59) P. 114.
(60) Notes upon Spelman, p. 114.
(61) See Selden's Titles of Honour, Spelman's Gloſſary in the word Aldermannus, Dr. Brady's Gloſſary at the end of his Introduction to the Old Engliſh Hiſtory, p. 66. and Mr. Tyrrel's General Hiſtory of England, vol. 1. in Introd.
(62) Miroir aux Juſtices, cited by Sir Edw. Coke in his Preface to the 9th Report.
(63) Spelman, ubi ſupra.
(64) Speed.

[O] He regulated the Militia in ſuch a manner, as was moſt proper for the ſecurity of the Nation.] In order to prevent the kingdom from being infeſted any more by foreign enemies, he diſpoſed the Militia in ſuch a manner, as enabled him to oppoſe any invaſion, if the Danes were inclined to renew their incurſions. He kept in each county a body of troops, and appointed ſeveral Prefects or Commanders, and ordered ſome of the ſoldiers to garriſon the forts and caſtles, which he built, and others to the ſervice of the field, as occaſion required. Theſe being divided into two bodies, the one went firſt and ſerved for a certain time, and then were relieved by the other, who ſtaid at home; and over all, as his Generaliſſimo, was his Princeps Militiæ, who commanded in chief under the King; and we find that in his Will he ſtiles Æthelred Earl of Mercia,

Trade and Commerce, and ordered a great number of trading ſhips to be built [P]; he promoted the intereſts of learning, which was at that time at a very low ebb in this Kingdom [Q]; and he is ſaid by a great many Authors to have founded the Univerſity Mercia, his ſon-in-law, who bore that office, by this name. It appears likewiſe, that beſides this regular and ſtanding Militia, he conſtituted by way of collateral ſecurity, other Guardians of the kingdom againſt the irruptions of the Danes. Theſe were perſons of great power, and influence, and reputation, who conſtantly reſiding in the places of their charge, had, in defect of the ordinary proviſions, ſome extraordinary commiſſion for the common ſafety of the county. Thus we find Ceolmund the Earl conſtituted a Guardian in Kent (65); in Rocheſter Swithulf the Biſhop; in Eſſex Earl Brithulf; in London Earl Æthelred; in Dorcheſter Halard the Biſhop; in Suſſex Eadulf; in Wincheſter the Biſhop Bertulf (66) and divers others in ſeveral places, as Edred, Duke or Earl of Devonſhire, who died in the year 900 (67), a month before Alfred's death, to whom he had been a faithful aſſiſtant in many battles (68). By this means, together with a numerous fleet, which was always ready to put to ſea, or cruiſing round the iſland, he kept the foreign Danes ſo much in awe, that during the reſt of his reign, they durſt not attempt to make a deſcent. And for the ſame reaſon thoſe who were ſettled in the iſland, found themſelves conſtrained to continue quiet.

(65) Matth. Weſtm. an. 197. Godwin. fol. 337.

(66) Spelman, p. 147, 148.

(67) Brompton, Col. 832.

(68) H. Huntingt. fol. 202. n. 20. See Hearne's Notes on Spelman, ubi ſupra.

[P] He gave all imaginable encouragement to trade and commerce, and ordered a great number of trading ſhips to be built.] When he had by theſe wiſe regulations provided for the ſafety of the State, he endeavoured to make the people reliſh the fruits of peace, by introducing trade and commerce. He ordered a conſiderable number of Merchant-ſhips to be built, which he let out to the principal Merchants for the encouragement of traffic. It is affirmed, that ſome of theſe Merchants traded as far as the Eaſt-Indies, from whence they imported ſeveral things before unknown to the Engliſh. Malmesbury (69) tells us, that Alfred ſent a preſent to the Indies in honour of St. Thomas. Sigelin Biſhop of Sherborn was employd to deliver it, who performed that voyage ſucceſsfully, and brought back precious ſtones, perfumes, and other things, which were then great curioſities in England. But here we are not to ſuppoſe, that this voyage was performed by doubling the Cape of Good-Hope, but that the Biſhop paſſed the Straits, and landed at ſome of the ports in Paleſtine, and travelled the reſt of the way in Caravans; or elſe re-imbarked upon the Red-ſea, and fell into the Arabian gulf, and coaſted along the Perſian ſhore till he came to the Indies. And to ſhew the extent of the King's genius, we are told (70), that there was in the Cotton Library an old Memorial of a voyage of one Oether a Dane, performed by Alfred's orders for the diſcovery of a North-Eaſt paſſage. Part of this account has been publiſhed by Hackluyt (71) and Purchas in his Pilgrim, from whom Sir John Spelman has tranſcribed it. In the Saxon tranſlation of Oroſius by King Alfred there is an exact relation of the Voyage of Oether and Wolſtan, who ſeems to have been an Engliſhman; but this is in ſeveral points different from the printed account of Hackluyt, as may be ſeen by conſulting it in the Appendix to the Latin tranſlation of Alfred's Life (72). He conſidered likewiſe the great want which the kingdom laboured under of Artificers, as well as thoſe of nobler profeſſions; and accordingly procured them to come over from all parts and ſettle in England. So that his court was ſoon frequented with ſtrangers of all profeſſions, Gauls, Franks, Armoric-Britons, Germans, Friſons, Scots, Welch, and others, whom he encouraged in the moſt liberal manner imaginable.

(69) De Geſtis Pontific. l. 2.

(70) Spelman, p. 152, 153, &c.

(71) Vol. 1. p. 235.

(72) P. 205. ed. Oxon. 1678.

[Q] He promoted the intereſts of learning, which was at that time at a very low ebb in this kingdom.] That learning was univerſally neglected in this Prince's reign, appears from his letter to Biſhop Wulfſig, prefixed to his tranſlation of St. Gregory's Paſtoral. In this letter he tells the Biſhop, that "both the "Clergy and Laity of the Engliſh, were formerly "bred to letters, and made great improvements in "the valuable parts of learning; that by the advantage of ſuch a learned education, the precepts "of religion and loyalty were well obſerved; the "State flouriſhed, and the Government was famous "for its conduct in foreign countries. And with "regard to the Clergy, they were particularly eminent for their inſtructions, for acting up to their "character, and diſcharging all the parts of their "function; ſo that ſtrangers uſed to come hither "for learning, diſcipline and improvement. But "now the caſe is miſerably altered, and we have "need of travelling to learn what we uſed to teach. "In ſhort knowledge is ſo entirely loſt among the "Engliſh, that there are very few on this ſide the "Humber, who can either tranſlate a piece of Latin, or ſo much as underſtand their common "prayers in their mother-tongue. There were ſo "few who could do this, that I do not remember "one on the South-ſide of the Thames, when I "came to the crown (73)." This univerſal ignorance was occaſioned by the dreadful devaſtation which the Danes had made, who had not only accidentally deſtroyed learning, while thro' covetouſneſs they ſeized upon all places, in which there was any proviſion for it, but had with a particular malignance towards learning, politeneſs, and religion, raged againſt the profeſſors of it and the profeſſion itſelf, burning books and houſes, and putting the men to the ſword. "And tho' by this ſcarcity at home, "as Sir John Spelman obſerves (74), the King was "forced to ſeek for learned men abroad, yet even "there alſo (in all places on this ſide the Alpes,) "Scholars and Men of learning were very ſcarce, "by reaſon of the like irruptions of thoſe Northern "Nations into the South-Weſt parts of Europe, "which in every place produced much what the "ſame effects. But whereſoever the King could "light of any men for his purpoſe, by all the means "he could he procured them to come over to him, "and help him in ſetting again on foot the know-"ledge of letters here in our land: and ſuch was "his exceeding liberality in the entertainment of "them, as that, notwithſtanding their ſcarcity, he "ſoon furniſhed himſelf with very choice men, "of whom there are ſome that are to this day re-"membred unto us." Of this number was John Erigena or Scotus, an Iriſhman, who was a perſon of conſiderable learning, and a great Maſter of languages, particularly the Greek, Chaldee, and Arabic; Aſſerius, ſirnamed Menevenſis from the monaſtery of St. Davids, of which he was a Monk, who wrote in the King's life-time an account of his actions, which is ſtill extant, and dedicated to Alfred himſelf, but he lived not to continue it to the end of his reign; John the Monk, famous for his ſkill in Logic, Muſic, and Arithmetic; who is probably the ſame, whom he calls in the Preface to Gregory's Paſtoral, John his Maſs-Prieſt, and who taught him among others, as he ſays there, to underſtand and tranſlate that book. He had others of eminent learning, who were Saxons, natives of the Kingdom, and yet in regard of the circumſtances of their procurement many of them may juſtly be number'd among thoſe, whom he had from foreign countries; as Werefrid Biſhop of Worceſter, who held that Biſhopric in the life of Burrhed King of Mercia; but the Danes invading Mercia, and expelling Burrhed, Werefrid, whoſe province was in Mercia, was obliged to take refuge beyond ſea, till he was reſtored by Alfred. Plegmond, a Mercian, to whom he gave the Archbiſhopric of Canterbury, and who is ſaid to have excelled all his contemporaries in the knowledge of Divinity and the Scriptures. Dunwulph Biſhop of Wincheſter, who had a very low education, and had been the Neat-herd, in whoſe houſe the King in his diſtreſs had concealed himſelf; but Alfred finding him a man of excellent genius, and capable of a much ſuperior employment, he got him inſtructed in learning; in which he made ſo great a progreſs, that the King raiſed him to the See of Wincheſter (75). But this ſtory is very much doubted by ſome writers (76).

(73) Præfat. Ælfredi Regis, publiſhed in Mr. Wiſe's edition of Aſſerius Menevenſis, Oxon. 1722. p. 87.

(74) Pag. 132.

(75) Malmeſbury 242. See Spelman, p. 138.

ſity of Oxford [R]. Though he was capable himſelf of diſcovering the beſt means of promoting the public good, yet he always conſulted with others of eminent abilities [S]. Neither ters (76). To theſe great Men we may add Wulfſiig and Æthelſtan Biſhops of London, Werebert Biſhop of Cheſter, and Wereolf a Prieſt; and particularly St. Neots, a man of extraordinary zeal for promoting Religion. Theſe were the principal perſons, whom the King made uſe of to recover his ſubjects from the diſadvantages of an illiterate education, to inform their underſtandings, direct their conſciences, and poliſh their manners. By their aſſiſtance he was directed in his enquiry after men of abilities and probity, who being found out, were put into a method of education, and furniſhed with opportunities of improvement. And thus in a ſhort time there were perſons enough of competent learning to furniſh the Engliſh Sees, and ſupport the character of Biſhops. And for fear the diſadvantage of the times ſhould be ſuch, that the learning of the preſent Clergy might die with them, and not deſcend upon their ſucceſſors, the King reſolved upon making ſome proviſion for the inſtruction of poſterity. To this purpoſe he employed his Biſhops and other learned Men in tranſlating ſuch books, as were moſt uſeful to the Clergy, into the Saxon language; and he undertook himſelf the tranſlation of Gregory the Great's Paſtoral concerning the duty of Biſhops and Prieſts. Several copies of this verſion were tranſcribed, and ſent by him to every Biſhop's ſon with order that they ſhould be carefully preſerved, with this view, that if thro' the like occaſions the Church ſhould hereafter be obliged again to confer holy Orders upon men, who underſtood not the Latin tongue, they might learn their duty from hence. The Preface of this Paſtoral is written by way of letter to Wulfſig Biſhop of London. We ſhall give the reader a ſhort extract from it. "He conjures the Biſhop "to communicate his knowledge, and transfuſe his "own good qualities as far as he can. Conſider, "ſays he, what puniſhment we have reaſon to ex"pect even in this life, if we neither take care of "our own improvement, nor conſult the benefit of "poſterity. We vainly value ourſelves upon the "name of Chriſtianity; but alas! there are but a "few of us, who live agreeably to our profeſſion. "Theſe conſiderations made me reflect, that tho' "before the late times of rapine and devaſtation all "the churches of England were well provided with "books, yet many people were little better for this "advantage, becauſe they were written in foreign "languages, which the people did not underſtand. "Now at firſt I was ſomewhat ſurprized to find "men of ſo great learning and piety, with whom "the country was plentifully furniſhed in former "ages, omit the tranſlation of at leaſt ſome part of "their Libraries. But this difficulty was eaſily re"moved, when I conſider'd, that our anceſtors had "no apprehenſion, that we ſhould ever have ſunk "into this prodigious degree of ignorance; and "therefore declined the tranſlating of books on "purpoſe; imagining that the locking up of learn"ing in foreign languages would prompt men to "ſtudy and application, and by conſequence pro"mote their improvement." He proceeds then to obſerve, that "the Bible written in Hebrew was "tranſlated into Greek and Latin, and that all Chri"ſtendom had ſome part of it render'd in their "own language. For theſe reaſons he thought it "adviſeable to tranſlate St. Gregory's Paſtoral into "Engliſh; for tho' the late commotions had diſ"couraged learning, and made Latin an unintelligi"ble language, yet a great many of his ſubjects "were able to read Engliſh." He informs Wulfſig that "he had a deſign, that all the Engliſh, who were "in any tolerable circumſtances, ſhould be obliged "to educate their children to read Engliſh before "they put them to any trade; and if they intended "to have them preferred to any degree of notice "and conſideration, they ſhould get them inſtructed "in Latin. And laſtly as to the ſenſe of the tranſ"lation, he had govern'd himſelf by the directions "of Plegmond, Aſſerius, Grimbold, and John (77)." Theſe books were ſent to all the reſpective Sees, and each copy had a ſtyle or golden pen worth fifty marks, fix'd to it; both which were laid up in the church, and all people ſolemnly conjured not to remove either of them (78).

(76) See Walker's Not. in Vit. Ælfredi Magni, pag. 102. and Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 138.

(77) Vide Præfat. Ælfredi Regis, in Mr. Wiſe's edition of Aſſerius Menev. p. 87, 88, &c. and Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. 1. book 3. p. 167. and Spelman, p. 141, 142, 143.

(78) Spelman, Concil. vol. 1. p. 379, 380. and the Life of Ælfred the Great, p. 143.

[R] And he is ſaid by a great many authors to have founded the Univerſity of Oxford.] From the prefatory Letter quoted in the preceding remark we may ſee how ſtrong the King's inclinations were to provide for the ſecurity of Religion, to revive the ſtudy of learning, and promote the happineſs of his people. To this purpoſe he mentions a ſcheme of founding ſchools throughout the Kingdom, from whence the Nation might be ſupplied for ever with perſons accompliſhed in all ſciences both divine and human, to ſerve the occaſions of State. How far this excellent project was executed by him, is difficult to determine. However it is certain, that he ſettled a noble ſeat of learning at Oxford; where he built and endowed four ſchools or colleges. In the firſt the Abbot Neots and Grimbold read Divinity; in the ſecond Aſſerius taught Grammar and Logic; in the third John, a Monk of St. David's, taught Logic, Arithmetic, and Muſic; and in the fourth John Scotus profeſſed Geometry and Aſtronomy (79). Spelman ſays (80), that he ſettled a revenue for about eighty Scholars under certain ſtatutes and regulations; and Camden tells us, that he founded but three halls or ſchools; the firſt at the end of High-ſtreet for Grammarians, was called Little-Univerſity-Hall: the ſecond in School-ſtreet for Philoſophy, was called Leſs-Univerſity-Hall; and the third in High-ſtreet, more to the Weſt than the firſt, for Divinity was named Great-Univerſity-Hall. Theſe three halls were afterwards thrown into one ſociety, and called by the name of Univerſity-College (81). Brian Twine ſets the antiquity of Oxford much higher than the reign of Alfred (82). But Sir John Spelman on the other hand ſeems pretty well aſſured, that this Prince was the firſt Founder (83). The examination of the arguments urged on both ſides, would lead us too far for the limits of our deſign; we ſhall therefore refer the curious reader to the writers themſelves.

(79) Rapin's Hiſtory of England, vol. 1. book 4. and Spelman, p. 187.

(80) P. 146.

(81) Id. p. 189.

(82) See his Apology.

(83) Life of Ælfred the Great, p. 172, &c.

[S] He always conſulted with others of eminent abilities.] He ordered matters in ſuch a manner, that all reſolutions relating to the publick were to paſs through two diſtinct councils. The firſt was the Privy-Council, to which none but thoſe, whom the King had a particular eſteem for, were admitted. Here all affairs were firſt debated, before they were laid before the ſecond or Great Council of the Kingdom, which conſiſted of Biſhops, Earls of the Counties, the King's Aldermen, and his chief Thanes, who were afterwards called Barons. "When ſeve"rally to every defect or evil appearance in the "State, ſays Sir John Spelman (84), the King had "provided a particular remedy; then conſidering the "continual change and innovation that new-founded "and growing States were neceſſarily ſubject to, he "held it not ſecure to leave the ſucceſs of all upon the "adminiſtration of the ordinances that he had already "made; but that by continual and certain intelligence "of the condition of the Commonwealth he might be "able to foreſee the coming evil and prevent it, or un"dertaking it before it had gotten ſtrength, with "more facility redreſs it, he inſtituted, for a perpe"tual ordinance (85), that twice in the year, and "oftner if need required, there ſhould be an aſſem"bly (that is of the Great Council of the Kingdom, "the Biſhops and Nobles) held at London, to con"ſult of the well governing of the Commonwealth. "This (we muſt underſtand) was an aſſembling of "the repreſentative body of the States ſettled by "Ælfred in a formal and a conſtant courſe; not "that it was of one and the ſame form and ſolem"nity with our later Parliaments; but as the whole "Kingdom was then entirely either in the hands of "the Kings or of his Earls and Thanes, and all that "held lands under them, held them in ſuch ſub"jection and dependence, as that they were wholly "at their Lords diſpoſe; ſo what was then ordained "by the King, his Earls and Thanes, was a binding "Law to the whole Kingdom; for that it was the "act of thoſe that had the abſolute intereſt, and did "involve the right of the reſidue of ſuch as were "but

(84) Spelman, p. 157, 158.

(85) Le Roy Ælfrid ordeigna pur uſage perpetuel, que a deux foits per lan, ou pluis ſouent pur miſtier, in temps de peace ſe aſſembler a Londres pur parliamenter ſur &c. Miroir aux Juſtices, quoted by Sir Edw. Coke in his Preface to the ninth Report.

Neither were the virtues of his private life leſs remarkable than his public [T]. He was

" but their liege-men and vaſſals. As for the Bi-" ſhops, they were ever members of thoſe grand
" councils and parties in the ſanctions of them;
" beſides that in reſpect of their temporal poſſeſſions,
" they had the intereſt of Thanes and Barons, the " ſacred eſteem of their perſons and function, toge" ther with their predominance of underſtanding,
" did not only make their votes equivalent to thoſe
" of the Nobles, but even the whole act to have
" the more reverend eſteem and acceptation."

The ſame Author obſerves, that from this inſtitution of the King it became a general cuſtom among his Saxon ſucceſſors to hold aſſemblies of their Biſhops and Nobles conſtantly three times a year, at Chriſtmas, Eaſter and Whitſuntide, in ſolemn conſultation concerning the affairs of the Kingdom. Theſe aſſemblies were not held always in one place, but wherever the occaſion required, though moſt commonly in the place where the King kept his court and reſidence (86). This general Council or Aſſembly of the nation was called in Saxon Wittena-Gemot: and at preſent the Parliament, a name taken from the French. It is very warmly diſputed, whether the people had a right to ſend repreſentatives to the aſſembly; but however that be, we ſee in theſe three councils the original of the Secret or Privy Councils, as well as the antiquity of Parliament.

(86) Spelman, p. 158.

[T] Neither were the virtues of his private life leſs remarkable than his public.] If we conſider the great and important affairs which he was engaged in for the publick good, we might imagine that he had no leiſure to mind his own private concerns. But he was one of thoſe happy genius's to whom every thing ſeems natural, and who are continually employed without appearing to be ſo. He knew too well the value of time to loſe any part of it. So far was he from being like moſt Princes, who think that their high ſtation gives them the privilege of ſpending all their time in diverſions and trifles, that he endeavoured to make the beſt of every moment. He made a vow to ſet apart half of his time to the ſervice of God, as Aſſerius Menevenſis informs us (87); but William of Malmesbury (88), and others relate, that he divided the four and twenty hours of day and night into three parts; eight hours of which he ſpent in reading, writing, and prayer; eight hours in ſleep and other refreſhments; and the remaining third was employed in the affairs of government. This vow of his was not made in adverſity, when every perſon is inclined to be religious, nor in his old age, when the world had firſt forſaken him, but in the vigour of life and in the height of his ſucceſs (89). As the uſe of clocks and hour glaſſes was not then introduced into England, he meaſured the time by the means of wax-candles, twelve inches long, with the diviſion of the inches marked on them diſtinctly. There being ſix in number, and being lighted one after another, burnt four hours each, that is, every three inches an hour, ſo that the whole ſix candles laſted juſt twenty four hours, the watching of which was committed to the keepers of his chapel, whoſe office it was to put him in mind how each hour paſſed; and to prevent the wind from making them burn unſteadily, it is ſaid he invented the method of encloſing them in lanthorns (90). " His practice of devotion, ſays Sir John Spel-
" man (91), was not after monaſtic renunciation,
" forſaking labour and the converſation of men, in" ſtead of the inticements of the world, but was
" in a converſeable regularity, not only good in
" itſelf, but profitable to all, and in a greater or leſ-
" ſer degree more obvious to every man's imitation."
His inclinations for virtue and ſobriety were remarkable in the moſt critical periods of life. When he was in the heat of his youth, and the ſtrength of his paſſions, he uſed to riſe in the night, walk privately into the church, and pray to God that he would fortify him with his grace againſt the irregular ſollicitations of his paſſions. And rather than run the riſque of a libertine practice, he begged, that ſome check might be put upon his health to ſecure his conduct, and abate the violence of deſire (92). " As his de" votion firſt ſhewed itſelf in his youth, ſo it con-
" ſtantly accompanied all the actions of his whole
" life; and though from his youth he was bred a
" man of war, and continually exerciſed in the ne-
" ceſſities of a barbarous and licentious war, yet
" could not the roughneſs thereof diſtemper the na" tural tenderneſs of his heart, nor any outrage of
" the barbarous enemy ſo harden it againſt pity, but
" that ſtill for all their provocations, he ſought out
" the way to ſhew mercy to them, never ſo truly
" pleaſed as when he could bring the concluſion of " a war to theſe terms, as to make an exchange of
" his own temporal victory for an eternal conqueſt
" of them to his Saviour. No wrong, no damage ſo
" great, no advantage againſt them of ſuch conſe-
" quence, but that all might be remitted, if once they " offered to embrace Chriſtianity; the King's heart
" never exceeding moderation, but when religion
" overſoftened it in piety and ways of ſhewing mer-
" cy (93)." He uſed, whenever he was at leiſure, to be either reading or queſtioning others to inform himſelf, or reaſoning with them upon religious ſubjects, in order to inſtruct them, never regretting ſo much the want of any thing in his country, as of men of virtue and learning, by whoſe help he might advance religion, virtue and knowledge, both in himſelf and others (94). His munificence and charity were extraordinary, as appears by the management of his fortune. He divided his revenues into two parts; and then ſubdivided the firſt moiety into three; with one third of which he paid the ſalaries of his court; another third was expended in buildings; and the remaining third was beſtowed upon ſtrangers and indigent perſons, who travelled hither. The other moiety was divided into four parts; one of which was diſtributed among the Engliſh, who were poor; the monaſteries had a ſecond portion; the ſcholars had the third: and the churches and monaſteries beyond ſea were preſented with a fourth (95). By his revenues we mean his own Hereditary Eſtate; for as Mr. Rapin obſerves, it was not cuſtomary in thoſe days for Princes to levy taxes upon the people, in order to ſquander the money in luxury and extravagancies. As for his genius, the ſtrength and univerſality of it was extraordinary. The new way of building ſhips, by which he gained the advantage over the Danes, was his own invention. He was an excellent Architect; he drew models with great beauty and exactneſs, and taught the Engliſh to build with more regularity and magnificence than formerly (96). He was very conſtant in his devotion, and uſed to frequent the publick ſervice every day, and ſeldom miſſed any ſtated hours of prayer either by day or night. He was a Prince of great condeſcention and inoffenſive pleaſantneſs in converſation; eaſy of acceſs, and had nothing that was rough, contemptuous, or diſobliging in his behaviour (97). With regard to his reputation in the field, nothing can be better eſtabliſhed. He commanded in more battles than Julius Cæſar, diſtinguiſhed himſelf with all imaginable bravery, and fought up to the character of an Hero in Romance (98). " His courage, ſays Sir
" John Spelman (99), was ſo preſent and innate in " him, that fear could never make the leaſt mo" mentary ſeiſure or miſgiving of his heart, though
" it often aſſail'd him in deſperate and unexpected ac" cidents. Withall it was ſo rarely qualified, as that " how great ſoever it was, it was yet poſſeſſed with" out that turbulent oſtentation, that leſſer ſpirits
" are often clogged withall. His courage always
" roſe according to the exigence of the occaſion,
" and having ſerved that, it quietly and without
" vapouring reſolved into that virtue, that he was " next to make uſe of. Neither was his heart only
" conſcious of his valour, but it was actually ap" proved both to himſelf and others. For though
" (by the privilege of a Prince) his conduct and " command in the war, might juſtly enough have " afforded him the title of Valiant; yet fortune
" would that the ſtrict trial both of his heart and " hands ſhould make his purchaſe of it; of both
" which he often made particular demonſtration, to
" the great ſupport of his own party, to the terror
" of his adverſaries, and to the admiration of them
" both. Solus adverſum pectus (ſaith Malmesbury)
" hoſtibus offerre, ſolus inclinatam aciem reſtituere,
" nota

(87) Pag. 64.
(88) De Geſt. Reg. l. 2. fol. 24.
(89) Spelman, p. 207.
(90) Id. p. 205, 206. and Aſſer. p. 68.
(91) Pag. 203.
(92) Id. p. 207, 208.
(93) Id. p. 208.
(94) Id. p. 205.
(95) Aſſer. Menev. p. 64, 65. and Malmesbury de Geſt. Regum Angl. fol. 25.
(96) Aſſer. Menev. p. 58.
(97) Id. p. 44.
(98) Malmesb. de Geſt. Regum Ang. l. 2. fol. 24.
(99) Pag. 214, 215.

was eminent for his learning, and wrote ſeveral books [U]. We muſt not omit to obſerve that he employed his poetic talent in the nobleſt improvement of the minds of his ſubjects [X]. He was highly eſteemed in foreign countries. He died in the two and fiftieth year of his age on the 28th of October 900 (n), having reigned twenty eight years and (n) Spelman, p. 216.

" nota virtutis ſuæ ſpecie alienos territans, ſuos cor-
" roborans; ſo little glorying the whilſt in what he
" did, as we may judge that virtue rather in eſteem
" with him for the ſervice it always did him, than " any way ſpecially affected, the natural bent of his " heart being wholly unto Literature, and therein,
" above all other, to the ſearch of Divine Know" ledge, and that, not as it is attained by ſpeculation
" only, but (which makes it truly Divine) as it is " perfected in the way of religious practice.

(100) Remark [B].

[U] He was eminent for his learning, and wrote ſeveral books.] We have obſerved above (100), that he had a very early inclination for learning; and his progreſs in it afterwards was anſwerable. Tho' his wit was ſharp and univerſal, yet it was alſo ſtrong, induſtrious, and patient of labour and ſtudy. He was a man of infinite application in reading, writing, and collecting, and the books, which he tranſlated, were an unknown number, as Æthelwerd aſſures us; In propriam verterat linguam volumina, numero ignoto, adeo variè, adeo peropimè &c. And tho' the Saxon language was then very barren and deſtitute both of phraſe and originals, to expreſs what related to arts and ſciences, becauſe it had been but little uſed in Literature, yet his verſions were ſo full and proper and expreſſive, that they charmed the reader (101). Aſſerius tells us, that he was the beſt Saxon Poet of his time (102), an excellent Geometrician, Orator, Philoſopher, Architect, and Hiſtorian. Mr. Bale in his Centuries (103) has given us a Catalogue of the works which he tranſlated, and thoſe which he wrote; and it is ſaid that the time of his compoſing theſe Books, and making his Laws was about the year 893 (104). He wrote Breviarium quoddam collectum ex legibus TROJANORUM, GRÆCORUM, BRITANNORUM, SAXONUM ET DANORUM. lib. 1. i. e. " An Abridgment collated from the Laws of the " Trojans, Greeks, Britons, Saxons, and Danes, in " one book." Viſi-Saxonum Leges, lib. 1. i. e. " The Laws of the Weſt-Saxons, in one book." Inſtituta quædam, lib. 1. i. e. " Certain Inſtitutes, " in one book." Contra Judices iniquos, lib. 1. i. e. " Againſt unjuſt Judges, in one book." Dicta Sapientum, lib. 1. i. e. " The Sayings of wiſe men, " in one book." Regum Fortunæ variæ, lib. 1. i. e. " The various Fortunes of Kings, in one book." Parabolæ & Sales, l. 1. i. e. " Parables and Jeſts, in one " book." Acta Magiſtratuum, lib. 1. i. e. " Acts of Magi- " ſtrates, in one book." Collectiones Chronicorum, lib. 1. i. e. " Collections of Chronicles, in one " book." Manuale Meditationum, Lib. 1. i. e. " A Manual of Meditations, in one Book." His tranſlations into Saxon were as follows: Hormeſtarii Pauli Oroſii, Lib. 1. Some are of opinion, that Alfred was not the author of this Tranſlation or rather Paraphraſe of Oroſius (105). Paſtorale D. Gregorii, Libri 2. i. e. St. Gregory's Paſtoral, in two books." Dialogus ejuſdem Gregorii, lib. 1. i. e. " A Dia- " logue of the ſame Gregory, in one book." But this was rather done at his command by Werefred Biſhop of Worceſter (106). Geſta Anglorum Bedæ, lib. 5. i. e. " Bede's Hiſtory of England, in five " books." This was publiſhed by Mr. Whelock at Cambridge 1644, in folio, who obſerves, that it is rather a paraphraſe than a tranſlation. Boëtius de Conſolatione, lib. 1. i. e. " Boëtius of Conſolation, in one book. This was publiſhed at Oxon in 8vo 1698, by Chriſtopher Rawlinſon, Gentleman-Commoner of Queen's college. Some are of opinion that Werefred, Biſhop of Worceſter, was the author of this tranſlation; and others ſay it was done by Aſſerius Menevenſis (107). Dr. Plot (108) tells us, that this tranſlation was made by Alfred at Woodſtock, for which he quotes a MS. in the Cotton Library. The King was ſo highly pleaſed with this book, that he always carried it about him in his boſom. Molmutinæ Leges, lib. 1. i. e. " The Molmutian Laws, " in one book (109). Martianæ Leges, lib. 1. i. e. " The Martian Laws, in one Book." Pſalterium Davidicum, lib. 1. i. e. " David's Pſalter, in one " book. Publiſhed by Sir John Spelman in 4to. 1640. The latter part of it was done by another hand. This tranſlation was the laſt, and that which concluded all his ſtudies, he being ſeized by death, before he had half finiſhed it, as Malmesbury (110) informs us, who likewiſe tells us of many other of his works, tho' he names but few of them, and thoſe already mentioned. He is ſaid to have tranſlated Æſop's Fables out of Greek into Latin and Saxon (111). And the old MS. Hiſtory of Ely (112) quoted by Archbiſhop Parker in his Preface to Aſſerius Menevenſis, ſays, that the King tranſlated all the New and Old Teſtament. Aluredus, acerrimi ingenii Princeps, per Grimbaldum & Joannem, doctiſſimos monachos tantum inſtructus, ut in brevi librorum omnium notitiam habuerit, totumque novum & vetus Teſtamentum in eulogium Anglicæ gentis tranſmutaverit. And Bury of Boſton ſays, totum ferè teſtamentum in linguam Anglicanam tranſtulit (113); i. e. " He tranſlated almoſt all the Teſtament " into the Engliſh language." Which words are very probably to be underſtood of the New Teſtament. But it is doubted whether Alfred really tranſlated the whole Bible (114). It is ſaid, that he wrote a Commentary of his own actions, like Julius Cæſar; for Mr. Fox tells us (115), that he alſo himſelf compiled a ſtory in the Saxon Speech, called the Story of Ælfred: But theſe words are ambiguous. However it appears from the Chronicle called, Brute of England, that he wrote an Hiſtory (116). Oudin tells us (117), that there is a MS. in the Bodleian Library (118), intitled, Flores ex divi Auguſtini Soliloquiorum libro collecti & Saxonicè redditi ab Aluredo Rege Anglorum. i. e. " Flowers collected from St. Auſtin's book of " Soliloquies; and tranſlated into Saxon by Alfred " King of England."

(101) Spelman, p. 210.
(102) See the following Remark.
(103) Centur. 2. cap. 22.
(104) See Mr. Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 210.
(105) See Somner's Preface to his Saxon Gloſſary.
(106) See Spelman, p. 211.
(107) See Mr Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 211, 212.
(108) Hiſt. of Oxfordſhire, c. 10. §. 118.
(109) See Sheringham de Ang. Orig. p. 125.
(110) De Geſt. Reg. Ang. l. 2.
(111) See Mr. Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 212.
(112) Hiſt. Eliens. l. 2.
(113) See Mr. Hearne's Notes upon Spelman, p. 213.
(114) Id. ibid.
(115) Ad ann. 872.
(116) Hearne, Notes upon Spelman, p. 214.
(117) Comment. de Scriptor. & Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. Sæc. 9. Col. 311. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.
(118) Num. 5181. Cod. 70.

[X] He employed his poetic talent in the nobleſt improvement of the minds of his ſubjects.] The reader will be pleaſed to hear Sir John Spelman upon this occaſion in his ſtrong and expreſſive ſtyle (119). " But conſidering with himſelf how weak the Re- " formation was, that depended only upon outward " terror and conſtraint, he applied all his thoughts " to find ſome means, whereby he might inwardly " reclaim their depraved minds, and take them off " from the greedy purſuit of their vile affections. " And whereas this was not otherwiſe to be effect- " ed than by inſtruction, and by infuſion of precepts " both divine and moral, that ſo they might become " Law-givers unto themſelves, and out of conſcience " abſtain from the things, that were evil; there " wanted thoſe, that ſhould be the inſtruments of " ſuch a work, Preachers and Teachers of the word of " God, who with continual pains in inſtructing, ex- " horting, and admoniſhing of them, might in time " beget a Reformation. Howſoever it was, the " King having apprehended the neceſſity of ſuch a " work, no difficulty whatſoever, nor want of " means could ſo diſcourage him, but that the deſire " and hope of doing an happy office unto his peo- " ple did much more ſet him forward in the en- " deavour. At laſt he fell upon the way, whereby " it pleaſed God, in the old world, to infuſe into " barbarous people better thoughts, namely of re- " ligion, of juſtice, of civility, and of honour, not " by writings, (for the Barbarians could not read,) " neither yet ſo much by preaching, (for they were " giddy and perverſe in hearing) but divine wits, " inſpired with more than human faculties, did in " parables, in fables, in ſongs, in proverbs, and the " like, (which they fitted to the humour and pleaſure " of the people) ſo livelily expoſe either the defor- " mity of the preſent reigning vice, or the beauty " and lovelineſs of the contrary virtue, as that while " the ſavage hearers (taken with delight of the " witty expreſſions) did retain and communicate " them to one another, they by little and little con- " ſented to the truth, that was contained in them; " and in the end became no leſs captivate of the and ſix months, and was firſt buried in the New-Abbey at Wincheſter, but afterwards removed to the Abbey of Hyde without the gates of that city. He married Ælſwith the daughter of Æthelred Earl of the Gaines and of Edburgh his wife, deſcended of the King of Mercia, and by her had two ſons and three daughters; Edward his eldeſt ſon ſucceeded him; his ſecond ſon and the youngeſt of his children was named Æthelwerd, and was educated a ſcholar. Æthelfleda his eldeſt daughter was married to Æthelred Earl of Mercia: Æthelgeow was a Nun, and Abbeſs of Æthelengey; and his youngeſt daughter named by ſome Ælfrith, and by others Æthelſwith, was married to Baldwin Earl of Flanders (o). It is believed that he was not in all things conformable to the See of Rome [Y]. His life and actions have been celebrated by the writers of thoſe times in the moſt magnificent manner, and particularly Henry Huntington, who has given an abſtract of his life in an epigram [Z].

(119) P. 20.

(o) Spelman, p. 221, 222.

☞ALFRED

" reaſon, which they ſo propounded, than delighted " with the wittineſs of their delivery." Our author then ſhews, what uſe had been made of Poetry by the ancient Legiſlators; and that parables and fables were employed by Solomon and Chriſt in order to correct the vicious prejudices of mankind. Alfred, who was a great admirer of Solomon, appears to have propoſed to himſelf the example of that King, and collected all the maxims of morality, which he could procure, eſpecially ſuch as were extant in verſe in the Saxon tongue; upon which account he is ſaid to have been Saxonicorum Poëmatum peritiſſimus. " As he collected what others had written, " ſo he compoſed much himſelf, and obtained the " name of an excellent Poet, for his admired natural " parts, joined with ſo pious an uſe, and ſo happy " effects of them. Whereby indeed he became a " Poet of the rank of thoſe, that in ancient time " have been ſo honourable, and who were as well " the Heroes of their times, as the Poets. As for " his abilities that way, though the event of his " labours hath made a ſufficient demonſtration of " them, becauſe it muſt needs be a powerful faculty " that works a change in the manners of men con- " trary to their own affections; whereas to have " done it but indifferently well in Poetry had been " as good as to have done nothing;

" ——— Mediocribus eſſe Poetis
" Non Dii, non homines, non conceſſere columnæ.

And again;

" Non ſatis eſt pulchra eſſe poemata, dulcia ſunto,
" Et quocunque volunt animum auditoris agunto.

" Yet the Monk of Malmesbury has expreſly teſti- " fied of him, that no man was more ſharp and " quick of apprehenſion than King Ælfred, nor " more elegant in the delivery of what he con- " ceived. And Æthelwerd avoucheth that his tranſ- " lation of Boëtius was ſuch as that it would paſſio- " nately and even to tears affect the hearers of it. " The King thus endowed by nature, and furniſhed " by his own induſtry ceaſed not to hunt out and " purſue all occaſions of inſtructing his people, " deſcending often from the awe and terror of a " Sovereign to give the hearer more freedom in " the way of learning, with great judgment inter- " mixing mildneſs and reproof, pleaſantneſs and ſe- " rioufneſs, until he either won or compelled all " ſorts of people, young and old, ignoble and noble, " yea his Biſhops, Earls, and Prefects of Counties, " to receive the impreſſions of his teaching, and in " a ſhort time brought it to paſs that learning and " civility, which formerly had been in contempt, " became the only thing in requeſt, and generally " deſired of every man (120)." There is in the Cotton Library a MS. Collection of divers precepts and inſtructions of Alfred tending to this purpoſe; but they are not his original work in the Saxon language, but a miſcellaneous collection of ſome later author in old Engliſh. The beginning of them intimates, that there had been ſome aſſembly of the chief perſons of both orders of the Kingdom at Sifford, now Shifford near Bampton in Oxfordſhire (121), and that the King had conſulted with his Clergy, Nobles, and others, about the manners and government of the people, and delivered ſome grave admonitions and inſtructions concerning the ſame, in order to be publiſhed throughout the Kingdom (122). Mr. Hearne tells us (123), that amongſt Sir Kenelm Digby's MSS. number IV in the Bodleian Library is another Tract called Ælfred's Proverbs, which is of a late date, and contains ſome Rhapſodies about the different conditions of man's life. Dr. Hickes has printed ſome part of it in his Theſaurus Ling. Sept. (124).

(120) Spelman, p. 124, 125.

(121) See Dr. Plot's Nat. Hiſt. of Oxfordſhire, c. 2. § 5.

(122) See Spelman, p. 126.

(123) Notes upon Spelman, p. 131.

(124) P. 222.

[Y] Conformable to the See of Rome.] Sir John Spelman concludes (125), that he was not entirely attached to that See, tho' in ſpiritual matters he reverenced the Pope, according to the doctrine of thoſe times, as univerſal Vicar, but exerciſed his royal authority abſolutely; upon which account they ſeem to have declined contending with him; and therefore, tho' it had happened, that all the Biſhoprics of Weſt-Saxony, viz. Wincheſter, Cornwal, Shirburn, Wells and Cridda, were for three whole years together vacant, and only under the care of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury until the time of the King's death, yet we do not hear of any offence taken at Rome; but when they continued as long vacant in his ſon Edward's time, the firſt news of reſentment, that he heard of, was a curſe and an excommunication. Alfred took likewiſe a method, that threatned the foundation of that univerſal ſovereignty, which in thoſe times of darkneſs begun to raiſe itſelf, by reſtoring the ſecond commandment, which had been order'd by their authority to be omitted in the Decalogue under the countenance of the ſecond Nicene Council; but eſpecially by reviving learning, and giving orders for a general tranſlation of all kinds of books relating to Religion, and eſpecially thoſe of the Old and New Teſtament. We find no Men of learning ſent from Rome to aſſiſt him in the revival of arts and ſciences, tho' he often ſent thither his preſents and oblations, which were returned with their holy favours of another kind. There is no intercourſe of Legates upon record; no interpoſing in the councils and regulations of the Church; no Bulls of privilege for the new Abbies of Wincheſter and Athelny erected by him (126); and what is more remarkable, he entertained John Scotus Erigena, and treated him with great regard, tho' the latter was proſecuted by the Pope for having written ſomething contrary to the ſentiments of the See of Rome. This ſhews, that the correſpondence between England and Rome was not very cloſe; and that this Prince and the Engliſh Church were not ſervilely governed by that See. Mr. Obadiah Walker (127), tho' he had not, at the time when he wrote his Notes upon Sir John Spelman, diſcovered himſelf to be of the Romiſh Church, endeavoured to confute theſe arguments, and to ſhew, that Alfred ſtood very fair with that Church; and upon the occaſion of Sir John Spelman's obſerving, that the reaſon of that King's not being canonized, was becauſe he had been no favourite of the See of Rome (128), he tells us, that there is no ground for that remark, and that he is called Beatus, i. e. " Bleſſed," by Ailredus Rhievallenſis, and the character of Saint is aſcribed to him in the Life of Edward the Elder; and that his name ſtands in the Calender of the Engliſh Martyrology, printed 1608, under the 28th of October (129).

(125) P. 219, &c.

(126) Collier, Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. 1. book 3. pag. 171.

(127) Not. in Vitam Ælfredi Magni, p. 171, 172.

(128) Spelman, p. 219.

(129) Not. in Vitam Ælfred. Magn. p. 171.

[Z] An abſtract of his life in an Epigram.] The verſes are not inelegant, conſidering the time when they were written.

Nobilitas innata tibi probitatis honorem,
Armipotens Alfrede dedit: probitaſque laborem;
Perpetuumque labor nomen, cui mixta doleri

☞ALFRED or ALFRID, natural ſon of Oſwy King of Northumberland, was made by his father King of Deira, which did not much pleaſe the Deirians [A]; ſo that as ſoon as they heard of Oſwy's death, they revolted againſt Alfred and ſubmitted to Egfrid, Oſwy's legitimate ſon, who had ſucceeded his father in the Kingdom of Bernicia, and who by the revolt of the Deirians became King of all Northumberland (a). Alfred retired into Ireland [B], where he applied himſelf to ſtudy, and made a conſiderable progreſs in learning (b), conſidering the time in which he lived. Egfrid having been killed in a battle againſt the Picts, and leaving no iſſue, the Northumbrians invited Alfred, who was ſtill in Ireland, to come and take poſſeſſion of the crown. Before his arrival the Picts made themſelves maſters of part of Bernicia, and the Welch took two Provinces, which anciently compoſed the Kingdom of Areclute, and became now the Kingdoms of Lenox and Cumberland. Alfred being ſeated on the throne of Northumberland could never wreſt thoſe Provinces out of the hands of the Welch, and it was with great difficulty that he could keep his own Kingdom, which was often attacked by his neighbours. He died in 705, having reigned about twenty years after his reſtoration (c); Simeon of Durham ſays (d), he reigned but nineteen years. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Oſred (e). He had been educated by the famous Wilfrid, for whom during his father's life he procured the Biſhoprick of York (f). Wilfrid having been removed from his Biſhoprick by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alfred reſtored him to it the ſecond year of his reign over the Northumbrians, but finding this Prelate too haughty and enterpriſing he depoſed him again, and was prevailed upon ſome years after to reſtore him a ſecond time (g). We ſhall give in a note an account of the reaſons why Wilfrid was depoſed [C]. We muſt not forget to obſerve, that Alfred aſſiſted at the council of Whitby (b), in which he maintained the opinion of the church

(a) A. D. 670.

(b) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 1. liv. 3. p. 168, 169. W. Malm. de Geſt. Reg. Ang. lib. 1. c. 3. p. 25. Buchan. Hiſt. Scot. l. 5. p. 163.

(c) Rapin, ibid. p. 169.

(d) Ap. Twyſden, Hiſt. Angl. Script. Decem. tom. 1. col. 91.

(e) Rap. ibid. Simeon Dunelm. ibid.

(f) Ricardus Hagueſtald. apud Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 293.

(g) Rapin, ubi ſupra, p. 251, 252.

(b) We have given ſome account of this Council, in the article of AILBERT, Rem. [B].

Gaudia ſemper erant, ſpes ſemper mixta timori.
Si modo victor eras, ad craſtina bella pavebas:
Si modo victus eras, ad craſtina bella parabas.
Cui veſtes ſudore jugi, cui ſica cruore
Tincta jugi, quantum ſit onus regnare, probarunt.
Non fuit immenſi quiſquam per climata mundi,
Cui tot in adverſis vel reſpirare liceret.
Nec tamen aut ferro contritus ponere ferrum,
Aut gladio potuit vitæ finiſſe labores.
Jam poſt tranſactos vitæ regnique dolores,
Chriſtus ei ſit vera quies, ſceptrumque perenne.

That is,

" Thy innate nobleneſs, O mighty Alfred,
" Form'd thee all good; thy goodneſs made thee
" active
" In ev'ry great purſuit; thy virtuous labours
" Crown'd thee with honour laſting as the world.
" Thy joys were mix'd with grief, they fears with " hope.
" If Victor now, you dread the morrow's battle:
" If conquer'd, you prepare for next day's fight,
" Undaunted, and ſtill greater from your fall.
" Your unremitting toil, your ſword all reeking
" With hoſtile ſlaughter, ſhew how vaſt the burthen
" To execute the functions of a Crown.
" None ever equall'd your diſtreſs; and none
" With equal courage bore the dreadful trial.
" In vain you fought for reſt amidſt the rage
" And dread alarms of war, till rais'd above
" This lower earthly orb, you found with Chriſt
" Bliſs undiminiſh'd, and a crown immortal."

T.

[A] Which did not much pleaſe the Deirians.] The reaſon of their diſlike was not perhaps, that Alfred was a baſtard; but in all probability they were afraid, that if the Kingdom of Northumberland, which at that time was under one King, came to be divided again, it might occaſion wars, which would be very deſtructive to them, as they could not but know by the experience of former times (1). We may obſerve here, that Northumberland contained anciently the whole country between the Humber and the river Tweed. That country was divided into two parts; the firſt, called Deira, contained what lies between the Humber and the Tees; the ſecond, called Bernicia, contained the country between the Tees and the Tweed (2).

(1) See Rapin, Hiſt. d'Ang. tom. 1. liv. 3. p. 154, 167.

(2) Ricard. Hagueſtald. ap. Rog. Twyſd. Hiſt. Ang. Script. decem. tom. 1. Col. 285.

[B] Alfred retired into Ireland.] William of Malmesbury ſays (3), that though Alfred was Oſwy's eldeſt ſon, yet the faction of the Nobles thought him unworthy of the crown, becauſe he was a baſtard; and that he retired into Ireland, either being forced to it, or out of anger and indignation. He adds, that Alfred being out of the reach of his brother's hatred, and enjoying a great deal of leiſure, applied himſelf to learning, and filled his mind with Philoſophy. Bale tells us (4), that Alfred retired into ſome Iſland of the Scots; but beſides, that this is contradicted by all the ancient Hiſtorians, it is more probable that Alfred ſtudied among the Iriſh, than among the Scots, ſince he always ſeemed devoted to the principles of the church of Rome, which were received in Ireland, whereas the Scots at that time uſed to follow the practice of the eaſtern churches.

(3) De Geſt. Reg. Ang. l. 1. ap. H. Savile, Rer. Ang. Scrip. poſt Bedam, p. 21.

(4) Balæus, Il. luſt. Magn. Brit. Scrip. Cent. 1. fol. 45, verſo.

[C] We ſhall give an account of the reaſons why Wilfrid was depoſed.] To give the reader a clear notion of theſe reaſons, we muſt lay before him what happened after the Council of Whitby. The Pope's party having prevailed in that Council, Coleman Biſhop of Holy-Iſland (5), and the other Scotch Clergymen returned into their country. Tuda was made Biſhop in Coleman's ſtead; but he dying ſoon after, Alfred deſired that Wilfrid, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf very honourably in the Council, might be made Biſhop of York, (the Epiſcopal See being ſtill in Holy-Iſland.) Wilfrid was commanded to go to Paris to be ordained by Ailbert or Agilbert Biſhop of that city. But Wilfrid ſtaying too long abroad, the Biſhoprick was given to Ceadda or Cedda, who was conſecrated by the Biſhop of Wincheſter. Wilfrid being returned into England was ſurprized to find his See filled up by another; however he durſt not complain of Alfred, who was then King of Deira, and retired into a Monaſtery. Some time after Theodore, who had lately been made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, making the viſitation of all the Biſhopricks of England, came to York, and cenſured ſeverely Cedda, becauſe he had procured himſelf to be conſecrated by the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Cedda ſubmitted with humility to whatever the Archbiſhop would command him. Theodore charmed with this reſignation conſecrated him again, but at the ſame time ordered him to retire into a Monaſtery, that he might make room for Wilfrid, for whom the two Kings deſigned the Biſhoprick of York. Though Bede has not thought fit to tell us for what reaſon Cedda was removed from his See, after he had been conſecrated a ſecond time, yet it is eaſy to gueſs that Theodore had been prevailed upon by the two Kings; for there was, it ſeems, no reaſon to remove Cedda, ſince, if his former conſecration had not been legal, that defect was now ſupplied by his having been conſecrated again. Wilfrid was extremely proud and haughty; he ſupported himſelf only by the favour of King Oſwy and of Alfred; but Oſwy being dead, and Alfred baniſhed, the Biſhop had not much intereſt at the court of Egfrid, and his pride made him at laſt loſe his Biſhoprick. When he was depoſed, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury divided the Kingdom of Northumberland into two Dioceſes; the firſt contained all church of Rome (i) concerning the time of celebrating Eaſter, though King Oſwy his father was of a contrary opinion. Bale ranks our Alfred amongſt the learned men of Great Britain, and tells us that in order to terminate the diſputes concerning the celebration of Eaſter, he wrote ſeveral letters to Coleman, and one to Adaman Coludius (k).

(5) The Epiſcopal See had been tranſlated from York to Holy-Iſland in the time of Aidan, (ſee his Article) and was afterwards again tranſlated to York.

(i) Rapin, ubi ſupra, p. 243.

(k) Baleus, Illuſt. Magn. Britan. Script. Cent. 1. fol. 45, verſo.

all the country of Deira, and the Epiſcopal See of it was at York; the ſecond contained the country of Bernicia, and the Epiſcopal See thereof continued in Holy-Iſland. Some time after Archbiſhop Theodore erected another Biſhoprick at Haguſtad in Northumberland. When King Alfred had ſucceeded Egfrid, Theodore, being very old and finding he could not live long, repented of what he had done againſt Wilfrid, and entreated King Alfred to reſtore him to his Biſhoprick, which was done accordingly. The See of Holy-Iſland being then vacant, Boſa, Biſhop of York, was tranſlated to Holy-Iſland, and Wilfrid eſtabliſhed at York. He was no ſooner ſettled again in his Biſhoprick, but he undertook to alter all that had been done in the North, whilſt he was under the King's diſpleaſure. He reſolved to unite again the Biſhoprick of Haguſtad to that of York; he claimed all the revenues that had been taken from the Biſhoprick of York, and annexed to that of Haguſtad; he pretended that whatever Theodore had done was void, as having been effected without a ſufficient power and authority. His pretenſions in this reſpect were perhaps well grounded, but he acted with ſo much haughtineſs, that he met every where with perſons who oppoſed him. Alfred himſelf had ſuffered ſo much from his inſolent temper, that he at laſt depoſed him a ſecond time (6). Richard Prior of Haguſtad ſays that Wilfrid was depoſed only because he was falſely accuſed by the King himſelf, and by ſeveral Biſhops, of having violated the commands of Theodore Archbiſhop of Canterbury (7); but that Author is not much to be credited in this, ſince it is plain from his writings, that he intended only to give us a panegyrick upon Wilfrid, and not a true hiſtory of that Prelate. He was again reſtored to his Biſhoprick after Alfred's death (8).

(6) Rapin, ubi ſupra, p. 247—251.

(7) Ricard. Haguſtald. ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 296.

(8) Id. ibid.

☞ALFRED ſon of Ethelred II King of England was ſent by his father to Richard II Duke of Normandy, with Emma his mother and Edward his younger brother (a); the reaſon of it was, that Sueno King of Denmark having invaded England, had made himſelf maſter of almoſt the whole country, which obliged Ethelred to follow very ſoon his wife and children (b). Sueno dying ſoon after, Ethelred returned into England, and was reſtored to the throne by the Engliſh, though the Danes had proclaimed Canute King of England. Ethelred dying about a year after his return into England, Edmund his ſon by his firſt wife ſucceeded him, but Canute had ſtill a very great party, being ſupported by all the Danes who were come into England. Edmund having been murthered by order of Edrick Streon his brother-in-law in the year 1017, Canute made himſelf maſter of the whole country. But fearing leſt the children of Edmund ſhould diſpute the crown with him, he ſent them out of England, with orders to the perſon who conducted them to kill them in their voyage, but his command was not obeyed, as we have obſerved in another place (c). Canute was ſtill very uneaſy on account of Edmund's brothers who were in Normandy, and would have been extremely glad, if he could have deſtroyed them. But he did not know how to get them out of the hands of Richard their uncle; and he was afraid that this Prince, who was very powerful, might one time or other undertake to reſtore them to the throne of their anceſtors. He thought the beſt method to prevent this danger was to draw Richard into his intereſt by deſiring of him Emma for his wife, and offering one of his ſiſters to that Duke. The propoſal was accepted; Richard married Eſtrithe Canute's ſiſter, and Emma was married to Canute. Alfred and Edward his brother were ſo exaſperated at this marriage, that they could not forbear ſhewing publickly their diſcontent. And indeed they had very good reaſons to complain, ſince Emma had conſented by her marriage contract, that the children ſhe ſhould have by Canute, ſhould be acknowledged as lawful heirs to the crown of England, by which means ſhe deprived the children ſhe had by Ethelred of their birth-right (d). After the death of Canute, Harald his ſon by his firſt wife was made King of England by the intrigues of the Earl Goodwin; and Hardicanute, Emma's ſon by the late King, enjoyed only the crown of Denmark. Emma was very much offended at this, but finding he could not at that time raiſe her ſon Hardicanute to the throne of England, ſhe thought it would not be impoſſible to procure the crown for one of Ethelred's ſons, being in hopes that the Engliſh would ſupport her with all their forces in favour of a perſon who was deſcended from their ancient Kings. To effect this deſign ſhe was obliged to act with great prudence and diſſimulation. It was neceſſary that her ſons ſhould come over into England, to raiſe a party in their behalf; but at the ſame time it was no leſs neceſſary to give no ſuſpicion nor jealouſy to the King. Emma therefore thought proper to live in ſuch a manner as might perſuade Goodwin, that ſhe would not in the leaſt meddle with ſtate affairs. She kept her ſelf ſhut up in Wincheſter, employed only in acts of piety and devotion, as though ſhe minded nothing but her ſalvation. When ſhe judged that the King was perſuaded that ſhe did not in the leaſt concern herſelf with politicks, ſhe deſired leave that the Princes her ſons, whom ſhe had not ſeen ſince ſhe was married to Canute, might come and viſit her at Wincheſter. Her requeſt was granted, and Alfred arrived with his brother at Wincheſter (e). A great many perſons, who were true Engliſhmen, immediately reſorted to Wincheſter to wait upon the young Princes; Goodwin ſoon perceived Emma's deſign, and acquainted Harald with the danger he was in, and told him at the ſame time, that the conſpiracy not being yet ripe for execution, could eaſily be prevented, and that the only way to be free from all danger, not only for the preſent, but alſo for the future, was to kill the two Princes.

(a) A. D. 1015.

(b) W. Malm. de Geſtis Rer. Ang. lib. 2. c. 10. In Rer. Ang. Script. poſt. Bedam, edit. ab Henr. Saville, Francof. 1601. fol. p. 70.

(c) See the remark [B] of the article ALDRED.

(d) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 1. liv. 5. p. 409.

(e) A. D. 1037.

Harald

Horald approving this project, Goodwin told him, that to execute it ſecurely, the King muſt affect a perfect tranquillity, in order to draw Alfred and his brother into the ſnare. When they had ſtaid ſome time at Wincheſter, the King invited them to paſs a few days at court before they returned into Normandy. This invitation made Emma extremely uneaſy. She knew very well that it was impoſſible for her ſons to make intereſt among the Noblemen without appearing at court; but ſhe was afraid to truſt them in the hands of a King, whoſe intereſt it was to have them deſtroyed. In this perplexity ſhe thought the beſt expedient was to ſend Alfred her eldeſt ſon to the King, and to keep Edward with her, thinking that if Harald had ſome ill deſign he would not execute it till he had both the young Princes in his power, ſince it would be in vain to kill one, whilſt the other was ſtill alive. Goodwin, being well pleaſed to ſee his project begin to ſucceed, obtained from the King a commiſſion to go and meet Alfred, under pretence of doing him honour, but his ſecret reaſon was that he did not care to truſt any other perſon with the execution of his deſign. The young Prince and the Normans who attended him were at firſt charmed with the marks of diſtinction they received from Goodwin; but that ſatisfaction was ſoon changed into the utmoſt conſternation, when they found that the Prince and all his attendants were arreſted in the caſtle of Guilford, where they had alighted under pretence of refreſhing themſelves. Alfred was immediately conducted to Ely, and confined in a Monaſtery after his eyes had been put out. He had hardly time to be ſenſible of his misfortunes, ſince he died a few days after, either of grief, or becauſe his death was haſtened; for Goodwin was afterwards accuſed of having killed him. Edward hearing what had happened to his brother, retired immediately into Normandy; and Emma, being commanded to leave the Kingdom, retired to the court of Baldwin Earl of Flanders. This is the account which Rapin gives us (f), without quoting any authority; but other Authors differ from him in ſeveral particulars, of which we ſhall take notice in remark [A].

(f) Ibid. p. 417-419.

☞ ALI

[A] Other authors differ from him [Rapin] in ſeveral particulars.] The account, which John Brompton (1) gives us of Alfred is very different from Rapin's. Here follows what that author tells us. "After "the death of Hardicanute, the Noblemen of Eng- "land being glad to be delivered from the power "of the Danes, ſent Embaſſadors to Alfred and Ed- "ward, who were in Normandy; acquainting them "that they might ſafely come into England, and "that Alfred ſhould be raiſed to the throne. The "Earl Goodwin, who had married a daughter of "King Canute, intending, as ſome thought, to ſeize "the crown either for himſelf or for his ſon Ha- "rold, reſolved to kill the two young Princes, as "ſoon as they arrived. Other Hiſtorians ſay, that "Goodwin, (who had alſo a daughter), knowing "that Alfred being a man of great virtue, would "diſdain to marry his daughter, hated him for that "reaſon, and reſolved to kill him, that he might "marry his daughter to Edward, who being "young and unexperienced, would not ſcruple it. "The Embaſſadors being arrived in Normandy found "only Alfred, Edward being gone into Hungary, "to meet his nephew the ſon of King Edmund (2). "Alfred embark'd immediately with ſeveral of his "mother's relations, and a great many other Nor- "mans, and arrived in England. This gave Good- "win a fair opportunity to raiſe ſuſpicions in the "minds of the Engliſh againſt Alfred; he repre- "ſented to them, that Alfred was accompanied by "a great number of Normans, to whom he had "promiſed the lands of the Engliſh; that therefore "it was not ſafe for them to ſuffer thoſe foreigners "to ſettle in the country. Goodwin having ſaid "this, went to Southampton, where Alfred was "landed, and having congratulated him on his ar- "rival, he offered to conduct him to London, where "the Nobles, as he ſaid, expected him to raiſe him "to the throne.... Alfred promiſed, that if he was "made King, he would eſtabliſh ſuch Laws, as "would be acceptable both to God and to his peo- "ple. But the traytor Goodwin had given orders "to his attendants to ſeize Alfred and his Normans; "which was done accordingly; they killed nine in "ten of all the Normans; and finding that thoſe "that remained were ſtill too numerous, they diſ- "patched every tenth man of them. They ſent "afterwards Alfred to Ely, where they put out his "eyes, and confined him to a monaſtery, where in "a little time he died in the moſt cruel torments: "For ſome authors relate that having opened his "belly, they took part of his guts, which they tied "to a poſt, and forced him with iron ſpikes to turn "round it, till all his bowels were pulled out of his "belly. Primordiis viſcerum ejus umbilico aperto "extractis, & ad ſtipitem ligatis, ipſum tantis vici- "bus ſtimulis ferreis circumduxerunt, donec noviſſima "viſcerum extrahebantur (3). The Engliſh Noble- "men, who were not of Goodwin's party, hearing "in what manner Alfred had been betrayed and "murthered, were extremely concerned, and ſwore "that the traytor deſerved a more cruel puniſhment, "than that which the Earl Edrich had ſuffered, who "had killed King Edmund, ſurnamed Ironſide. "They reſolved to have Goodwin ſeized, but "he being fled into Denmark, all his eſtate "was confiſcated. However ſome pretend that Al- "fred was not killed then, but during the reign of "King Harald. They ſay, that Edward, Alfred's "brother, being diſpleaſed that Harald ſhould reign "in England, came with forty ſhips and a great "number of Normans, to Southampton, where he "landed and plundered the country; but being at- "tacked by the Engliſh, he returned into Normandy, "with a great booty. That at the ſame time Alfred "landed with ſome ſoldiers in another place, and "being kindly entertained by Goodwin, he was "treacherouſly ſeized in the night-time by that "Earl's command, who ſent him to King Harold, "by whoſe orders his eyes were put out, and he "was killed." Others, adds Jo. Brompton, relate this otherwiſe; and here he gives us an account which is pretty much the ſame with that of Rapin, only he differs from him in placing Alfred's death under the reign of Hardicanute, whereas Rapin places it under that of Harold. Brompton adds, "that ſome authors affirm, that "Emma herſelf "conſented to the death of her ſon, and likewiſe "gave poiſon to Edward," for fear perhaps leſt Hardicanute her ſon by her ſecond husband ſhould loſe the crown. However that be, John Brompton obſerves, that according to the ancient Chronicles, it is probable that Alfred's death did not happen till after Hardicanute's death. And indeed Henry of Huntingdon (4) agrees with John Brompton. But William of Malmesbury (5), Roger de Hoveden (6), Henry de Knyghton (7), the Chronicle of Mailros (8), and ſeveral others place the death of Alfred in the ſame year as Rapin, viz. A. D. 1037. The account which Rapin gives of Alfred's death, was grounded only upon a common report, as William of Malmeſbury tells us, who adds (9), that he dares not give it for truth, becauſe it was not found in any Chronicle. But Matthew of Weſtminſter, and ſeveral others, as we have ſeen, relate the ſtory, without ſhewing the leaſt doubt concerning it. Moſt of the manuſcript

(1) In Chron. ap. Rog. Twyſden, Hiſt. Ang. Scrip. Decem. Lond. 1652. fol. tom. 1. Col. 934. &c.

(2) See the Remark [B] of the article ALDRED.

(3) Joh. Brompton, ubi ſupra, Col. 935. Lin. 62.

(4) Ap. Saville, Hiſt. Ang. Scrip. poſt Bedam, p. 365.

(5) De Geſt. Reg. Ang. l. 2. c. 12. ap. eund. p. 77.

(6) Annal. pars prior, ap. eund. p. 438.

(7) Ap. Twyſden ubi ſupra, col. 2326, where Alfred is called Elfred. Some call him Alured.

(8) Ad. An. 1036, where Alfred is called Alwred. in Angl. Scrip. Veter. Ox. 1684, tom. 1. 156.

(9) Ubi ſupra.

ALI ſon of Abu Taleb, couſin and ſon-in-law to Mahomet, and fourth Khalif from that falſe Prophet, was raiſed to the Khalifate the year of the Hegira 35, and of our Lord 655 (a). His father having a very numerous family, at a time when the tribe of Koraiſh was afflicted with a grievous famine, Mahomet took Ali to his houſe, where he lived till the former ſet up for a Prophet. According to ſome writers Ali was the ſecond that embraced the principles of Iſlam or Mahometiſm (b). Mahomet having begun his miſſion, Ali offered himſelf, and was appointed his firſt Viſier upon that accaſion [A] (c). The tribe of Koraiſh having agreed privately together to murder Mahomet, the latter was informed by the Angel Gabriel of the whole conſpiracy, and thereupon Ali, at the Prophet's requeſt, covered himſelf with his green veſtment, and laid himſelf on Mahomet's bed, by which means the latter eſcaped with his life, and Ali came off unhurt. This generous action of Ali is greatly applauded by the Oriental Hiſtorians (d). Mahomet honoured Ali very highly, by declaring, that he ſhould be his brother in this world and in that which is to come (e). The latter at twenty one years and five months old was married to Fatima daughter to the falſe Prophet, ſhe being fifteen years and very near an half (f). Mahomet beſieging the citadel of Kaebar, Ali there ſignalized his bravery in a moſt conſpicuous manner, for Mahomet putting the ſtandard into Ali's hand, he planted it on a great heap of ſtones, and continued there till he made himſelf maſter of the caſtle (g). The Prophet appointed him Governor of Medina in his abſence, and Super-intendant or Vicar over his own family (b), and he only was allowed to perform the ceremony of waſhing Mahomet's body after his death, he having ſaid to him a little before, "Thou only "may'ſt waſh my body; and if any one ſees my nakedneſs, it will immediately blind "him" [B] (i). Upon Mahomet's death, Abu Becr was choſen Khalif, though a great many were of opinion that the right of ſucceſſion belonged to Ali [C]. After the murder of Othman the third Khalif from Mahomet, Ali was earneſtly preſs'd to accept

(a) Bibliotheque Orientale, ou Dictionaire Univerſel, par Monſ. d'Herbelot, pag. 89. Paris, par la Compagnie des Libraires, 1697, folio; and the Hiſtory of the Saracens, by Simon Ockley, vol. 2. pag. 1. London printed for B. Lintott, 1718, 8vo.

(b) La Vie de Mahomet, traduite & compilée par Mr. Jean Gagnier, tom. 1. p. 110, 111. Amſterdam, chez Wetſteins, &c. 1732, 12°. Moſt of the Mollems pretend that Ali was the firſt Muſlem, and are ſo ridiculouſly ſuperſtitious as to believe that he profeſſed it when in his mother's womb; for they declare, that during all the time ſhe went with him, he kept her from falling proſtrate to idols. d'Herbelot, p. 95.

(c) Gagnier, Vie de Mahom. tom. 1. p. 115.

(d) Idem p. 281 & ſeq.

(e) Idem, p. 304.

(f) Idem, p. 315. and Prideaux's Life of Mahomet, p. 69. 8th edition London, 1723, 8vo.

(g) Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet vol. 2. p. 54. and Voyages du Chevalier Chardin, vol. 3. p. 146, 147, who gives us the miraculous relation, according to the Perſians, of this ſiege.

(b) Gagnier, p. 212.

(i) Idem, p. 300.

manuſcript Annals, which are in the Cottonian Library, as alſo a treatiſe, entitled Encomium Emmæ, i. e. "the Praiſes of Emma," which William of Malmesbury never ſaw, and which is a panegyrick upon that Queen, written by a Monk her contemporary, relates the ſtory after the following manner: "Harold conſidering how he could treacherouſly "get the two young Princes in his power, forged "a letter, as if it were written by their mother Em"ma; in which they were earneſtly deſired to come "over into England; and acting like a tender mo"ther, ſhe reproached them for being ſo careleſs "about their own intereſt, ſince they could not but "know, that the Uſurper's authority gained daily "more and more ground, the King leaving no me"thod unattempted to draw the Nobility over to "his intereſt. He aſſured them that the Engliſh "would chuſe one of them for their King, rather "than Harold; that therefore it was proper they "ſhould make all the haſte they could to come over, "but with as much ſecrecy as was poſſible, to take "ſuch meaſures, as might be attended with ſucceſs. "This letter was ſent to Normandy by an Expreſs; "and the young Princes received it with the ut"moſt joy. They returned an anſwer by the ſame "Meſſenger, that one of them would go and meet "their mother, at ſuch a time and in ſuch a place, "which they named. Alfred, the youngeſt of the two "brothers (others ſay, he was the eldeſt) embarked "accordingly, with a few Normans; and as ſoon "as they arrived they fell into Goodwin's hands, "who treated them, as Rapin relates. This account "is the more probable, becauſe if both Princes were "come into England, Harold would certainly have "diſpatched them both, having them both in his "power. The Saxon Annals ſay nothing of Alfred's "death (10)." What further ſhews, that Alfred was killed under King Harold, and by his order, is that in King Edward's reign, Goodwin being accuſed of having murdered Alfred the King's brother, ſwore that he had done nothing, but what he was commanded by King Harold (11): Which ſhews that it was under that King that Alfred was killed. We muſt take notice here, that according to Rapin, Ethelred's firſt wife, King Edmund's mother, was called Elgive; whereas according to the authors we have quoted in this article (12), Elgive or Elfgive was Emma's Saxon name; and William of Malmeſbury ſays expreſly, that the name of Edmund's mother is unknown. Erat Edmundus non ex Emmâ natus ſed ex quadam alia, quam fama obſcura recondit (13). P.

(10) Taken from the Rev. Mr. Tindal's notes upon Rapin.

(11) Ranulph. Higden, in Polychron. lib. 6. ap. Tho. Gale, Hiſt. Ang. &c. Script. xx. tom. 1. 277.

(12) See particularly Radulf. de Diceto. ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, col. 461.

(13) Ubi ſupra, p. 71.

[A] Ali was appointed Mahomet's firſt Viſier.] This was when the Prophet began his miſſion, which he opened among his relations. Ali, by Mahomet's order, provided a feaſt for about forty of them, and the latter after telling his gueſts, that God had commanded him to call them to himſelf, enquired which of them would chuſe to be his Viſier (Counſellor or Miniſter) in this important affair, and divide the cares of it with him. All of them were ſilent, when Ali ran up boldly to Mahomet, and cried, "I am "the man who will do what you require; if any one "dares oppoſe you I will break his teeth, I will tear "out his eyes, I'll rip up his belly, I'll break his "legs. I, O Prophet of God, will be thy Viſier "over them." The Prophet hearing this, threw himſelf about Ali's neck, embraced him tenderly, and cried: "This is my Brother, my Envoy, and "my Lieutenant among you. Submit your ſelves "all to him, and pay him obedience (1)." The Hiſtorian tells us, that all the ſpectators burſt out a laughing.

(1) Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, tom. 1. p. 115, 116. and Voyages de Monſ. le Chevalier Chardin en Perſe &c. tom. 3. p. 167. a Amſterdam chez J L. de Lorme, 1723, 4to.

[B] If any one ſees my nakedneſs.] All thoſe who were preſent at this ablution, veil'd their eyes for fear leſt they ſhould be blinded. Some, with Ali, turn'd the corps, and others poured the water, whilſt Ali waſh'd it. According to a certain tradition, which may be look'd upon as an abſurd one, as Ali was rubbing, he felt ſomething that ſtopt his hand, upon which he cried out, "O Prophet! thy yard "muſt certainly be erect towards the heavens," and immediately Mahomet's body exhaled a very ſweet odor, as he had done when he was living. An idle ſtory is related, viz. that Ali, as he was waſhing, took privately a tatter of an old garment, and dipping it in the water employed on this occaſion, conveyed it ſecretly to his breaſt under his ſhirt, and afterwards experienced miraculous effects from thence. And indeed being one day asked how he happened to be endued with ſo lively an underſtanding and ſo prodigious a memory, he anſwer'd, "As I waſhed the corps of the Prophet, I perceiv"ed ſome drops of water hanging at his eye-brows "[illegible] on his eye-lids: Immediately I ſuck'd and "ſwallowed them, and ever ſince that time my me"mory has been prodigiouſly ſtrengthened." However this is look'd upon as an idle tradition by the judicious Eaſterns, who don't believe any of the numberleſs ſilly fictions which are related among them (2).

(2) Gagnier Vie de Mahomet, tom. 2. p. 300, 301, 302.

[C] That the right of ſucceſſion belonged to Ali.] This diverſity of opinions with regard to Abu Becr and Ali, has divided the Mahometans ever ſince; ſome accept of the Khalifate, which he refuſed for ſome time, but was afterwards choſen (k). Upon his exaltation, he reſolved to diſpoſſeſs all thoſe perſons of their Governments and Lieutenancies, who had been appointed by Othman his predeceſſor; this ſome very judiciouſly adviſed him to, whilſt others perſuaded him againſt it (l), but at laſt he took the former reſolution, and appointed new Lieutenants (m). Accordingly theſe ſet out for their government, but met with great oppoſition (n). Ali was vigorouſly oppoſed by the (o) Karegites or Separatiſts, as they were called, who, to the number of ſixty thouſand men, took up arms under the murdered Othman's bloody ſhirt, which was ſet up as a ſtandard upon the pulpit of Damaſcus, in order to fire the people againſt Ali, and ſtir them up to rebellion (p). Ali wrote circular letters to all the Provinces to aſſiſt him, and whilſt he was making preparations for the war, news was brought him that Telha and Zobeir, to whom Ali had refuſed the governments of Cufa and Baſora (q), and Ayeſha (one of Mahomet's wives) had formed a terrible conſpiracy againſt him (r). Ayeſha went in perſon againſt Ali [D], and marching to Baſora, took it after a ſhort reſiſtance (s). The Khalif before this had debated what was to be done, and at laſt agreed to take the field. Accordingly he marched out of Medina with about nine hundred men, and at firſt hoped to overtake Ayeſha before her arrival at Baſora, but hearing on the road that it was taken, he made a halt, in order to conſider upon meaſures (t). He diſpatched meſſengers to the inhabitants of Cufa deſiring their aſſiſtance, who at laſt ſent him nine thouſand men, which made Ali very eaſy, but threw Ayeſha and her party into ſome perplexity (u). At laſt the two armies came in ſight of one another, and ſome conferences were held betwixt Ali, Telha and Zobéir, but to no purpoſe; ſo coming to an engagement, Telha was killed [E]; Zobéir flying met with the like fate, and Ayeſha was taken priſoner [F]. Ali gained a complete victory on this bloody day, which is called the day of the Camel, (becauſe Ayeſha was mounted on one) (x), and was now exceeding powerful, he being maſter of Irack, Egypt, Arabia, Perſia and Khoraſân. The Syrians however were againſt him, and theſe acknowledged Moawiya, who had been their Governor under Othman, whoſe near relation he was, for the lawful Khalif (y). Upon this Ali marched out againſt him with ninety thouſand men, and coming to the confines of Syria, and his army wanting water, he found

(k) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 2. p. 9. and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orientale, p. 89.
(l) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracen. p. 9. and d'Herbelot, p. 89.
(m) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracen. vol. 2. p. 11.
(n) Idem, p. 12.
(o) See reference (13) of note [H].
(p) Idem, p. 16. and d'Herbelot, p. 90.
(q) D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 89.
(r) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 2. p. 16, 17.
(s) Idem, p. 20.
(t) Idem, p. 28.
(u) Idem, p. 40.
(x) Idem, p. 43. and d'Herbelot, p. 90.
(y) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 2. p. 47, 48.

ſome aſſerting that the former, and his ſucceſſors in the Khalifate, Omar and Othman, had a juſt title to it, and others diſclaiming their title, and looking upon them as uſurpers, and conſtantly maintaining the right of Ali. Of the former opinion are the Turks at this day, of the latter the Perſians. This has created ſo great a variance between the two Nations, that altho' they agree in other points of ſuperſtition, they yet treat one another as moſt damnable hereticks upon this account (3).

(3) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 1. p. 7. and Voyages du Chevalier Chardin, en Perſe &c. tom. 2. pag. 311, & ſeq.

[D] Ayeſha went in perſon againſt Ali.] Ayeſha had been preſented with a fine camel: this ſhe mounted in a litter which was ſet upon the beaſt, and headed the forces from Mecca towards Baſora. The army being upon their march, came to a rivulet called Jowâb, on the ſide of which there was a village of the ſame name. All the dogs of the village came running out in a body, and fell a barking at Ayeſha, who, being greatly ſurprized, immediately enquired the name of the place. Being told that it was called Jowâb, ſhe repeated that verſe of the Koran, which is often made uſe of in imminent dangers; We are reſigned to God, and to him we have recourſe (4); declaring that ſhe would not go a ſtep farther; that ſhe had heard the Prophet ſay when he was travelling with his wives; I wiſh I had known it, and they ſhould have lodg'd within the barking of the dogs of Jowâb. Beſides, that he had formerly told her, one of his wives ſhould at ſome time or other be bark'd at by the dogs of this place; that ſhe ought to mind this, becauſe ſhe would be in a bad condition, and in very great danger (5). Upon this ſhe ſtruck her camel upon the leg, to make him kneel, in order to deſcend from him, and reſolved to ſtay there all night. Telha and Zobéir could not tell what to make of this whimſy, and knowing of what importance it was to them to precipitate their march, having good reaſon to believe that Ali would not be long after them, they told her, and ſuborned fifty witneſſes to ſwear it, that it was a miſtake of the guide, and that this place had never been called by that name. However, all this was to no purpoſe, for ſhe would not move a ſtep, till at laſt, ſomebody crying out, Quick, quick, yonder comes Ali, they all fled away immediately, and made the beſt of their way to Baſora (6). Our author obſerves however, that the Hiſtorians affirm this was the firſt ſolemn and public lye that was ever told ſince the beginning of Mahometiſm, which, ſays he, whether it be ſo or not, is little to the purpoſe. But this is moſt certain, that thoſe who ſpread it found their account in it, for it conveyed them with incredible ſpeed to Baſora (7).

(4) Koran, ch. 2.
(5) Abul Feda.
(6) Ockley's Hiſt. of the Saracens, vol. 2. p. 19, 20. and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 89, 90.

[E] Telha was killed.] In the heat of the battle, when victory began to incline towards Ali, Merwan ſaid to him, It is but a little while ſince Telha was among Othman's murtherers, and now he is ſo fond of worldly grandeur, that he appears among thoſe who ſeek to revenge his blood; and after ſaying theſe words, Merwan let fly an arrow and wounded Telha in the leg. His horſe throwing him, he called for help, and ſaid, "O God! take vengeance upon me "for Othman, according to thy will!" Perceiving that his boot was full of blood, he ordered his ſervant to take him up behind him, who did ſo, and conveying Telha into a houſe in Baſora, he there expired. But a little before he had ſeen one of Ali's men, and asking him whether he belonged to the Emperor of the Faithful, he anſwer'd yes, "Give "me then, ſaid Telha, your hand, that I may put "mine in it; and by this action renew the oath of "fidelity which I have already made to Ali." The words were no ſooner ſpoke, but he died. When this was told Ali, he ſaid, "God would not call "Telha to heaven till he had blotted out his firſt "breach of his word by this laſt proteſtation of fi-"delity (8)." As for Zobéir he was treacherouſly murdered by Amru Ben Jarmuz, who ſtruck off his head as he was at prayers (9).

(7) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 20.
(8) Idem, p. 43, 44.
(9) D'Herbelot, p. 90. and Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 45. Ali curſing Amrû for killing Zobeir, Amrû thruſt himſelf through with his own ſword.

[F] Ayeſha was taken priſoner.] So long as Ayeſha's camel ſtood upon his legs, the battle raged with greateſt fury about him. According to Tabari, there were ſeventy hands cut off that held his bridle. Ayeſha's litter was ſtuck ſo full of arrows and javelins, that it look'd like a procupine. At laſt her beaſt was ham-ſtring'd, ſo that Ayeſha was forced to lie there till the battle was over. Ali having gained the victory, came and ask'd her how ſhe did. Some Hiſtorians relate, that reproachful language paſt between them. But it is generally ſaid that Ali treated her civilly, and diſmiſſing her handſomely with a very good equipage, commanded his two ſons Haſan and Hoſein to attend her a day's journey. Ali confined her to her houſe at Medina, and enjoined her not to intermeddle any more with State-affairs. Ayeſha went to Mecca, and there ſtaying out the time of her pilgrimage, afterwards returned to Medina (10).

(10) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 45, 46. d'Herbelot, p. 90. and Prideaux's Life of Mahomet, p. 108. Ali firſt diſcovered Ayeſha's incontinence to Mahomet, and for that reaſon ſhe bore him a mortal hatred.

found out a well by the ſpirit of prophecy [G]. He marched forward, and came to a place called Seffein, between Irâk and Syria, where the enemy's army was poſted, conſiſting of fourſcore thouſand men. They came in ſight of one another, and ſpent a month or two in ſending of meſſages backwards and forwards, in order to bring matters to an accommodation. Afterwards they fought in parties, and at laſt came to a general engagement. Ali challenged Moawiya to fight him in ſingle combat, but the latter refuſed. The victory was going to be complete on Ali's ſide, when Amrû Ebno'l Aas who commanded in Paleſtine and fought in concert with Moawiya prevented it by a ſtratagem [H]. The armies then ceaſed all hoſtilities, agreeing to determine their diſputes by the arbitration of two perſons. Ali retired to Cufa, and Moawiya to Damaſcus, leaving their troops upon the ſpot. Eight months after the battle of Seffein, the two arbitrators, Abû Mûſa and Amru, the former an honeſt but ſimple man, and the latter reputed the moſt cunning of all the Arabians, met in a place lying between Mecca, Cufa and Syria. Amrû prevailed with Abû Mûſa to decree, that both Ali and Moawiya ought to be depoſed, and another perſon elected. A tribunal being then raiſed between the two armies, Abû Mûſa declared according to the agreement abovementioned; but Amru harangued in favour of Moawiya [I] (z). The Syrians upon this went back to Moawiya and wiſhed him joy, and from that time Ali's intereſt declined, and that of Moawiya's increaſed daily. A treaty was afterwards made between them, in which Ali ſuffered the title of Chief or Emperor of the Faithful to be omitted. Theſe things happened the 37th of the Hegira, and of Chriſt 657, in which year the Karegites or Separatiſts revolted from Ali. The occaſion of this was, becauſe he had put his affairs into the hands of arbitrators, and would not fall upon Moawiya (aa). Theſe increaſing to twenty five thouſand, Ali endeavoured to win them back to their allegiance by gentle methods, which proving ineffectual, he cauſed them all to deſert except four thouſand, and theſe he cut to pieces with their leader. This victory was gained the 38th year of the Hegira, which again united all the Arabians under Ali. He then withdrew to Cufa, whither all his army had retired (bb). This year Ali, by an artifice of Moawiya, diſpoſſeſſed Saad the ſon of Kais of his government of Egypt, and appointed Mahomed the ſon of Abû Becr in his ſtead, which cauſed great troubles in that country. This Mahomed was afterwards routed, and falling alive into his enemy's hands they killed him, and incloſing his dead body in that of an aſs, burnt him to aſhes (cc). Ali then ſent for the Governor of Baſora, in order to concert matters with him, during which that city was won by Abdalla whom Moawiya ſent, but it was ſoon recovered by Ali's ſoldiers (dd). In the beginning of the 40th year of the Hegira, Moawiya began again to exert himſelf, and ſent three thouſand

(z) Idem, p. 54. & ſeq.

(aa) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 2. p. 60. and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 92.

(bb) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 64.

(cc) Idem, p. 66. and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. vol. 2. p. 93.

(dd) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 67, 68. and d'Herbelot, p. 93.

[G] Ali found out a well by the Spirit of Prophecy.] Not far from his camp there was an hermitage under ground, the hermit whereof, who was a Chriſtian, came and offer'd himſelf to him. Ali asked him whether there was never a ſpring in the neighbourhood; to which the hermit replied, that there was only a ciſtern which had but three buckets of water in it. Ali went on thus: I know however that ſome ancient Prophets of the people of Iſrael have dwelt in this place, and dug a pit in it. The hermit ſaid he had been informed by ſome old men, that indeed there was a well which was ſhut up, but that no body knew where it was dug; and that according to a tradition of the country, no one could find and open it, but a Prophet, or one ſent by a Prophet; Ali however ſoon found it, and ordering the men to dig in a place he pointed out, they met with a ſtone of a prodigious ſize that covered it; but Ali putting his hand to it, removed it with the greateſt eaſe. The hermit aſtoniſhed at the ſight, embraced Ali's knees, and would never leave him afterwards. He alſo preſented Ali with an old parchment, which he ſaid had been writ by Simeon the ſon of Safa (that is Simon Cephas) one of the greateſt of Chriſt's Apoſtles, in which an account was given of the coming of the laſt Prophet; the arrival of his lawful heir and ſucceſſor, and the miraculous diſcovery of this well (11).

(11) Ockley's Hiſt. of the Saracens, vol. 2. pag. 49, 50. and d'Herbelot Bib. Orient. p. 91.

[H] Amrû . . . prevented it by a ſtratagem.] This was in the laſt battle fought in Seffein. The ſtratagem was this: Amrû finding Victory declared for Ali, ſent for Moawiya in great haſte, and adviſed him to fix the Korans on the points of their lances, and cry out, "(12) This is the book that ought to decide all our differences; this is the book of God "between us and you." This artifice did not fail of the deſired ſucceſs, for the inſtant the Irakians, who were the flower of Ali's army, ſaw this, they threw down their arms, and cried to Ali, "Will "you not anſwer to the book of God?" Ali anſwered, As you are men of truth and honour, go on and fight your enemy, for neither Amrû nor Moawiya have the leaſt relation to Religion or the Koran. Alas! I know them better than you do; by God they have put up theſe Korans in no other view but to trick us. The ſoldiers however replied that this ſhould not prevent their being determined by the book of God. It is for that very purpoſe, replied Ali, I have been fighting, but they have rebelled againſt God and his commandment. In a word, the ſoldiers threatned not only to deſert, but to deliver Ali into the hands of his enemies, in caſe he did not found a retreat. And ſome of the Karegites (13), declaring, that they would ſerve him as they had done Othman, that is, murder him, Ali was forced to call off Alaſhtar one of his Generals, who came back with great reluctance, and not till three or four Meſſengers had been diſpatched; vexed to the ſoul to ſee ſo glorious a victory wreſted out of his hands by ſuch a ſtratagem (14).

(12) D'Herbelot has it thus, "This is the "book that ought "to decide all our "diſputes, and "which forbids "the thus ſhed-"ding, without "any juſt reaſon, "the blood of "the Moſlems, P. 91.

(13) Or Sectaries, an enthuſiaſtic ſett of people who refuſe obedience to their ſuperiors, in things ſacred as well as civil.

(14) Ockley's Hiſt. Saracens, vol. 2. p. 53, 54.

[I] Amrû harangued in favour of Moawiya.] Abû Mûſa aſcended the tribunal firſt, whence he pronounced the following words: "(15) I depoſe Ali and "Moawiya from the Khalifate to which they pre-"tend, in the ſame manner as I take this ring from "my finger." Having made this declaration he immediately came down, when Amrû went up and ſaid, "You have heard how Abû Mûſa has for his part "depoſed Ali; as for my part I depoſe him too, "and I give the Khalifate to Moawiya, and inveſt "him with it, after the ſame manner as I put this "ring on my finger; and this I do with ſo much "the more juſtice, becauſe he is Othman's heir and "avenger, and the worthieſt of all men to ſucceed "him." Ali's party confounded at this unexpected declaration, began to complain grievouſly of Abû Mûſa, who being at laſt aſhamed of his arbitration, and juſtly fearing Ali's diſpleaſure, fled away to Mecca. Abû Mûſa is ſaid to have had the moſt harmonious voice that ever was heard, and that his common diſcourſe was perfect melody (16).

(15) There is a Law in the Koran, which enjoins a man to refer his cauſe to a choſen perſon, who being joined with another nominated by his adverſary, theſe are to determine the difference. D'Herbelot, p. 91.

(16) Idem, p. 57, 58. and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 93.

thouſand horſe to Mecca and Medina, in order to ſeize upon thoſe places, which they did; Mowaiya being then in Damaſcus, and Ali in Cufa, each praying publickly, notwithſtanding theſe diviſions, for the other (ee). The ſame year a conſpiracy was formed againſt Ali, Moawiya and Amrû, which is as follows. A little after the battle which Ali won over the Karegites (ff), three of the moſt zealous among them met at Mecca, where they diſcourſed about the battle and the great loſs they had ſuſtained. Theſe three (one of which was Abdarrahmàn the ſon of Melgem) ſaid among themſelves, were but Ali, Moawiya and Amrû dead, the affairs of the Moſlems would be in a good condition. Upon this they agreed to murder them, and after poiſoning their own ſwords, every man took his road, Abdarrahmàn to Cufa, the ſecond to Damaſcus, and the third to Egypt (gg). The two laſt however were unſucceſsful in their attempts, but Abdarrahmàn executed his bloody deſign, for coming to Cufa he took up his lodging at a woman's houſe who hated Ali. This woman procured Abdarrahmàn two aſſociates. Theſe coming into the Moſque, and pretending to quarrel among themſelves, they fell upon Ali, who had ſeveral preſages of his death [K], when Abdarrahmàn gave him a mortal wound [L]. Ali died about the fourth or fifth day after he was wounded, which happened near the 20th of the month of Ramadan, the year of the Hegira 40, and of our Saviour 660. Authors differ about his age, which ſome make about fifty ſix, and others ſixty three (hh). He reigned four years and three quarters. It is not certainly known where he was buried, but the moſt probable opinion is, that he was interred in that place which the Moſlems viſit at this day as his tomb, and where a great many oblations are left by the devotees (ii). He had nine wives, who brought him fourteen ſons and eighteen daughters (kk). The Moſlems have beſtowed very honourable titles upon him, and theſe among others; the Lion of God Victorious, and the Diſtributer of Lights or Graces (ll). Some of his ſect think he is ſtill alive (mm), and others are ſo extravagant as to believe him a Divine perſon (nn). The Perſians relate a thouſand wild fictions concerning Ali. All the Mahometans look upon him as a man of great wiſdom, and a conſiderable number of his ſentences or maxims are at this day extant (oo). He writ ſeveral pieces, but the moſt celebrated is one containing the grand events that will happen to the end of the world (pp). Some wiſe anſwers of his are related [M]. Haſan his eldeſt ſon ſucceeded him in the Khalifate. If we conſider Ali with regard to his courage, moderation, piety, and underſtanding, he will be found one of the greateſt men that was ever born among the Arabians (qq). He was the firſt of the twelve Imams. The Perſians ſolemnize the day of his martyrdom annually, on which occaſion he Moſques are ſo crowded, that there is preaching in the ſtreets (rr). Thoſe of his ſect wear not only a turbant made in a peculiar faſhion, but alſo twiſt their hair in a manner very different from the other Moſlems (ss).

(ee) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 70, 71.

(ff) See the note [H] of this article.

(gg) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 72, 73. and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 93.

(hh) D'Herbelot, p. 94. is for the latter.

(ii) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 78, & ſeq.

(kk) Idem, p. 80 and d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. pag. 94, 95.

(ll) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 81. and Voyag. de Chardin, tom. 2. pag. 343.

(mm) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 83.

(nn) Idem, p. 84. and Voyages de Chardin, tom. 2. p. 341.

(oo) Such as deſire to peruſe a large number of his ſentences, may conſult Ockley's Hiſtory of the Saracens, vol. 2. towards the end.

(pp) Ockley's Hiſt. of the Saracens, p. 84.

(qq) Idem, p. 89.

(rr) Voyages de Chardin, tom. 3. p. 211.

(ss) D'Herbelot Bib. Orient. pag. 95.

[K] Ali had ſeveral preſages of his death.] This he had during the whole month of Ramadan, and he ſometimes uſed to hint theſe Omens to his friends. He was one day heard to ſay after his undergoing much uneaſineſs, "Alas! my heart, there is need of "patience, for there is no remedy againſt death (17)." Going out very early on Friday the 17th of the month (on which day he was kill'd) towards the moſque, it was obſerved that a great number of houſhold-birds made a loud noiſe as he was paſſing through his yard; upon which, one of his ſlaves having thrown a cudgel at them to make them quiet, Ali ſaid, "Let them alone, for their cries are only lamen-"tations foreboding my death (18)."

(17) D'Herbelot, p. 94 ſays thus; "Well! my "heart, one muſt "have patience "ſince there is "no remedy a-"gainſt death.

(18) Ockley's Hiſt. Sarac. vol. 2. p. 76. and D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 94.

[L] Abdarrhamàn gave him a mortal wound.] Several of the neareſt relations of the woman at whoſe houſe this aſſaſſin lodged, were Karegites, and had loſt their lives in the battle fought againſt them. which fired her with the ſtrongeſt reſentment againſt Ali. Abdarrhamàn finding this began to inveigle her, and even made overtures of marriage, to which ſhe anſwered, I demand in dowry of the man who marries me, three thouſand drachms of ſilver, a ſlave, a maid, and Ali's head. He accepted the conditions; and being joined with two other ruffians, they ran to the moſque, and drawing their ſwords, Abdarrhamàn ſtruck Ali upon the head, juſt on the place where he had formerly received a wound in Mahomet's time. The three aſſaſſins had time to eſcape, however one of them was afterwards killed, and the other got quite off, but Abdarrhamàn was taken, and being brought before Ali, he commanded his ſon Haſan, in caſe he died of his wounds, to kill the murtherer at one ſtroke, which he did. Thus (19) d'Herbelot relates his death, but two celebrated Eaſtern Hiſtorians (20) give a very different account of it, for according to theſe, Abdarrhamàn's hand was firſt cut off, and then his foot on the oppoſite ſide: Next they put out his eyes with a red hot iron, then cut out his tongue, and afterwards burnt him. This account is much more probable than the other. Be this as it will, the heretics conſider Abdarrhamàn as a martyr (21).

(19) P. 94, who ſays farther, that Ali's friends cauſed Abdarrahmàn's body to be put into a mat, in order to burn it.

(20) Tabari and Abul Faragius.

(21) Idem, pag. 77, 78.

[M] Some wiſe anſwers of Ali are related.] A Commander of his having one day ask'd him, impudently enough, how it came to paſs, that the reigns of his predeceſſors Abû Becr and Omar had been ſo peaceable, and that of Othman and his own ſo full of troubles and diviſions: Ali replied, "The reaſon is "plain; it is becauſe Othman and I ſerved Abû "Becr and Omar during their reigns; whereas Oth-"man and my ſelf found no body to ſerve us but "you, and ſuch as are like you (22)." Another example Ali gave of his good ſenſe, is this. Being one day told, that Moawiya ſaid that Ali and thoſe of his family diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their bravery, and that Zobéir and his houſe were conſpicuous for their magnificence; but that as for himſelf and his relations, they endeavoured to diſtinguiſh themſelves from other men by acts of humanity and clemency only; Ali anſwered thoſe who told him this, that it was probable theſe words of Moawiya were employ'd by him merely to ſpur on Zobéir and himſelf to bravery and magnificence; in order that the one plunging into expence, and the other into dangers, they might thereby be no longer able to oppoſe Moawiya's uſurpation; however, that as for himſelf he would endeavour to win the affections of the people by gentle methods (23). There is a famous Elogium of Ali, written on the gallery of Abbas the ſecond's tomb in the city of Kom in Perſia (24). A remarkable circumſtance is related of Ali, viz. that his mother was delivered of him in the temple of Mecca, which is ſaid to have happened to no other perſon (25). Some of Ali's deſcendants made a conſiderable figure in the world.

(22) Id. p. 85.

(23) Id. p. 95.

(24) Voyages du Chevalier Chardin, vol. 1. pag. 208, & ſeq. 4°. This elogium is writ with all the fire and extravaganee of the Eaſterns, and ſhews the genius of the Perſian Poetry, and the tranſports of the Mahometan devotion.

(25) D'Herbelot Bib. Orient. p. 94.

ALKINDE, or ALKINDUS. See ALCHINDUS.

☞ALLAM (ANDREW), the ſon of Andrew Allam, by Bridget Derling his wife, was born at Garſingdon in Oxfordſhire in April 1655. He was educated in grammar learning at a private ſchool at Denton in the pariſh of Cudeſdon near to his native place, under Mr. Will. Wildgooſe, an eminent ſchoolmaſter. He was made Batler of St. Edmund's Hall in Eaſter Term 1671, where, as Mr. Wood informs us (a), if he had not fallen under the care of a bad tutor, he might have proved a prodigy in ſeveral kinds of learning. After he had taken the degrees of Batchelor and Maſter of Arts, he became a Tutor, Moderator, and Lecturer in the Chapel, and at laſt Vice-principal of his Houſe; all which offices he executed with prodigious applauſe. In 1680 at Whitſuntide he entered into Holy Orders, and in 1683 he was one of the Maſters of the Schools, which place he diſcharged with great judgment and prudence. He died of the Small-pox on the 17th of June in 1685, and was buried in the church of St. Peter in the Eaſt in Oxford. He was a perſon of eminent virtues; he was ſober, moderate, and modeſt even to example. He underſtood the ſeveral controverſies in religion, and particularly thoſe between the Proteſtants and Papiſts far beyond his years. He knew the world of men well, but authors better; and nothing except years and experience were wanting to render him a perfect ſcholar (b). His works, which are extant, ſhall be mentioned in the Note [A].

(a) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 784. 2d edit. 1721.

(b) Id. ibid.

[A] His works, which are extant, ſhall be mentioned in the note.] I. The learned Preface or Epiſtle to the reader, with a dedicatory Epiſtle in the Printer's name, prefixed to The Epiſtle Congratulatory of Lyſimachus Nicanor &c. to the Covenanters of Scotland, &c. Oxon. 1684. II. The Epiſtle, with an account in it of Dr. Coſins's Life, prefixed to the Doctor's book, intitled, Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Politeia in tabulas digeſta. Oxon. 1684, in fol. The Epiſtle before, with a Review and Correction of the book intitled, Some plain Diſcourſes on the Lord's Supper, &c. written by Dr. George Griffith, Biſhop of St. Aſaph. Oxon. 1684, 8vo. IV. Additions to and Corrections in the Angliæ Notitia, or Preſent State of England, printed, as Mr. Wood informs us, in the edition of that book at London in 1687, without any acknowledgment from the author of the Notitia. V. Additions to Helvicus's Hiſtorical and Chronological Theatre, printed in the edition of that work at London in 1687, in fol. He deſigned to have finiſhed the Supplement to that book from 1660 to 1683, if he had not been prevented by death. VI. He laid the foundation of a Notitia Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ; wherein he propoſed to ſpeak of the foundation of all the Cathedrals, with an account of their ſtatutes and cuſtoms; and then to give a liſt of the names of the preſent Biſhop, Dean, Archdeacon, Canons, and Officers of each Cathedral: But death prevented him from finiſhing this. VII. He tranſlated into Engliſh The Life of Iphicrates, from Cornelius Nepos, printed in the Engliſh verſion of that author by ſeveral Gentlemen of Oxford. Oxon. 1684, in 8vo. VIII. He aſſiſted Mr. Wood in his elaborate work of the Athenæ Oxonienſes, or The Hiſtory of Oxford Writers; and is mentioned by that author with great reſpect and gratitude. T.

ALLATIUS (LEO) keeper of the Vatican Library, a native of the Iſland of Scio, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the ſeventeenth Century. He was laborious and indefatigable, fond of manuſcripts, endowed with a great memory, very fit for the collecting of materials, and conſequently well qualified for the employment he bore; though on the other hand he had no great penetration, nor did he reaſon like a good Logician. I do not mention here the employments he had before he was Librarian to the Pope; neither have I examined, whether Moreri, who is very diffuſe on this ſubject, has been ſo exact as he ought. What I have to offer relating to his employments ſhall be inſerted in the note [A]. Omitting therefore here what may be found in Moreri's Dictionary, I ſhall only touch upon ſuch things as he has left out. Allatius was a great help to Meſſieurs of Port-Royal in the controverſy that roſe between them and Mr. Claude, touching the belief of the Greeks with regard to the Euchariſt. Mr. Claude often calls him Mr. Arnaud's great Author, and gives him but a very indifferent character [B]. F. Simon deſcribes him as a man of little [A] What I have to offer relating to his employments, ſhall be inſerted in the notes.] I read in Lorenzo Craſſo (1), that Leone Allacci (as he calls him) at nine years old was carried from the iſland of Scio his native country into Calabria, where he was favoured with the protection of a great family (2). Some time after he was ſent to Rome, and admitted there into the Greek College; where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of polite Learning, Philoſophy and Divinity. From Rome he paſſed to Naples, and was choſen there great Vicar to Bernard Juſtiniani, Biſhop of Anglona. From Naples he returned to his native country; but being at a loſs there how to employ himſelf agreeably to his inclination, he came back to Rome, ſtudied Phyſic under Julius Cæſar Lagalla, and took his degree of Doctor in that Science. Afterwards he made the Belles Lettres his chief ſtudy; and taught Greek in the college of his Nation at Rome. Gregory XV charged him with the care of removing the Elector Palatin's Library to Rome (3); but by the death of that Pope he loſt the reward that was due to his commiſſion. He lived, ſome time after, firſt with Cardinal Bichi, and then with Cardinal Francis Barberini, and was at laſt, by Pope Alexander VII, appointed Keeper of the Vatican Library. This is the whole account Lorenzo Craſſo gives of him, in the book I have quoted. I add, that he was a long time Librarian to Cardinal Barberini.

(1) Lorenzo Craſſo Iſtoria de' Poeti Greci, pag. 306. See alſo his Elogii d'Huomini Litterati, tom. 1. p. 397, &c.

(2) The family Spinelli.

(3) Moreri places this in the year 1621; but Heidelberg was not taken till 1622.

[B] Mr. Claude gives him but a very indifferent character.] Allatius "was a Greek who had renounced "his own religion to embrace that of Rome; a "Greek whom the Pope had raiſed to be his Libra- "rian; a man the moſt devoted to the intereſts of "the Court of Rome; the moſt malicious and ill- "natured, that ever appeared; his animoſity and "hatred againſt the Greeks, whom he called Schiſ- "matics, and in particular againſt Cyril, is not to "be matched. In other reſpects he was a mere "Bragadocchio (4).... He ſhews his attachment to "the Court of Rome in the very beginning of his "book De perpetua Conſenſione, where he writes in "favour of the Pope thus *; The Roman Pontiff, "ſays he, is quite independent, judges the world "without being liable himſelf to be judged; we are "bound to obey his commands, even when he governs "with

(4) M. Claude's Anſwer to M. Arnaud's book, l. 3. c. 12. tom. 1. p. 452. edit. in 8o.

* Allat. de Perpet. Conſ. l. 1. cap. 2.

little ſincerity [C]. No Latin by birth ever ſhewed himſelf more incenſed againſt the Greek Schiſmaticks than Allatius, or more devoted to the See of Rome. He neither engaged in matrimony, nor orders, for a reaſon that deſerves notice [D]. What we read of a pen Allatius uſed is very extraordinary, and ſcarce to be matched in the hiſtory of Authors [E]. He publiſhed ſeveral manuſcripts, ſeveral tranſlations of Greek Authors, and ſeveral pieces of his own compoſing. Theſe three different kinds of works are not diſtinguiſhed in the catalogue Moreri gives of them; neither does that catalogue compriſe them all. In his compoſitions he ſhews more erudition, than judgment and good ſenſe. He was Critic enough to find out the faults of thoſe againſt whom he wrote; but then he uſed to interſperſe his criticiſm with too much ill-nature, and inſult over his adverſaries, as appears chiefly from the Diſſertations he publiſhed againſt Mr. Creygthon, touching the Council of Florence (a). One may judge of his turn in writing, and likewiſe of his memory, by the frequent digreſſions he makes from one ſubject to another in one and the ſame volume. Mr. de Sallo was far from admiring him on this account [F]. Allatius died at Rome in January 1669, being eighty three years old (b). He wrote ſeveral Greek Poems, one upon the birth of Lewis XIV, in which he introduced Greece ſpeaking. He reprinted this Poem, and prefixed it to his book de Perpetua Conſenſione &c. which he dedicated to that Prince. I had (a) See Journal des Savans 13 Nov. 1666.

(b) Hen. Witte, Diarium Biographb. ad ann. 1669. Moreri places his death in 1670.

" with injuſtice; he gives Laws, but receives none; " changes them as he thinks fit; appoints Magi- " ſtrates; decides all queſtions in point of religion; " and manages the eccleſiaſtic affairs of the greateſt " concern, as he pleaſes. It is not in his power to " err, being out of the reach of all hereſy and il- " luſion; and, as he is armed with the authority of " Chriſt, not even an Angel from heaven could make " him alter his opinion or deviate from truth. The " ill-nature he ſhews againſt ſuch as he diſputes with, " namely againſt Chytreus, Creygthon, the Archbi- " ſhop of Corfù, and ſome others, whom he abuſes " without the leaſt provocation, will plainly appear " to any one that reads his works. He honours " them in every period with the fine titles of fools, " liars, dunces, helliſh mouths, rotten muſhrooms, " wicked impudent fellows &c; which may ſuffici- " ently convince us that he had no great command " of his temper †. In order to prove that the Greek " Church agrees with the Latin, at leaſt in the moſt " material points of religion, he lays it down, as a " truth not to be called in queſtion, that ſuch only " of the Greeks, as acknowledge the authority of " the Roman See, ought to be look'd upon as true " members of the Greek Church. As to the others, " whom he is pleaſed to call Heretics and Schiſmatics, " he openly declares, that they ought to be reduced " with fire and ſword; Heretics, ſays he, ought to " be proſcribed, rooted out, puniſhed, and, if they " perſiſt in their hereſy, put to death, and conſumed " in the flames ‡." Had Moreri therefore any rea- ſon to call him a weak, but well-meaning man? Is this Elogium, however ſlighting, due to thoſe, who, in teaching us how heretics are to be dealt with, have recourſe to penal laws only, to extirpations, axes, fire and ſword.

† See Allat. de Perpetua Conſ. l. 3. c. 15, 16, 17, 18. & adverſ. Creygth. paſſim.

‡ Allat. de Perpetua Conſ. l. 2. c. 13. and l. 3. c. 11.

[C] F. Simon deſcribes him as a man of little ſincerity.] The main ſcope of the whole firſt chapter of his Critical Hiſtory of the Levant, is to ſhew that Allatius had no manner of reaſon to inveigh againſt Caucus Archbiſhop of Corfù; that Caucus did not charge the Greeks with any opinion or practice but what they really followed; and that Allatius, in order to inſinuate himſelf into Pope Urban VIII's favour, who deſigned at that time to reunite the Greek Church to that of the Latin, by lenitive methods, ſet out the opinions of the Greeks in a light more favourable to that deſign, than to truth. That is, in plain terms, he wanted ſincerity. For if Caucus was in the right, Allatius could not contradict him, out of complaiſance to the Pope, without ſacrificing ſincerity to the maxims of State.

[D] He neither engaged in matrimony nor orders for a reaſon that deſerves notice.] Pope Alexander VII having asked him one day, why he did not enter into orders? Becauſe, anſwered he, I would be free to marry. But if ſo, replied the Pope, why don't you marry? Becauſe I would be at liberty, anſwered Allatius, to take orders (5). Thus he paſſed his whole life in deliberating between a pariſh and a wife, and was perhaps ſorry, at his death, for not having choſe either of them: but had he made choice of either, he might have repented his election for thirty or forty years together.

(5) Mabillon. Muſæum Ital. tom. 1. p. 61.

[E] What we read of a pen Allatius uſed, is very extraordinary.] We have for this particular the ſame voucher as for the former, viz. John Paſtricius, Head of the College de propaganda fide, Allatius's good friend, to whom he bequeathed all his books, told our Mabillon (6), that Allatius had wrote Greek for forty years, with one pen (7); and that, having loſt it, he was ſo grieved, that he could ſcarce forbear crying. He wrote ſo exceeding faſt, that he could copy, in one night, the whole Diarium Romanorum Pontificum, which Hilarion Rancatus a Ciſtercian Monk, had lent him (8): he was not allowed to publiſh it.

(6) Ibidem.

(7) See the article upon Lancelot an Olivetan Monk.

(8) Mabillon, Muſæum Italicum, p. 77.

[F] He made frequent digreſſions from one thing to another. . . . He was not admired on this account.] Mr. de Sallo, after obſerving that the moſt remarkable piece in one of Allatius's works was a lamentation of the Virgin Mary, goes on thus: " This la- " mentation (9) was compoſed by Metaphraſt, and " that was ſufficient for Leo Allatius . . . . to inſert " a panegyric upon Metaphraſt, written by Pſellus. " As Metaphraſt's name was Simeon, he took an op- " portunity from thence of making a long diſſertati- " on upon the lives and works of ſuch celebrated " men as bore the ſame name. From the Simeons " he paſſes to the Simons, from them to the Simo- " nides, and laſtly from the Simonides to the Simo- " nactides. Such was Allatius's manner of writing, " as appears from other diſſertations he wrote upon " the lives and works of authors who bore equivo- " cal names, as that of George, Methodius, Nicetas, " Philo and Pſellus; each of which afforded him " matter for ſome diſſertation. This manner of " writing is of a new invention; at leaſt it was al- " together unknown to the ancients." Diogenes Laërtius in the Lives of the Philophers mentions, at the end of each Life, ſuch as bore the ſame name; and quotes Demetrius Magnes, who wrote a book περὶ ὁμωνύμων ποιητῶν τε & συγγραφέων, i. e. " Of Poets " and Writers of the ſame name (10)." See the note [H] of the article APOLLONIUS Tyaneus. This manner of writing was not revived by Allatius. Before him Meurſius publiſhed divers Treatiſes of this nature. See Mr. Teiſſier in his Catalogue of Catalogues, where he gives a liſt of ſuch authors as have wrote upon this ſubject (11). He calls them Scriptores de Homonymis. The word Homonymi, according to Mr. Sallo, ought to be tranſlated thus, thoſe who bore equivocal names; but, with his leave, the tranſlation would not be true; for no one ever ſaid, that the Princes of the ſame name, for inſtance the Charles's, Lewis's, Henry's, had equivocal names. Thoſe names are called equivocal, that are liable to be taken in different ſignifications: ſuch is the true meaning of that word both in Logic and common diſcourſe. But to return to Leo Allatius; I cannot help obſerving that he had a particular talent in making of Catalogues, which he gave a good ſpecimen of, when he publiſhed his Apes Urbanæ, a book that begins to be ſcarce, and already ſells at an extravagant

(9) Journal des Savans, Jan. 19, 1665.

(10) Diog. Laert. in Epimenide l. 1. num. 112.

(11) Teiſſerii Catal. Catalogor. p. 355.

I had forgot to acquaint the reader that the Gentlemen of Port-Royal offered ſomething in anſwer to Mr. Claude in vindication of Allatius [G].

vagant rate in Holland (12). It contains a Catalogue of all the learned Men that appeared in Rome, from the year 1630 to 1632; and likewiſe a Catalogue of their works. Its title was taken from the Bees which Pope Urban VIII bore in his coat of arms. There is another Catalogue done by Allatius, not ſo generally known, as that I have now mentioned. It is entitled Dramaturgia, and regards the dramatic pieces and their authors. The book he publiſhed at Rome 1630, De erroribus magnorum virorum in dicendo, contained ſeveral remarks borrowed from Claude du Verdier; which Mr. Morhof reproaches him with (13).

(12) It is not to be met with there in the Bookſellers ſhops, but in what the Walloons call Auctions, that is in the publick ſales of Libraries.

(13) Morh. de Patavin. p. 86. Polyhiſ. p. 179. * Drelincourt Dialog. of the deſcent into Hell, p. 290, &c. Note, That in my edition, which is the ſecond, you will find what relates to Allatius in pag. 466.

[G] The Gentlemen of Port-Royal offered ſome kind of anſwer to Mr. Claude in vindication of Allatius.] They firſt relate part of what Mr. Claude produced againſt him; and then continue thus: "But beſides that ſuch ill-grounded reproaches are always "unbecoming; that the works of Allatius give us "a quite different character of him; and that Mr. "Claude's brethren * ſpeak of him in a very different "manner, quoting and commending him: they are "repugnant to good ſenſe; for there is ſo wide a "difference between one's being ſharp or ill-natured "againſt thoſe he diſputes with; and his being an "impoſtor or capable of alledging falſe paſſages; "that we cannot argue the one from the other. "We muſt not reaſon of the vices of men, as of "their virtues; there is no manner of connexion "between their vices; nay they are often contrary "to one another; ſo that a man may be paſſionate, "violent, a flatterer, ſelf-intereſted, without giving "us reaſon to believe, that the paſſages he cites are "ſuppoſititious. As to Allatius, we have leſs reaſon "to ſuſpect him than any other, ſince the manu-"ſcripts, which he quoted, and have been afterwards "printed have juſtified his fidelity. Beſides, he va-"lued himſelf greatly upon the reputation of an "able Critic; and it is well known, that men of "ſuch a character are very far from adulterating au-"thors (14) or forging of paſſages." It is true he is quoted, and commended by Mr. Drelincourt, who even follows his opinion concerning the Pythoneſs, which made Samuel's ſhade appear. The book he quotes is entitled De Engaſtrimytho, and was publiſhed in 8vo.

(14) General Anſwer to Mr. Claude, c. 13. p. 212.

☞ALLEMANT (PETER L') a famous Monk of the order of St. Auguſtin, was born at Rheims in France in the year 1592, and at the age of twenty three years entered himſelf in the congregation of St. Genevieve, and was profeſs'd the year following. His merit and abilities were ſo very conſiderable, that he was choſen Chancellor of the Univerſity of Paris. He was likewiſe elected Prior of St. Genevieve, and died the 18th of January 1673, being eighty one years of age (a). Though he was one of the fineſt genius's of his time, and ſpoke the Latin and French languages with the utmoſt propriety and elegance, and was extremely well ſkilled in profane as well as eccleſiaſtical learning; yet he never publiſhed any thing but books of Devotion in French [A].

(a) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 18. p. 196. edit. Amſt. 1711.

[A] Books of devotion in French.] In the year 1653 he publiſhed an Elogium or Abridgment of the Life of St. Genevieve. Some time after he wrote Spiritual Conferences between a devout ſoul and Jeſus Chriſt upon the Sacrament, and Meditations upon the Lord's Prayer. But his moſt conſiderable performances were three ſmall treatiſes upon death, intitled, The Death of the righteous, The Spiritual Teſtament, and Holy Deſires after Death. The two firſt were printed in 1672, and the laſt after his death in 1573. He collected in the firſt piece inſtances of thoſe, who had died in a pious and exemplary manner. In the ſecond he deſcribes the diſpoſition of a Chriſtian, who is preparing himſelf for death. And the laſt contains the ſentiments of the Fathers concerning the deſires, which Chriſtians ought to have for death, with the reaſons and motives of thoſe deſires. He repreſents them, ſays Mr. Du Pin (1), with ſo much force, veracity, and eloquence, that it is evident he was influenced by them himſelf, and it is difficult not to be affected with them, whatever attachment a man may have to this world, and how ſtrong ſoever his apprehenſions may be of death. T.

(1) Ubi ſupra, p. 197.

☞ALLEN (JOHN), Archbiſhop of Dublin in the reign of King Henry VIII, had his firſt academical education in the Univerſity of Oxford; from whence he removed to that of Cambridge, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, or, as Mr. Wood (a) rather thinks, of Batchelor of Laws. He was afterwards ſent to Rome to the Pope by Dr. Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to manage ſome affairs relating to the church. He continued there about nine years, and was created Doctor of Laws either in that city, or ſome other Univerſity of Italy. Upon his return he was made Chaplain to Cardinal Wolſey, and Commiſſary or Judge of his Court, as he was Legate a latere; though he was ſuſpected of great diſhoneſty in the execution of that office (b). He aſſiſted the Cardinal in viſiting at firſt, and afterwards diſſolving forty little Monaſteries, for the erection of his College at Oxford, and that at Ipſwich. He had by the favour of Wolſey the church of Dalby in Leiceſterſhire, though it belonged to the Maſter and Brethren of the Hoſpital of Burton Lazars (c). In the latter end of the year 1525 he was incorporated Doctor of Laws of the Univerſity of Oxford; and on the 13th of March 1528, upon the death of Dr. Hugh Inge, he was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Dublin, and about the ſame time was made Chancellor of Ireland. His death happened in the year 1534 on the 25th of July, according to one writer (d), or, according to another (e), on the 28th of that month; and the circumſtances of it were very tragical [A]. He was (a) Athenæ Oxonienſ. vol. 1. Col. 35. 2d edit. 1721.

(b) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(c) Lord Herbert's Life of King Henry VIII. edit. 1672. pag. 192.

(e) Jac. Waræus in Comment. de Præſul. Hibern. edit. 1665. pag. 119.

(d) Edm. Campian, Hiſt. of Ireland, edit. 1633. p. 120.

[A] The circumſtances of it are tragical.] Mr. Wood tells us (1), that on the 25th of July early in the morning Thomas Fitz-Gerald, eldeſt ſon of the Earl of Kildare, commanded the Archbiſhop to be brought before him at Tartaine, tho' he was then extremely weaken'd by a late ſickneſs. He kneeled down before the Traytor in his ſhirt and mantle, and endeavoured to move his compaſſion; but all in vain; ſo that he reſigned up himſelf to God's mercy, and was immediately ordered by Fitz-Gerald to be brain'd to death like an ox, which was executed upon the ſpot. The place, where this barbarous act was committed, was afterwards hedged in, overgrown, and unfrequented, in deteſtation of the fact. And was then fifty eight years of age. He wrote ſeveral pieces in Latin [B].

(1) Ubi ſupra, Col. 670.

And it was obſerved by the people, that all the acceſſaries to it, tho' they were afterwards pardoned for the rebellion, ended their lives in the utmoſt miſery. However we may remark on the other hand, that his death has been conſider'd by ſome writers, whom Mr. Wood calls preciſe, as a judgment upon him for his conduct in the diſſolution of Daventry Priory in Northamptonſhire among many other Monaſteries, in order to enable Cardinal Wolſey to erect his College in Oxford.

[B] Several pieces in Latin.] Epiſtola de Palliî Significatione activâ & paſſivâ; i. e. "An Epiſtle "concerning the active and paſſive Signification of "the Pall." This he wrote when he received the Pall to be Archbiſhop. De Conſuetudinibus ac Statutis in tuitoriis cauſis obſervandis. He wrote likewiſe ſeveral things concerning the Church.

T.

☞ALLEN, or ALLYN, or ALAN (WILLIAM), a famous Engliſh Cardinal in the ſixteenth Century, and the author of ſeveral works [A], was the ſecond ſon of John Allen by Joanet or Jennet Lyſter his wife, and born at Roſſal in Lancaſhire. In 1547, about the fifteenth year of his age he was entered into Oriel College in Oxford, under Morgan Philips, the chief tutor in that houſe, by whoſe care he made ſo great a progreſs in Logic and Philoſophy, that he was unanimouſly elected Fellow of that College in 1550. Four years after he proceeded in Arts; and in 1556 he became Principal of St. Mary's Hall, and in that and the year following one of the Proctors of the Univerſity. About the year 1558 he was made Canon of York; but when Queen Elizabeth came to the crown, and began to make an alteration in religion, he left his country and preferment about the year 1560, and retired to Louvain in the Low-Countries (a). While he continued there he wrote a book in Engliſh againſt Dr. Jewel, afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury, concerning Purgatory, which was afterwards printed (b). But falling into a dangerous diſeaſe, occaſioned by too careful an attendance upon a pupil of his, who was of a good family in England, he was adviſed by his Phyſicians to return to his native country for his health's ſake. He obſerved their directions, and concealed himſelf in Lancaſhire, till he had recovered his former ſtrength; but endeavouring then to make proſelytes to the church of Rome, and to deter people from frequenting the aſſemblies of Proteſtants, he was obliged by the

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 268, 269. 2d ed. 1721.

(b) Nic. Fitzherbert. in Epit. Vit. Card. Alani. p. 39.

[A] The author of ſeveral works.] A Defence of the Doctrine of Catholics concerning Purgatory and Prayers for the dead. Antwerp, 1565, in 8vo. Brief Reaſons concerning Catholic Faith. A Treatiſe made in defence of the lawful power and authority of Prieſthood, to remit ſins. Louvain, 1567, in 8vo. The People's Duty for confeſſion of their ſins to God's Miniſters. The Church's meaning concerning Indulgences, commonly call'd Pope's Pardons. Theſe two Tracts were printed with the Treatiſe made in defence &c. and were all anſwered by Dr. William Fulke of Cambridge. De Sacramentis in genere; i. e. "Of "the Sacraments in general." De Sacramento Euchariſtiæ; i. e. "Of the Sacrament of the Euchariſt." De Sacrificio Euchariſtiæ; i. e. "Of the Sacrifice of "the Euchariſt," printed at Antwerp, in 4to, 1576. Apology and true Declaration of the Inſtitution and Endeavours of the two Engliſh Colleges, the one in Rome, the other now reſident in Rheimes, againſt certain ſiniſter informations given in againſt the ſame, printed at Mons in Hainault, 1581, in a large 8vo. This book is ſaid by an anonymous writer (1) to be a princely, grave, and flouriſhing piece of natural and exquiſite Engliſh. Apologia pro Sacerdotibus Societatis Jeſu & Seminariorum Alumnis contra Edicta Regia. Mr. Wood propoſes a query, whether this is not the ſame book with the preceding. It was printed in a book intitled, Concertatio Eccleſiæ Catholicæ &c. Aug. Trev. 1583, in 8vo, & 1694, in 4to. Piiſſima admonitio & conſolatio verè Chriſtiana ad afflictos Catholicos Angliæ; i. e. "A pious Admoni- "tion and truly Chriſtian Conſolation to the afflicted "Catholics of England," printed likewiſe in the ſame book. A true, ſincere, and modeſt Defence of the Engliſh Catholics, that ſuffer for their faith both at home and abroad, againſt a ſlanderous Libel, intitled, The Execution of Juſtice in England. It is not expreſſed when and where it was printed; but by the character and ſome paſſages in it, it appears to have been printed abroad about 1583, in 8vo. It was likewiſe publiſhed in Latin at Ingolſtad 1584, in 8vo, and in a book intitled, Concertatio Eccleſiæ Catholicæ in Angliâ &c. 1594, This Defence was anſwered by Dr. Tho. Bilſon in the third part of his book of the Supremacy, or in the book intitled, The true Difference between Chriſtian Subjection and Unchriſtian Rebellion. The Execution of Juſtice, to which Allen's defence was was deſigned as an Anſwer, was ſaid then and ſince to have been written by Sir William Cecil Lord Burleigh. The ſecond edition of it at London 1583, in five ſheets in 8vo, was entitled, The Execution of Juſtice in England for maintenance of public and Chriſtian peace, againſt certain ſtirs of ſedition and adherents to the traytors and enemies of the realm, without any perſecution of them for queſtions of Religion, as is falſely reported, &c. Epiſtola de Daventriæ ditione, Cracov. 1588, in 8vo, printed likewiſe about the ſame time in Engliſh (2). We may obſerve, that in 1587 William Stanley and Rowland York, two Engliſhmen, delivered up a fort near Zutphen, and the ſtrong garriſon of Daventry to the Spaniards. Upon which Dr. Allen, being influenced by the Bull of Pius V againſt Queen Elizabeth, not only commended the treaſon, but excited others in this Epiſtle to the ſame inſtances of perfidiouſneſs, as if they were under no obligation to a Queen, who was excommunicated. At the ſame time he ſent divers Prieſts to Rowland York, to be Chaplains and Confeſſors to his Regiment, which conſiſted of 1300 ſoldiers all Engliſh and Iriſh (3). In 1588 he wrote a book, which he deſigned to publiſh, when the Spaniards ſhould invade England, in order to excite all the Engliſh Papiſts to take up arms againſt the Queen. The firſt part of this book was entitled, A Declaration of the ſentence of Sixtus V, grounded upon that Pope's Cruſado, by which he gave a plenary indulgence and pardon for all ſins to all, who ſhould aſſiſt in depriving Queen Elizabeth of her Kingdom. The ſecond part was entitled, An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England. The Queen hearing of theſe books, ſent Dr. Val. Dale to the Prince of Parma, Governour of the Low-Countries under the King of Spain, to expoſtulate with him concerning theſe books, written by Dr. Allen, wherein, as he obſerved, the author exhorted the Nobility and People of England and Ireland to join with the Spaniſh Forces under that Prince, and invade England; but the Governour pretended that he knew nothing of any ſuch book, and diſmiſſed the Queen's Agent without any ſatisfaction (4). However, immediately after the deſtruction of the Spaniſh Armada, the Roman Catholics procured the whole impreſſion to be burnt, except thoſe copies, which had been ſent abroad before, and were conveyed ſecretly away by the Printer and others.

(1) Hypercritica, or a Rule of Judgment, &c. MS. Addreſs 4. Sect. 2. quoted by Wood, ubi ſupra Col. 271.

(2) See The State of the Engliſh Fugitives, p. 23.

(3) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(4) Camden. Annal. Eliz. ad ann. 1583.

the Magiſtrates to leave that country, and went to a place near Oxford, where he continued his former deſigns, and wrote two books in Engliſh, one Of the Authority of the Prieſthood, and the other Of Indulgences. From thence he removed to Norfolk, where he lived ſometimes in the Duke of Norfolk's houſe, and ſometimes near it, and wrote Certain brief Reaſons concerning the Catholick Faith. He afterwards went to Oxford again, where he perſuaded one of his former friends to leave the Proteſtant communion, which being diſcovered by the parents of the latter, our author was obliged to leave England, after he had continued there about three years. He retired to a Monaſtery at Mechlin in Brabant, where he was made Divinity-Reader, which office he executed with great applauſe. Being deſirous of ſeeing Rome, he reſolved to go thither with Dr. John Vendivile, the King's Profeſſor at Doway, afterwards Biſhop of Tournay; but changing his mind, after he had performed ſome part of that journey, he went to Doway, where an Univerſity had been founded about the year 1562. Here he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he was made Canon of the Church of Cambray. About the year 1568, he procured a Seminary to be raiſed at Doway for the reception of the learned Engliſh Catholicks, who had left their country for the ſake of religion, and a yearly penſion to be aſſigned them. Soon after being made a Canon of Rheims he procured another Seminary to be erected there by the Guiſes, who were kinſmen to Mary Queen of Scots; for the Netherlands being involved in confuſion, the Engliſh, who had been ſettled in the College of Doway, were baniſhed from thence by the command of Don Lewis de Requeſens (c), or, as Janus Nicius Erythræus tells us (d), by an armed Body of Hereticks, ſo that they were obliged to retire to Rheims, where they fixed for ſome time. He likewiſe began a Seminary at Rome, and two others in Spain, for the education of the Engliſh youth in the Roman Catholick Religion. At laſt for his great merit in advancing the intereſts of that church, he was made Cardinal-Prieſt of St. Martin de Montibus by Pope Sixtus V, on the 28th of July 1587, and two years after was made Archbiſhop of Mechlin, the Metropolis of Brabant (e); but he could not reſide upon his Archbiſhoprick, becauſe the Pope would not let him leave Rome, having found him very ſerviceable in the Conſiſtories. He died of a retention of urine at Rome on the 16th of October 1594, aged ſixty three years, as Du Pin tells us (f), or, as Erythræus (g) affirms, in the ſixty ſecond year of his age, and was buried in the church of the Engliſh College in that city. We have different characters of him by the different parties in religion. But it is generally agreed, that he was a man of excellent parts and learning, extremely zealous and devout in religion, of an active vigorous mind; an affable and inſinuating behaviour; and of a graceful perſon, which with an innate gravity, commanded reſpect from all who ſaw him. His death was extremely regretted by the Roman Catholicks; for beſides the ſervices of his pen, he kept the Engliſh Papiſts from breaking out into mutual conteſts, and compoſed the differences between the Secular Prieſts and Jeſuits (h). Nicius Erythræus tells a ſtory of a miraculous eſcape of his in England [B], and accuſes the Engliſh government of deſigns againſt his life [C].

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(d) Pinacoth. 1. p. 92. edit. Lipſ. 1712.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra, and Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 16. p. 158. edit. Amſterd. 1710.

(f) Ibid. and Camden. Eliz. ad ann. 1594.

(g) Ubi ſupra, p. 93.

(h) Collier, Eccleſ. Hiſtory, vol. 2. part 2. book 7. p. 643. edit. London 1714.

ALLEN

[B] Nicius Erythræus tells a ſtory of a miraculous eſcape of his in England.] He informs us, that our author came over to his own country, having changed his dreſs and name, in order to conceal himſelf; where he reconciled a great many perſons to the Church of Rome: but once he was in prodigious danger of being taken; however the perſon who was employed to ſeize him, and who was very well acquainted with him, and had ſupp'd with him that very night, had ſuch a miſt caſt before his eyes by God, that he paſs'd by him, and did not know him, tho' he was preſent. Neque tamen ibi quieti ſomnoque ſe dedit, ſed tanquam miles animoſus & fortis, mutatâ veſte ac nomine, veluti & ex occulto ac de inſidiis, ad ſtationes hoſtium, hoc eſt, in Angliam venit, ibique multa prælia præclara fecit, videlicet multos in Catholicorum caſtra reduxit, ac quodam die minimum abfuit, quin caperetur; ſed illi, cui ejus capiendi partes erant traditæ, qui probè eum noverat, & cum eo etiam nocte illa convivium inierat, glaucoma ob oculos Deus objecit, eoque hominem adduxit, ut quem ante oculos haberet, tanquam ignotum præteriret. The reader will perhaps make ſome abatement in this relation with regard to the miraculous interpoſition of God in his favour, and conſider it merely as an ornament, made uſe of by Erythræus to give a grace to his Elogium of the Cardinal. He tells afterwards, that while he was Preſident of the College at Rheims, one of the Society, whom he had particularly obliged, had reſolved to poiſon him and the whole College at ſupper one night; but being touched with remorſe of conſcience, confeſſed the crime which he had intended.

[C] Accuſes the Engliſh Government of deſigns againſt his life.] He tells us, that Allen was very near being killed by an aſſaſſin, who was ſent for that purpoſe by the Magiſtrates of England, who were extremely offended at his frequent journeys to Rome, and the Seminaries, which he had procured to be founded in ſeveral places; and apprehenſive, ſays he, leſt their new Religion ſhould be deſtroyed. Neque ita multo poſt, nihil proprius factum eſt, quam ut Sicarii cujuſdam ſcelere opprimeretur, miſſi ad eum interficiendum ab Angliæ Magiſtratibus, crebris illius Romam itionibus, & collegiis tot locis excitatis, vehementer exterritis, & novæ Anglicanæ Religioni exitium metuentibus. This is ſo ſhocking an imputation upon the Engliſh Government, that the impartial reader will expect ſome other proof of it, than this writer's ſingle aſſertion, who was exceſſively devoted to the Church of Rome, and writes every where with a peculiar aſperity againſt the Proteſtants. This partiality of his will appear evident from a paſſage immediately following, where he tells us, that "the Engliſh Magiſtrates tortur'd "and exerciſed all kinds of barbarity againſt the Ca- "tholics, when they ſeized them; and among the "reſt they deſtroyed that noble example of inte- "grity, genius, and learning, Edmund Campian, "who was one of the firſt of the Jeſuits, who went "over to England, in order to ſupport as far as he "was able the declining intereſts of the Catholic "Religion; he was at firſt put upon the rack, and "afterwards hang'd and quarter'd. Our age, con- "tinues our author, never ſaw a more enormous "crime than this, which the Sun itſelf might even

ALLEN or ALLEYN (THOMAS) a famous Mathematician, and eminent for his knowledge of all kinds of Literature, was deſcended through ſix generations from Henry Allen or Alan, Lord of the Manor of Buckenhall in Staffordſhire, and born at Utoxeter in the ſaid county Dec. 21, 1542. He was admitted Scholar of Trinity College in Oxford the 4th of June 1561, and elected Fellow in 1565, and two years after took the degree of Maſter of Arts. But being averſe from taking holy orders, and inclined to a retired life, he left the College and his Fellowſhip about the year 1570, and entered himſelf in Gloceſter Hall, where he applied himſelf very intenſely to his ſtudies for many years, and at length became an eminent Antiquary, Philoſopher, and Mathematician. A certain writer (a) tells us, that he was the Prince of all the Mathematicians of his time. His great accompliſhments gained him the eſteem of ſeveral Princes and Noblemen both in England and abroad; and when Albertus L'aſkie Count of Sirade in Poland was in England in 1583, he ſollicited him to go over with him into that country, with aſſurances of procuring for him the greateſt honours and dignities. But his regard for a calm philoſophical life made him reject all thoſe offers of wealth and grandeur. He was likewiſe courted to live in the family of Henry Earl of Northumberland, a great patron of Mathematicians; which invitation he embraced, and was prodigiouſly beloved by that Earl. Here he became acquainted with theſe celebrated Mathematicians, Thomas Harriot, John Dee, Walter Warner, and Nathaniel Torporley, who were frequently at the Earl's Seat. Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and the great Favourite of Queen Elizabeth, had a very great friendſhip for our Author [A], who was alſo highly reſpected by the moſt conſiderable men of that age [B]. His ſkill in the Mathematicks expoſed him, as well as the excellent Friar Bacon, to the cenſure of the vulgar, eſpecially thoſe of Oxford, who repreſented him as a Conjurer and Magician. His efforts for the improvement of Learning were very extenſive and conſiderable [C]. He wrote ſeveral

(a) Gul. Burton. in Orat. Funebri Tho. Alleni, Lond. 1632, 4°, p. 6. and Wood, Athenæ Oxon. vol. 1. col. 574. edit. 2. 1721.

" retire from the ſight of. But when they found, " that the world was ſhock'd at this exceſſive cruel- " ty, they affirmed, that theſe perſons were puniſhed " for Treaſon, and not for Religion, and pretended, " that their crime was for having concerted deſigns " againſt the Queen's life. But Allen defended thoſe " who ſuffered from this imputation in a book, " which he wrote for that purpoſe, and ſhewed the " true reaſon of the cruelty of the heretics." But whoever is converſant in our Hiſtory, and knows the circumſtances of theſe times, and the various attempts againſt Queen Elizabeth's life by the Romiſh Prieſts, will ſee how very falſe and aggravated this account of Erythræus is. Let us hear what Camden ſays (5) of the Cardinal's conduct in this point. He informs us, that " Allen with R. Parſons the " Jeſuit, and others lay continually in wait for the " deſtruction of the Queen and people of England, " and by exciting both foreigners abroad, and natu- " ral ſubjects at home, plotted together to reſtore " the Romiſh Religion to its former ſtate." And in another place he tells us (6), " That after he had " thrown off both his love to his country, and his " obedience to his Queen, he urged the King of " Spain and the Pope to invade England. For which " purpoſe he intereſted himſelf in all the pernici- " ous conſultations upon that ſubject, after Pope " Sixtus V had conferred on him the title of Cardi- " nal, and the King of Spain had given him an " Abbey in the Kingdom of Naples, and nominated " him to the Archbiſhoprick of Mechlin. When " the Bull of excommunication againſt Queen Eli- " zabeth was publiſhed, at the ſame time that the " great Armada was prepared againſt England, he " brought the Bull into the Low-Countries; and " cauſed it to be printed in Engliſh. Beſides he " wrote An Admonition to the Engliſh, to adhere to " the Pope and the King of Spain; but being diſap- " pointed in all his hopes, he returned to Rome, " where being wearied with the diſſenſions and animo- " ſities of the Engliſh Fugitives, both Scholars and " Nobles, he died at laſt in the 63d year of his " age." To this we may add what Biſhop Godwin ſays of him (7), who tells us, that he ſo little deſerved to be eſteemed an Engliſhman, that like another Heroſtratus, he endeavoured to raiſe a confuſion in the Church and State. T.

(5) Annal. R. Elizab. ad ann. 1589.

(6) Ibid. ad ann. 1594.

(7) In Comment. de Præſul. Angl. ad finem, inter Cardinales.

[A] Had a great friendſhip for our author.] He entertained him at his houſe with all the civility imaginable, and offer'd to beſtow a Biſhoprick upon him, if he could have been induced to abandon the charms, which he found in a retired and ſtudious life. But the Earl's familiarity with Allen and the famous John Dee the Mathematician expoſed him to the cenſure of the author of a book entitled, Leiceſter's Commonwealth; who tells us, that they (whom he ſtigmatizes with the name of Atheiſts,) uſed the art of figuring and conjuring for procuring the ſaid Earl's unlawful deſigns; and that by their black art they endeavoured a match between Queen Elizabeth and him. This is undoubtedly an idle and impertinent ſuggeſtion: however it is certain, that Allen was ſo intimate with that Earl, that few matters of State were tranſacted, but he had the knowledge of them, and nothing of moment was done in the Univerſity but our author informed him of it by Letters (1).

(1) Wood, ubi ſupra, Col. 575.

[B] Highly reſpected by the moſt conſiderable men of that age.] Particularly by Sir Tho. Bodley, Sir Henry Savile, Camden, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir Henry Spelman, Selden, &c. the laſt of whom tells us (2), that " he was a man accompliſh'd in all kinds " of Literature, and endowed with an excellent " judgment, and that he was the greateſt ornament " of the famous Univerſity of Oxford." Omni eruditionis genere ſummoque judicio ornatiſſimus, celeberrimæ Academiæ Oxonienſis decus inſigniſſimum. And Camden ſays (3), that he was plurimis & optimis Artibus ornatiſſimus, i. e. " adorn'd with many ex- " cellent Arts and Sciences." To this we may add the character given him in a MS. in Trinity-College Library, which Mr. Wood read, and is as follows: Vir fuit elegantium literarum ſtudioſiſſimus, Academicæ diſciplinæ tenaciſſimus, apud exteros & Academicos ſemper in magno precio, eorumque qui in Eccleſiâ Anglicanâ atque in Univerſitate Oxonienſi pro meritis ſuis ad dignitates aut præfecturas ſubinde provecti fuerunt. Fuit ſagaciſſimus obſervator, familiariſſimus conviva, &c. i. e. " He was a man of great " application to polite Literature, very tenacious of " the diſcipline of the Univerſity, always highly va- " lued by foreigners as well as thoſe of the Univerſity, " and eſteemed by thoſe, who were raiſed by their " merit to the higheſt ſtations in the Church of " England and the Univerſity of Oxford. He was " a ſagacious Obſerver, an agreeable Companion, " &c."

(2) In Notis ad Eadmer. edit. 1623, p. 200.

(3) In Britannia in cap. de Saxonibus.

[C] His efforts for the improvement of learning were very extenſive and conſiderable.] He ſpared no coſt nor labour in collecting of ſcattered MSS. of every Faculty, eſpecially thoſe of Hiſtory, Antiquity, Aſtronomy, Mathematics, Philoſophy, &c. Theſe Collections of his have been quoted in the works of ſeveral learned Authors, and mentioned to have been in Bibliotheca Alleniana (4). It was by his aſſiſtance, advice veral pieces [D]. He died in Glouceſter Hall on the 30th of September 1632, and was buried with great ſolemnity in Trinity College Chapel.

(4) Wood, ubi ſupra.

advice, and communication, that ſeveral members of the Univerſity of Oxford became eminent in Mathematics and Antiquity; particularly Harriot, Twyne, Hegge, the two James's, Burton, and Digby. But his Collections, Obſervations, and Notes in Aſtronomy, Mathematics, and the new Philoſophy, are loſt in obſcure hands; however it is ſuppoſed, that Sir Kenelm Digby made uſe of his obſervations in Philoſophy in his own writings.

[D] He wrote ſeveral pieces.] I. Claudii Ptolomæi Peluſienſis de Aſtrorum judiciis, aut, ut vulgo vocant, quadripartitæ conſtructionis, Liber ſecundus; cum Expoſitione Thomæ Alleyn Angli Oxonienſis. i. e. "The ſecond Book of Claudius Ptolomy of Peluſium "concerning the judgment of the Stars, or, as it "is commonly call'd, of the quadripartite conſtruc-"tion, with the Expoſition of Tho. Alleyn of Ox-"ford." The firſt chapter of it begins thus; Hactenus quidem præcurrimus ea, quorum cognitione, &c. II. Cl. Ptolomæi de Aſtror. Judiciis. Lib. 3. cum Expoſitione Tho. Alleyn, &c. This contains the third book of Ptolomy upon the ſame ſubject, with Allen's Expoſition. Mr. Wood ſaw theſe two MSS. and tells us, that they came into the hands of William Lilly, the famous Aſtrologer, who gave them to Elias Aſhmole Eſq; in 1652. One of theſe copies was tranſcribed from the original, which was given by Allen to Sir Tho. Aylesbury; and the other copy John Huniades the great Chymiſt had in his poſſeſſion, who gave it to Lilly. Our author likewiſe wrote Notes upon many of his books, and particularly upon Bale's book De Scriptoribus Maj. Britanniæ, which, as Mr. Wood informs us, are entered by another hand in the margin of that work in the public Library of Oxford. The chief part of his Library of MSS. came ſoon after his death into the hands of Sir Kenelm Digby, as he had appointed, and the year following were given by him to the Bodleian Library. But ſome of them had been before and about the time of his death procured from him by Rich: James of Corpus Chriſti College for the Cottonian Library; and others came into the hands of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Maſter of the Requeſts.

T.

☞ALLEN (THOMAS) a man of diſtinguiſhed knowledge in the Greek and Latin tongues, was born in the year 1573, and educated in the King's School at Worceſter, from whence he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford in Michaelmas Term 1589, when he was ſixteen years of age. He was at firſt a ſtudent in Brazen Noſe College, and having made a very conſiderable progreſs in Philoſophy, he was elected Probationer Fellow of Merton College in 1593, and by the ſevere diſcipline uſed at that time, he became a famous diſputant. He afterwards entered into holy orders; but he did not apply himſelf ſo much to frequent preaching, as to the more abſtruſe and difficult parts of critical Learning. This gained him the eſteem of Sir Henry Savile, who procured him a Fellowſhip of Eaton College, and found him very ſerviceable for his deſigns. He died the tenth of October 1638, and was buried in the chapel belonging to that College (a). We ſhall mention his works and his epitaph in the note [A].

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. Col. 604. ed. 2. 1721.

[A] We ſhall mention his works and his epitaph.] He wrote Obſervationes in Libellum Chryſoſtomi in Eſaiam; that is, "Obſervations upon St. Chryſoſtom's book upon Iſaiah," printed in Sir Henry Savile's edition of that Father (1). He likewiſe aſſiſted Sir Henry in compiling his Annotations on Chryſoſtom's Homilies on Matthew and the other Evangeliſts, as the latter acknowledges in his Preface to thoſe annotations, in which he ſtiles our author Vir doctiſſimus, Græcarum literarum non minus quàm Theologiæ peritus, &c. i. e. "A very learned Man, "and no leſs skilful in the Greek Learning, than in "Divinity." His Epitaph is as follows: Thomas Allenus Wigornienſis, vir pietate inſignis, Theologus præſtantiſſimus, multarum optimarum linguarum, variæque eruditionis callentiſſimus, in collegium hoc (in quo diu ſocius vixit) in collegia inſuper alia, locaque, in quibus aliquam vitæ ſuæ partem poſuit, piè munificus, hic jacet. Obiit die decimo menſis Octobris, an. 1636. i. e. "Here lies Thomas Allen of "Worceſter, a man of exemplary piety, an excellent "Divine, skilful in many valuable languages and "various kinds of literature; who was very ge-"nerous to this College, in which he lived long "as a Fellow, and to other Colleges and places, in "which he had ſpent any part of his life. He died "the 10th of October, 1636." T.

(1) Vol. 8. pag. 139, &c.

☞ALLESTRY or ALLESTREE (RICHARD) an eminent Engliſh Divine of the ſeventeenth Century, was the ſon of Robert Alleſtry, a Gentleman of an ancient family in Derbyſhire, whoſe fortune being reduced by the profuſeneſs of his predeceſſors, he was retained in the ſervice of Sir Richard Newport, afterwards created Lord Newport, Baron of High Arcol, as Steward to him, and being married, ſettled himſelf at Uppington near the Wreken in Shropſhire (a). Our Author was grandſon of William Alleſtry of Alveſton in Darbyſhire (b), and was born at Uppington in March 1619. He was firſt ſent to a neighbouring country free-ſchool, and afterwards removed to another more celebrated ſchool at Coventry (c), which was taught by Philemon Holland the famous Tranſlator (d), where he continued till he became fit for the Univerſity. In the year 1636, when he was ſeventeen years of age (e), he was carried by his father to Oxford, and placed as a Commoner in Chriſt-Church, under the tuition of Mr. Richard Buſby, afterwards the celebrated Dr. Buſby, and Maſter of Weſtminſter School. Six months after his ſettlement in the Univerſity, Dr. Samuel Fell, Dean of Chriſt-Church, obſerving his parts and induſtry made him Student of the College, where he purſued his ſtudies with uncommon vigour and ſucceſs. As an encouragement of which, as ſoon as he had taken his degree of Batchelor of Arts, he was choſen Moderator in Philoſophy, and had that employment renewed every year till the diſturbances of the Kingdom interrupted the ſtudies and repoſe of the Univerſity (f). Mr. Alleſtry therefore among other Students actually took arms for the King under Sir John Biron [A], and exerted himſelf with great vigour in that cauſe. In 1643 June

(a) See an account of the life of Dr. Alleſtry, prefixed to his Sermons, Oxon. 1684. fol.

(b) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. Col. 676. edit. 2. London 1721.
(c) An Account of the Life, &c.
(d) Wood, ibid.
(e) Not fifteen years, as Mr. Wood tells us, ſince it appears that he was born in 1619.

(f) An Account of the Life, &c.

[A] Took arms for the King under Sir John Biron.] The King having left London in 1641, and iſſuing out his commiſſion of Array in the ſeveral parts of the Nation, directed it likewiſe to the Univerſity of Oxford,

(g) Wood, Faſti Oxon. Col. 33.

June 2d (g), he proceeded Maſter of Arts, and the ſame year was in extreme danger of his life by a peſtilential diſeaſe, which then raged in the garriſon at Oxford. Upon his recovery he applied himſelf again to the ſervice of the war [B]. Soon after this he took holy orders, and became an eminent Tutor and Cenſor of the College, where he met with very ſevere uſage from the oppoſite party [C], and was ejected by the Parliament Viſitors about the middle of July 1648. Upon this he went into Shropſhire, and was ſoon after entertained as Chaplain to Francis Newport Eſq; afterwards Lord Newport of High Arcol, where he continued till Richard Lord Newport the Father died in France, whither he had ſome time before retired to avoid the ſeverity of the the prevailing party. Upon this occaſion Mr. Alleſtry was ſent over to ſettle his affairs there, and having diſpatched this commiſſion with good ſucceſs he returned to Oxford, where it met with an active and ready obedience from the generality of the members of that place, and particularly from Mr. Alleſtry, who engaged in the ſervice, and continued in it till Sir John Biron, afterwards Lord Biron, who was ſent with a party of horſe to ſupport the Scholars in arms there, withdrew from thence. After a ſhort ſtay there he was ſent for to join with Prince Rupert, and by the aſſiſtance of the Gentlemen of Worceſterſhire was received into that city, where he was preſt by the Forces of the Parliament; but the Prince came up ſeaſonably to reinforce them; which occaſioned the ſharp fight in Poyick field near that city, the unexpected ſucceſs of which ſtruck a prodigious terror upon the Parliament, who being Maſters of the money, forts, and magazines of the Kingdom, imagined that they ſhould eaſily carry all without a ſingle battle. Thoſe Students, who could furniſh themſelves for a ſudden march, went along with Sir John Biron from Oxford; but the reſt, among whom was Mr. Alleſtry, ſtaid behind, and return'd to their ſtudies. Soon after this the Lord Say with a party of the Parliament Forces came to Oxford, and plundered the colleges of ſuch plate, as had not been before ſent to the King, and enquired after thoſe, who had been active in promoting the King's ſervice; upon which occaſion, and by a particular accident, which then happened, Mr. Alleſtry was called in queſtion. The occaſion was this; at Chriſt-Church ſome of the Parliament-ſoldiers attempted to break into the treaſury, and after a day's labour forced a paſſage into it; met with nothing, except a ſingle groat and an halter in the bottom of a large iron cheſt. Enraged with that diſappointment, they went to the Deanery, where having plundered what they thought fit, they put it all together in a chamber, lock'd it up, and retired to their quarters, intending the next morning to return and diſpoſe of their booty. But when they came, they found every thing removed. Upon examination it appeared that Mr. Alleſtry had a key of the lodgings, the Dean and his family being withdrawn, and that his key had been made uſe of in this affair; upon which he was ſeized, and notwithſtanding all the defence he could make, had been treated with great ſeverity, if the Earl of Eſſex had not called away the Forces on a ſudden, and ſo reſcued him from their reſentments. Mr. Alleſtry was preſent at the battle of Keinton or Edgehill in Warwickſhire; after which underſtanding that the King deſigned to march immediately to Oxford, and to keep his Court as uſual at the Deanery at Chriſt-Church, which was in part left to his care in the abſence of the Dean, in his journey thither he was taken priſoner by a party from Broughton houſe, which was garriſoned by the Lord Say for the Parliament. He was confined there but a ſhort time; for the Garriſon ſurrendred itſelf to the King's Forces, who ſummoned it in their paſſage. Upon the King's return from the battle at Branford, having made Oxford his headquarters, Mr. Alleſtry ſettled himſelf again to his ſtudies (1).

(1) An Account of the Life of Dr. Alleſtry &c.

[B] Applied himſelf again to the ſervice of the war.] The exigence of the King's affairs made the aſſiſtance of the Scholars of the Univerſity very neceſſary to him; and accordingly a regiment of them was raiſed, who ſerved as Volunteers without any pay or reward, and not only performed all duties in the garriſon, and ſallies for the defence of it in caſe of attacks and ſieges; but were likewiſe commanded upon parties abroad, and endured all the fatigues of marches and mean quarters, and differ'd in nothing from the poor mercenary ſoldiers but in their civility and juſtice to the country people, while they ſtayed with them, and paying them at their departure. In this Regiment Mr. Alleſtry, tho' a Maſter of Arts and Fellow of the College, performed all the duties of a common ſoldier; and in this ſervice he continued till the end of the war, ſtill applying what time was left from military duties to the proſecution of his ſtudies, and even joining them both together, frequently holding his muſket in one hand and a book in the other, and making the watchings of a Soldier the lucubrations of a Student (2). (2) Ibid.

[C] Met with ſevere uſage from the oppoſite party.] He ſhewed himſelf zealous thro' his whole conduct for the King's cauſe; as we are informed by Dr. John Fell Biſhop of Oxford, who wrote his Life, and whoſe words are as follow (3): "He bore a part in (3) Ibid.
"the ſignal teſt of the loyalty of the Univerſity of "Oxford, poſſibly the greateſt that has been given
"by any ſociety of men; I mean the paſſing a ſo-
"lemn decree and judgment of theirs againſt the "covenant and rebellion enflamed and fomented by
"it, performed in convocation, when the city was
"held by a garriſon of the rebels, whoſe ſwords
"were at the throats of thoſe Confeſſors, and yet
"the decree was carried by a moſt unanimous ſuf-
"frage of the whole body, there being but one
"diſſenter in that numerous Senate, and he a per-
"ſon, who had abſented himſelf from the Univer-
"ſity during the war, and taken part with the re"bels." Soon after this the Parliament Viſitors came with a ſecond commiſſion (having loſt their firſt, as we are informed by Dr. Fell, by outſtaying in a long Prayer and Sermon the time aſſigned for the opening of it,) and began their enquiry, and fixed a paper upon the door of St. Mary's church, wherein they ſignified that thoſe, who would not ſubmit to the authority of the Parliament, ſhould leave the precincts of the Univerſity within three days, upon pain of being conſidered as ſpies of war, and accordingly proceeded againſt. The Biſhop of Oxford expreſſes himſelf with great acrimony upon this occaſion. He tells us, that "by this practice often re"peated, the men of greateſt hopes and merit in
"the Univerſity were ſpoiled of all things, and not "ſuffer'd to breathe the common air; ſo that within
"the compaſs of a few weeks an almoſt general rid-
"dance was made of the loyal Univerſity of Ox"ford; in whoſe room ſucceeded an illiterate rab-
"ble, ſwept up from the plough-tail, from ſhops
"and Grammar-ſchools, and the dregs of the neigh"bour Univerſity. Tho' in that ſcandalous number
"ſome few there were (4), who notwithſtanding (4) The Biſhop perhaps means here Dr. Wilkins, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter, Mr. Seth Ward, afterwards Biſhop of Sarum, Mr. Wallis, &c.
"they had parts and learning, were preferred upon
"the account of their relations; who merited a bet"ter title to the places they poſſeſt, and have ſince
"proved uſeful men in the Church and State. Thoſe
"of the ancient ſtock, who were ſpared upon this
"tryal, were afterwards caſt off upon the ſecond
"teſt of the engagement, till in the end there were "left very few legitimate members in any of the "colleges." Mr. Alleſtry was very ſoon involved in this ruin; and tho' he had the care of ſeveral Perſons of Quality, who were his pupils, and accounts of his own and theirs to adjuſt, yet he could not without difficulty prevail with the Governor of the town Lieut. Coll. Kelſey to grant him a little reſpite for ſettling his affairs, and doing juſtice to thoſe, for whom he was concerned. The Viſitors abſolutely refuſed his requeſt for this reaſon, as Dr. Rogers one of their Members expreſſed it, becauſe he was an eminent Man.

to his employment, in which he continued till the defeat of King Charles II at Worceſter, and his eſcape from thence. The managers of the King's affairs wanting an intelligent and faithful perſon to ſend over to the King, deſired Mr. Alleſtry to undertake that journey, which he readily agreed to, and having attended the King at Roan, and received his diſpatches, returned to England (b). Soon after coming to Oxford, where he found his friends Mr. John Dolben, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, and Mr. John Fell, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford, who had likewiſe been baniſhed the Univerſity, living privately, and performing the offices of the Church of England to the loyal party there, he joined with them, and continued there till Sir Anthony Cope of Hanwell near Banbury prevailed with him to live in his family; which he did for ſeveral years, having liberty to go or ſtay, as his occaſions required; by which means he was enabled to ſtep aſide without being taken notice of upon meſſages from the King's friends; which ſervice he managed with great courage and dexterity. But in the winter of the year 1659 he was ſeiz'd at Dover, in his return from the King in Flanders, and committed to priſon [D]. Soon after the Reſtoration, he was made Canon of Chriſt-Church, and created Doctor of Divinity October 3, 1660 (i), and appointed one of the Lecturers of the city of Oxford. He continued this Lecture for ſeveral years, though he never received any part of the ſalary belonging to it, but ordered it to be diſtributed among the poor (k). While he was engaged in this Lecture, he was made one of the King's Chaplains in ordinary, and in 1663 he was appointed Regius Profeſſor of Divinity upon the death of Dr. Creed (l). In 1665 he was made Provoſt of Eton College near Windſor, upon the death of Dr. John Meredith; which valuable employment he was not without ſome difficulty prevailed upon to accept [E]. In 1679 finding his ſight decayed by the fatigue of his place of Regius Profeſſor of Divinity, he reſigned it to his friend Dr. Jane. But diſeaſes are not cured by the removal of the cauſes which firſt occaſioned them; and though by the uſe of mineral waters in the Summer ſeaſon, and the taking of journies in the Autumn, he for ſome time ſupported himſelf, the decay continued and encreaſed upon him, till it was formed into a dropſy; ſo that he was obliged to remove to London to put himſelf under the care of the Phyſicians;

(b) An Account of the Life, &c.

(i) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. Col. 137.

(k) An Account of the Life, &c.

(l) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. Col. 677.

[D] He was ſeized at Dover .... and committed to priſon] As he returned from Flanders with Letters, and landed at Dover, he was ſeized by a party of ſoldiers, who waited for him; a ſpy, who was employed at the King's Court, having given notice of his diſpatch, and deſcribed particularly his perſon and habit. But Mr. Alleſtry had ſo much preſence of mind, as to ſecure his Letters, and commit them to a faithful hand, who took care of them. The ſoldiers according to their orders guarded him to London, where he was examined by a Committee of the Council of Safety, and charged with having a correſpondence with the King, and bringing Letters from him; which they confirmed by ſeveral circumſtances of his journey, and threatned him with the utmoſt ſeverity, if he continued obſtinate, and would not confeſs the truth. But Mr. Alleſtry evading all the queſtions, which they urged to entrap him, and proving inflexible to all the menaces, which they made uſe of to draw him to betray either himſelf or others, he was ſent priſoner to Lambeth houſe, which was then made a goal for the King's friends, where by ill uſage he contracted a ſickneſs, which almoſt proved fatal to him. After he had been confined about ſix or eight weeks, his friends procured his enlargement; "which was the eaſier obtained, for "that ſome of the leaders of the party ſeeing things "move towards his Majeſty's Reſtoration, were wil-"ling by kindneſſes to recommend themſelves in "caſe of a revolution; among whom was the late "Earl of Shaftsbury, who was uſed to value him-"ſelf, that Mr. Alleſtry owed his preſervation to "him (5)." Mr. Alleſtry having obtained his liberty, returned to Oxfordſhire, and went from thence to viſit his relations in Shropſhire. In his return deſigning to pay a viſit to his friend Dr. Hammond at Weſtwood near Worceſter, he met his body at the gate carrying out to his funeral. This great Man at his death gave a ſignal teſtimony of his regard for our author and his eſteem for his parts and learning, by leaving him his Library as a legacy.

(5) An Account of the Life, &c.

[E] With ſome difficulty prevailed upon to accept.] We ſhall give an account of this affair in the words of Dr. Fell, who tells us, that he was induced to accept it particularly by the conſideration, "That a "great intereſt was made by a lay-man, who proba-"bly might ſucceed upon the advantage of his re-"fuſal, notwithſtanding that the Provoſt there be "actually the Parſon of Eton Pariſh, and preſented "to the cure, and inſtituted by the Biſhop of Lin-"coln the Dioceſan, as all other Pariſh Prieſts are; "ſo that as nothing could be more plainly ſacri-"legious and irregular in itſelf, than ſuch an uſur-"pation by a lay-perſon; ſo nothing could be a "greater diſſervice to the Church, than by an un-"ſeaſonable modeſty to make way for it. Upon "theſe motives it was, that Dr. Alleſtry became "Provoſt of Eton; and for the ſame reaſon it was, "that during his life he continued ſo, never hearken-"ing to any offer of preferment, which might "make a vacancy, and repeat the former hazard. "And it may be truly ſaid, that this was the great-"eſt ſecular care, that he carried with him into "another world, it being his dying requeſt unto his "friends to interpoſe with his ſacred Majeſty, that "he might have a ſucceſſor lawfully capable, and "who would promote the welfare of the College." We may obſerve here, that Dr. Zachariah Cradock of Cambridge, who had been inſtalled Canon Reſidentiary of Chicheſter, on the 11th of February 1669, ſucceeded him in the Provoſtſhip, by virtue of the election of the Fellows: ſo that the celebrated Mr. Waller the Poet, who made uſe of all his intereſt to obtain it, was diſappointed (6). When Dr. Alleſtry was preferred to this employment, he found the College of Eton in a very bad ſtate with regard to its revenues and fabric; and what was of no leſs ill conſequence, unſtatutable and unreaſonable grants of Leaſes; to all which, except one, the reduction of which was the work of time, he applied effectual remedies. He found the School in a low condition; but by his prudence in the choice of a learned and diligent Maſter, by his intereſt in bringing young Gentlemen and Perſons of Quality thither, and by his great kindneſs to them when there, and taking care for the building fit accommodations for their reception within the precincts of the college, in a few years the School was raiſed to the higheſt pitch of reputation. He did likewiſe another conſiderable ſervice to this School, and to King's College in Cambridge, whoſe ſeminary it is: that whereas formerly both thoſe Societies were under the diſcouragement, that the Fellowſhips of Eton were generally diſpoſed of to perſons of foreign education; by the vigorous interpoſition of Dr. Alleſtry, joined to the petition of the Provoſt and Fellows of King's College, the King paſſed a grant under the Broad Seal, that for the future five of the ſeven Fellows ſhould be ſuch as had been ſicians; which however proved at laſt ineffectual. He was a man of great virtues and uncommon qualifications. He was eminent for the vigour and improvements of his mind [F], his piety and honeſty, and the ſincerity of his friendſhips [G], the agreeableneſs of his converſation [H], his benevolent and diſintereſted temper [I], his ſkill in been educated in Eton ſchool, and were Fellows of King's College; which will be a perpetual inticement to diligent ſtudy and virtuous endeavours in both thoſe royal foundations. He built likewiſe the weſt-ſide of the outward court of Eton College at his own expence. And finding at his coming thither the Society involved in a conſiderable debt, by an ill cuſtom brought in by thoſe of the late times of confuſion, who at the year's end divided whatever money remained after the ordinary payments were diſcharged, incidental ones and debts contracted being ſtill deferred to the future year; which in time grew ſo very great, as to endanger the College's becoming bankrupt; to prevent this he retrenched his own dues, and prevailed upon the Society to do the like; ſo that within a few years the College paid a debt of above a thouſand pounds, and ſpent two thouſand pounds in repairs (7).

(6) See Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. Col. 678.

(7) An Account of the Life, &c.

[F] For the vigour and improvements of his mind.] In drawing this great man's character we ſhall generally make uſe of the words of his friend the learned Dr. John Fell. His mind, that nobler part of him, was compoſed by an extraordinary indulgence of nature; thoſe faculties, which in others uſe to be ſingle, and are thought neceſſarily to be ſo, as excluding each the other, were united in him. Memory, fancy, judgment, elocution, great modeſty, and no leſs aſſurance, a comprehenſion of things and fluency of words; an aptneſs for the pleaſant, and ſufficiency for the rugged parts of knowledge; a courage to encounter, and an induſtry to maſter all things, formed the character of his happy genius. This felicity of temper was ſeconded by the circumſtances of the times in which he lived, which engaged him ſeverally to exert and cultivate his faculties. Before the civil war he had ſecured the foundations of the whole circle of learning, by his own indefatigable ſtudy, and the indulgent care of his Tutor Dr. Busby, and the particular encouragement of Dr. Fell the Dean, who always conſidered him as a part of his family, and treated him with the ſame regard as his own children. "When the war broke out, "he had the benefit of being, inſtead of one, in ſe- "veral Univerſities; Oxford was then an epitome "of the whole Nation and all the buſineſs of it; "there was here the Court, the Garriſon, the Flower "of the Nobility and Gentry, Lawyers and Di- "vines of all England. And times of action have "ſomewhat peculiar in them to ferment and invi- "gorate the mind, which is enervated by the ſoft- "neſs of peace. The calamitous times which ſuc- "ceeded, as they engaged him to the exerciſe of "popular preaching, a talent which nothing beſides "neceſſity and practice can cultivate; ſo they led "him out into foreign parts, enter'd him into the "managery of buſineſs of greateſt truſt and hazard, "and made him as well read in men, as in books. "After all this it was no ſmall advantage to be re- "turned by the King's happy Reſtoration to the U- "niverſity, and to the opportunities of reading and "converſation with learned men, and in that con- "ſpicuous theatre to have the obligation of a pub- "lic employment to exert all his faculties, and with "utmoſt endeavour to improve and communicate "his knowledge. And we may ſay it without envy, "that few of his time had either a greater com- "paſs, or a deeper inſight into all the parts of learn- "ing, the modern and learned languages, Rhetoric, "Philoſophy, Mathematics, Hiſtory, Antiquity, "Moral and Polemical Divinity; all which was "not to be pumpt up, or ranſackt out of common- "place books, but was ready at hand, digeſted for "his own uſe and communication in diſcourſe to "others (8)."

(8) Ibid.

[G] His piety and honeſty and the ſincerity of his friendſhip.] From his child-hood he had a ſtrong impreſſion of piety and the duties relating to God and man; which may partly be aſcribed to the ſtrict and ſevere education, which he had from his father. By this means, notwithſtanding the licence of war and the fire and temptations of youth, he preſerved his innocence and love of God and virtue, till he made the more immediate ſervice of them his profeſſion. To render himſelf ſecure from intemperance, he frequently abſtained from lawful ſatisfactions, by the ſtated returns of faſting and abſtinence, and continuance in celibacy his whole life. "In his conſti- "tution he had a great deal of warmth and vigor, "which made him apt to take fire upon provocati- "on; but he was well aware of it, and kept a pe- "culiar guard upon that weak part; ſo that his heat "was reſerved for the great concerns of the ho- "nour of God, and the ſervice of his Prince and "Country, wherein he was altogether indefatiga- "ble, and in the moſt diſmal appearances of af- "fairs would never deſert them, nor deſpair of their "reſtauration. There was not in the world a man "of clearer honeſty and courage; no temptation "could bribe him to do a baſe thing, or terror af- "fright him from the doing of a good one (9)." This made his friendſhip as laſting and inviolable as his life, without the mean conſiderations of profit, or ſly reſerves of craft; not the pageantry of ceremonious addreſs, or cold civility; much leſs the ſervile falſeneſs of obſequious flattery. It was a ſolid and maſculine kindneſs, a perfect coalition of affections and minds; ſo that there was nothing he poſſeſs'd, but it was his friend's as abſolutely as it was his own; and it became a general obſervation, that he and they had all things in common. This temper of his directed him to live with great kindneſs with his neighbours and acquaintance, ſo that Eton College, while he lived there, was but one family, his lodging being every fellow's chamber, and they as much at home with him as in their own apartment. And in the Univerſity, tho' his ſtation and parts might expoſe him to envy, he had no competition or difference with any perſon; ſo that no man ever lived with a more univerſal good will of all, who knew him, or died with a more general ſorrow at his loſs.

(9) Ibid.

[H] The agreeableneſs of his converſation.] It was always chearful and entertaining, eſpecially in the reception of his acquaintance at his table and friendly viſits; and in the evening after he had wearied himſelf with the ſtudies of the day, which he generally continued till eight of the clock at night, during the many years he was Profeſſor; ſoon after which he was to be called away to the night-prayers in the College. This ſhort interval he made as eaſy as he could to himſelf and thoſe who were with him: And he had the greateſt reaſon to relax his mind then; for after the employment of the day was over, he uſed to be as faint and exhauſted, as if he had gone thro' the moſt fatiguing labour imaginable; and his intenſion of thought waſted his ſpirits in ſuch a manner, that he was frequently in danger, while he was at ſtudy, of falling into a ſwoon, and obliged to riſe from his ſeat, and walk about his room for ſome time, before he could recover himſelf. Nor had his ſingular abilities and endowments the uſual effect to make him proud and contemptuous; all his diſcourſes were with deference and reſpect, and ſpoken with weight becoming a Profeſſor, but with the ſoftneſs of a Learner. In his converſation he was exceedingly tender of ſaying any thing, that might give offence, or reflect upon any perſon's reputation; and he was very ready in caſe of reſentment to give the perſon offended, whoever it happened to be, the utmoſt ſatisfaction.

[I] His benevolent and diſintereſted temper.] His contempt of the world was very extraordinary, as well in his large and conſtant charities, both by ſettled penſions to indigent perſons and familes and occaſional alms, as by his generous hoſpitality. But we have an higher inſtance of his generoſity in giving away a fixed and conſtant revenue, that he might have juſtly retained, to the value of three hundred pounds a year; the particulars of which are as follows. Upon the King's Reſtoration, he was made, as we obſerved above, Canon of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, and ſoon after Regius in the diſcharge of the office of Profeſſor of Divinity [K], and the excellence of his Sermons [L]. We ſhall mention his works in a note [M.] When he found his health irrecoverable, Regius Profeſſor of Divinity, to which employment a Canonry in that Church, and the Rectory of Ewe Elme in that County and Dioceſe are annex'd; ſo that the profit of two Canonries and the Rectory belonged to him, and conſidering the weight of that Profeſſorſhip, no perſon, who made a juſt eſtimate of things, would have envied it him; but he regretted it to himſelf, and for ſeveral years gave the whole profit of one of his Canonries to the repairs of the College; and afterwards being ſollicited by the Biſhop of Wincheſter in favour of an old Student of the College, who was deſtitute of a ſuitable ſupport, he entirely quitted the advantage of the abovementioned Canonry to him. And with regard to the benefice, he never received the leaſt benefit from it, but left it to a friend, whoſe circumſtances required ſuch an acceſſion (10). "But the uncontroulable proof of "contempt of the world, is the dying poor, and not "to have collected any thing againſt the hazards of "fortune, and commonly pretended exigences of "old age and ſickneſs; which was in a remarkable "manner Dr. Alleſtry's caſe, he having never during "his life purchaſed an inch of ground, nor any an-"nuity or leaſe to the value of a penny; nor did "he take care to renew the patrimonial eſtate, which "he held by a leaſe for life, tho' it were the place "of his birth, which generally gives an endearment, "and a deſire to continue the poſſeſſion. Thereby, "as the author to the Hebrews expreſſes it, ſojourn-"ing in the earth as in a ſtrange country, and "ſhewing plainly that he look'd for a better one, and "a city, which has foundations, whoſe Builder and "Maker is God." His greateſt treaſure was his Library, which was indeed a conſiderable one, both for the number and choice of the books; but theſe he diſpoſed of by deed before his death to the Univerſity of Oxford for the uſe of his ſucceſſors in the chair. So that his executors had only his perſonal eſtate to ſhare among them, which he took to be ſo inconſiderable, that he thought it not worth the formality of a will; but deſigning, after the diſtributing ſome little remembrances among his friends, to leave the remainder to his relations, he conceived that the Law by an adminiſtration would of courſe divide it among them. But being told by his friend, to whom he communicated this purpoſe of his, that in this malicious world the dying inteſtate would be a thing of ill fame, and interpreted the product of an unwillingneſs to think of death, or part with what he had; and that what he ſo left would come leſs obligingly to his relations, and probably would occaſion contention among them, he took advice, and by will diſpoſed of ſuch legacies as he thought fit to leave to the poor and to his friends, and gave the remainder among his ſiſters and their children (11). But tho' he had ſo little regard to the purſuits of intereſt, he was neither negligent in ſecular affairs, nor unskilful in the management of them; which apeared very evidently from his dextrous diſcharge of private truſts committed to him in behalf of his dead friends, and the adminiſtration of his public employments. "He was for ſeveral years Treaſurer "of Chriſt-Church, in a buſy time of their repair-"ing of the ruins made by the intruding uſurpers; "and amidſt the neceſſary avocations of ſtudy, found "leiſure for a full diſcharge of that troubleſome em-"ployment."

(10) Ibid.

(11) Ibid.

[K] His skill in the diſcharge of the office of Profeſſor of Divinity.] "In the managery of the buſi-"neſs of the chair of Divinity, as he performed "the ſcholaſtic part with great ſufficiency in exact "and dextrous untying the knots of argument, and "ſolid determination of controverted points, ſo that "he was not oppreſſed by the fame of any of his "moſt eminent Predeceſſors; his prudence was very "remarkable in the choice of ſubjects to be treated "on; for he waſted not time and opportunity in "the barren inſignificant parts of School-Divinity, "but inſiſted upon the fundamental grounds of con-"troverſy, between the Church of England and the "moſt formidable enemies thereof." With an equal ſteadineſs he aſſerted the Goſpel truth againſt the uſurpations of Rome, the innovations of Geneva, the blaſphemies of Cracow, and the monſters of our own Malmesbury, never intermeddling with the unfathomable abyſs of God's decrees, the indeterminable five points; which in all times and in all countries, wherever they have happened to be debated, paſt from the Schools to the State, and ſhock'd the Government and publit peace. By his judicious care herein, tho' he found the Univerſity in a ferment, and a great part of its growing hopes ſufficiently ſeaſoned with ill prepoſſeſſions, he ſo brought it to paſs, that during the whole tract of ſeventeen years that he held the chair, there was no factious bandying of opinions, nor petulant ſidings on the account of them; which thing diſturbed the peace of the laſt age, and helped forward to inflame thoſe animoſities, which ended in the execrable miſchiefs of the civil war (12). The learned world was at firſt very impatient to ſee an edition of his Lectures; but the reaſon of their diſappointment was as follows: Dr. Alleſtry a little before his death having communicated to the Biſhop of Oxford ſeveral particulars concerning his intentions for the diſpoſal of his goods and papers, the Biſhop obſerved that there was no mention made of his Lectures, and knowing how his modeſty had during his life reſiſted all the importunities for the publiſhing them, ſuſpected that the ſame motive might be more prevalent at his death. He wrote therefore to him upon that ſubject, deſiring him, that his Lectures might be preſerved, which had coſt him ſo much ſtudy and labour, and would be uſeful proportionably to others. His anſwer dated Jan. 19th, 1680 was, that having not had opportunity to reviſe what he had written, which was not every where conſiſtent with his preſent imaginations, tho' in nothing material, yet in ſome particulars, which he ſhould have better examined, eſpecially divers of the Act-Lectures, which being upon the ſame head, the thread of them was not right nor didactical, and NECTARIUS's Penitentiary not expounded the ſame way in one place as in another, and the firſt blundering and not true; therefore he adds, that if the Biſhop had not writ, and for that he himſelf would not go out of the world without ſatisfying him in every thing, he had reſolved to have ſent for his papers, and burnt them; but now he gave them up all to the Biſhop upon this inviolable truſt, that nothing of them ſhould be publiſhed as a ſcheme of his, but to be made uſe of to ſerve any other deſign the Biſhop ſhould think fit (13).

(12) Ibid.

(13) Ibid.

[L] The excellence of his ſermons.] The writer above quoted tells us, that "the variety of auditors "for whom they were firſt deſigned, makes them "not to be all of the ſame fineſs of ſpinning and "cloſeneſs of texture; but in them all there will "appear the ſame ſpirit of perſuaſive Rhetoric and "ardent piety, whereby tho' dead he yet ſpeak-"eth (14)."

(14) Ibid.

[M] We ſhall mention his works in a note.] The Privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford in point of Viſitation, in a Letter to an honourable Perſonage; printed in one ſheet and an half in 4to, 1647. Upon this occaſion Will. Prynne publiſhed his Univerſity of Oxford's Plea refuted, &c. in anſwer to which R. Waryng wrote An Account of Mr. Prynne's Refutation &c. and Edward Bagſhaw Sen. his Short Cenſure of the Book of Will. Prynne, entitled, The Univerſity of Oxford's Plea refuted. It was imagined by ſome that Mr. John Fell, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford, was the Author of the Pamphlet abovementioned concerning the Privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford &c. (15). Dr. Alleſtry publiſhed likewiſe Eighteen Sermons, whereof fifteen were preached before the King, the reſt upon publick occaſions, London 1669, fol. moſt of which had been before publiſhed ſingly (16). Of the Authority and Uſefulneſs of the Scripture; a Sermon on 2 Tim. iii. 15. Oxon. 1673, 4to (17). Forty Sermons, whereof twenty one are now firſt publiſhed, the greateſt part preached before the King, and on ſolemn occaſions, Oxon. 1684, fol. Theſe were publiſhed by Dr. John Fell Biſhop of Oxford, and had the nineteen Sermons before mentioned added to them, with the account of his life abovementioned prefixed to them, and his picture before them (18).

(15) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Id. ibid.

irrecoverable, he desired to receive the Sacrament, and that those of his friends, who happened to be in town, would communicate with him, particularly the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London, Lincoln, Exeter, and St. Asaph, Dr. Busby, and Mr. Fell, one of the Fellows of Eton College, who continued with him the whole time of his sickness: He afterwards took his last leave of them with great equanimity and constancy of mind, and waited for the hour of his release. He died the 28th of January 1680, in the sixty first year of his age, and was buried the first of February in the Choir of Eaton College Chapel, where his executors erected to his memory a monument of white marble with an inscription [N]. Of the same family with Dr. Allestry was another of both his names of Derby, Author of several Almanacks before the civil wars began. Mr. Wood tells us (m), that he saw one of them for the year 1629 and 1633, but he was not certain whether he was educated in the University of Oxford or not. Of the same family likewise, and nearly related to our Author was Jacob Allestry, son of James Allestry Bookseller of London, who lost a very considerable fortune by the fire of London in 1666. He was educated in Westminster School, and entered into Christ Church in Act Term 1671, when he was eighteen years of age, and the year following was elected Student of that College. He afterwards took the degrees of Arts, was Musick Reader in 1679, and Terræ Filius in 1682; both which offices he performed with great applause, being esteemed a good Philologist and Poet. But having resigned up himself to a vicious and extravagant course of life, his body was so weakened and exhausted, that he was obliged to retire to an obscure house in Fish-row in St. Thomas's parish in Oxford, where he lay concealed for seven weeks, till he died in a very wretched manner the 15th of October 1686 (n). He wrote several Poems [O].

(m) Ubi supra, Col. 678.

(n) Id. ibid. Col. 799, 800.

[N] With an inscription.] It is as follows: H. S. I. Ricardus Allestree Cathedræ Theologicæ in Universitate Oxonienſi Professor Regius; Ecclesiæ Christi ibidem Præbendarius; & Collegii hujus Etonenſis præpositus. Muniis istis singulis ita par, ut & omnibus major. In disputationibus irrefragabilis, concionibus flexanimus, negotiis solers, vitâ integer, pietate sanctus. Episcopales infulas eadem industriâ evitavit quâ alii ambiunt; cui rectius visum, Ecclesiam defendere, instruere, ornare, quam regere. Laboribus studiisque perpetuis exhaustus, morte, si quis alius, præmaturus obiit vir desideratissimus Jan. 28. an. M.DCLXXX, ætatis LXI. Nobile sibi monumentum areæ adjacentis latus occidentale quod a fundamentis propriis impensis struxit, vivus sibi statuit. Brevem hanc tabellam hæredes defuncto posuere. i. e. "Here lies Dr. Richard "Allestree, Regius Professor of Divinity in the Uni- "versity of Oxford, Canon of Christ-Church in that "city, and Provost of this College of Eton. He "discharged each of these offices in such a manner, "as shewed him Superior to the execution of them "altogether. He was invincible in disputation, mov- "ing and pathetical in his Sermons, skilful in the "management of affairs, of great integrity in his "life, and of exemplary piety and devotion. He "avoided the episcopal character with the same in- "dustry as others pursue it; and he thought it a "much nobler task for him to defend, instruct, and "adorn the church, than to govern it. Having ex- "hausted himself with continual labour and study, "this valuable person submitted to death too early "for the advantage of mankind, the 28th of January "1680, in the sixty first year of his age. While he "was living he raised himself a noble monument by "building the west side of the adjacent court at his "own charge. And his executors have erected this "little monumental table to his memory." Mr. Wood (19) tells us, that the building mentioned in this epitaph was a new grammar school, which cost the Doctor about fifteen hundred pounds.

(19) Ibid.

[O] He wrote several Poems.] One of these intitled, What art thou, Love! was printed in the Examen Poeticum, or The third part of Miscellany Poems, &c. London 1693, 8vo, p. 178. He had likewise the chief hand in composing the Verses and Pastorals, which were spoken in the Theatre at Oxford the 21st of May 1681, by Will. Savile, second son of George Earl (afterwards Marquis) of Halifax, and George Cholmondley second son of Robert Viscount Kellis, (both of Christ-Church) before James Duke of York, his Dutchess and the Lady Anne. These Verses and Pastorals were afterwards printed in the Examen Poeticum abovementioned, p. 181 &c. (20).

(20) Ibid. Col. 800.

T.

☞ALLEY (WILLIAM), Bishop of Exeter in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was born at Great Wycomb in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Eton School. From thence he was removed to King's College in Cambridge in the year 1528, where he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts, and then retired to Oxford, in order to make a farther progress in his studies. He married afterwards and obtained a benefice in the church, and embraced the reformation with the utmost zeal. But when Queen Mary came to the crown, and began to reduce religion to its former state by all the methods of severity imaginable, he left his living, and travelled from one place to another in the North-parts of England, where he was not known; and by sometimes practising Physick and teaching of youth, he obtained a tolerable support for himself and his wife. After Queen Elizabeth's succession to the throne, he read the Divinity Lecture in St. Paul's Cathedral in London, which he performed with such applause and success, that he soon after was raised to the Bishoprick of Exeter, to which See he was consecrated 14 July 1560. In November 1561 he was admitted Batchelor and Doctor of Divinity of the University of Oxford. He died the 15th of April 1570, and left a son named Robert Alley, Archdeacon of Cornwall (a). We shall mention his works and his character in the note [A].

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 162, 163. 2d edit. 1721.

ALMAIN

[A] We shall mention his works and his character in the note.] He wrote, I. The poor Man's Library, a Rhapsody or Miscellany in two Tomes. The first containeth seven Lectures upon the first Epistle of St. Peter, read publickly in St. Paul's Cathedral in London, an. 1560. The second containeth five Lectures upon the said first Epistle read in the same place. London 1571, fol. II. An Hebrew Grammar: but Mr. Wood tells us, that he does not know whether it was ever printed. He translated likewise the Pentateuch, ALMAIN (JAMES), Profeſſor of Divinity in the College of Navarre at Paris, flouriſhed at the beginning of the ſixteenth Century. He was born at Sens, and looked upon as one of the ſubtleſt Logicians and beſt Schoolmen of his age. His attachment to the principles of Scotus, Occam, and Gabriel Biel, gives us a true character of his genius. He taught Logic and Phyſicks before he was admitted into the College of Navarre, which happened in 1508, and publiſhed ſome treatiſes on theſe two parts of Philoſophy in 1505 and 1508. He took his degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1511, and the enſuing year explained the third book of Sentences in the College of Navarre. He was appointed, about the ſame time, to write againſt Pope Julius II in favour of Lewis XII, and to maintain the authority of Councils againſt a book which had been publiſhed by Cardinal Cajetanus, and ſent to Paris by the Council of Piſa to be refuted there by the faculty of Divinity. The faculty charged Almain with that taſk, who fully anſwered their expectation. He died in 1515, being very young, and all his works were publiſhed at Paris two years after [A]. Thoſe who affirm he was a Monk are miſtaken [B].

teuch, when the tranſlation of the whole Bible was undertaken by Queen Elizabeth's command. He was a man of univerſal learning, eſpecially in Divinity and the Languages, and of infinite application, ſo that he preached almoſt every Holy-day, and read a Lecture every day, while he lived at Exeter. His Epitaph upon the monument over his grave tells us, that he was acerrimus Evangelicæ veritatis propugnator, morum probitate præcelebris, bonarum diſciplinarum mirabili ſcientia clarus, i. e. "A zealous defender of "the Goſpel Truth, eminent for the integrity of "his manners, and his uncommon skill in all valuable "kinds of learning. T.

[A] All his works were publiſhed at Paris.] This edition is owing to Oliver Lugduneus, who prefixed a Preface to it, in which he expatiates on the praiſes of his author. The moſt celebrated works of Almain are four moral Treatiſes. Expoſitio circa deciſiones quæſtionum Magiſtri Guillelmi Occam. De Poteſtate ſummi Pontificis. De Auctoritate Eccleſiæ & Conciliorum. Dictata ſuper ſententias Magiſtri Roberti Holcot (1).

(1) Launoius, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navar. p. 611.

[B] Thoſe who affirm he was a Monk are miſtaken] Father Labbe (2) cenſures Geſner, and his epitomizer Simler, for having falſely aſſerted, that Almain was a Monk; which accuſation Moreri has taken care to copy from Father Labbe. Mr. de Launoi arraigns Geſner on the ſame head, but ſomewhat better circumſtanced: for he finds fault with him for having advanced in his Bibliotheca, that Almain was a Franciſcan Friar, and adds, that Poſſevinus in his Apparatus only ſays, that he was a Monk (3). Father Labbe uſes no ſuch diſtinction: he ſays, that Almain, according to Geſner, was a Monk, but according to others, a Franciſcan Frier. I can hardly believe that Geſner was guilty of what is laid to his charge, not finding he makes any where mention of Almain throughout his whole Bibliotheca. It is true he mentions one Almannus a Benedictine; but tells us, that he flouriſhed in 890. As to Simler, he ſays indeed, that James Almain, a Monk, publiſhed a book againſt Cardinal Cajetanus. Moreri was not well acquainted with the age of this author: He was ſtill alive, ſays he, and flouriſhed at the beginning of the ſixteenth Century. He ought to have ſaid, that he only began to flouriſh at that time.

(2) De Script. Eccl. tom. 1. p. 488.

(3) Launoii Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navar. p. 614.

ALPAIDE concubine to Pepin, and mother of Charles Martel. Some Authors affirm, but without foundation, that Pepin married her after having divorced Plectrude [A]. It is generally believed that Lambert Biſhop of Liege was not ſo mean-ſpirited as to approve of Pepin's amours; and that Alpaide, provoked at the liberty with which he uſed to cenſure them, prevailed with Pepin ſo far as to make him conſent to the plot ſhe had laid againſt the life of that Prelate [B]. Some add, that Dodon, brother to Alpaide, executed that wicked deſign; and that after the murder he was ſeized with a diſeaſe which bred ſuch ſwarms of worms in his body, that he was obliged to ſeek for relief by throwing himſelf into the Maeſe (a). Lambert has been canonized, and is ſaid to have been the only Prelate who was not afraid to ſpeak the truth

(a) Mézerai, Abregé Chron. tom. 1. p. 171. at the year 707. Cordemoi Hiſt. of France, tom. 1. p. 381.

[A] Some authors affirm, but without foundation, that Pepin married her after having divorced Plectrude.] Mr. de Cordemoi obſerves (1), that they have no other authorities beſides the ſecond Continuator of Fredegaire, who writes that Pepin married Alpaide. "But beſides that this author, (who wrote, "as it is well known, in compliance with the or-"ders of Charles Martel's brother and nephew,) took "care never to mention the amours of Pepin and "Alpaide but as a lawful marriage; he no where "tells us that Plectrude was divorced. Nay there "are ſeveral public Acts ſtill extant, which plainly "prove that Plectrude never lived ſeparate from "Pepin; ſo that Alpaide could not be looked upon, "neither according to the Eccleſiaſtical nor the Civil "Laws, as his lawful wife: and if he married her, "he had two wives at a time."

(1) Cordemoi, Hiſt. of France, vol. 1. p. 381.

[B] Alpaide provoked at the liberty, which Lambert took in cenſuring them, prevailed with Pepin to conſent to the plot ſhe had laid againſt the life of that Prelate.] It is not at all amazing that the ſecond Continuator of Fredegaire ſhould take no manner of notice of the Prelate's behaviour, and the fatal conſequences it is ſuppoſed to have been attended with; for he could not touch upon that ſubject, without incurring the diſpleaſure of Charles Martel's relations, who employed him: ſo that his ſilence is of no force. But neither is it mentioned by the author of the Geſtes (2). A contemporary writer only tells us, that a Nobleman, named Dodon, killed St. Lambert to revenge the death of two of his relations, who had been killed by the holy Biſhop's domeſtics without his privity (3). If we were informed what Party that author followed, whether he was for Charles Martel or Plectrude, whether he entertained any hopes or fears, we ſhould not be at a loſs what to infer from his ſilence. Mr. de Cordemoi adds, that from the records of thoſe times it does not appear, either that Dodon was brother to Alpaide; or that ſhe prompted him to kill Saint Lambert; that truly the Martyrologies of thoſe times inſinuate, that the Biſhop was put to death in purſuance of an order from the Court; and that, as Pepin was the Head of it, thoſe who wrote afterwards, thought themſelves in a manner obliged to explain the obſcure and dubious words of the Martyrologies to the diſadvantage of that Prince and of Alpaide (4). In my opinion the ſureſt way is to count this among the dubious events. Thoſe who tell us, that Lambert Biſhop of Liege was the only one that had reſolution enough to reprimand Pepin, and ſpeak in high terms of his bigamy, as of a public adultery, without minding either the promiſes or threats of Dodon (5), Alpaide's brother, wrote a long time after (6), which renders their teſtimony leſs certain. On the other hand, Alpaide's ſon was ſo formidable, that nothing can be argued from the ſilence of the contemporary writers.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Godeſcale in vita S. Lamberti, c. 7. quoted by Cordemoi, ibid.

(4) Cordemoi, Hiſt. of France, vol. 1. p. 382.

(5) Anſelm. Laodicenſ. Canonicus, Sigibertus Monachus Gemblacenſis, Nicolaus Laodic. Canonic. Vener. & alii, quoted by Cordemoi p. 381.

(6) Cordemoi, p. 383.

truth to Pepin [C], and he met with the ſame fate with St. John the Baptiſt. His morals were ſo ſtrict that he could not be prevailed upon, at table, to bleſs Alpaide's glaſs [D]. This woman retired at laſt into a Monaſtery (b), where ſhe died. A monaſtery is commonly to women of that character, what Leghorn was formerly to Bankrupts.

(b) Moreri writes that this monaſtery was founded by Alpaide at Orplegrand in Brabant.

[C] Lambert was the only Prelate, who was not afraid to ſpeak the truth to Pepin.] The writer of an Hiſtorical Dictionary would have a thouſand occaſions to obſerve, that there are no greater flatterers of men in power than the Eccleſiaſtics. Their ſermons, prayers, ſpeeches, and dedications, are ſtuffed with ſuch fulſom panegyrics, that I cannot better deſcribe the condition they put an honeſt hearer or reader in, than by the proverb, Date mihi pelvim. It is true Pepin was not King: but he had in his hands the keys of the mouths and pens; that is, puniſhments and rewards: he only wanted the title of Sovereign; in other reſpects he was truly King, and performed all the functions of that dignity. Flatterers do not mind an empty title; but adore, with more ſubmiſſion, one that is veſted with power without the title, than one that has the title without power.

[D] Lambert refuſed at table to bleſs Alpaide's glaſs.] It is related by a modern Hiſtorian thus: Ad epulas invitatur (B. Landebertus) à Printipe. Pippinus cæterique illuſtres viri qui aderant, ſcyphum quiſque ſuum ab antiſtite benedici, aut, ut alii dicunt, de manu ejus poculum accipere, pia ambitione cupiebant. Cum Alpais (nam & ipſa pleno convivio intererat) ſcyphum ſuum à Landeberto ſignari optaret, indignabundus Epiſcopus palatio exceſſit, convivarum hilaritate confuſa (7). i. e. "St. Lambert was invited to "the banquet by the Prince. Pepin and the reſt of the "illuſtrious perſons who were preſent, had a pious am- "bition to have each of the glaſſes bleſſed by the Pre- "late, or, as others ſay, to take the cup out of his hand. "When Alpaide, for ſhe alſo was one of the compa- "ny, deſired Lambert to bleſs her glaſs, the Biſhop "refuſed and went out of the palace, confounding "the chearfulneſs of the gueſts." Compare this with the ſtories related in the new Letters againſt Mr. Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (8).

(7) Hadrian. Valeſii rerum Francicarum l. 33.

(8) P. 614, &c.

☞ALPINI (PROSPERO), a famous Phyſician and Botaniſt of the ſixteenth Century, was born at Maroſtica, a little town in the State of Venice, the 23d of November 1553. He was the ſon of Franceſco Alpini, an eminent Phyſician of that time. He was very early inclined to the profeſſion of arms, after the example of his brother Paul who ſerved in the Milaneſe. However he was at laſt diverted from this reſolution, and determined by the advice of his friends, and his father's example to apply himſelf to learning. Having finiſhed his claſſical ſtudies, he went to Padua in the year 1574, where he was choſe ſome time after Deputy to the Rector, and Syndic of the Students, and diſcharged theſe two offices with ſo much prudence and addreſs, that he gained not only their favour, but likewiſe that of the Profeſſors. The employments in which he was engaged, did not however prevent him from purſuing his own ſtudies of Philoſophy and Phyſick with ſuch ſucceſs, that he was made Doctor of both theſe Faculties the 28th of Auguſt 1578 (a). He did not continue long without buſineſs, for he was ſoon after ſent for to Campo San-Pietro, a little town in the territories of Padua, to practiſe Phyſick there. But this ſituation was too narrow for his extenſive views. He was deſirous of gaining a perfect knowledge of exotic plants, and eſpecially of balm; and this induced him to take a voyage to Egypt [A], where he had the opportunity of confirming the antient doctrine of the Generation of Plants [B]. In the year 1586, ſoon after his return to Venice, he was made Phyſician to Andrea Doria, Prince of Melfi, and General of the Spaniſh army; which employment he diſcharged

(a) Memoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtr. tom. 11. p. 176, 177, edit. de Paris 1730.

[A] This induced him to take a voyage into Egypt.] He thought the beſt way to ſucceed in his enquiries about theſe foreign plants, was after Galen's example to viſit the countries, where they grow. He ſoon met with an opportunity of gratifying his curioſity in this point; for George Emo or Hemi being appointed Conſul for the Republic of Venice in Egypt, in the room of Franceſco Priuli, he choſe our author for his Phyſician. They left Venice the 12th of September 1580, and after a long and dangerous voyage arrived at Grand Cairo in the beginning of July the year following. Alpini continued three years in that country, where he omitted no opportunity of obtaining all the intelligence he could procure. He travelled along the banks of the river Nile, and went as far as Alexandria and other parts of Egypt, conſulting every perſon, who could beſt give an account of what he was deſirous to know. But he had very often the misfortune to meet with thoſe, who were incapable of affording him any lights upon the ſubjects, which he wanted; and he complains of this frequently in his writings, moſt of which were written, or at leaſt the deſign of them formed in Egypt (1).

(1) Ib. p. 178.

[B] Of confirming the ancient doctrine of the Generation of Plants.] This doctrine is obſcurely hinted at by Ariſtotle (2); but plainly delivered by Theophraſtus, who ſays, that "the male palm-trees are of "uſe to the females, for they cauſe the fruit to grow "firm and ripe. Some call the method of managing "them Caprification, becauſe of ſome ſimilitude in "the effect; it is done after the following manner. "Whilſt the male palm is in flower, they cut off "the ſheath, out of which the flower comes, ſo as "to take with it the down, and flower and duſt, "and then ſhake it over the fruit of the female. "The conſequence of this is, that the fruits do not "drop off till they come to maturity. Thus the "male ſeems to be of uſe to the female both the "fig and the palm, for that which bears the fruit "is called the female. But in this it is by a ſort of "coition, in the other it is by another way." Τοῖς δὲ φοίνιξιν οἱ ἀπὸ τῶν πρὸς τὰς θήλεις· ἔτοι γὰρ εἶσιν οἱ ἐπιμένειν ποιοῦσις καὶ ἐκπίπτειν. ὃ καλοῦσί τινες ἐκ τῆς ὁμοιότητος ὀλυνθάζειν· γίνεται δ' τόνδε τὸν τρόπον· ὅταν ἀνθῇ τὸ ἄῤῥεν, ἀποτιμῶντες τὴν σπάθην ἀφ' ἧς τὸ ἄνθος ἐυθὺς ὥσπερ ἔχει· τότε χνοῦν ἔ τὸ ἄνθος κ' τὸν κονιορτὸν κατασείσσι κατὰ ᾧ καρποῦ τῆς θηλείας. κἂν τοῦτο πάθῃ, διατηρεῖ ἔ ἐκ ἀπομάλλει· φαίνεται δ' ἀμφοῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἄῤῥένος τοῖς θήλεσι βοήθειαν γίνεσθαι· θῆλυ γὰρ καλοῦσι τὸ καρποφόρον· ἀλλ' ἡ μὲν οἷον μίξις· ἡ δ' κατ' ἄλλον τρόπον (3). Pliny follows Theophraſtus, and almoſt tranſlates his very words (4).

(3) Theophraſt. de Hiſt. Plant. l. 2. ad finem.

(4) Plin. Hiſt. Mundi, lib. 13. cap. 4.

This account of the palm-trees was generally reputed fabulous, till Proſpero Alpini had the opportunity of being an eye-witneſs of the truth of it. He aſſures us, that "the female date-trees or palms "do not conceive or bear fruit, unleſs ſomebody "takes care to mix the branches of both ſexes to- "gether, and ſuffer them as it were to kiſs: or as "the general way is, inſtead of mixing the branches, "to take the duſt found in the male ſheath, or the "male flowers themſelves, and ſprinkle them over "the females." Neque fœminæ concipiunt, ac fructificant, charged with ſuch ſucceſs, that he raiſed to himſelf the character of the firſt Phyſician of that age. This drew upon him the regard of the Republick of Venice, who began to be uneaſy, that ſo eminent a ſubject of theirs ſhould continue at Genoa, when he might be of ſo much ſervice and reputation to their own ſtate. He was recalled therefore in 1593 to fill the Profeſſorſhip of Botany at Padua, which had been vacant for ſeveral years; and he had likewiſe the office of demonſtrating the plants given him, with a ſtipend of two hundred florins, which was afterwards raiſed by degrees to ſeven hundred and fifty. He diſcharged both theſe places in a manner which was greatly to his honour, though his health was very precarious, and had been extremely broken by the voyages which he had made. He was prodigiouſly afflicted with the gout, which ſometimes deprived him of the uſe of his limbs. He was afterwards ſeized with ſuch a deafneſs, as that he was not able to hear at all. This occaſioned him to begin a Treatiſe upon that diſeaſe, in which he endeavoured to ſhew, that no perſon had ever underſtood the nature of it; but death prevented him from finiſhing it (b). He wrote ſeveral works in Phyſick and Botany [C]. Tomaſini in his Elogia tells us (c), that he died of a ſlow fever in November 1616, on his birth-day. But in his book intitled, Gymnaſium Patavinum, which he publiſhed ten years after his former book, he ſeems to retract what he had advanced concerning the day on which Alpini died, and acquaints us that it was the fifth of February 1617. This latter is certainly the true date, becauſe it appears to have been taken from the regiſters of the Univerſity, which Tomaſini tificant, ni in ramis maris fœminæ ramos aliquis permiſcuerit, ac ſe quaſi oſculari permiſerit. Plerique fœminas ut fœcundent, non ramos, ſed pulverem intra maris involucrum inventum ſupra fœminarum ramos atque cor ſpargunt, vel alii flores maris pulveris loco ſpargere ſolent (5). This doctrine of the ſexes of plants does not ſeem to have been underſtood by any of Alpinus's contemporaries, except the famous Cæſalpinus (6). It was quite laid aſide till Dr. Grew, towards the latter end of the laſt Century, propoſed ſome conjectures relating to it. But within theſe few years it has been ſo much ſupported by a great variety of experiments, that few Botaniſts queſtion the truth of it.

(b) Ibid. p. 178, 179, 180.

(c) Elog. Illuſtr. Viror. tom. p. 301.

(5) Proſp. Alp. de Plantis Ægypti, p. 10.

(6) See his Article.

[C] He wrote ſeveral works in Phyſic and Botany.] I. De Medicina Ægyptiorum Libri IV, in quibus multa cum de vario mittendi ſanguinis uſu per venas, arterias, cucurbitulas ac ſcarificationes noſtris inuſitatas, deque inuſtionibus, & aliis chirurgicis operationibus, tum de quamplurimis medicamentis apud Ægyptios frequentioribus, eluceſcunt. i. e. "Of the Phyſic of "the Egyptians, in four Books; in which a parti- "cular account is given of the various uſes of let- "ting blood by the veins, arteries, cupping-glaſſes, "and ſcarifications, not practiſed amongſt us, and "of cauteries and other chirurgical operations, and "of a great many other medicines very frequent "among the Egyptians. Printed at Venice 1591 in 4to. In the Paris edition in 4to, 1646 is added James Bontius's Medicina Indorum, or The Phyſic of the Indians. And in another printed at Leyden in 4to 1718, are added the books de Balſamo, and Bontius's Medicina Indorum. II. De Plantis Ægypti liber; in quo non pauci, qui circa herbarum materiam irrepſerunt, errores deprehenduntur, quorum causâ hactenus multa medicamenta ad uſum medicinæ admodum expetenda, pleriſque medicorum, non ſine artis jacturâ, occulta atque obſoleta jacuerunt. i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning the Plants of Egypt; in "which many errors are diſcovered, which have "crept in with regard to plants, an account of which "a great number of Medicines of conſiderable uſe "in Phyſic have continued unknown and neglected "by moſt of the Phyſicians, to the detriment of "that art." Printed at Venice 1592, in 4to. Cum Obſervationibus & Notis Joannis Veſlingii. Acceſſit Liber de Balſamo. i. e. "With the Obſervations and "Notes of John Veſlingius. To which is added "the Treatiſe de Balſamo." At Padua 1640, in 4to. This work is written by way of Dialogue between Alpini and Melchior Guillandin. III. De Balſamo Dialogus, in quo veriſſima Balſami plantæ, Opobalſami, Carpobalſami, & Xylobalſami cognitio, pleriſque antiquorum atque juniorum Medicorum occulta, nunc eluceſcit. i. e. "A Dialogue concerning Balſamum, "in which is explained the true nature of the plant "Balſamum, Opobalſamum, Carpobalſamum, & Xy- "lobalſamum, which has hitherto been unknown "to moſt of the ancient and modern Phyſicians." Printed at Venice 1592, in 4to. At Padua 1639, in 4to. And likewiſe with the two preceding works. It was tranſlated into French by Anthony Colin, and printed with a tranſlation of ſeveral other pieces of the ſame kind at Lyons 1619, in 8vo. IV. De præſagienda vita & morte ægrotantium Libri VII. In quibus ars tota Hippocratica prædicendi in ægrotis varios morborum eventus, cum ex veterum Medicorum dogmatis, tum ex longâ accurataque obſervatione, nova methodo eluceſcit. i. e. "Seven "books concerning the method of forming a judg- "ment of the life or death of patients, in which "is explained in a new method the whole Hippo- "cratic art of foretelling the various events of diſ- "eaſes in ſick perſons, as well from the opinions of "the ancient Phyſicians, as from a long and accu- "rate obſervation." At Venice 1601, in 4to: this edition is full of faults. At Padua 1601, in 4to. Francfort 1601, in 8vo. And under the following title, Medicinalium Obſervationum Hiſtorico Criticarum Libri VII. i. e. "Seven books of Hiſtorical and Critical Obſervations in Phyſic." At Francfort 1621, in 8vo. With the former title and a Preface by Dr. Herman Boerhaave at Leyden 1710, in 4to. V. De Medicina methodica Libri tredecim. In quibus medendi ars Methodica vocata, olim maximè celebris, quæ hac ætate non ſine magno ſtudioſorum medicinæ & dedecore & damno planè deſiiſſe viſa eſt, denuò reſtituitur, atque in medicorum commodum quadantenus ad Medicinam Dogmaticam conformatur. i. e. "Thirteen books concerning Methodical Phyſic; "in which the art of Phyſic called Methodical, an- "ciently very famous, but now fallen into neglect "to the great diſgrace and diſadvantage of Students "in Phyſic, is again reſtored, and adapted in ſome "meaſure to the Dogmatic Phyſic, for the uſe of "Phyſicians." Padua 1611, fol. Leyden 1719 in 4to. VI. De Rhapontico diſputatio in Gymnaſio Patavino habita. In qua Rhapontici planta, quam hactenus nulli viderunt, medicinæ ſtudioſis ob oculos ponitur, ipſiuſque cognitio accuratiùs expenditur atque proponitur. i. e. "A Diſputation held in the ſchool "at Padua concerning the Rhaponticum, in which "that plant, which was never yet ſeen by any per- "ſon, is preſented to the Students in Phyſic, and "the knowledge of it accurately conſider'd and "propoſed." At Padua 1612 and 1622 in 4to. VII. De Plantis exoticis Libri duo. i. e. "Of exotic "Plants in two books." Venice 1629, in 4to. This work was not publiſhed, as we find by the date of this edition, (which was the only one that ever was printed of it) till about twelve years after the death of the author, who wrote it in 1612. It was publiſhed by his ſon Alpino Alpini. Alpini left ſeveral other works, which have never been printed; particularly, De Medicina Ægyptiorum Liber quintus. i. e. "The fifth book concerning the Phyſic of the "Egyptians." De naturali rerum in Ægypto obſervatarum Hiſtoria Libri V, variis plantarum, lapidum, & animalibus iconibus exornati. i. e. "Five "books concerning the Natural Hiſtory of things "obſerved in Egypt, adorned with a variety of "draughts of Plants, ſtones, and animals (6)."

(6) Memoires pour ſervir, &c. tom. II. p. 18, &c.

maſini had before him. He was buried the day after he died without any funeral pomp in the church of St. Anthony. He was then in the ſixty fourth year of his age. He was married twice; the firſt time to Bartolomæa Tharſia of Padua, by whom he had four ſons; Marc Anthony, Doctor of Civil Law, who died young of the plague in 1631: Alpino Alpini, who, after he had practiſed Phyſic ſeveral years at Venice, was made Profeſſor of Botany at Padua in 1633, and died the 12th of December 1637; Maurice, a Monk of Mount Caſſino and Doctor of Divinity, who died in 1644; and Paul, who followed the profeſſion of arms. The name of Alpini's ſecond wife was Guadagnina. He mentions her in his book De Præſagienda vita & morte, where he tells us that ſhe died about the year 1600, after ſeventeen days ſickneſs (d). We ſhall give the reader ſome account of that work, which is the moſt conſiderable of all his writings [D].

(d) Memoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 11. p. 180, 181.

[D] An account of that work, which is the moſt conſiderable of all his writings.] There is no method more proper for bringing the Art of Phyſic to a ſtate of perfection, than that which is founded upon obſervation and examples. Hippocrates has diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the great variety of uſeful obſervations, which he has given the world; and it would have been of prodigious advantage to mankind, if he had digeſted them into a proper order. However this has been attempted by the learned Lewis Duret in his work upon the Coacæ Prænotiones of Hippocrates, and by our Alpini in the book, which we are giving an account of. The learned Dr. Boerhaave publiſhed a very correct edition of it in 1710. This work merits the greateſt regard of the Phyſicians, becauſe the prediction is the moſt excellent and wonderful part of Phyſic. Hippocrates foreſeeing a plague, prevented the fatal conſequences of it; upon which account the ſame honours were decreed to him as to Hercules. Eudemus, a Roman Senator and Philoſopher, being recovered of a diſeaſe, as Galen had foretold him, cried out full of admiration, that Apollo was come to inform the ſick, thro' Galen's mouth, of what ſhould happen to them. This art of foreſeeing diſeaſes, or what ſhall happen to the ſick, is the moſt neceſſary part of Phyſic, becauſe it is impoſſible to preſcribe proper remedies without ſuch a knowledge. Our Alpini therefore undertook to make the ſtudy of this art more eaſy, and having made a great number of obſervations upon ſeveral ſick perſons, and in ſeveral countries, compoſed a work, wherein he ſhews the method how to foreſee diſeaſes; how to judge whether they will be long or ſhort; how to know the precedent ſymptoms; and laſtly how to foretell the death or recovery of ſick people. This laſt head, which makes the fourth part of the work, is contained in the ſeven books, which we are now treating of. There are in the Prognoſtica of Hippocrates ſeveral rules neceſſary to make a right prediction; and in his books Epidemiarum ſeveral particular caſes, which confirm the truth of thoſe rules. Alpini has digeſted in a proper order the beſt things in thoſe two works, and inſerted the moſt excellent obſervations of Galen upon that ſubject; to which he has added what he had learned by his own experience. The firſt book turns upon thoſe predictions, which are grounded in general on the ſtrength of ſick people. The ſecond treats of thoſe, which are particularly grounded upon the ſtate of the brain, the heat or coldneſs of the body, pain, &c. The third ſhews what the ſeveral motions and ſituations of ſick people foretell. The fourth, what inferences may be drawn from the pulſe, the reſpiration, hunger, thirſt, or the privation of both of them. The fifth, what the leanneſs of the body, the colour of the skin, and the air of the face ſignify; what indications ariſe from the noſe, the eyes, the tongue, &c. The ſixth, the ſigns, which appear before a criſis. The ſeventh, what each ſort of criſis does commonly foretell. The author is very particular upon all theſe heads. We ſhall give an example of what he obſerves. A ſick perſon is tormented with a Delirium; what does this ſymptom foretell? He makes the following obſervations upon it, after Hippocrates, Galen, and the beſt Obſervators. A Delirium is not mortal, when the pulſe is ſtrong, and the reſpiration free. It is alſo harmleſs, when the head ſweats plentifully with the reſt of the body; when the hemorrhoids come upon it, when the ſick perſon feels a great pain in his hips, thighs, feet, or hands; when after ſleep, or after ſome evacuation, ſuch as the bleeding of the noſe, a flux of urine, or the voiding of ſtools, he recovers his ſenſes, or ſeems to be more eaſy; when he laughs in his raving; when having ſtill ſtrength enough, he raves only by intervals. But a Delirium is mortal, when the ſtrength is very much exhauſted, when it encreaſes after ſleep; when it occaſions a profound ſilence, whether the ſick perſon will not ſpeak, or cannot do it: for if he will not ſpeak, it is a ſign the melancholly humour prevails in the higheſt degree. If he cannot ſpeak, it is becauſe the organs are obſtructed by a thick humour, ſo that he cannot articulate his words; or becauſe he has no voice to form them; which is equally dangerous, eſpecially when this accident is attended with a weak motion of the hands, and when the ſick perſon opens his eyes ſlowly and not fully. A Delirium is alſo mortal, when a trembling comes upon it; for tho' a trembling be not mortal in itſelf, it proves ſo moſt commonly, when it happens to meet with the ſymptoms abovementioned. When ſick people in a Delirium gather motes, or pluck out the down of their blankets, death is near at hand. If their ſtools are white, and their urine very clear, it is another pernicious ſign. Alpini confirms all this by ſeveral examples taken from Hippocrates and Galen; to which he adds ſeveral explications founded upon the ſtructure and œconomy of the body. He frequently uſes the word Faculty; but he ought to be excuſed conſidering the time he lived in; eſpecially ſince tho' he uſes that word, his explications are nevertheleſs natural and judicious, and contain nothing but what agrees with modern Phyſic (7). His ſtyle is not very elegant; and he appears to have followed no other kind of Philoſophy but that of Ariſtotle. This is the author's maſter-piece, who has reduced to ſolid and judicious maxims an art, in which there ſeemed room only for conjectures. The writers of the Acta Eruditorum at Leipſic are of opinion, that this is the beſt book, which Phyſicians can read in order to qualify them for the practice of Phyſic. T.

(7) See Memoirs of Literature, vol. 1. Art. 81. p. 336, &c. 2d edit. London 1722.

ALSTEDIUS (JOHN HENRY) a German Divine of the reformed religion, was one of the moſt fertile genius's of the ſeventeenth Century, an indefatigable writer, and one that anſwered his Anagram admirably well (a). He was a long while Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Divinity at Herborn in the county of Naſſau, from whence he went to teach at Wiſſenburg in Tranſilvania (b). He there died in 1638 at the age of fifty. He had been one of the Fathers of the Synod of Dort. He applied himſelf chiefly to the writing of methods, and digeſting of all the parts of arts and ſciences into certain ſyſtems. His Encyclopædia (c) is valued even by the Roman Catholicks [A]; for it was reprinted

(a) The word ſedulitas is exactly made up of the letters of Alſtedius.

(b) Witte, Diar. Biograph. tom. 1.

(c) It is divided into four vol. fol.

[A] His Encyclopædia is valued even by the Roman Catholicks.] Lorenzo Craſſo places him among the Great Men, whoſe Elogiums he publiſhed, and from him very likely Moreri copied the praiſes he beſtows reprinted at Lyons, and ſold very well in France. His Chronological Theſaurus, of which there are ſeveral editions, is by ſome counted among his beſt works, and cried down by others. Voſſius takes no notice of it; he only mentions his Encyclopædia in general, and his Arithmetick in particular (d). He obſerved however in this Author a great deal of reading and a vaſt variety of erudition. Thoſe who in judging of his works are the leaſt inclined to flatter him own, that his Methods and Syſtems contain ſome good things [B]. The opinion he endeavours to eſtabliſh in his Triumphus Biblicus, has had but few followers, viz. that the materials and principles of all arts and ſciences are to be found in the Scripture. He could never have publiſhed ſuch a vaſt number of books without the help of other mens labours; but in that he was a little too free, making no ſcruple to copy them (if we may be allowed the expreſſion) by wholeſale [C]. John Himmelius, a Divine of the Confeſſion of Auſburg, and Profeſſor of Divinity at Jena, is one of thoſe that wrote againſt him [D]. Moreri was not informed as to the year Alſtedius died in [E], and had better not have mentioned it.

(d) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. p. 326.

I ſhould not have forgot that he was a Millenarian. He publiſhed in 1627 a Treatiſe de Mille Annis, wherein he aſſerted that the elect were to reign with Chriſt on the earth a thouſand years; after which the reſurrection of all men, and day of judgment, were to enſue. He imagined that this reign was to begin in 1694; but we are very ſure he was miſtaken. Biſterfeldius his ſon-in-law was of the ſame opinion (e).

(e) Heideggeri Diſſertatio de Chiliaſmo, pag. 652.

ſtows upon Alſtedius. I find that the reader is referred to a work of Sorel for the character of this learned German (1), who muſt have been better known, and more valued, than many others among the Roman Catholicks. Father Lami of the Oratory is of opinion, that among all the writers of Encyclopædies, and Syſtems of Sciences, Alſtedius is almoſt the only one that deſerves to be read, and placed, with reputation, in a choſen Library (2). See the following Note.

(1) Of Chriſtian Perfection, pag. 591, quoted by Konig, Bibliothecæ veter. & novæ, p. 29.

(2) Diſcourſe upon the Sciences, quoted by Baillet, Judgment of the Learned, tom. 2. num. 269. pag. 328.

[B] His Methods and Syſtems contain ſeveral good things.] What follows was copied by Mr. Baillet out of the anonymous German, who wrote the Bibliographia curioſa Hiſtorico-Philologica. "Alſtedius "has indeed many good things; in ſome paſſages "he is not ſo exact as were to be wiſhed, but ne- "vertheleſs his performance was well received by "the publick, when it firſt appeared. He may be "of ſome uſe to thoſe, who being deſtitute of other "helps, and not having the Authors at hand, deſire "to be acquainted with the terms of each art and "ſcience. His patience, labour and judgment in "chuſing the Authors for his abſtracts, can never "be ſufficiently commended. His Abſtracts are not "ſcraps of learning and rhapſodies tacked together "without any order, but contain the principles of "Arts and Sciences digeſted into a right method. "He even endeavours to be uniform throughout the "whole work, though ſome pieces are better than "others, and ſome good for nothing, as his Hiſtory, "his Chronology, &c. It muſt be owned, that he "often confounds himſelf by ſtriving to be too clear; "that he is incumbered with too many diviſions and "ſubdiviſions, and that he affects a method too "much conſtrained (3)." Lorenzo Craſſo tells us, that though the works of Alſtedius ſhew more labour than genius, yet they were generally admired, and that the eſteem they were in procured him admittance into the Temple of Glory. Con gloria del ſuo nome s'è ammirata la fatica fatta nelle ſtorie, e nella Cronologia de' Tempi: le quali coſe, quantunque in libri diverſi di ſcrittori illuſtri ſacri e profani trovanſi, e vi concorra in tale raccoglimento più ſudore che ingegno, tuttavia l'ordine dato da Giovanni Errico alle ſudette fatiche ſtoriche e' ſtato dagli uomini amatori delle antichità e dell' erudizioni aſſai commendato (4). i. e. "He has received a great deal of ho- "nour from his labours in Hiſtory and Chronology: "and though ſuch a work, being a collection from "the beſt writers, both ſacred and profane, ſhews "more induſtry than genius, yet the method he uſed "in theſe hiſtorical labours have given him a ſuffici- "ent degree of eſteem among the lovers of antiquity "and learning."

(3) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. p. 328.

(4) Lor. Craſſo, Elogii d'huomini Letterati, p. 214.

[C] Having no difficulty to copy other Authors.] Thomaſius remarks (5). *Hunc in Paratitlis Theologicis quicquid de ſilentio ſacrorum affert * obſervo prope de verbo deſcripſiſſe e Caſaubono † quem nominari tamen etiam lectoris intererat, ut ſciret unde plura ſibi haurienda forent. Vereor autem ne quercum eandem alibi quoque excuſſerit, cum in ipſo ad lectorem principio reperiam periodum unam alteramque dedicationis Caſaubonianæ.* i. e. "I obſerve that he has "tranſcribed almoſt verbatim what he ſays de Silen- "tio Sacrorum, in his Theological Part, from Ca- "ſaubon, whom he ought to have named, that the "reader might have known where to look for more. "And I am afraid he has gathered from the ſame "tree in other places, for in the beginning of his "Epiſtle to the Reader, I find a period or two of "Caſaubon's Dedication.

(5) In his Treatiſe de Plagio Litterario, num. 354. pag. 155, * Tit. initiati, pag. 166, 167, 168. † Exerc. 16. ad Baron. num. 43. p. 399.

[D] Himmelius is one of thoſe that wrote againſt him.] His work is entitled Anti-Alſtedius, ſive Examen Theologiæ Polemicæ Joannis Henrici Alſtedii. Had this remark only acquainted the reader with the title of one of Alſtedius's chief works, it would not have been altogether uſeleſs.

[E] Moreri was not well informed as to the year Alſtedius died in.] Alſtedius, ſays he, died about the year 1645 or 46; ſome ſay in 1640, at the age of 52. Of the three authors he quotes two (6) are quite ſilent as to this matter; the third, viz. Lorenzo Craſſo, only ſays, that Alſtedius publiſhed the four volumes of his Encyclopedy at the age of 52 (7).

(6) Voſſius & Zeiller.

(7) Lorenzo Craſſo, Elogii d'Huomini Letterati 1463. tom. 3. p. 212.

ALTAEMPS (MARK) ſon to one of Pope Pius IV's ſiſters, was one of the Cardinals that preſided in the Council of Trent. Wolfgang Altaemps his father was Count of the Empire in the dioceſe of Conſtance. How honourable ſoever the character of the Pope's Legate to that Council was, the Cardinal owed it intirely to the intrigues of ill-meaning perſons. The Borromei's, who were related to the Pope in the ſame degree with him, procured him that dignity, with a deſign to remove him from the court (a). He remained at Trent from January 1562 till near the beginning of the ſpring in 1563 [A], when he was recalled by the Pope to raiſe troops. For the Pope hearing that (a) See Amelot de la Houſſaie in his marginal notes on the verſion of the Hiſt. of the Council of Trent by F. Paul p. 449. where he quotes a letter of Mr. de l'Ile to the King dated Dec. 9, 1561.

[A] He remained at Trent from January 1562 till near the Spring 1563.] Pallavicino finds fault with F. Paul, for having aſſerted, that the Cardinals Simonetti and Altaemps were declared Legates both at one time, to be added to thoſe who had been named before. This ſhews, he knew not, that Simonetti had been honoured with the dignity of Legate to the Council at the ſame time with Oſius and Seripande; that is, ſeveral months before Altaemps was added to them (1). He cenſures him alſo, for not having mentioned Oſius and Seripande, but in recording what happened a conſiderable while after the dignity of Legate had been conferred upon them. Tho' ſuch faults are of no great conſequence, yet we ought not to blame a critic, who takes notice of them, ſince an Hiſtorian is bound to avoid them.

(1) Pallavic. Hiſt. Concil. Trid. l. 15. c. 13. num. 2 that the Dukes of Saxony and Wirtemberg, and the Landgrave of Heſſe were levying ſoldiers; and that the Germans had ſome thoughts of ranſacking Rome, where they had found a rich booty in 1527, reſolved to guard himſelf againſt any ſurpriſe of that kind (b). The Cardinal was much diſpleaſed at Pibrac's harangue, and was for returning a ſmart anſwer to it; nor could he help ſaying, That the inſolence of that Lawyer ought to be checked, who was only uſed to deal with the meaner ſort of people (c). He was raiſed to the Purple in 1561, and a little before his being Legate was choſen by the Canons of Conſtance for their Biſhop. He had neither the learning, nor the experience, that are requiſite to preſide in a Council; but Pius IV, his uncle, was ſenſible that the other Preſidents would ſupply what he wanted (d), and teach him the intrigues of Oecumenical Councils. When the Pope ſent him in 1560 with the character of Nuncio to the Emperor Ferdinand, he appointed the famous Cornelio Maſſo, Biſhop of Bitonto, to be, as it were, his pedagogue (e). Altaemps was then Biſhop of Coſſano. This family was afterwards raiſed to a higher rank; for we find a Duke of ALTAEMPS, who died in 1620 (f). This was a man of learning, and, if I am not miſtaken, Rome was indebted to him for that Library, which was famous there for many years under that name, and was not quite ſold off, when Dom Mabillon travelled into Italy (g). This Duke, who was called John Angelo, wrote the life of Pope Anicetus. Another Duke of Altaemps, named Gaudentius, no leſs curious in books, nor leſs learned than the former, died in 1677. He publiſhed the Life of St. John Chryſoſtom, and a book intitled, Perſecuted Holineſs triumphant (h).

(b) F. Paul, Hiſt. of the Council of Trent, pag. 648, according to Amelot's tranſlation.

(c) Ibid. p. 490.

(d) Paſſavic. Hiſt. Conc. Trid. l. 15. c. 13. num. 10.

(e) Ibid. l. 14. c. 13.

(f) Witte. Diar. Biogr. tom. 2. p. 26.

(g) In 1686. See his Muſæum Italicum, tom. 1, p. 78, 79.

(h) Witte. Diar. Biogr. p. 116.

ALTENSTAIG (JOHN) Doctor of Divinity, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth Century. He was born in Mindelheim in Germany, and wrote a pretty good Lexicon Theologicum [A].

[A] He wrote a pretty good Lexicon Theologicum.] He dedicated it to the Biſhop of Ausburg, which Dedication is dated, October 1, 1517. Konig places the firſt edition of this work in the year 1519 (1). I have only ſeen the Antwerp edition by Petrus Bellerus, 1576, folio, which bears this title, Lexicon Theologicum continens vocabulorum deſcriptiones, definitiones, & interpretationes perutiles, theologiæ ſtudioſis concinnatum.

(1) Konigii, Bibliotheca, pag. 29.

ALTHAMERUS (ANDREW) a Lutheran Miniſter at Nuremburg, publiſhed, before the middle of the 16th Century (a), not only ſome works in Divinity [A], but alſo notes upon Tacitus de Situ, Moribus, & Populis Germaniæ, which were printed at Nuremburg in 1529 and 1536 (b), and at Amberg in 1609, 8vo (c). Simon Schardius has inſerted them in the firſt volume of the German Writers. He was ſuch an enemy to the doctrine of the merit of good works, and ſo ardent in rejecting it, that he inveighed againſt St. James the Apoſtle in a moſt outragious manner (d). This offers us an opportunity of examining a paſſage we read in the diſputes between Grotius and Andrew Rivet [B]. From this enquiry it will appear that our Althamerus was at the

(a) Micrælii, Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 734.

(b) Geſneri Bib. fol. 38 verſo.

(c) Hertzii, Bibliath. Germ.

(d) See the note [B].

[A] He publiſhed ſome works in Divinity.] They are entitled: Conciliationes locorum ſcripturæ, qui ſpetie tenus inter ſe pugnare videntur. Annotationes in D. Jacobi Epiſtolam. De Peccato Originis. De Sacramento Altaris. He likewiſe compiled a Dictionary of the proper names that are to be met with in the Bible, Sylva Biblicorum nominum &c. which was printed at Baſil in 1535. His Conciliationes locorum Scripturæ were publiſhed at Nuremburg the ſame year, and at Wittemburg in 1582. The Epitome of Geſner only takes notice of theſe two editions; tho' there is no manner of doubt but that they were preceded by another edition that appeared before the year 1528 (1).

(1) Hoſpiniani, Hiſt. Sacram. Part 2. p. 84.

[B] This offers us an opportunity of examining a paſſage in the diſputes between Grotius and Andrew Rivet.] The firſt piece of this part of their quarrel contains the following words (2): Gaudeo D. Rivetum non accedere iis qui Jacobi epiſtolam rejecerunt, quorum quidem hoc amplius dixere, "Mentiris Jacobe in caput tuum." That is, "I am glad, that "Mr. Rivet does not join with thoſe, who reject "the Epiſtle of St. James, ſome of whom have "moreover ſaid, James, you lie, againſt your own head." ſecond is, that Rivet asked (3), Who are thoſe who have uſed ſuch language? how many are they? adding, that having read the works of the Jeſuits and other Polemic Writers, (who are always ready to catch at any thing of that nature,) with a deſign to find out whether they ever upbraided the Proteſtants with that blaſphemy, he had not met there with any ſuch reproach. The third is that Grotius (4), when he anſwered his adverſary who had challenged him in expreſs terms and very ſmartly, named no body, which made Rivet believe he had no author to produce. Quod nunc autores non indicet harum contumeliarum, ſays he (5), oſtendit ſe nullos habere. The fourth is, that Grotius in his ſecond reply, quoted the words of Andrew Althamerus: Is qui Jacobum accuſavit mendacii, fuit Andreas Althamerus (6). Liber editus eſt Argentorati, Anno CIↃIↃXXVII. Verba ejus inter cætera ſunt: Vult nunc probare ſuam ſententiam, ſed directe contra ſcripturam agit. Non poſſumus hic defendere Jacobum. Citat enim ſcripturas falsò; & ſolus, Spiritui Sancto, Legi, Prophetis, Chriſto, Apoſtoliſque omnibus contradicit. Teſtimonium ipſius vanum eſt. Uni ipſi teſti non eſſe credendum, ſupra annotavimus, præſertim cum quo ipſe Spiritus Sanctus & tot teſtes veritatis diſſentiant. Credendum multitudini. Paulus multo dignius ſanctiuſque rem tractat; Si Abraham ex operibus juſtificatus, habet quod glorietur, ſed non apud Deum; quid enim dicit Scriptura? Credidit Abraham Deo, videlicet promiſſioni divinæ de ſemine; & reputatum, ſcilicet quia credidit, illi ad juſtitiam. Non quod ex filii immolatione juſtificatum dicit, recte mentitus eſt in caput ſuum. Quindecim enim annos ante immolatum Iſaachum juſtificatus fuit Abraham, etiam nondum nato Iſaacho; non ex circumciſione, neque filii immolatione, ſed ex ſola fide. Dicit enim ſcriptura, Credidit &c. ut nihil habeat Jacobus ad quod refugiat. Nos fidei magiſtrum conſtituimus; & jam ſuis ipſiſſimis verbis ſcimus, neſciviſſe quid ſit fides. Et in fine libri, Ne igitur ſuccenſeas nobis, Lector, ſi durius & vehementius calamo quandoque in auctorem invecti ſumus. Meretur enim hoc odium, & hanc ſpiritus vehementiam, dum aliam perfectionem atque juſtitiam à nobis contendit, quam fidei. i. e. "He, "who accuſed St. James of a lye, was Andrew Al-"thamerus. His book was printed at Strasburg, in "1527. His words are as follow: He would now "prove his opinion, but he runs directly counter "to

(2) Grotii Animad. in notas Riveti, pag. 1029, tom. III. Operum Riveti.

(3) Riveti examen Animad. Grotii, p. 1029. tom. III. Operum ejus.

(4) Grotii votum pro pace Eccleſiaſtica, ibid. pag. 1054.

(5) Riveti Apologet. ibid. pag. 1100.

(6) Grotii Diſcuſſio Apologet. Rivetiani pag. 722. Opuſculorum Grotii editionis Amſtelodamenſis, apud Bleau anno 1679 in folio.

the conferences of Bern in 1528, which paved the way to the reformation of that Canton.

" to the Scripture, There is no defending James in " this place. For he quotes the Scripture falſly ; " and contradicts the Holy Ghoſt, the Law, the " Prophets, Chriſt, and all the Apoſtles. His teſti- " mony is to no purpoſe. I have noted above, " that we are not to believe one witneſs, and eſpe- " cially when the Holy Ghoſt and ſo many witneſſes " of truth differ from him. We muſt give credit " to the multitude. Paul treats the ſubject much " more worthily and holily. If Abraham be juſti- " fied by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not " before God ; for what ſaith the Scripture ? Abra- " ham believed God, namely the divine promiſe of " the ſeed ; and it was counted to him, namely be- " cauſe he believed, for righteouſneſs. Now when " he ſays he was juſtified by the offering up of his " ſon, he directly lies againſt his own head. For " Abraham was juſtified fifteen years before the of- " fering up of Iſaac, nay before Iſaac was born ; " not by circumciſion nor by the offering up of " his ſon, but by faith alone. For the Scripture " ſays, He believed, &c. ſo that James has no re- " fuge. We have conſtituted a Maſter of faith : and " now we know by his own very words that he did " not know what faith is. And at the end of the " book, Be not angry therefore with us, Reader, if " we are ſometimes harſh and ſevere upon that au- " thor. For he deſerves this hatred and vehemence " of ſpirit, while he contends for another perfec- " tion and juſtification than that of faith." The laſt is, that Rivet, ſeeing ſo plain a quotation, anſwered (7), that it was not ſufficient, becauſe Grotius had ſpoken in the plural number, and that one was not many, unus non ſunt multi. He diſapproved of the words of Althamerus, but, at the ſame time, complained of Grotius, for not having told, that Althamerus was not a Calviniſt. He proves him to have been a Lutheran, and adds, that in the Conferences of Bern he ſpoke in favour of the Papiſts, and maintained the tenet of the Real Preſence. Qui cum in diſputatione Bernenſi (8), quam ſecuta eſt Reformatio anni 1528, libera ei facta eſſet diſputandi copia, volens paſſus eſt ſe à parte Pontificia deligi, ut Oratoris munere in ſuggeſtu fungeretur, carnalemque Chriſti præſentiam in Cœna defenderet. " His in- " ſulting of S. James, concludes Rivet, is nothing " to us. The whole ignominy reflects upon the Pa- " piſts and Lutherans, whoſe cauſe he defended." Upon the whole we may conclude : I, That Rivet imbarked in a new difficulty without the leaſt cauſe. He might have let paſs that remark of Grotius without any manner of prejudice to his own cauſe, and only deſired him to name thoſe who had dared to abuſe the Apoſtle in ſo outrageous a manner. II, That he was greatly miſtaken in imagining that his adverſary had none to produce. III, That by preſſing him too much he ſhewed himſelf ignorant of a matter of fact, whereof the knowledge might have been of ſome reputation to a man of his ſtudy, and likewiſe to his library. IV, That he had recourſe to cavils which ſerved only to prolong the diſpute, and give occaſion to many unneceſſary queſtions. It is certain, that when we know any thing to have been aſſerted by a writer, we have, according to the current phraſe, a right to ſay, that it has been aſſerted by ſome. Neither are we obliged to quote more authors than one, unleſs we have ſaid, that it is objected by many, or by ſeveral perſons. Now Grotius did not uſe any ſuch expreſſion, but ſaid indefinitely, quidam dixere, there are not wanting who have ſaid, or ſome have ſaid. Grotius would come off with flying colours, even ſuppoſing the author he quoted not to have been a Calviniſt, but a Lutheran. What Rivet produces touching the Conferences of Bern, is foreign to the ſubject : for it does not prove that Althamerus was a Papiſt ; but at the moſt, that he was ſo zealous againſt the Zuinglians, with regard to the Real Preſence, that he made no conſcience to maintain it, even to the advantage of Popery. If Rivet was ſatisfied with himſelf on this occaſion, it is plain that Polemical Writers make no manner of diſtinction between what is real, and what is but captious and ſophiſtical.

(7) Riveti Grotianæ Diſcuſſionis Διάλυσις, pag. 1201. tom. III. Operum ejus.

(8) He uſes the very words of Hoſpinianus, Hiſtoriæ Sacramentar. without quoting him, Part II. pag. 84.

ALTHUSIUS (JOHN) a German Civilian flouriſhed about the end of the ſixteenth Century. He wrote a book of Politics. Some Civilians of Germany are ſtrangely incenſed againſt him, for having maintained that the ſupreme power is lodged in the people [A]. He likewiſe compoſed a Treatiſe De Juriſprudentia Romana ; one De Civili Converſatione, and another intitled Dicæologia, &c.

I forgot in my two firſt editions to mention that he was a Proteſtant ; that after having been Profeſſor of Law at Herborn, he was raiſed to the dignity of Syndic in the city of Bremen ; and that the Jeſuits, in their anſwer to the Anti-coton, have placed him in their catalogue among the other Proteſtants, who have ſpoken diſreſpectfully of the regal power [B].

ALTIERI.

[A] Some of his own countrymen are ſtrangely incenſed againſt him for having maintained that the ſupreme power is lodged in the people.] Bœclerus maintains, that the principle of Althuſius is calculated to break through all the ties of civil ſociety ; and that his work ought to be burnt, inſtead of being recommended, as it is to young Students. Omnes Reges nihil aliud eſſe quam Magiſtratus. . . . ALTHUSIO inter ſolemnia carmina placet, cujus Politica non tradit ſane, qui civitatis finis & felicitas & tranquillitas obtineri debeat, ſed quibus modis omne vinculum ſocietatis & ſalutis civilis diſſolvi ac everti poſſit. DEMAGOGICA apelles merito ; & tamen, qui Juriſconſulti nomen præfert, & quædam ſubinde in oſtentationem ejus ſcientiæ jacit, commendari juventuti academicæ audimus librum orco damnandum judicio eorum, qui venena à cibis diſtinguere didicerunt (1). i. e. " Althuſius's doctrine is that Kings are mere " Magiſtrates ; his Politics do not tend to the happi- " neſs and tranquillity of cities, but to the diſſolv- " ing and overturning of civil ſociety. They de- " ſerve to be called Dæmagogics ; yet becauſe they " bear the name of a Lawyer and make oſtentation " of that ſcience, we have heard recommended to " the youth of the univerſity a book, that ought to " be condemned to hell, in the opinion of thoſe, " who know how to diſtinguiſh meat from poiſon." The learned Conringius paſſes the following judgment upon it. Fundamentum doctrinæ ſuæ politicæ collocat in eo, quod ſumma Reipublicæ cujuſvis jure ſit penes ſolum populum : qui error peſtilens eſt & turbando orbi aptus (2). " He lays the foundation of " his political doctrine in this principle, that the " chief power of every Commonwealth is in the " people only : which is a peſtilent error, and cal- " culated to diſturb the world." Another German Writer uſes a ſtronger expreſſion. In claſſem iſtam, ſays he (3), referendi ſunt illi Politicorum, qui majeſtatis πρῶτον δημιουργὸν populum faciunt, inde POLITICI POPULARES, &, qui jugulum omnium Principum ac Regum petunt, MONARCHOMACHI dicti. Horum hominum nefanda dogmata refertim habet ALTHUSIUS in ſuâ Politicâ, Vulcano, publico edicto, conſecranda. i. e. " To that claſs are to be referred thoſe Politicians, " who make the people the firſt original ſource of " majeſty, whence they are called popular Politicians, " and becauſe they endeavour to kill all Princes and " Kings, King-killers. Althuſius has collected the hor- " rid doctrines of theſe men in his Politics, which " deſerve to be condemned to a public burning."

[B] The Jeſuits . . . have placed him in their Catalogue among the other Proteſtants who have ſpoken diſreſpectfully

(1) Boecler. in Grotium de jure Belli, l. I. c. III. num. 8. p. 235.

(2) Conring. de Civ. Prudent. c. 14.

(3) Meier. in Analyſ. l. III. Polit. Ariſt.

ALTIERI. Two Cardinals of this name are mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary; one of them died in 1654; the other was Pope Clement X. He might have added to these two a third Cardinal Altieri, who died the 29th of June 1698.

respectfully of the Regal power.] The words of the Jesuit, who presented to the Queen mother an apologetic answer to the Anti-Coton, are as follow, "Next to Hotoman, says he (4), we add the princi- "ples and very words of John Arthusus (5), Doctor "of Law, copied from the chapter De Ephoris in "his Politics methodically digested, and published at "Herborn in 1603; where he writes, among other "things, that it is lawful to depose a Tyrant; to "turn him out of the administration; and even to "put him to death, if no other remedy can be "found, and chuse another in his room." The words of Althusius are (6): Ejusmodi Tyrannum ab officio removere, administratione demandata privare, imò etiam, si aliter contra vim se defendere non possunt, interficere, & alium in ejus locum substituere possunt.

(4) Apologetic Answer to the Anti-Coton, p. 185, 186.
(5) He ought to have said Althusius.
(6) Althusii Politica Methodice digesta, c. 14.

ALTILIUS (GABRIEL) a native of the Kingdom of Naples, flourished about the end of the fifteenth Century (a). He was chiefly valued on account of his Latin verses, which made him be looked upon as one that studied polite Literature, and read the Antients with great improvement. This helped him to push his fortune in the court of Ferdinand King of Naples, where the true taste which had been introduced in the reign of King Alphonsus was not yet quite lost. He was chosen Preceptor to the young Prince Ferdinand [A]; and likewise employed, as it seems, in State-affairs; for he accompanied Jovianus Pontanus to Rome, in order to negotiate there a peace between King Ferdinand and Pope Innocent VIII (b). He had a great share in the friendship and esteem of Pontanus, as appears from the works of the latter (c). Sannazarius gives in his Poems no less clear proofs of the value he had for him (d). But these two are not alone in commending him [B]. The Poem Gabriel Altilius wrote on the marriage of Isabel of Arragon, is one of his most celebrated pieces [C]. One would hardly believe that Latin verses should have raised him to the dignity of a Prelate; and nevertheless it is certain that they helped him in a great measure to the Bishoprick of Policastro. Some find fault with him for neglecting the Muses after his preferment, though they had proved so serviceable to him [D]. They discover some ingratitude and impudence (e) in the precipitate manner he abandoned them, and would look upon such a fault as unpardonable, had they not some regard to the excuse he could alledge, viz. that it was incumbent upon him, as a Bishop, to apply himself, without delay, to the study of the Scripture. I shall endeavour to rectify what has been written concerning the time of his death (f). His Epithalamium on Isabel of Arragon

(a) Not of the 14th, as Moreri writes.
(b) Pontanus Præf. Tractatus de magnificentia.
(c) He wrote his epitaph, and dedicated to him his treatise, de Magnificentia. See also his Dialogue to Ægidius, p. 1471.
(d) Eleg. 11. ver. 17. & Epigram 7.
(e) See the beginning of the Note [D].
(f) See the latter part of note [D].

[A] He was chosen Preceptor to the young Prince Ferdinand.] This is what Paulus Jovius insinuates by this expression, junioris Ferdinandi Regis (1); which expression is also used by Ughelli (2). Toppi is of a different opinion: Fù maestro, says he, di Re' Ferdinando I d'Aragona, e Vescovo di Policastro, nel 1471 (3). I believe he is mistaken; Ferdinand I died in 1494, being above 70; he must therefore have been born about the year 1424, and Altilius must have been his Preceptor about the year 1440. It is not usual to choose a man that is very young for preceptor to the son of a King: he must have had time to make his learning appear; neither would Alphonso, who was himself no mean Scholar, and had many learned men about him, ever have chosen Altilius without previous proofs of his learning. So that, according to Toppi, Altilius in 1440 was about 30. But it is certain, that he was then scarce born; being only a little above 60 (4), when he died in 1501 (5).

(1) Pauli Jovii Elog. cap. 125.
(2) Ughelli Italia Sacra, tom. 3. p. 796.
(3) Toppi Bibliotheca Napoletana, p. 101.
(4) Jovius de Elogiis, c. 125.
(5) See the quotation (17).

[B] Pontanus and Sannazarus are not alone in commending him.] Giraldi mentions him with great commendations. Basil Zanchius composed several verses in his praise, which are to be found in the Deliciæ Poëtarum Italorum. Giovanni Matteo Toscani extols him both in his verse and prose-compositions (6). But by no other writer he has been so much cried up, both on account of his parts and kind temper, as by Alexander ab Alexandro, where he describes at length how he and some others were received by Altilius, when they went to congratulate him upon his promotion (7). He entertained them with a supper that was more agreeable to his former state, than his new dignity. As he had not then abandoned the Muses his first favourites, (if he ever abandoned them) the entertainment run upon some verses out of Martial, which a young Musician had sung.

(6) In Peplo Italiæ.
(7) Alex. ab Alex. Genial Dierum lib. 5. cap. 1.

[C] The Poem Gabriel Altilius wrote on the marriage of Isabel of Arragon is one of his most celebrated pieces.] To this Poem and his Elegies was owing the esteem he was in. Usque adeo molliter ac admirandè in Elegis & heroico carmine excelluit, sicuti ex Epithalamio Isabellæ Aragoniæ perspici potest, ut Pontani atque Actii testimonio antiquis vatibus æquaretur (8). i. e. "He so much excelled in the delicacy of his "Elegies and the sublimity of his Heroics, as appears "in his Epithalamium of Isabel of Arragon, that in "the opinion of Pontanus and Actius he was equal "to the ancient Poets." Julius Scaliger thinks his Epithalamium too prolix. His words are: Gabriel Altilius Epithalamium cecinit longe optimum, excellentissimum vero futurum, si sibi ille temperasset. Dum enim vult omnia dicere, afficit auditorem aliquando fastidio tanto, quanta in aliis voluptate. Est enim nimius, quod vitium illi genti est peculiare. Est enim totis illis Italiæ tractibus perpetua loquendi fames (9). i. e. "Gabriel Altilius wrote a very good "Epithalamium, which would have been still better, "if he had known where to stop. But endeavour- "ing to say all, he nauseates the reader as much "in one place, as he delights him in another. He "says too much, which is the common fault of "his country. For all those parts of Italy have a "continual appetite of speaking." This is no compliment to the Neopolitans (10).

(8) Jovius Elog. c. 125.
(9) Julius Cæsar Scaliger Poëtices, l. 6. p. 736.

[D] Some find fault with him for neglecting the Muses after his preferment.] That such a reproach, expressed in such hard terms, should come from a Bishop, is very surprizing: Is virtutis merito Policastri (ea urbs enim Buxentum fuit) antistes factus, à Musis per quas profecerat, celeriter IMPUDENTERQUE discessit; MAGNO hercle INGRATI animi PIACULO, nisi ad spem non injustæ veniæ ob id culpa tegeretur, quod ad sacras literas nequaquam ordinis oblitus tempestivè confugisset (11). i. e. "When he was made "Bishop of Policastro for his virtue, he soon and "IMPUDENTLY left the Muses, by whose means "he had been promoted. A most heinous ingrati- "tude, if there was not some hope of alleviating "his crime, by saying that his order required him "to apply himself to sacred Literature." See the judicious reflections of M. Baillet upon this subject (12). The four following verses of Latomus are not amiss.

Audiit Altilius desertis transfuga Musis,
In quorum tabulis nobile nomen erat;
Sed

(10) See note [H] of the article ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO, versus finem.
(11) Paul Jovius Elog. c. 125.
(12) Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poëtes, tom. 1. p. 138. See likewise tom. 111. p. 82.

Arragon is the only piece that has been inſerted in the collections of Gruter and Matteo Toſcani [E]. It is very likely that moſt part of his other poetical performances are loſt.

Sed quid peccavit, ſi demereatur ut olim
Carminibus Phœbum, nunc pietate Deum?

" When from the Muſes court Altilius came,
" He was reproach'd with a deſerter's name.
" What harm, if he, who could Apollo pleaſe,
" With verſe, th' Almighty ſhould with pray'rs
" appeaſe?

Altilius would have been more to blame, if, after having obtained a miter by preaching, he had done like many others, who no ſooner ſee themſelves raiſed to the Epiſcopal dignity, but give over preaching; being ſenſible that this kind of command is not of neceſſity, to be maintained by the ſame means it was acquired (13). Paulus Jovius is equally miſtaken as to matters of fact. He ſuppoſes Altilius made no verſes after his promotion; and that the Epithalamium was his maſter-piece (14). I do not doubt but this Iſabel is the ſame perſon that was betrothed to Giovanni Galeazzo Sforza Duke of Milan, on the firſt of November 1471. I cannot therefore be perſuaded that Altilius did really abandon the Muſes, which is the crime he is charged with. He was made Biſhop in 1472; and the beſt of his poetical pieces was compoſed after that time. There is therefore no room to ſay, that the miter enticed him away from Parnaſſus. The Epithalamium was made not when Iſabel was betrothed, but when ſhe was married, that is in 1489 (15), as plainly appears from the very beginning of that Poem.

(13) Saluſt ſays, Imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum eſt.

(14) Jovius Elogiorum, cap. 125.

(15) I am indebted to Mr. de la Monnoie for this remark.

Purpureos jam læta ſinus Tithonia conjux
Extulerat, roſeoque diem patefecerat ortu,
Cæruleum tremulo percurrens lumine pontum
Qui cupido ſua vota viro deſponſaque dudum
Connubia, optatoſque locos & gaudia ferret.

" Her purple breaſt Aurora did diſplay,
" And with her roſy fingers gave the day.
" The trembling light danc'd o'er the curling " wave,
" And to your longing ſpouſe new tranſport gave:
" For now his promis'd Bride he was to meet,
" And long expected joys receive compleat.

This proves that Ughelli was greatly miſtaken, when he wrote, that Altilius died in his Biſhopric of Policaſtro in 1484 (16). It may be made plain that he did not die till about the year 1501; for Jovianus Pontanus, in mentioning the news that was brought of his death, obſerves that Sannazarius was going into France with King Frederic (17).

(16) Ughelli Ital. Sacra, tom. 7. p. 796.

(17) Jovian Pontanus in Dialogo cui titulus Ægidius, p. 1471, 1487. Mr. de la Monnoie made me obſerve this.

[E] His Epithalamium on Iſabel of Arragon is the only piece that has been inſerted in the Collections of Gruter and Matteo Toſcani.] By the Collection of Gruter I mean the work entitled, Deliciæ CC. Italorum Poëtarum, collectore Ranutio Ghero. The Collection of Giovanni Matteo Toſcani bears this title, Carmina illuſtrium Poëtarum Italorum. This author atteſts, in his Peplum, to have read only the Epithalamium and a few Epigrams of Altilius. The author of the edition of Sannazar's Latin Poems (a) in 1689, and of the ſhort notes that are added to them, tells us, that he does not remember to have ever ſeen in print any other pieces of Altilius beſides his Epithalamium, and one Epigram; and from thence infers, that a great many have been loſt, ſince Paulus Jovius mentions his Elegies, and Sannazarius aſcribes ſome Odes to him (18). To make ſome amends for this loſs, three or four pieces wrote by Altilius, and never before printed, have been inſerted in the Notes upon Sannazarius. Toppi records three pieces of Altilius, which are to be found ne fiori delle rime de Poeti illuſtri raccolti & ordinati da Girolamo Ruſcelli, ſtampati in Venetia nel 1558, in 8*vo* (19). Theſe three compoſitions are, Gabrielis Altilii Lamentatio, ejuſdem Epithalamium, ejuſdem Elegia.

(18) Notæ in Sannaz. p. 184.

(19) Toppi, Bib. Napolitana, pag. 102.

§ (a) Mr. Broeckhuſius. REM. CRIT.

ALTING (HENRY), Profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelberg and Groningen, was born at Embden the 17th of Feb. 1583. His family had been long before very conſpicuous in Frieſland. He was deſigned, from a child, for the employment in which his father had diſtinguiſhed himſelf; I mean the holy miniſtry [A]. He was therefore ſent very early to ſchool, and after having gone through his Humanity Studies and a courſe of Philoſophy at Groningen, he was ſent into Germany in 1602. He ſtaid three years at Herborn, where he made ſuch a progreſs under the famous Piſcator, Matthias, Martinius, and William Zepperus, that he was allowed to teach Philoſophy and Divinity. While he was preparing to ſet out on his travels into Switzerland and France, he was choſen Preceptor to three young Counts (a), who ſtudied at Sedan with the Electoral Prince Palatin, and took poſſeſſion of that employment at the beginning of September 1605. The ſtorm which the Duke of Bouillon was threatened with from Henry IV, though it did not break out, yet obliged the Electoral Prince to retire from Sedan with the three young Noblemen in 1606. Alting accompanied them to Heidelberg, where he continued to inſtruct his three noble pupils; and was alſo admitted to read ſome Lectures in Geography and Hiſtory to the Electoral Prince till the year 1608, when he was declared his Preceptor, as appears from ſome manuſcripts of the Vatican Library [B]. With this character he accompanied him to Sedan, and diſcharged his office ſo well,

(a) The Counts of Naſſau, Solms and Iſenberg.

[A] His father had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the holy miniſtry.] He was called Menſo Alting, and was grand ſon to another Menſo, who in 1523 was given by the States of Drent, as an hoſtage, to the Duke of Guelderland. Another Menſo Alting, great grandfather to the Menſo who had been an hoſtage, was one of the Counſellors of Reinold the Fat, Duke of Guelderland, and retired into the country of Drent in 1361 (1). Menſo Alting the Miniſter was the firſt who, with two others, preached the Reformation in the territory of Groningen, about the year 1566, and under the tyrannical Government of the Duke of Alva, ſub ipſa Albani Ducis graſſante tyrannide (2). He was alſo the firſt that preached in the great church of Groningen after the reduction of that town by the States-General in 1594. He faithfully ſerved the Church of Embden during the ſpace of 38 years, oppoſing, with great courage and reſolution, the fury of the Anabaptiſts, and attempts of the Ubiquitarians. He died the ſeventh of October 1612, the ſame day that his ſon and Abraham Scultetus were very near being drowned in the lake of Haerlem; Subita ac procelloſa coorta tempeſtate, naufragio ac ſubmerſione proximi (Scultetus & Altingius) ægre tandem toto corpore madentes, ſalvi tamen divina clementia in proximam ripam evaſerunt (3). His life, written at length by Ubbo Emmius is preſerved by his heirs among their other manuſcripts (4).

(1) Vita Jacobi Alting.

(2) I muſt inform the reader that the Duke of Alva came into the Low-Countries only in 1567; ſo that the Author of Henry Alting's life is not ſo exact as he ought.

(3) Vita Henr. Alting.

(4) Vita Jacobi Alting.

[B] He was Preceptor to the Electoral Prince Palatine, as appears from ſome manuſcripts of the Vatican Library.] The exerciſes of the King of Bohemia, which Alting corrected with his own hand, well, that the young Prince, upon his return to Heidelberg in 1610, being examined on all points of religion before the Duke of Deux-Ponts, Adminiſtrator of the Electorate, and many other perſons of diſtinction, anſwered very judiciouſly, and in Latin. He was one of thoſe who were appointed to attend the young Elector on his journey into England in 1612, where he became acquainted with George Abbot Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with Dr. King Biſhop of London, and Dr. Hackwell Preceptor to the Prince of Wales. He had alſo the honour to ſpeak with King James. The marriage between the Elector and the Princeſs of England being ſolemnized at London in the month of February 1613 (b), Alting left England firſt with his former diſciples, and arrived at Heidelberg the firſt of April. In the enſuing Auguſt he was appointed Profeſſor of the Common Places of Divinity; and as he was not qualified for preſiding in thoſe diſputes, without being Doctor of Divinity, he took that degree in November with the uſual ceremonies. In 1616 he was employed in a very troubleſom office, viz. the direction of a Seminary, if I may be allowed ſo to entitle the Collegium Sapientiæ of Heidelberg. He was offered the ſecond Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, vacant by the death of Coppenius in 1618, which he refuſed, but at the ſame time procured it for Scultetus. He gave very great proofs of his learning at the Synod of Dort, whither he was ſent with two other deputies of the Palatinate (c). It was on this occaſion that the Univerſity of Leyden was reſtored to the power of conferring the degree of Doctor, which they had ſuffered to be extinguiſhed. John Polyander, publick Profeſſor in that Univerſity, was firſt created Licentiate in Divinity by Alting, and afterwards Doctor by Scultetus, which veſted him with the power of conferring the degree of Doctor upon his Collegues. Alting no doubt conceived great hopes ſoon after his return to Heidelberg, the Elector Palatine having gained a crown by the troubles of Bohemia. But ſuch a ſucceſsful beginning was attended with a dreadful ruin. Tilli took Heidelberg by ſtorm in Sept. 1622, and allowed his ſoldiers to commit all imaginable diſorders [C]. Alting eſcaped their fury by a miracle [D], and retired to his family, which he had ſent ſome time before to Heilbron. He rejoined it at Schorndorf, but was (b) Konig does not mark the proper time, when he ſays, vixit anno 1613. For he was not then in his moſt flouriſhing ſtate.

(c) Abraham Scultetus and Paulus Toſſanus; the latter was ſent by the Eccleſiaſtical Senate, and the two others by the Univerſity.

are lodged in that Library, and ſhewn to travellers; as we are informed by the author of Alting's Life, who adds, that they are as much worth ſeeing, as moſt part of the reliques that are commonly ſhewn to the curious. Hujus magiſterii ejus ne unquam apud poſteros inteſtata queat eſſe induſtria, vel Roma, quod miremur, faciet, quæ in Bibliotheca Vaticana inter Heidelbergenſia cimelia, dicam ceu ſpolia, oſtentat themata & exercitia ſtyli regis Bohemiæ, Altingi manu emendata, eruditis peregrinatoribus minimeque ſuperſtitioſis viſenda, atque non minus credo, quam pleræque ipſorum reliquiæ ἀξιωθίατα, digna ſpectatu (5).

(5) Vita Henr. Alting.

[C] Allowed his ſoldiers to commit all imaginable diſorders.] They plundered, murdered, raviſhed, racked, and, in few words, committed all the crimes, which the fury of ſoldiers fired by a falſe zeal of religion, is capable of. Urbs . . . impetu & vi capta, omniaque dira exempla paſſa direptionis, lanienæ, libidinis, quæ militaris licentia, victoris inſolentia, odium religionis, barbarorum Croatarum feritas comminiſci potuere aut patrare. . . . Ea nocte inſomni & mœſta inter lamenta & ejulatus, quibus omnia undique perſtrepebant, aut ſequioris ſexus vim patientis, aut virorum equuleis ſubditorum, ac per varia tormenta ac vulnera lenta citave morte affectorum, &c. (6), i. e. "The city being taken by ſtorm, ſuffered all the terrors of plundering, butchering and luſt, that the licence of ſoldiers, the inſolence of conquerors, the hatred of religion, the cruelty of Barbarians could threaten or perpetrate. . . . On that ſleepleſs night, amidſt the ſad lamentations and ſhrieks which were heard every where, of the tender ſex ſuffering violence, of men on the rack, put to a quicker or ſlower death, by various torments and wounds &c." Such are generally ſpeaking, the conſequences of a war; which ought to ſtrike terror into thoſe who either engage in or adviſe to it, in order to prevent evils, which perhaps would never happen, or at the worſt, would not often be half ſo bad as thoſe, that attend a rupture. We ſhall have more than once occaſion to take notice of the agonies great Commanders have been reduced to by their conſciences, reproaching them with the devaſtations they had occaſioned.

(6) Ex Vita Henr. Alting.

[D] He eſcaped their fury by a miracle.] The particulars of his eſcape deſerve to be recorded. He was in his ſtudy, when news was brought that the enemy was maſter of the town, and ready to plunder it. Upon this bolting his door, he had recourſe to prayer. When one of his friends accompanied by two ſoldiers, came to adviſe him to retire by the backdoor into the Chancellor's houſe, which was protected by a ſtrong ſafeguard, becauſe Count Tilli deſigned the papers that were lodged there ſhould come entire into his hands. The Lieutenant Colonel of the regiment of Hohenzollern was upon that guard, who addreſſing himſelf to Alting, With this axe, ſaid he, I have killed to day ten men; and Doctor Alting ſhould be the eleventh, did I but know where he had hid himſelf. Who are you? continued he, addreſſing himſelf to the Doctor. Alting was not ſo much diſturbed as not to return a ready anſwer, which was not the fartheſt from truth he could make. I have been Regent, anſwered he, in the College of the Sapience. The author of his Elogy compares this anſwer to that of Saint Athanaſius: Sane, ſays he, ille vultus, ille habitus, ille ſermo, is rerum articulus quemvis alium percellere poterat; at noſter imperterritus, ſolerti tamen uſus reſponſo, nec aperte ſe negavit Altingium, nec tamen intempeſtive ſe prodidit, eâdem fere, quâ olim in caſu ſimili S. Athanaſius dexteritate uſus, "Ego, inquit, "Ludimagiſter fui in Collegio Sapientiæ. The Lieutenant Colonel promiſed to ſave him. The next day the Jeſuits took poſſeſſion of the houſe, and made the Officer march off in ſuch haſte that he had not time to enquire about his School-maſter. Thus Alting remained in the hands of the Jeſuits; but had hid himſelf in a garret: and by good luck a cook, belonging to the Elector's court, was employed by Count Tilli, whoſe victuals were dreſſed in the Chancellor's houſe. The cook furniſhed him privately with the neceſſary proviſions, and even found him an opportunity of returning to his own houſe to ſee what paſſed there; and gave him three ſoldiers of the Bavarian troops for a ſafeguard. Alting found his houſe all in confuſion, and his ſtudy poſſeſſed by a Captain, who either in joke, or out of civility, told him, that he gave him leave to carry away what book he pleaſed. Alting did not think fit to accept of the offer, and only anſwered that if thoſe things belonged to him, he wiſhed that God would bleſs him with a longer poſſeſſion of them, than he had done their former owner. In returning he paſſed thro' a thouſand dangers; and after three days Tilli allowed him to retire. I have ſomewhere read, that Alting might have ſaved ſeveral books of the Elector's Library, had he not been afraid to expoſe his own houſhold-goods, and to paſs for a Plagiary, and that he removed many of them to the College of Sapience; but I own I don't underſtand this; for I find ſome contradiction in it. If thro' fear of being looked upon as a Plagiary, he was ſcarce allowed to continue there a few months; the Lutheran Miniſters having practiſed againſt him the doctrine of Non-toleration [E]. He retired with his family to Embden in 1623, and went from thence to wait upon the King of Bohemia at the Hague, who detained him to inſtruct his eldeſt ſon (d), and would not allow him to engage himſelf in the ſervice of the church of Embden, which deſired him for Paſtor; nor of the Academy of Franeker, which offered him in 1625 the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, vacant by the death of Sibrant Lubbert. That Prince gave him leave, with much reluctance, to accept the following year a Profeſſorſhip of Divinity at Groningen, which he took poſſeſſion of the 16th of June 1627, and kept it to the day of his death. It is true he was quite reſolved in 1633 to change Groningen for Leyden, but upon condition the eſtates of Groningen would give their conſent, which they refuſed to do. It is likewiſe true that he gave ear to the propoſals that were made him in 1634 in the name of Prince Lewis Philip (e) inviting him to come and re-eſtabliſh the Academy at Heidelberg, and the Churches of the Palatinate, and that he had already gone through a thouſand dangers as far as to Franckfort; but the battle of Norlingen, gained by the Imperialiſts, having defeated this undertaking, he was obliged to return through many by-roads to Groningen. We do not find in his hiſtory that he was ever afterwards fond of changing his abode. The laſt years of his life proved very painful, being miſerably tormented both with uneaſineſs of mind and bodily diſtempers. He was ſo grieved at the death of his eldeſt daughter in 1639, that he fell into a deep melancholy, which threw him into a quartan ague. The ague ended in a dangerous lethargy, which the Phyſicians had ſcarce cured him of with the utmoſt endeavours of their ſkill and art, but a domeſtic affliction that befel him threw him into a worſe ſtate of health than ever. He loſt his wife in 1643, which diſturbed him to ſuch a degree, that he could never afterwards get the better of his melancholy. From the time he was thus left alone to the day of his death he had no reſpite, but was continually paſſing from one indiſpoſition to another. He died devoutly and like a good Chriſtian the 25th of Auguſt 1644. He was a man of great merit. The books he wrote teſtify his learning [F], and his application in the diſcharge of his duty in the Academy; nor are there wanting proofs of his concerning himſelf in other things for the good of mankind. He went yearly to wait upon the King of Bohemia, and to inſpect the ſtudies of the Royal Family. He contributed very much to the collections that were made throughout (d) Who was drowned in Haerlem-Meer the 7th of Jan. 1629.

(e) He was Adminiſtrator of the Palatinate, and in 1633 offered Alting to be a Profeſſor of Divinity and Eccleſiaſtical Senator.

did not remove any book out of the Elector's Library into his own ſtudy, upon what grounds is it aſſerted that he removed ſeveral to the College of Sapience; and that he might have ſaved many? Beſides, he was allowed, according to the author of his Life, to take but one volume with him. Read however what follows: Hunc (Quintilianum) & alios illius Bibliothecæ libros ſua manu in Collegio Sapientiæ exceeperat Henricus Altingius, atque ex communi illo incendio Bavarico eripuiſſet, niſi ſuis reculis timuiſſet, & ne plagiarius haberetur, ſi antiquus liber in ejus ſupellectile reperiretur, veritus fuiſſet (7). i. e. "Henry Alting had taken Quintilian and other books "of that Library in the College of the Sapience, and "had ſaved them from the Bavarian flames, if he "had not been afraid of being accounted a Plagiary, "if that ancient book was found in his ſtudy."

(7) Lomeier, de Biblioth. p. 278. I doubt whether the word Plagiary be applied to one who ſteals not the thoughts of an author, but a book or volume in ſpecie without publiſhing it as his own.

[E] The Lutheran Miniſters practiſed againſt him the doctrine of Non-toleration.] At the entreaties of the Electoreſs he obtained leave from the Duke of Wirtemberg to reſide at Schorndorf, where he ſtayed till February after the devaſtation of the Palatinate, which the Lutheran Clergy complained of, and alſo of the Duke, for giving him ſuch a permiſſion. The motives of their complaint was, that Alting was a Profeſſor of Heidelberg. Ibi ad Februarium uſque hæſit, facultate hac per ſereniſſimam Electricem impetrata à Duce Wirtembergico, cujus alias Miniſtri Lutherani quaſi Ponti Axeni accolæ, aut aves Diomedeæ, quæ ſolos ſocios gratanter excipiunt, id ferebant ægerrimè, non alia de cauſa quam quod Altingius Profeſſor eſſet Heidelbergenſis (8). I do not doubt, but that they would have obſerved better the laws of hoſpitality towards a Merchant of the Palatinate; or even towards a Calviniſt Profeſſor, who had come from a remote country, than towards a Profeſſor of Heidelberg. The Palatinate bordered upon the Dukedom of Wirtemberg: the Profeſſors of Tubingen and Heidelberg often provoked one another with theſes and polemic writings; and from hence ſprung their theological and profeſſorial hatred. But after all, their animoſity againſt Alting is inexcuſable. He had eſcaped out of the Popiſh flames; the injury he had received from the common enemy ought to have been a ſtrong recommendation in his behalf; his belief differed not from theirs in any material point. If men are to hate and perſecute one another on account of religion, it ſhould be as amongſt the people of Egpyt, of whom one ſerved one Deity, and the other a quite different one.

(8) Vita Altingii.

Inter finitimos vetus atque antiqua ſimultas,
Immortale odium, & nunquam ſanabile vulnus
Ardet adhuc Ombos, & Tentyra; ſummus utrinque
Inde furor vulgo, quod numina vicinorum
Odit uterque locus, quum ſolos credat habendos
Eſſe Deos, quos ipſe colit (9).

(9) Juvenal. Sat. 15. ver. 33.

"An old grudge, to immortal hatred turn'd,
"Betwixt the Tentyrites and Ombites burn'd;
"A wound in theſe two neighbour-towns paſt
"cure:
"Becauſe that neither people will endure
"Their neighbours Deities; nor will have more
"Held to be Gods, than they themſelves adore.
Sir Robert Stapylton.

But the Eccleſiaſtic incendiaries always imagine that the difference is of the utmoſt conſequence. It is a Gangrene, ſay they; it undermines the very foundation of Religion.

[F] The books he wrote.] Thoſe that have been publiſhed are the following: Notæ in Decadem Problematum Johannis Behm de glorioſo Dei & beatorum cælo; Heidelbergæ, 1618. Loci communes, cum didactici, tum elenctici: Problemata, tam theoretica, quam practica: explicatio catecheſeos Palatinæ cum vindiciis ab Arminianis & Sotinianis; Amſtelodami, 1646, in three volumes. Exegeſis Auguſtanæ Confeſſionis, una cum ſyllabo controverſiarum Lutheranarum; Amſtelodami, 1647. Methodus Theologiæ didacticæ & catecheticæ; Amſtel. 1650. But moſt part of his works were never publiſhed, and ſome never finiſhed. The Catalogue of them is annexed to the author's Life: I found in that Catalogue, that the Medulla Hiſtoriæ prophanæ, publiſhed by Daniel Pareus, was compoſed by our Alting, of which theſt neither Thomaſius, nor Mr. Almeloveen have taken any notice (10). The Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Palatinate from the reformation to the adminiſtration of John Caſimir, is one of the moſt remarkable pieces among Alting's manuſcript works.

(10) He publiſhed a Catalogue of Plagiaries at the end of his Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ. Amſtelod. 1694, in 8vo.

out all the Proteſtant countries for the churches of Germany, and chiefly of the Palatinate. He was one of the three diſtributors of the collections that were made in England, and was Almoner of Lewis de Geer. I do not mention two other important commiſſions he was employed in, viz. the reviſal which was made at Leyden of the new Dutch tranſlation of the Bible, and the viſitation of the County of Steinfurt. In the firſt he had ſome Collegues, but in the ſecond he was the only general inſpector; the Count of Bentheim having ſent for him to inform againſt Socinianiſm, which the country was threatened with, and to eſtabliſh good order in the churches. Alting, as we are told in his Elogy, was no quarrelſome Divine [G]; he did not ſpend his time in trifles and falſe ſcruples; he was not fond of novelty, but zealous in behalf of the antient doctrine; an enemy to the ſpeculations of the ſchoolmen, and one that kept cloſe to the Scripture (f). Perſons of his profeſſion ought to take example by him as to the regulating of their families [H]. All that could be ſaid of his was, that every thing was there in good order; this was all the matter it afforded to talk of. He married at Heidelberg in 1614, and had ſeven children, whereof a daughter and two ſons ſurvived him. The eldeſt ſon was Profeſſor of Civil Law at Daventer (g). We ſhall treat of the other in the following article.

(f) Theologiam probabat ac tuebatur ſolidam ac maſculam, non ex lacunis Scholiaſticorum, etſi illarum inexpertus non eſſet, ſed ex fontibus Siloë & Scripturarum derivatam; ut gloriæ ſibi duceret ſe ab imperitis nonnullis ac naſutis Palæmonibus traduci tanquam Theologum Scripturarium & Biblicum. Vita Alting. i. e. "He "liked and followed a ſolid "and maſculine "Theology, not "derived from "the puddles of "the Schoolmen, "ignorants caſt tho' he was not ignorant of them neither, but from the ſprings of Siloë and the Scriptures, ſo that he gloried in the reproach which ſome upon him of being a Scripture Divine.

(g) Taken from the Life of James Alting, amongſt thoſe of the Profeſſors of Groningen, printed in folio, in 1654.

[G] He was no quarrelſome Divine.] We ſhall relate the very words of his Hiſtorian: Alienus à jurgiis & vitilitigiis Cuminiſectorum; ab iis diſtinctiunculis & ineptiis Sophiſtarum, quibus myſteria ſalutis potius implicantur quam explicantur; à ſcrupuloſitatibus Præciſiſtarum, qui nodum quærant in ſcirpo, colant culicem, camelum deglutientes (11). i. e. "He "was a ſtranger to the quarrels and ſquabbles of the "Cuminiſectors; to the little diſtinctions and fooleries "of the Sophiſts, by whom the myſteries of ſalvation are rather obſcured than explained; to the "ſcruples of the Preciſiſts, who ſtrain at a gnat and "ſwallow a camel." The ſect of the Preciſiſts made a great noiſe in Holland about forty years ago (12): we have a diſtinct character of them here: they ſtrain at a gnat, but ſwallow a camel, and make way to diſputes, which only ſerve to arm irreligious men and libertines. But let us go on: Ab omni denique καινοφονία & novatione in Theologicis, quaſi illud ſemper Tertulliani tenens, "primum quod-"que veriſſimum." i. e. Laſtly to all innovations in "Theology, holding that ſaying of Tertullian, the "firſt is the trueſt." It is certain that nothing is more pernicious than the love of novelty, which, after having ſet the Univerſities and Synods in a combuſtion, ſhakes, and ſometimes even overturns, States and Kingdoms. Such Profeſſors therefore as exhort their diſciples to guard themſelves againſt the ſpirit of innovation, can never be ſufficiently commended. Neither ought they to be deterred from earneſtly recommending the ancient and common tradition, becauſe they may ſeem thereby to admit the authority of the Church, which is rejected by all Proteſtants in oppoſition to the Church of Rome: they ought not, I ſay, to be deterred on that account; becauſe if men ſhould forbear the uſing of an argument till ſuch time as it became liable to no objections, they would be a long while without uſing any at all.

(11) Vita Jacobi Alting.

(12) This was written in 1698.

[H] All perſons of his profeſſion ought to take example by him as to the regulating of their families.] It was only known that no body knew what paſſed in his family, except that every thing was done according to the rules of decency and fear of God. Hinc in familia ejus omnia ſemper pacata, omnia ordinata, de qua hoc ſolum ſciretur, quod a nemine ſciretur, quid in illa fieret, niſi quod piè, compoſitè, decenter omnia fieri neminem lateret (13). That is a thouſand times better, than if every one talked of what is done or ſaid in a Clergyman's houſe. Such a report was ſpread there this morning, ſays one (14); laſt night ſuch a reflection of a news-monger was diſputed of there, ſays another. He may excuſe himſelf like Adam, adds a third, and ſay, the woman that thou haſt given me made me do it. What, ſays a fourth, you heard that circumſtance only there; I ſuſpect it much. The nympha loquax that preſides there is a prating goſſip, that helps the matter, and makes others add to the ſtory what ſhe pleaſes. I will have none of her gloſſes, and commentaries; I appeal to the text, how uncertain ſoever it may be. No wonder that Alting was inconſolable for the death of his wife, if what his Hiſtorian relates be true, viz. that he lived with her near thirty years without the leaſt complaint or quarrel. Cum ea per annos prope triginta ſine rixâ, ſine querela, conjunctiſſime vixit (15). This is what few perſons can brag of, as very few can complain that they do not know whether the effects of a reconciliation are as ſweet in marriage as in gallantry

(13) Vita Jacobi Alting.

(14) Compare this with the note [N] of GRUTER.

(15) Vita Jacobi Alting.

Amantium iræ amoris redintegratio eſt (16).

(16) Terent. Andr. Act. 3. Sc. 3. ver. 23.

"The falling out of lovers is the renewing of love.

ALTING (JAMES), ſon of the abovementioned, was Profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen. He was born at Heidelberg the 27th of September 1618, while his father was Deputy at the Synod of Dort. His infancy was ſpent in paſſing from one place to another [A]. He performed his ſtudies at Groningen with good ſucceſs; and as he was extremely fond of the Oriental Languages, he went to Embden in 1638, to improve himſelf there under the direction of the Rabbi Gamprecht Ben-Abraham. He travelled into England in 1640, where he made himſelf known to men of great note, and preached, and was ordained Prieſt of the Church of England by the learned John Prideaux Biſhop of Worceſter. He had reſolved never to leave that Kingdom, but afterwards accepted the Hebrew Profeſſorſhip vacant at Groningen by the death of Gomarus.

[A] His infancy was ſpent in paſſing from one place to another.] For at two years old he was ſent to Chriſtianus Chytræus Miniſter of Bretten. The enſuing year his mother, notwithſtanding her being with child, was obliged to retire to Heilbron, whither ſhe carried him along with her; from thence, at a year's end he was ſent to Schorndorf. Sequente mox anno propter imminentem Heidelbergæ obſidionem, matre etiam comite, eaque tum gravida Heilbronnam, indeque, exacto anno, Schorndorfium miſſus eſt (1). From Schorndorf his father Henry Alting brought his whole family, thro' many by-roads, to Embden. From Embden he went to Leyden, where he was Preceptor to the ſon of the King of Bohemia. The plague obliged him to leave Leyden, and retire to Honſlaerdijk: laſtly from Honſlaerdijk he went to Groningen, being invited thither to the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity in 1627. James Alting was then nine years old.

(1) Vita Jacobi Altingii.

(c) In 1673.

rus. He took poſſeſſion of this employment the 13th of January 1643, the ſame day that Samuel Des Marets was inſtalled in the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which had been held by the ſame Gomarus. In proceſs of time his titles and employments were increaſed; he was admitted Doctor of Philoſophy the 21ſt of October 1645, Preacher to the Academy in 1647, Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity in 1667. He went twice to Heidelberg, viz. in 1651 and 1662, where the Elector Palatine Charles Lewis expreſſed a great value for him, and often preſſed him to accept of the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, but he begged to be excuſed. He ſoon fell out with Samuel Des Marets his Collegue, which indeed could hardly be avoided, ſince they differed as to the method of teaching, and in ſome points, as to their principles. Alting kept to the Scripture, without meddling with ſcholaſtic Divinity: he was in the career of glory, and haſtened to go on in it; he wanted neither wit nor learning to maintain his opinions. The firſt Lectures which he read in his own houſe upon the Catechiſm drew ſuch crowds of hearers to him, that for want of room in his own chamber, he was obliged to uſe the Hall of the Academy; moſt of the foreign Students were on his ſide. His Collegue was accuſtomed to the diſtinctions and method of the School-men; had been a long time in great eſteem; publiſhed a great many books, and had a ſprightly genius with a great deal of learning: the Students in Divinity of the country adhered to him, thinking that the ſureſt way to church-preferments; for ſuch only were admitted to ſerve the Pariſh-churches, as had ſtudied according to his method. This was ſufficient to occaſion, and keep on foot, a miſunderſtanding between the two Profeſſors, even though their temper had had no ſhare in the quarrel. Alting had great difficulties to ſtruggle with; the majority of votes, and the authority of age, were on his adverſary's ſide, who beſides had a battery capable to alarm the world, and revive the moſt venerable prejudices. This was to give out that Alting was an innovator, a man who plucked up the boundaries, which our fathers had ſo wiſely placed on the confines of truth and falſhood. He ſet up for a publick informer, and charged James Alting with thirty one erroneous propoſitions. The Curators of the Academy ſent both the information and the anſwer to it, to the Divines of Leyden, without acquainting the parties, begging them to give their opinion upon the ſubject in debate. Their judgment is remarkable [B]. Alting was cleared from all hereſy, but his imprudence was blamed in broaching new hypotheſes; on the other hand Des Marets was found fault with for acting contrary to the laws of charity and modeſty (a). The latter would not ſubmit to that judgment, nor accept of the ſilence that was propoſed: He was for having the cauſe examined by Aſſemblies, Schools and Synods, which the heads would not agree to, forbidding all writings either in favour, or againſt the judgment of the Divines of Leyden; and thus the work of Des-Marets, intitled, Audi & alteram partem, was ſuppreſſed. This quarrel made a great deal of noiſe, and might have been attended with bad conſequences, eſpecially when Des Marets was called to the Univerſity of Leyden (b); but he died at Groningen (c) before he could take poſſeſſion of that employment. He made ſome ſort of reconciliation on his death-bed, which ſhall be mentioned in the note [C]. Alting was obliged to complain that he had been impoſed

(a) Cum Altingium ab omni hæreſeos notâ abſolverent, in ipſo autem prudentiam in procudendis novè inventis, in Mareſio modeſtiam & charitatem requirerent. Vita Jacob. Alting.

(b) Et res miram habitura cataſtrophen, Mareſio quanquam ſene ad Theologiæ Profeſſionem Lugdunum in Batavis vocato. Vita Jacob. Alting.

(c) In May 1673.

[B] Their judgment is remarkable.] I do not intend to declare myſelf, in this diſpute, for either ſide; all I have to ſay is, that on the like occaſions one cannot help judging as the Divines of Leyden did. Thoſe, who invent new hypotheſes, are but too apt to maintain them at the expence of the peace and tranquillity both of the Church and Univerſities. They may be orthodox, but cannot be prudent; for it is a piece of imprudence and temerity to diſturb the public without ſome great and urgent cauſe. Thoſe, who oppoſe a new method of teaching, ſhew commonly too much paſſion and violence: I am willing to grant, that ſometimes they have no private views; but they run upon extremes, alarm the whole Church for trifles, and make the world fear a total depravation as to the confeſſion of faith, when there is yet no attempt againſt it. They may therefore be zealous, but at the ſame time it muſt be owned, that their zeal is not accompanied with moderation, charity, or juſtice. Nay they are often as imprudent as their adverſaries: they do not reflect, that a new method, if not minded, drops of itſelf; but, if oppoſed, degenerates into a party. The author of the new method may have relations in the Government, who will ſuſtain him with all their clients. Thus you will ſoon ſee the Civil and Canon Laws combined, and the factions of the Church and State matched together. What miſchiefs may we not fear from ſuch a conflict? How many evils would Religion, and likewiſe the State, avoid, were men contented only to oppoſe fundamental innovations?

[C] He made ſome ſort of reconciliation on his death-bed.] A Clergyman of Groningen ſeeing that Mr. Des Marets was paſt all hopes of recovery, ſuggeſted a reconciliation between him and his collegue; and having his conſent, he went to make the ſame propoſal to Mr. Alting, who anſwered, that his ſilence in the midſt of the clamours and books of his adverſary witneſſed for his peaceable temper; that he was always ready to accept of a peace upon reaſonable terms; but that he demanded ſatisfaction for the injurious reports that had been ſpread abroad to the prejudice of his honour and reputation; and that he did not underſtand how any one could court his friendſhip while he believed him to be a man of ſuch a character, as he had been repreſented to be. Upon this the mediator retired, without making any further propoſals. Not long after it was given out in the city, that Mr. Alting had been ſo hard-hearted as abſolutely to refuſe to be reconciled with his dying collegue; ſo true it is, that town-reports do not repreſent things as they are in themſelves. The mediator, accompanied by another Clergyman, returned to Mr. Alting, and obtained from him a formulary of the ſatisfaction he deſired. This formulary was no ways liked by Mr. Des Marets, and that, which Mr. Des Marets drew up, did not at all pleaſe Mr. Alting; there was more goings to and fro on this occaſion than in the capitulation of a fortreſs. At laſt, the alteration which Mr. Alting made in the formulary of Mr. Des Marets having been accepted of, upon condition that Mr. Alting would approve of what Mr. Des Marets added to it, to make the conditions equal on both ſides, the articles were ſigned; and this was all the reconciliation. Note, that the parties only retracted the perſonal injuries; as to the accuſations in point of doctrine, the accuſer referred them to the judgment of the Church (2).

(2) Taken from a Letter of James Alting in the fifth volume of his works.

posed upon [D], and was not easy, though delivered from so formidable an adversary. The Clergy was continually murmuring at what they call innovations [E]; but the secular power wisely prevented the storms, which the Synods and Convocations would have raised, threatning to interdict such as should revive the quarrel of these two champions. Alting never enjoyed his health the three last years of his life, and at last was seized with a continual fever, of which he died the ninth day, the 20th of August 1679. He died piously, resigned to the will of God, and often recommended the edition of his works to the care of his cousin Menso Alting Burgo-Master of Groningen. His desire was complied with some years after with the impression of five volumes in folio [F]. He lived a single life till near the thirtieth year of his age, and then married [G]. Had he lived longer he would have composed two books, one in Latin, the other in Dutch: The first was to be An Apology of his Doctrine; and the other The History of his Life from the time of his Professorship; and thereby he would have shewn how undeservedly he had been [D] Alting was obliged to complain that he had been imposed upon.] His complaint was occasioned by the last edition of the System of Mr. Des Marets, where he found himself very ill used. He pretended his adversary should have left no monuments of the quarrel, and that his reconciliation had not been sincere, since he had not suppressed such an injurious book. Posteaquam autem ad plures abiit (Maresius) (3) Alting. tom. 5. Mantissa pag. 425. . . . . monitus fui ego (3) de Systematis novi perpetuis Annotationibus, quæ infandis maledictis cum in alios tum in me constarent. Liber ille paucis ante mortem ipsius diebus vendi quidem cœperat, sed nondum in meas ædes fuerat illatus. . . . Curavi ergo afferri, atque inde didici quantopere D. Maresius mihi illusisset, quando in speciem concordiam redintegrari expetiit. Etenim quotiescunque verum illud est ac sincerum votum, non tantum verbis pax initur, sed etiam abolentur omnia monumenta prioris inimicitiæ. Tenera namque conscientia ad suam ipsius infamiam spectare retur, si quod ipsamet damnavit, atque ex sua memoria abolitum voluit universorum notitiæ ac memoriæ infixum dederit, editis contumeliosis chartis per universum orbem disseminatis. i. e. "After Des Maret's death, . . I was "informed that the Annotations on the new System "were full of abominable reflections both on my "self and others. The book was published a few "days before his death, but was not brought so soon "to my house. . . . I procured it, and found how much "Des Marets had deceived me, when he pretended to "be desirous of a renewal of our friendship. For "when such a desire is real and sincere, it is not "only a verbal peace that is made, but also all monu-"ments of former hatred are forgotten. For a ten-"der conscience is thought to work its own infa-"my, if it fixes that in the knowledge and memory "of all men by publishing reproachful books all "over the world, which it would have blotted out "of its own memory." If I am allowed to speak my mind freely, I think there was no reason to pretend that Mr. Des Marets should have suppressed a whole large volume; had he done so, the Bookseller must have been indemnified; and so the reconciliation would not have only cost a retractation, a nollem factum; but would have been a pecuniary loss to the family; since not three or four sheets were to be suppressed, but the entire work, as Alting himself owns. Cum in illius esset potestate totum opus suppressisse, quæ unica supererat in opere usquequaque sibi conformi emendatio (4). i. e. "When "it was in his own power to have suppressed the "whole work, which was the only way of correcting "it as it was every where uniform." He declared in a writing under his hand, that he retracted whatever he might have said, or published, against the reputation of his adversary; and that was enough. Ita ut inDicta velit Cl. D. Maresius, si quæ in dictis & scriptis ipsius in famam Cl. D. Altingii incurrere videantur (5). i. e. "So that the learned Des Marets would "be glad to have unsaid all that reflects upon the "learned Alting's character, in his words or writ-"ings." With this alone he might have died canonically, according to the phrase used on the other side the Alpes, è morto canonicamente.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Idem, ibid.

[E] The Clergy was continually murmuring against his innovations.] The following words will inform us of the whole matter. Qualis fuerit utriusque ante mortem mutua conciliatio ipsiusmet Autoris Epistola initio Mantissæ tomi quinti posita testatur. Quiescente Maresio, non sic tamen quiescendum sibi duxerunt qui ipsius partium fuerant. Nihil autem adeo dedisse operam videntur, quam ut via quasi ecclesiastica, per synodos, classes, & quas dicimus correspondentias, Altingii opinionibus obsisterent. Ita variis quidem fluctibus postea jactatus vir optimus, suæ autem sententiæ tenacissimus tandem fere enatavit; siquidem quotiescunque aliquid proponeret Ecclesiasticorum ordo, illud mox procerum edicto vel consulto rejectum est. Imo exauctorationis etiam pœna in eos constituta, qui de controversiis Maresio-Altingianis in cœtu aliquo Pastorum quidquam moverent. Ita factum sæpius est, ut generalibus etiam verbis concepta gravumina de periculosis novitatibus in spongiam incubuerint (6). i. e. (6) In vita Jacobi Alting. "What sort of reconciliation they had before they "died appears from the Author's Epistle prefixed to "the Mantissa of the fifth volume. Tho' Des Marets "was quiet, yet his Partisans had no mind to be "so. They seem to have made it their chief aim "to beat down Alting's opinions by ecclesiastical "methods, by Synods, Classes, and what we call "Correspondences. Thus this good man, but most "tenacious of his own opinion, tho' a long time "tossed about by various waves, yet at length es-"caped. For no sooner did the Ecclesiastics pro-"pose any thing, but immediately it was rejected "by an Edict or Decree of the Magistrates. Nay "they were threatned with deprivation, who should "start any thing of the disputes between Des Marets "and Alting, in an assembly of the Clergy. Thus it of-"ten came to pass, that the complaints which were "made in general words concerning dangerous "innovations, were absolutely suppress'd." Hence we may infer, that there was no mischief he had not reason to apprehend from the Divines, had he not been protected by the Magistrates. It is not to be questioned but that the secular and ecclesiastical power stand in need of each other; the ecclesiastical power must now and then spur the secular, and the secular bridle the ecclesiastical.

Alterius sic
Altera poscit opem res, & conjurat amice (7). (7) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 410.

"Mutually they need each other's aid.
Lord Roscommon.

[F] His desire was complied with some years after with the impression of five volumes in folio.] The late Mr. Bekker, then Minister at Amsterdam, who had been the author's disciple and good friend, took particular care of this edition. It appeared at Amsterdam in 1687, and contains divers analytical, exegetical, practical, problematical, and philosophical tracts, which not only witness James Alting's laborious life, but likewise his deep knowledge. His diligence may be known by another consideration. Most men of great study grow at last averse from writing of letters, which fault he was never guilty of; for he wrote no fewer than five thousand, tho' only a small number of them has been published. Loquuntur epistolæ quarum tam paucas ex 5000 publicari potuisse, id equidem dolendum. Erat autem ad scribendas literas impiger (8). The bare names of the Divines to whom he wrote shew that he was no Voetien. (8) Vita Jacobi Altingii.

[G] He lived a single life till near the 30*th year of his age, and then married.*] Vitam cœlibem ad annum ætatis trigesimum fere perduxit; cujus tandem pertæsus junxit tibi tori sociam (9). Of the eight children which God had given him three were alive when he died; one professed Physic, another followed the Law, and the third served in the army. The first and last of these three survived him but a few years. (9) Idem.

been harraſſed with ſo many troubles (d) [H]. This is what I have extracted from his life prefixed to the firſt volume of his works. If any one finds untruths in this article, I beg he would not aſcribe them to me, who have only related what I find in the book I have cited. I give this notice once for all, that I do not warrant the truth of ſuch accounts; and conclude with this remark, that Alting was a Divine greatly addicted to the text of the Scripture, to Cocceianiſm, and Kabbiniſm. His application to Rabbiniſm expoſed him to a great affront [I]. He preached well in three languages, viz. German, Dutch and Engliſh.

(d) Ex vita Jacob. Alting. in limine operum, editor. Amſt. an. 1687.

[H] How undeſervedly he had been harraſſed with ſo many troubles.] Thoſe who prefer the words of the original to my abſtract, will meet with ſatisfaction in the following paſſage. Dixit inter alia (Altingius) ſi Deus ſibi vitam viresque concederet, ſtare ſibi animum duos libellos in lucem mittendi, alterum quidem, quem orſus etiam eſt, quo ſe purgaret coram Eccleſia ab heterodoxias & hæreſeos crimine ſibi intentato; alterum vero, quo hiſtoriam vitæ ſuæ publicæ panderet, ab eo tempore quando in Academia docere cæpiſſet, unde cuivis judicandum relinqueret, quo jure, qua injuria tantum ipſi moleſtiarum creatum fuiſſet. . . . Præ cæteris autem conquerebatur à malevolorum inſidiis atque inimicitiis ſtetiſſe; quo minus ut vellet publico inſervire potuiſſet (10). i. e. " Alting " ſaid among other things, that if God would grant " him life and ſtrength, he was determined to publiſh " two books; in one of them, which he had begun, " he propoſed to purge himſelf before the Church " of the imputation of heterodoxy and hereſy; in " the other he intended to ſet forth the Hiſtory of " his public life, from the time of his beginning to " teach in the Univerſity; where he would leave " it to any one to judge how juſtly or unjuſtly " ſuch a load of troubles had been raiſed againſt him. " But above all he complained, that he was hindred " from ſerving the publick as much as he deſired, " by the treacheries and hatred of ill deſigning men." It is certainly much to be lamented that men of great parts ſhould be diverted by domeſtic quarrels, from employing their talents in ſervice of their own communion, and in oppoſing the common enemy, againſt whom the whole ſtrength of a party ought to be kept cloſely united. I do not mention the ſcandal which ſuch proceedings raiſe, for we ought rather to be ſcandalized at the little ſcandal they occaſion. Whether the reaſon of that is, becauſe to be ſcandalized, when there is juſt occaſion of taking offence, requires ſuch a ſhare of judgment as few attain to; or becauſe there is nothing but what we may be inured to by cuſtom, and that ab aſſuetis non fit paſſio; or whatſoever elſe may be the cauſe of it; it is certain that thoſe, who keep on foot diviſions by ſowing, under pretence of zeal, violent and outragious libels, filled with cavils, generally meet with great favour. Is the cauſe of this, that to be ſcandalized, when there is juſt motive of ſcandal, requires ſuch a ſhare of judgment as few have? or rather becauſe there is nothing, but what men may be inured to by cuſtom, and ab aſſuetis non fit paſſio? But whatever may be the cauſe of it, it is certain, that people have an exceſſive indulgence for ſuch as under pretence of zeal keep on foot diviſions by their violent and outragious libels. Nothing would be more effectual to repreſs the itching deſire ſome perſons have to write bitter and ſatyrical books againſt their brethren, than if people were offended in earneſt at ſuch a conduct, and gave public proofs of their contempt and indignation. But while they follow the party that makes moſt noiſe and buſtle, the diſeaſe may be looked upon as incurable.

(10) Ibid.

[I] His application to Rabbiniſm expoſed him to a great affront.] He was deemed a half Jew; a man, who differed from a Jew only in not being circumciſed; of the want of which he ſometimes complained. What gave occaſion to theſe injuries was his maintaining, that the points of the Tetragrammaton are not proper for that name; and conſequently, that the true pronunciation of it is unknown; and that ſuch as read it Adonai, ought not to be accuſed of Jewiſh ſuperſtition. Here follows the judgment that was paſſed upon that opinion. Impudentia eſt Grammaticorum nonnullorum, & filiorum Bicri negare ea ſuperſtitione Judaica oriri, quod id nomen aliter pronuncietur quam legitur.——Sed per nos homines Semi-Judæi doctrina, ſtudio, affectu, commercio, & qui ſolo fere pondere præputii, & quo interdum ſe gravari dolent, diſtant à recutitis, inſaniant ut libuerit.——Veſtræ eſt impudentiæ, petulantiæ & ſuperbiæ in primo gradu, quod auſitis dicam ſcribere imperitiæ & ignorantiæ tot illuſtribus eccleſiæ viris, vobis etiam longe doctioribus, quod id nominis enuncient, & pronuncient uti ſcribitur (11). Was this a ſufficient cauſe to be ſo very angry? have we not here a plain inſtance of what a Pagan Philoſopher judiciouſly obſerved. Crede mihi, levia ſunt propter quæ non leviter excandeſcimus, qualia quæ pueros in rixam & jurgium concitant. Nihil ex his, quæ tam triſtes agimus, ſerium eſt, nihil magnum. Inde, inquam, vobis ira & infantia eſt, quod exigua magno æſtimatis (12). i. e. " Believe me, we are not a " little angry about little offences, ſuch as ſtir up " feuds and quarrels among children. None of " theſe things about which we are ſo earneſt, are ei- " ther ſerious or great. Thus, I ſay, it is paſſion " and childiſhneſs in you, to make ſo much of tri- " fles." Could any thing worſe be ſaid againſt a man, who entertained thoughts of apoſtatizing from the faith, and only waited for the ſolution of three or four ſmall difficulties to turn Jew?

(11) Oper. Alting. tom. 5. in Mentiſſa, p. 426.

(12) Senec. de Ira, lib. 3. cap. 34.

☞ALVARES (a) DE LUNA, the favourite of John II King of Caſtile in Spain, was famous for the abſolute aſcendant which he had over his Maſter for many years together, and the puniſhment which he ſuffered at laſt. He was natural ſon of Don Alvaro de Luna Lord of Canete in Arragon, and his mother was a woman who had no valuable qualifications but beauty, and was infamous for her unbounded luſt. Dr. Geddes (b) calls her a common ſtrumpet, who had three ſons before by unknown fathers. Our de Luna was born at Canete about the year 1388; his firſt name was Peter, and it was changed to that of Alvares by Pope Benedict XIII, who was charmed by his wit when he was but a child. He was introduced into the court in the year 1408, and made one of the Gentlemen of King John II's bed-chamber (c), where the advantage of his perſon, and his eaſy and inſinuating addreſs raiſed him to the higheſt pitch of authority in the State. In the year 1427 he was obliged to retire from court, but was ſoon after recalled by the King [A], and inveſted with all the authority which

(a) Dr. Geddes calls him Alvaro. See his Tracts vol. 4.

(b) Ubi ſupra, p. 229.

(c) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, tom. 2. l. 19. c. 17. p. 204. edit. Moguntiæ 1605.

[A] Obliged to retire from court, but was ſoon after recalled by the King.] The greateſt part of the Courtiers reſolved to exert their utmoſt efforts to ruin Alvares, for they were uneaſy to obſerve that he ſhould govern all things in ſo proud and avaricious a manner, by the aſſiſtance of a few upſtart men whom he had raiſed and fixed to his intereſt. They complained that a man who was eminent for no ſkill in military affairs, and no virtues of any kind, ſhould by mere artifice and diſſimulation be advanced to ſuch an which he enjoyed before, and revenged himſelf ſeverely upon his enemies [B]. Mariana has repreſented his character in a ſtrong and beautiful light [C], by which we find that his haughtineſs and paſſion raiſed the enmity of the Nobility againſt him. Of the five and forty years which he ſpent at court, he enjoyed for thirty of them ſo entire a command over the King, that nothing could be done without his expreſs orders; and the King himſelf had not the liberty ſo much as to change his officers or ſervants, nor even his cloaths and diet without his approbation (d). In ſhort he wanted nothing but the name of King to complete his grandeur; he had all the places of the King-dom in height of favour and power, that he reigned alone, though another had the title of King. They could not view his proſperous ſituation without the ſtrongeſt emotions of regret and envy, and they thought it very unreaſonable that a man ſhould be brought out of low and mean circumſtances to ſuch a diſproportionate ſtate of power and magnificence. He being very confident of the King's favour, with whom he had lived in the utmoſt familiarity from his childhood, and ſecure of what might happen, treated every perſon as vaſtly inferior to him, and depended too much upon his preſent power. Nay there was a report, and it was affirmed by men of eminence and character, that he had the aſſurance to offer gallantry to the Queen herſelf; but this was not ſufficiently proved at that time; and it is probable that many ſtories were invented and believed to his diſadvantage. But let us hear Mariana in his noble and expreſſive language. Maxima procerum pars in perniciem Alvari conſpiravit, quem in aulâ cum paucis, iiſque novis hominibus, atque ejus beneficio obligatis ſuperbè & avarè dominari dolebant. Nullâ militari laude, nullis virtutibus, unâ ingenii dexteritate, & aſſimulatis ad tempus officiis ad eum gratiæ & potentiæ gradum evectum querebantur ſcilicet, ſolumque alieno nomine regnare; retentem ejus fælicitatem ægris oculis aſpicientes, & fortunæ modum in homine alioqui humili & obſcuro requirentes maximè. Ipſe favore Principis ferox; cui à puero in omnia jura familiaritatis aſſueverat, venturique ſecurus, cæteros omnes præ ſe viles exiſtimare, nimiumque præſenti potentiâ fidere; ut Reginam de turpi amore appellaſſe, rumor eſſet, & magni viri affirmarent; verò an falsò, compertum ne tum quidem fuit; & multa ex invidiâ crimina afficta creditaque putamus fuiſſe (1). However the party at laſt prevailed againſt him, and procured him to be baniſhed from court for a year and an half; upon which he retired to Aylon, a town under his own juriſdiction, where he was attended by a great number of the Nobility (2). But this misfortune of his was the greateſt affliction to the King imaginable. Mariana has a reflection upon this uncommon affection between him and Alvarez. He obſerves, that the Stoics were of opinion, that every man's courſe of life is determined by an eternal chain of ſecret cauſes, which they call Fate, and that all the prudence of mankind can never prevent what is deſtined for them by this immutable Law. This is the aſſertion of that grave and ſevere ſect of Philoſophers; and yet every one muſt ſee the abſurdity of ſuch a ſcheme, ſince it deprives men of that liberty of action and determination, which is the characteriſtic of human nature. But yet it muſt be owned, that there was ſome peculiar cauſe, which united the minds of the King of Caſtile, and Alvarez ſo firmly, that ſcarce any thing could divide them; tho' this union expoſed them both to the public hatred. Nay the latter was conſidered in a more ſhocking light than the Sejanus's, Patrobius's, Polycletus's, and Aſiaticus's, who were the Freedmen of the Roman Emperors, and were univerſally hated on account of the Aſcendant, which they had over their Maſters. How comes it to paſs, that neither the King ſhould be the leaſt affected by the infamy, which he ſuffer'd on account of his familiarity with this Miniſter; nor Alvarez foreſee the ruin, which he was precipitating himſelf upon? Things in a moderate ſtate are generally laſting; but thoſe which are exceſſive are ſubject to deſtruction; and the higher men are raiſed into favour, the more they ought to abate of their vanity, and conſider the uncertainty of human affairs. There ſeems, ſays Mariana, to be ſome peculiar efficacy in the influence of the Stars, which preſide at the birth of men; and from thence the inclinations and averſions of Kings take their riſe; or the ſword of God's juſtice confounds the mind, when he would not have the force of it abated, as it happened in the preſent caſe. Æternâ conſtitutione nexuque cauſarum latentium (quod fatum vocant) quemque hominum ſuum curſum peragere, neque eſſe aliquid in noſtris conſiliis, ad evitandum quod eſt immutabili lege deſtinatum, Stoici perſuadere conati ſunt, genus alioqui Philoſophorum cum primis ſeverum & grave. Stultè, inquis, & inaniter. Quid id neget? an major eſſe furor poſſit, quam homini, per quod homo eſt, conſiliorum ſuorum & vitæ arbitrium detrahere? Sed cauſam tamen extitiſſe aliquam fateri neceſſe eſt, quæ Regem Caſtellæ & Alvarum Lunam ita conſtrinxit ac conglutinavit animis, ita devinxit voluntates, ut divelli vix poſſent; quamvis publicâ ex ea re invidiâ flagrarent ambo, majori Alvarus; ut Sejanos, Patrobios, Polycletos, Aſiaticos, Romanorum Principum libertos, vetera odiorum nomina ſuperaret. Quî factum, ut neque Rex infamiâ moveretur, quæ ex ea familiaritate orta erat, neque Alvarus exitium provideret, ad quod magnis itineribus feſtinabat? Nempe moderata durant, violenta in præceps ruunt; quoque magis humanus favor extulit, hoc magis ſe deprimere homines debent, varioſque caſus metuere, memores humanæ inconſtantiæ. Nimirum eſt in aſtris poteſtas aliqua, conditioneſque naſcendi; inde Principum inclinationes, offenſioneſque ortum plerumque habent; aut perſtringit mentem divinæ vindictæ gladius, cum aciem ſuam retundi non vult, uti in præſenti accidit (3). The King appeared every day overwhelmed with the deepeſt melancholly; he ſhewed all the marks of diſtreſs in his countenance from the moment Alvarez was removed from him. He ſpoke of him by day, and he dreamt of him by night. When the Courtiers obſerved this, they found, that he muſt infallibly be ſoon recalled, and would very probably be raiſed to an higher degree of favour than before; upon which they exerted themſelves in order to gain his friendſhip, ſo that upon the death of Roderic Davala, who had been the rival of Alvarez, he was immediately reſtored to his dignities (4).

(d) Idem, ibid. l. 22. c. 13. p. 313.

(1) Mariana, lib. 20. c. 15. pag. 240.

(2) Ibid. p. 241, 242.

(3) Id. l. 29. c. 16. p. 242, 243.

(4) Id. ibid.

[B] Revenged himſelf ſeverely upon his enemies.] As ſoon as he returned to court, he reſolved to ſupport the authority, which he was advanced to, by every method that he could employ. Inſtead of gaining over the Courtiers to his party by all the inſtances of civility and generoſity, which were neceſſary in ſuch a circumſtance, he perſuaded the King to baniſh them the court, and oblige every one of them to retire to their own houſes. This was the worſt Counſel, that could poſſibly have been followed, and it proved particularly fatal to him, who was the author of it. Quam primum in curiam rediit, proceres, quos novis officiis placare debuit, ii ut ab aula pellerentur, & pro ſe quiſque domos abire cogerentur, auctor Regi extitit; peſſimum conſilium exitialeque ipſi imprimis conſultori futurum (5). In ſhort his conduct alienated the minds of all the great men from the King, occaſioned a thouſand diſorders in his Kingdom, and involved him in a war with the King of Arragon (6).

(5) Id. l. 21. c. 1. p. 246.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[C] Repreſented his character in a ſtrong and beautiful light.] The Hiſtorian introduces it with an excellent reflection upon the abſurdity of mankind, who unjuſtly complain of the uncertainty of human affairs, and repreſent them as precarious and mutable every moment, and conducted rather by the raſhneſs of fortune, than any certain principles of wiſdom and prudence; whereas their own ill conduct is rather to be accuſed, which frequently hurries them on to ruin. For where is the wonder if an indolent youth produces a neceſſitous old age? If the eſtate of our anceſtors is loſt in luxury and extravagance? If power, that has been abuſed, is taken away from us?

dom in his diſpoſal; he was the Maſter of the Treaſury, and had gained the affections of the ſubjects by his profuſe bounty to them. The King was informed ſufficiently of the extravagant conduct of his favourite, but he durſt not complain the leaſt of it, becauſe Alvares was grown ſo prodigiouſly formidable. However at laſt, as he proceeded ſtill greater lengths in the abuſe of his power, an accuſation was formed againſt him full of the moſt ſhocking crimes; he was ſeized [D] and condemned us? If envy and certain deſtruction follows pride? The true names of things are loſt among us; to give away the property of others, and to be laviſh of our own, is called liberality. Raſhneſs, eſpecially if it be attended with ſucceſs, is accounted laudable. Ambition is eſteemed honourable, and a violent and extravagant uſe of power claims the character of a juſt and reaſonable ſeverity. Our fortune is very ſeldom different from our manners. We are improper judges of things, and enquire after foreign cauſes of unhappineſs, which are often not diſcoverable, though ſome of them may appear. This, ſays Mariana, I premiſe, before I enter upon the ſad cataſtrophe of Alvares de Luna. Being raiſed from a low condition of life, he gained the utmoſt height of grandeur; but ambition urged him on to his deſtruction. He had ſeveral valuable qualifications in him, and ſeveral defects; the event ſhewed which were predominant. His wit was lively and penetrating, his judgment clear, his ſpeech proper, and enlivened with an agreeable facetiouſneſs, and a ſatyrical turn of humour; but he had a little impediment and heſitation in it. He was maſter of a profound cunning and diſſimulation, and he had a great ſhare of confidence, pride and ambition, which, with a mixture of treachery, were the ingredients of his compoſition. His body was ſmall, but firm, and proper for the ſervices of war. His face was ſmall, but agreeable, and it had an air of dignity. Such was the turn of his nature in his youth, and age confirmed and encreaſed it. Add to this, that he had a contempt for men, which is the common defect of courtiers, and he was difficult of acceſs. In the decline of life he was very liable to exceſſive ſallies of anger. Like a wild beaſt, which has been ſhut up in a cage, and wounded with darts, and then let looſe, he was inflamed by the hatred of his enemies, and being impotent in his ſucceſs, committed a great many inſtances of cruelty from the ſpirit of revenge. It is no wonder that a man of this character ſhould fall, but it is rather ſcandalous that he ſhould maintain his poſt ſo long. Ab humili ducta fortuna ad ſummum pervenerat; in præceps ambitio, dedit. Bona inerant in naturâ moribuſque, inerant mala: utra magis eventus indicat. Ardens ingenium, perſpicax judicium, aptus ſermo, & cum aculeo facetus, quadam tantum hæſitantiâ tardior; profunda calliditas atque ſimulatio, audacia, ſuperbia, ambitio, ex quibus atque ex fraude compoſitus videbatur. Corpus exiguum, ſed firmum, & bellicis laboribus idoneum. Facies minuta, venuſta tamen, cum dignitateque. Hæc a primis annis ſuſcepta confirmavit ætas auxitque. Acceſſit contemptus hominum, commune potentium malum, aditus difficilis. Ætatis flexu ira pervicacior fuit. Quaſi fera in cavea petita jaculis, deinde emiſſa, inimicorum odio exacerbatus, impotenſque ſucceſſu, quas non ſtrages dedit vindictæ ſtudio ardens? His moribus non corruiſſe mirum eſt, ſed tandiu perſtitiſſe pudendum (7).

(7) Id. l. 22. c. 12. p. 310.

[D] He was ſeized.] An accident furniſhed at laſt an opportunity of compleating his ruin. It was as follows: Peter Stunica (8), Count of Placentia, retired to a town, where he lived privately, and avoided interpoſing in public affairs at ſo dangerous a time. This Alvares imagined was done out of hatred to him, upon which he reſolved the deſtruction of the Count. Garſias, the ſon of the Duke of Alva, uſed continually to iſſue out of a caſtle, which was ſituated near that town, and plunder the country, in revenge for his father's impriſonment. Alvares adviſed the ſiege of that caſtle, determining at the ſame time to ſeize upon the Count of Placentia. But this deſign of his was turned againſt himſelf. Several of the Nobility at the Count's deſire formed a conſpiracy againſt Alvares's life. Five hundred Horſe were ſent to Valladolid, whither the King was come from Burgos, to ſeize unexpectedly upon Alvares, tho' another deſign was pretended. An aſſembly of the Nobility being appointed at Burgos, they returned thither, by the advice of Alvares. Enecus Stunica the brother of the Count of Placentia, was Governor of the caſtle of that city; and the Count of Placentia was ſent for with a body of ſoldiers to deſtroy his enemy. But he being indiſpoſed, his ſon Don Alvares was ſent, and while he was preparing his ſoldiers, the King adviſed de Luna to retire, telling him, that he was not ignorant how much he was hated; that for his own part, he was reſolved to govern by the Counſels of his Nobles. Alvares refuſed to obey him, till he had ſent for the Archbiſhop of Toledo, whom he intended to ſubſtitute in his room. However he diſcovered from the King's diſcourſe, that there was a plot againſt him; and yet he was ſo infatuated that he killed Alfonſo Biverus (9) the King's Counſellor at his houſe, and threw his body into the river, without any regard to the day, which was Good-Friday. A man was ſent immediately to haſten the coming of Alvares Stunica; who came firſt with his head covered, and after him followed at proper diſtances eighty horſe. Several of the Citizens were ſent for to the caſtle at night, and ordered to ſecure the ſtreets of the city. A report was ſpread upon this all over the city, that Alvares was to be committed to priſon the next day; but no body acquainted him with it; for their minds were ſeized with ſuch an amazement, that they knew not what to do. Gotor, one of the family, when he heard of the danger Alvares was in, adviſed him to retire in the night to a houſe in the ſuburbs, but he was incapable of obeying that uſeful Counſel. His mind was agitated with ſuch a variety of thoughts, that he could not tell what to determine upon. At laſt he reſolved to wait the event. It is very probable, that he was ſo confident of himſelf and his own power, that he deſpiſed his enemies. However things being thus prepared early on Thurſday morning the 4th of April, the houſe, where he was, was ſurrounded with a body of armed men; but they did not think proper to uſe violence, tho' ſeveral of the ſoldiers had been wounded from the windows. At laſt Alvares ſurrendred himſelf, having received a writing from the King, wherein he aſſured him, that he ſhould receive no injury; but this promiſe was immediately broken. He was committed to cuſtody in the ſame houſe, and ſeeing from the window the Biſhop of Ebula *, who came to dine at that houſe after Maſs, ſtanding by the King, he ſaid to him, "You, Prieſt, "ſhall ſuffer for this injury, which has been offered "me." The Biſhop aſſured him in the moſt ſolemn manner, that he had no ſhare in that advice. This ſhews, that Alvares's haughty temper was not yet abated by his misfortunes. Pœnas, inquit, Sacrificule, hujus noſtræ injuriæ dabis; ad quem ille, Deum teſtor, reſpondit, nullam me hujus conſilii partem fuiſſe. Nondum domita multis Alvari ferocia erat. After dinner was over, when he found that he could not obtain leave to ſpeak to the King in perſon, he ſent a note to him in theſe terms: "It is five and "forty years, Sir, ſince I was admitted into your "ſervice. I do not complain of the rewards, which "I have received; they were greater than my me-"rits or expectation. This I ſhall not deny. There "was but one thing wanting to compleat my hap-"pineſs, and that was to have fixed proper bounds "in time to this great fortune of mine. While in-"ſtead of chooſing retirement, after the example of "the greateſt Men, I ſtill continued in the employ-"ment, which I thought was my duty, and abſolute-"ly neceſſary for your intereſt, I fell into this mis-"fortune. It is very hard that I ſhould be deprived "of liberty, when I have more than once riſqu'd "my life and fortune to reſtore it to you. Grief "prevents me from ſaying more. I know that the "Deity is provoked againſt me by my ſins; but it "will be ſufficient for me, if his anger is appeaſed "by theſe calamities, which I ſuffer. I can no

(8) Dr. Geddes call'd him D'Eſtuniga.

(9) Dr. Geddes calls him Alonzo Perez.

* Dr. Geddes calls it Abula.

condemned on the fifth of July (e) 1453 to loſe his head, which was executed at Valladolid with all the circumſtances of infamy imaginable [E]. His head was fixed upon a pole, and his body was left upon the ſcaffold for three days with a baſon near it, in order to receive the charity of thoſe who were willing to contribute to the burying of it, which was at laſt done in the church of St. Andrew, where criminals uſed to be interred. It was removed thence to the church of St. Francis in that city, and ſeveral years after it was brought to the church of Toledo, and a funeral made for him by his friends with the King's permiſſion (f). It is ſaid, that his unhappy cataſtrophe was foretold him by an Aſtrologer, who aſſured him that Cadahalſo would prove fatal to him; which word ſignifies in Spaniſh a Scaffold; but he underſtood it of a town in Spain of that name, which he always carefully avoided. But Mariana rejects this as a ſtory which deſerves very little credit (g). Mr. de Fleury tells us (b), that he was accuſed of having received money of the Moors to prevent the taking of the city of Granada; but Mariana, who is the only Author whom he cites, mentions nothing of that particular charge againſt him. A Spaniſh writer has a remarkable reflection upon de Luna and his Miniſtry [F]. The (e) Dr. Geddes ſays, that he was executed the 4th of June. See his Life of Don Alvaro de Luna, in the fourth vol. of his Tracts, p. 354. edit. London 1715.

(f) Marian. ibid.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 313, 314.

(b) Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 110. vol. 22. c. 131. p. 602. edit. de Bruxelles 1726.

" longer bear that prodigious maſs of riches, which " it was wrong in me to have heaped together. I " ſhould willingly reſign them, but that every thing " I have is in your power, and I am denied the op- " portunity of ſhewing mankind, that you have " raiſed a perſon to the height of power, who can " contemn wealth, as well as procure it, and give it " back to him from whom he received it. But I " deſire you in the ſtrongeſt terms, that as I was ob- " liged by the lowneſs of the treaſury to raiſe ten " or twelve thouſand crowns by a method that I " ought not to have taken, you will reſtore them to " the perſons, from whom they were extorted. If " you will not grant this on account of the ſer- " vices which I have done; yet I think it is abſolutely " neceſſary to do it from the reaſon of the thing." The King returned him this anſwer; that with regard to what he had ſaid concerning his ſervice and the rewards which he had received, he did not deny it; that there never was any King or Emperor in any age, who had beſtowed ſuch prodigious favours upon a private man. That he had loſt his liberty, on the account of Alvares, and recovered it by his aſſiſtance, and therefore the former was as great a reaſon of reproach to him, as the latter of commendation. That as the treaſury was chiefly exhauſted by his means, it was much more reaſonable to ſupply it from his own eſtate, than by oppreſſing others. However he would make ſatisfaction to thoſe who had been injured from his eſtate. It is wonderful, as Mariana obſerves, that among ſo many people, who had been obliged to Alvarez, there was not one, who came to aſſiſt him in this exigence. But all regards of friendſhip are loſt towards the unfortunate, and turned to the contrary ſide with the favour of the Court. Mirum eſt, in tanto numero eorum, qui Alvari beneficiis obſtricti erant, nullum in periculo ad præſidium accurriſſe. Verum miſeros ſtudia deſtituunt, cum aulæ gratia in contrarium circumacta (10).

(10) Id. l. 22. c. 12. p. 312.

[E] Which was executed at Valladolid with all the circumſtances of infamy imaginable.] The King immediately after he was taken into cuſtody, gave orders for ſeizing all the towns and riches, which belonged to Alvares, who was brought to a tryal, in which it was impoſſible for him to eſcape, ſince he had rendred the King implacable by ſo many injuries, which he had done to him. After his condemnation he was removed to Valladolid, and having confeſſed himſelf, and received the Sacrament, he was carried upon a mule to the place of execution, the Cryer proclaiming the reaſons of his ſentence in this form: " Let this puniſhment be inflicted " by the King's appointment upon this cruel tyrant; " for raſhly and madly invading the rights of the " Kingly Majeſty, which is God's Vicegerent on " earth; for reducing the whole Court under his " power, and making himſelf Maſter of the State in " general; and becauſe that having raiſed himſelf above " the condition of a private man, he acted with the ut- " moſt haughtineſs and diſregard to God and the " King, and to the great loſs of the King's eſtate, " and by a ſhameful perverſion of juſtice, commit- " ted ſuch a ſeries of crimes, miſchiefs, and tyran- " nies, and been guilty of ſo many inſtances of " bribery, as have ſubjected him to the loſs of his " head by the axe; in order that the juſtice of God " and the King appearing in the puniſhment of one " man, may deter others from the like attempts. " Let him, who offends thus, ſuffer in this manner." Hoc ſupplicium huic crudeli tyranno abs Rege eſto. Quod præcipiti temeritate & amentia cum regiæ majeſtatis divinæ in terris vicariæ fugillatione, aulâ in poteſtatem redactâ, republicaque univerſâ ad arbitrium revocatâ. Supra conditionem, ſupraque privati hominis modum elatus ſuperbiâ in Deum regemque, contempta regia majeſtate, regii patrimonii magnâ jacturâ, fœda judiciorum perturbatione, ea crimina, flagitia, maleficia, peculatus perpetravit, pro quibus ſecuri ſubjicitur; ut divina regiaque vindicta ſancita unius ſupplicio cæteris documentum detur ſimilis audaciæ vitandæ. Sic qui deliquit, pœnas dato (11). There was a large ſcaffold erected in the middle of the market-place, and a croſs placed upon it, and two torches lighted, and the floor was ſpread with tapeſtry. As ſoon as he mounted the ſcaffold, he paid his reverence to the croſs, and preſently after gave his ſignet and hat to a boy, who was his page, telling him, Theſe are the laſt gifts you ſhall ever receive from me. The boy fell into the greateſt agony of grief imaginable; which drew a deep ſigh from all the people who ſtood round. Their minds were agitated with different thoughts: and the compariſon of Alvares's late grandeur and proſperity with his preſent diſtreſs extorted tears even from his enemies. Barraſa, who belonged to Prince Henry's ſtables, being there, he called him to him, and deſired him to tell the Prince from him, that he ſhould not follow this example of the King in rewarding his ſervants. Obſerving an iron hook upon a high pole, he asked the executioner, what uſe that was deſigned for; who told him, it was to fix his head upon, when it was divided from his body. " After I am dead, ſays Alvares, you may do with my " body what you pleaſe; death cannot poſſibly be " diſgraceful to a man of courage; or untimely to " one who has paſſed thro' ſuch important poſts " of honour." Poſt mortem, ſubdit Alvarus, de corpore, ut libet, facito. Viro forti mors turpis eſſe non poteſt; neque immatura tantis honoribus defuncto (12). Having ſaid this, he ſubmitted himſelf to the axe with the greateſt intrepidity imaginable. Such was the end of the man who had enjoyed an uncontroulable authority at court for thirty years together; an example ſufficient to inſtruct Courtiers, that they ought rather to make themſelves the objects of their Maſter's love than of their fear; ſince the latter muſt inevitably prove fatal to them at laſt; and it is impoſſible for a Miniſter, who has acted in an haughty aſſuming manner, to die in peace. Sed exemplo tamen calamitatis monendi ſunt aulici, ut amari à principibus quàm metui malint; quia metus domini exitium ſervi eſt; & fata vix ſinunt ſuperbos famulos feliciter mori (13). Alphonſo Spina (14) a Franciſcan Fryar, who wrote the Fortalitium Fidei (15), a work of great learning, tho' with a barbarous title, attended him in his laſt moments.

(11) Id. lib. 22. c. 13. p. 313.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Dr. Geddes calls him Alonzo d'Eſpinar.

(15) It was written in the year 1439, and the greateſt part of it turns upon controverſies, which were then on foot againſt the Jews, Saracens and Mahometans. See Father Simon's Bibliotb. Critiq. tom. 3. c. 30. edit. Paris, 12°, 1710.

[F] A Spaniſh Writer has a remarkable reflection upon De Luna and his Miniſtry.] This Writer is John de Santa Maria, a Monk, who in the 20th chapter of his book De Republica y Policia Chriſtiana, has the following paſſage (16). " Don John II King " of Caſtile was involved in a variety of troubles by " allowing (16) See Dr. Geddes's Tracts, vol. 4. pag. 374, &c.

The reader will obſerve that we have generally followed the noble Hiſtorian abovementioned in this Article, which may be compared with the minute and circumſtantial account, which Dr. Geddes has given us from ſome antient Spaniſh Chronicles, which he had in his poſſeſſion (i).

(i) See his Preface to the Life of Don Alvaro de Luna.

" allowing this favourite ſo abſolute a power in all " public affairs. When the people ſaw their King " in a perfect ſubjection and ſlavery to him, they " concluded that he was certainly bewitched to him. " The King's will and underſtanding were ſo entire- " ly reſigned to him, that he neither underſtood " what he gave him, or durſt deny him any thing " that he deſired. And as the ungrateful ivy ſucks " the ſap from the tree, that ſupports it; ſo this fa- " vourite robbed the King of his revenue and au- " thority, and of little leſs than his whole Kingdom. " By which means the royal authority was ſunk ſo " low, that the Grandees and the King's own firſt " couſins the Infantes, and the Kings of Arragon " and Navarre, took up arms and made war upon " him; and on ſome occaſion he was deſerted even " by the Prince his ſon, and his own wife. From " hence aroſe great civil conteſts, and all under the " title of ſetting the King at liberty, and reſcuing " him from the ſlavery he was in; and no other " reaſon was aſſigned for making the war, but only " this, That the whole Kingdom ſaw that the fa- " vourite did all, and the King did nothing. It can- " not be denied, that this favourite did many things, " which merited the King's affection; for on many " great occaſions he had ſerved the King valiantly " with the hazard of his life and perſon. But as " his intereſt in the King encreaſed, his ambition " and covetouſneſs grew up with it, and roſe to that " height, that they rendred him odious to the whole " Kingdom, and even to the King himſelf at laſt. " The King turned againſt him, as he pretended, " upon account of the great damages, which he " ſuſtained in his Kingdoms, and in his own credit " and authority, by the great power, which that " favourite had uſurped. Many things had been " formerly urged to the King on that head, but with- " out effect. That which really prevailed with him " was his intereſt. As ſoon as he was told of the " prodigious treaſure, which that favourite had a- " maſſed together, and that it woud all come into " his hands, he was highly pleaſed with the diſ- " courſe, and immediately put an end to his Fa- " vouritiſm, by making war upon the Conſtable " with the treaſure, which he relied upon as the " beſt guard to defend, and the ſureſt means to " ſupport him." T.

☞ALVARES (EMANUEL) a famous Grammarian of the ſixteenth Century, was a Portugueſe by nation, and born in the Iſland of Madera the fourth of June 1546. He entered himſelf among the Jeſuits, and became eminent for his integrity and prudence, by which means he was raiſed to be Rector of the Colleges at Coimbra, Evora and Liſbon, and Preſident of the Profeſſed Houſe of St. Roch. He was diſtinguiſhed in the knowledge of all kinds of learning, and particularly of polite Literature; and was ſo far from being elated with his ſuperiority in this reſpect, that he condeſcended to inſtruct the youth in the Latin, Greek and Hebrew tongues for ſeveral years together. He died in the College of Evora the 30th of December 1582 (a). His Latin Grammar is extremely approved of [A].

(a) Ribadeneira and Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Soc. Jeſ. p. 100. edit. Antwerp. 1643, and Nic. Antonio Bib. Script. Hiſpaniæ, p. 262. edit. Romæ 1672.

[A] His Latin Grammar is extremely approved of.] It is intitled De Inſtitutione Grammaticâ, in three books; the firſt of which treats of Etymology, the ſecond of Syntax, and the third of Proſody. Gerard John Voſſius in his Grammar ſtyles him a very learned Man, doctiſſimum Virum; and Gaſpar Scioppius, who was the ſevereſt critic imaginable, in an Oration of his De veteris ac novæ Grammaticæ Latinæ origine, dignitate, & uſu, tells us, that our author deſerves the firſt place among the Grammarians; " For, ſays he, he writes in a much more pure and " elegant ſtyle in delivering that art, than any one, I " will not ſay of the ancient Grammarians, (for " all of them write extremely ill in Latin) but " even than moſt of the moderns; and he has taken " care to ſelect out of the beſt of the ancient authors " thoſe examples, which are moſt proper to confirm " the rules of the art, and eaſieſt to be underſtood " by Learners." Nam & ipſe longè cultius dicendi genus, quam non dico veterum quiſquam (nam peſſimè omnes Latinè ſcripſerunt,) ſed quam recentiores plerique in arte tradendâ præſtitit; & ea ex optimo quoque veterum authorum exempla ſelegere curæ habuit, quibus regulæ artis plurimùm ſtabiliri, & ſine negotio à tyronibus intelligi poſſent. Antonius Velleſius, a Portugueze, wrote a large Commentary upon this Grammar; and two Compendiums of the Latin tongue were formed from it by Richard Heſius a German, and Richard Richardi an Italian, both Jeſuits. There was publiſhed likewiſe at Rome in 8vo 1606, Catalogus verborum difficiliorum Grammaticæ Emanuelis Alvari; i. e. " A Catalogue of diffi- " cult words in the Grammar of Emanuel Alvares," by Antonio Maria Torrigio a Roman. This Grammar has been publiſh'd in Portugal, at Rome, Venice, Diling, Cologne, and other places; and at Munſter in Weſtphalia 1613, in 8vo, and at Strasburg 1612, in 12mo. Some objections having been made to it by one Orlando Peſcetio, there was a book publiſh'd at Ingolſtad in defence of it with this title, Efflatio pulveris adverſus Emmanuelis Alvari Grammaticas Inſtitutiones ab Orlando Peſcetio Veronæ excitati, quâ plus CLXX reprehenſiones a Jacobo a Foſſa ex commentariis Mariani Benedicti a Santo Vito confutantur (1). Nic. Antonio queries whether it was our author, or another Emanuel Alvares, who tranſlated from the Portugueze into Spaniſh the following book; Las Cartas de algunos Padres que andan en la India de Portugal deſde el anno de MDLVII. Raſta LXI. Printed at Coimbra by John Barret. T.

(1) See Nic. Antonio Bib. Script. Hiſp. ubi ſupra.

☞ALVARES (FRANCIS) a Portugueſe Prieſt, was Chaplain to Emanuel King of Portugal, and Embaſſador from that Prince to David King of Ethiopia or Abyſſinia, which voyage he wrote an account of [A]. The latter King had ſent Matthew the Ethiopian

[A] Which voyage he wrote an account of.] It is intitled, Verdadeira informaçaon de Preſte Joano das Indias, em que ſe contano todos os ſitios das terras; e dos tratos, e commercios dellas, e do que paſſara na viagem de D. Rodrigo de Lima que foi per mandado de Pedro Lopez de Sequeira; & aſſi das cartas e preſentes, que o Preſte Joano mandou al Rey noſſo Senhor. Printed at Lisbon 1540, fol. Paulus Jovius, the Hiſtorian, undertook at the deſire of Martinus a Portugallia, who was then Embaſſador from Portugal to the Pope, to tranſlate this Hiſtory into Latin; which upon his neglecting to perform, Damianus a Goes, a Portugueze Knight, promiſed to execute in a work, which he dedicated to Pope Paul III, De Fide, Religione, Moribuſque Æthiopum; i. e. " Concerning the Faith, " Religion, and Manners of the Æthiopians." It was tranſlated into Spaniſh by Thomas de Padilla, and publiſhed at Antwerp in 1557, in 8vo; and by Michael Ethiopian Embaſſador to Emanuel, who in return thought proper to employ our Author and Edward Galvanus, who died before he arrived in that country, in an embaſſy to the King of Ethiopia. He continued ſix years in that country, and acted with ſo much addreſs and prudence, that he brought letters back to King John, who ſucceeded his father Emanuel, and to Pope Clement VII, and gave an account of his embaſſy to the latter at Bologna in January 1533, in the preſence of the Emperor Charles V (a). He died in the year 1540.

(a) Nic. Antonio, Bib. Script. Hiſp. pag. 305. edit. Romæ 1672.

Michael de Selves at Toledo 1558, in 8vo. There was a French tranſlation of it, as we are informed by Anthony du Verdier (1), which was intitled, Deſcription de l'Ethiopie contenant vraye relation des terres, & pais du grand Roy & Empereur Prete-Jean, l'aſſiete de ſes royaumes & provinces, leurs couſtumes, loix, & religion. Aveq les pourtraicts de leurs temples, & au commencement le voyage de André Corſel Florentin. Eſcrite premierement en Eſpagnol per François Alvares & traduite en Francois; i. e. "A Deſcription of Ethiopia, containing a true ac- "count of the dominions and country of the great "King and Emperor Preſter-John, the ſituation of "his Kingdom and Provinces, and their Cuſtoms, "Laws, and Religion. With draughts of their "temples; to which is prefixed the voyage of An- "drew Corſel a Florentine. Written firſt in Spa- "niſh (2) by Francis Alvares, and tranſlated into "French." Printed by John Bellere at Antwerp 1558, in 8vo. This work was abridged by Ramuſius. Bodinus tells us (3), that our author was the firſt who gave a true and accurate account of Ethiopia, which is approved of by the foreign and all the beſt Writers, and read with the greateſt ſatisfaction. Franciſcus Alvareſius multo majore fide ac diligentiâ res Æthiopum primus ſcripſit, quæ nunc à peregrinis & optimis quibuſque ſcriptoribus probantur, nec ſine magna voluptate leguntur. T.

(1) Bibliotheq. p. 365. edit. de Lyon 1585.

(2) This is a miſtake, for it was in Portugueſe. See Nic. Antonio, ubi ſupra.

(3) Method. Hiſtoriæ.

☞ALVARES DE PAZ (JAMES), the Author of ſeveral devotional Treatiſes [A], and an eminent Jeſuit in the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Toledo in Spain of a good family, and educated in polite Literature and Philoſophy in the ſchools of the Jeſuits, among whom he entered himſelf when he was ſeventeen years of age. While he was yet under the Noviciate he made ſo great a progreſs in Divinity, that he wrote ſeveral Meditations, which the moſt conſiderable Fathers of that order thought worthy of tranſcribing for their own uſe. Having compleated his ſtudies of Divinity at Alcala de Henares, he was determined by the advice of his ſuperiors to take a voyage to the Kingdom of Peru in America, and in the paſſage ſuffered a great many inconveniences, and particularly the want of water, which occaſioned the death of ſeveral perſons. He read Lectures upon Philoſophy and Divinity at Lima in that country with great applauſe, and at the ſame time purſued the moſt rigorous courſe of piety and devotion imaginable. He was likewiſe Rector of the Colleges of Quita, Cuſco, and Lima, and governed the whole Province for ſix years, in ſuch a manner as to join the moſt exact diſcharge of his office with the more private duties of religion and piety. At Potoſi he was received with the utmoſt regard by the Governor, and the whole city, who went out to meet him and revered him as a Saint. He was ſoon after ſeized there with a diſeaſe, which proved fatal to him the ſeventeenth of January 1620 in the ſixtieth year of his age. His death was attended with all the circumſtances of the moſt perfect reſignation to the will of God. The Jeſuits (a), from whom we borrow this Article, pretend, that ſeveral miracles have been performed at his ſepulchre; but we ſhall not expect of the reader to give credit to theſe accounts, any more than to ſome particulars in the character, which we ſhall give of him from thoſe writers [B].

(a) Rabadeneira and Alegambe, Bibliath. Script. Societ. Jeſu. p. 191, 192. edit. Antwerp. 1642.

ALYPIUS

[A] The Author of ſeveral devotional Treatiſes.] De Vita Spirituali ejuſque Perfectione; i. e. "Of the "Spiritual Life and the Perfection of it," in five books fol. Father John a Gorcum of Boiſleduc publiſhed an Abridgment of this work at Antwerp in 8vo, 1620. De Exterminatione Mali & Promotione Boni; i. e. "Of the Extirpation of Evil and the Promo- "tion of Good," in five books, fol. De Inquiſitione Pacis, ſive Studio Orationis; i. e. "Of the Enquiry "after Peace, or the Study of Prayer," in five books, fol. Some of the Tracts which are contained in theſe three volumes were publiſhed ſeparately, as particularly, De Vitâ religioſè inſtituenda, ſive, De quotidianâ virtutum exercitatione; i. e. "Of the Conduct "of a religious Life, or, Of the daily Exerciſe of the "Virtues," in 120. Meditationes tripartitæ; i. e. "Meditations in three parts," in 4to. De Humilitate virtutum omnium fundamento; i. e. "Of Humi- "lity, the Foundation of all Virtues." De Virtutum adoptione. He left likewiſe a work behind him, De Sacerdotum Inſtitutione; i. e. "Of the Inſtruction "of Prieſts."

[B] The Character which we ſhall give of him from thoſe writers.] We find the utmoſt hyperbole run through all the elogiums, which they have given us of the writers of their Society. Our Author, they tell us, was a man adorned with every virtue; and with regard to mortification, he has given a deſcription of his own rigour in that point in the Tract, which he wrote upon that virtue. He kept the ſtricteſt guard over all his ſenſes, and his diet was ſo very ſparing, that he ſeemed to keep a continual faſt. He made uſe of the ſcourge and the hair-cloth even in the decline of his age and health. His chaſtity was preſerved pure from the ſtain even of the leaſt irregular thought. He confeſſed himſelf every day before maſs. He made a ſolemn vow many years before, that he would never commit even a venial ſin deſignedly, and never read a profane author: For when he was learning the Italian tongue, in order to underſtand the devotional books in that language, and happened to fall upon the moſt eminent of their Poets, he found himſelf troubled with ſuch a confuſion of vain images and ideas, and ſuch an abatement of devotion, that he reſolved for the future to refrain abſolutely from reading ſuch books. Votum a pluribus annis conceperat, nullum ſe de induſtria peccatum veniale admiſſurum; nullum Scriptorem prophanum lecturum; nimirum cum ſtudio Italicæ Linguæ diſcendæ, quo libros Aſceticos eo ſermone conſcriptos poſſet intelligere, in principem poetam incidiſſet, tantâ vanarum imaginum confuſione & ariditate devotionis mulctatus eſt, ut deinceps omni hujuſmodi lectione abſtinere decreverit (1). He was prodigiouſly abſorbed in divine contemplation; nay he very often appeared to be raiſed aloft from the ground, and his whole body to be ſurrounded with a kind of beamy light. Divinarum rerum contemplationi mirificè fuit addictus; ſæpe ſublimis à terrâ, & igneo quaſi fulgore toto corpore perfuſus, magnâ in luce conſpectus eſt. For above twenty

(1) Ibid.

ALYPIUS, of Antioch, lived under the reign of Julian the Apoſtate; he had already commanded in England, when that Prince had a fancy to rebuild the temple of Jeruſalem, and committed this work to his care. Alypius haſtened the work very much, and was ſeconded by the Governor of the Province (a). He was forced however to abandon this undertaking: The fires, which came from under the earth, rendered the place inacceſſible. Eight years after, he found himſelf involved in the horrible perſecution, which cauſed an infinite number of perſons to periſh, and was at firſt ſtirred up againſt thoſe who had ſought by Magick who the ſucceſſor of Valens ſhould be. When thoſe who received the commiſſion to inform againſt the guilty, had begun to put their deſign in execution, every body was accuſed, and no ſooner condemned than puniſhed. Alypius, who retired to a private life to enjoy the comforts of reſt, was attacked there by the informers; they accuſed him of poiſoning (b); he was baniſhed and all his goods were confiſcated. His ſon Hierocles, condemned to death on the ſame accuſation, happily eſcaped when they were leading him to execution (c). The news of this happy circumſtance ſoftened the affliction of Alypius in his baniſhment. It is very probable, that the Author of a Geographical Work which very much pleaſed Julian the Apoſtate, is not different from our Alypius [A], but I do not believe that this work is the deſcription of the old world, which James Godfrey has tranſlated out of Greek twenty five years his mind was ſo intenſely fixed upon God, that all the buſineſs which belonged to his office could never the leaſt divert him. This enabled him to write with the utmoſt eaſe upon the profoundeſt myſteries; to feel his ſoul poſſeſſed with the moſt agreeable affections; to form the moſt excellent conceptions concerning divine things; and to enjoy the preſence of the Deity every moment. While he was once reading a Lecture upon the divine attributes, he fell into ſo deep a rapture, that he was obliged to be carried home by his ſcholars. Another time as he was ſaying maſs, Chriſt himſelf ſeemed to embrace him in the moſt tender manner; and he acknowledged himſelf, that he was juſt ready to expire from the vehemence of the affection which he felt. And becauſe this happened very frequently to him, as he was preaching, he reſolved to diſcontinue his public performances, till he was admoniſhed by God to reſume them. His works received a very peculiar ſanction from God; for while he was compoſing them, he ſeemed to be ſurrounded with a celeſtial light and ſplendor, and there ſtood by him a perſon in the figure of a grave man, who whiſpered to him what he wrote. Theſe particulars are ſo very extraordinary, that the reader will undoubtedly expect to ſee our Author's own words. Cum de divinis attributis aliquando prælegeret, adeò extra ſe abreptus eſt, ut inter diſcipulorum manus debuerit ad cubiculum deferri. Aliâ die celebrantem viſus eſt Chriſtus ſuaviſſimè amplexari; & faſſus ipſe eſt affectûs vehementiâ ſe tum propè fuiſſe confectum. Id cum illi ſæpiùs etiam inter concionandum eveniret, publico abſtinere decrevit, quoad Dei monitu juſſus eſt ſolitas publicè functiones obire. Lucubrationibus ipſius luculentum acceſſit divinitùs pondus commendationis, quod viſus ſit inter ſcribendum cæleſti fulgore circumfundi, & ab adſtante quopiam, viri gravis ſpecie, quæ ſcribebat in aurem excipere. He was commanded by God to take upon him the adminiſtration of the Province, and not to undergo the two cauteries which the Phyſicians had preſcribed him, becauſe he was about to change the inconveniences which he ſuffered in his health, into the fatigues and troubles which would reſult from the office which he enjoined him. Provinciæ adminiſtrationem à Deo juſſus eſt admittere; & quæ de Medicorum conſilio, gemina ſibi erat cauteria inuſturus, miſſa facere; quoniam afflictiones Valetudinis erat in officii moleſtias converſurus. The enthuſiaſm, which appears ſtrongly through this Author's whole character, as it is drawn by the Hiſtorians of his own order, is an inconteſtable proof of the Fanaticiſm, which Dr. Stillingfleet juſtly charged upon the Church of Rome. We find an infinite variety of this kind among their writers; and the world muſt be furniſhed with an aſtoniſhing legend of dreams, if the viſions and revelations of that nature were collected, as the miracles of reputed Saints have ſometimes been, particularly in the Legenda Aurea, and by Bollandus and other Authors. Such inſtances have not perhaps always reſulted from hypocriſy, and a deſign to deceive, but the perſons, who have pretended to theſe inſpirations, may have thought themſelves moved and acted by the Spirit of God; and yet notwithſtanding all their pretences, and the opinion others have had of them, it has been afterwards evident, that it has been very far from a divine infuſion and illumination. What ſhall we think of Tereſa, whoſe life is full of viſions and revelations, and of whom we are told by a writer in that way (2), that beſides many other extatical ſights in the Kingdom of Heaven, ſhe often had the ſight and company of the Holy Trinity, and of each perſon in particular; that they ſpoke to her, and ſhe to them, and uſed to ask, and did obtain particular favours of each ... that God ſhewed her how all creatures are contained in his Divine Eſſence, as in a cryſtal glaſs; and that ſhe ſaw therein the thoughts, words, and deeds of all men? This, ſhe ſaid, was one of the greateſt favours to her. The ſame Author, St. Ubald, likewiſe talks of the union of the ſoul to the Divine Eſſence, of its being abſorpt and drowned over head and ears, and ingulphed in the depth of Divinity, ſo that it became one and the ſame with God, by a true Deification (3). He mentions alſo an inſtance of the rapturous ſtate of one, who when the hour of prayer was ſpent, could hardly be perſuaded that it was ſo, not knowing what prayer he was in (4). The famous Quietiſt Molinos reports of Gregory Lopez (5), "that having for the ſpace of three years "continued that ejaculation, Thy will be done in time "and in eternity, repeating it as often as he breathed, "God diſcovered to him that infinite treaſure of "the pure and continued act of faith and love; and "that during the thirty ſix years he lived after, he "always continued that pure act of love, without "ever uttering the leaſt petition, ejaculation, or any "thing that was ſenſible." By this means all religion is reſolved into a ſpiritual and ſenſeleſs frame and courſe, a certain ſtillneſs and quietneſs, as Molinos expreſſes it (6), when the ſoul doth not know whether it be alive or dead, loſt or gained, agrees or reſiſts, which is the true reſigned life. He tells us likewiſe (7), that theſe rapturous Ladies, ſuch as Sànta Tereſa and Donna Maria d'Eſcobar, heard and talked with God hand to hand. But this will appear very incredible, if we conſider the ſubject of the converſation between them; for whenever, ſays Tereſa, the Lord commanded me any thing, if my Confeſſor told me another, I turned to the Lord, and told him, that I muſt obey my Confeſſor. This, ſays that grave man upon it, is ſound and true doctrine, which ſecures ſouls (8). But the ſame writer obſerves in another place (9), that the deſire of revelations uſes to be a great hindrance to the interior ſoul, eſpecially to women; and there is not an ordinary dream, but they will chriſten it with the name of a viſion. And father Ubald abovementioned amidſt all his viſionary chimeras has made this juſt remark (10), "You muſt not think them holieſt who "have conſolations, viſions, and revelations; for "many are great Saints, that never had any of them; "and others that had viſions and guſts are not there"fore Saints; for true ſanctity doth conſiſt in ſolid "virtue, and true conformity of our will to the will "of God in all things, &c." T.

(a) See the note [A].

(b) Ibid.

(c) See how, in the Article of HIEROCLES.

(2) Paul of St. Ubald. Part 3. p. 65, 71, 72, 86.

(3) P. 14, 16, 41.

(4) P. 57. n. 4.

(5) See Molinos's Spiritual Guide, l. 1. c. 17. n. 135. quoted by Dr. Williams 1ſt Sermon at Boyle's Lectures for the year 1696. 1 edit. 4°. London p. 29.

(6) Ibid. l. 3. c. 7. n. 63.

(7) Ib. Preface, n. 17.

(8) Ib. l. 2. c. 2. and c. 9. n. 71.

(9) Ib. l. 2. c. 6. n. 46.

(10) Part 3. c. 6. n. 11.

[A] The author of a geographical work that pleaſed Julian the Apoſtate, is not different from our Alypius.] This author lived under Julian the Apoſtate. There are two Letters extant written to him by this Greek into Latin [B]. I am not perfectly well acquainted with that Alypius who wrote a Treatiſe of Muſick intitled Εισαγωγὴ Μουσικὴ, Introductio Muſica, which Caſſiodorus mentions: Meurſius is the firſt who publiſhed it in Greek (d). Mr. Hofman had done better to have entirely omitted this article [C]. See his errors in the firſt edition of my Dictionary (e).

(d) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. p. 94.

(e) It was thought it would be better to place them here again under the Note [C].

Prince, which teſtify that Alypius was Cæſarius's brother, and that he was employed in a conſiderable office (1). This laſt character agrees admirably well with Alypius of Antioch, who, after having been Lieutenant Governor in England, was ſent into Judea, to have the ſuperintendance of the building of the temple. We learn all this from Ammianus Marcellinus. Ambitioſum quondam apud Hieroſolymam templum . . . . inſtaurare ſumptibus cogitabat immodicis: negotiumque maturandum Alypio dederat Antiochenſi, qui olim Britannias curaverat pro Præfectis. Cum itaque rei idem fortiter inſtaret Alypius, juvaretque provinciæ rector, metuendi globi flammarum prope fundamenta crebris aſſultibus erumpentes fecere locum exuſtis aliquoties operantibus inacceſſum (2). i. e. "He had thoughts of rebuilding at an immo- "derate expence the once proud temple of Jeruſa- "lem: and committed the forwarding of this work "to Alypius of Antioch, who formerly had been "Pro-prefect in Britain. And whilſt Alypius was "earneſtly purſuing the undertaking, and the Go- "vernor of the province aſſiſted, terrible balls of "fire burſt out frequently near the foundations, and "having burnt the workmen ſeveral times rendred "the place inacceſſible." He ſays thus in the 29th book: Ecce autem Alypius quoque ex Vicario Britanniarum, placiditatis homo jocundæ, poſt otioſam & repoſitam vitam (quoniam huc uſque injuſtitia tetenderat manus) in ſqualore maximo volutatus ut veneficii reus citatus eſt cum Hierocle filio (3). i. e. "But "behold Alypius alſo, who had juſt been Lieu- "tenant in Britain, a man of a pleaſant temper, "after an idle and indolent life (becauſe thus far "injuſtice had ſtretched out her hands) having "wallowed in the greateſt vileneſs, was accuſed of "poiſoning with his ſon Hierocles.

(1) See the note [B].

(2) Amm. Marcellin. l. 23. c. 1. p. 350. ad ann. 363.

(3) Idem, lib. 29. cap. 1. p. 556, ad ann. 371.

[B] I do not take this work to be the deſcription of the old world, which James Godfrey has tranſlated out of Greek into Latin.] This deſcription is an anonymous work, compoſed under the Emperors Conſtantius and Conſtans. There was a very barbarous old Latin tranſlation of it, that was communicated to the learned James Godfrey by Salmaſius. He printed it, with the Greek text, and a new verſion, accompanied with notes (4). Voſſius is not far from believing, that the author of this deſcription is the ſame Alypius, that ſent a geographical work to Julian the Apoſtate: but, if it be ſo, continues he, it muſt be ſaid, according to the remark of James Godfrey, that Alypius compoſed it, before his commanding in England, for there is no mention of this iſle, but on the credit of another. "Britannia, pro- "vincia, ſicut qui fuerunt narrant, valde maxima. i. e. "The Province of Britain, as thoſe who have "been there relate, is very large." For my part, I ſhould readily conclude from this paſſage, that Alypius did not make this deſcription: this is what I build upon. He had been Lieutenant in England a long time, when Julian committed to him the care of building the temple of Jeruſalem. Negotiumque maturandum Alypio dederat Antiochenſi, qui OLIM Britannias amaverat pro Præfectis (5). i. e. "He "committed the forwarding of this work to Alypius "of Antioch, who FORMERLY had been Pro-prefect "in Britain." He ſent his Geographical Treatiſe to this Emperor, whilſt he commanded under him in ſome Province. He was at that time capable of ſpeaking of England as an eye-witneſs. Therefore he muſt not be the author of the Deſcription of the old world, in which this iſle is mentioned, only on the faith of thoſe who had ſailed thither. It is in vain to tell me that he wrote two books, one before his going into England, and the other under Julian the Apoſtate; and that the firſt is the Deſcription publiſhed by Godfrey; for it is very probable, that if he had made this Deſcription, he would have inſerted it in the work that he ſent to Julian; and ſo there would have been no reaſon to have any concern about the firſt work. It would have been loſt then, and we ſhould not at preſent have had the book that Godfrey has tranſlated and illuſtrated with notes. Moreover we learn from Julian, that Alypius was a Poet. Ἔχει γὰρ, ſays he (6), καὶ τὰ διαγράμματα τῶν πρόσθεν βέλτιον, καὶ κατεμύθωσας αὐτὸ προσθεὶς τὰς ἰάμβους. i. e. "For there are "in that table ſome Deſcriptions better than the "former, and you have adorned them by the addition "of ſome Jambics." He afterwards approves the manner in which Alypius treated the people, and praiſes him for having ſometimes made uſe of mildneſs and ſometimes of ſeverity. Περὶ δὲ τὴν διοίκησιν τῶν πραγμάτων, ὅτι θαρραλέως ἅμα καὶ πρότως ἅπαντα πειραίνειν προθυμῇ συνηδόμεθα· μίξαι γὰρ πραότητα καὶ σωφροσύνην ἀνδρείᾳ ἐ ῥᾴμῃ, ἐ τῇ μὲν χρῆσθαι πρὸς τοὺς ἐπιεικεστάτους, τῇ δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν πονηρῶν ἀπαραιτήτως πρὸς ἐπανόρθωσιν ὐ μικρᾶς ἐσὶ φύσεως, ὐδ' ἀρετῆς ἔργον. i. e. "But "with regard to the Government of the Com- "monwealth, I am glad that you have a mind to "do it with diligence and humanity. For it is the "part of no ſmall genius and virtue to mix mildneſs "and moderation with fortitude and ſtrength, ſo that "one may be uſed towards the good, and the other "to correct the bad with ſeverity.

(4) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. p. 248.

(5) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 23. cap. 1.

(6) Julian. Epiſtola XXX.

[C] Mr. Hofman had done better, to have entirely omitted this article.] I. He writes Alipius. II. He ſays, that Alipius of Antioch is the author of the Deſcription of the old world. III. That this Deſcription was publiſhed in Latin under Conſtantius and Conſtans. IV. That there was another Alipius of Antioch, who compoſed a treatiſe of Geography. V. That Ammianus Marcellinus declares it. This is all what Hofman ſays: he is therefore guilty of ſeveral omiſſions; but the worſt is, that in this ſhort account he gives us, he has committed a great many blunders.

ALYPIUS, a Philoſopher of Alexandria, contemporary with Jamblicus, and one of the moſt ſubtil Dialecticians of his time, was as little as a dwarf, but his genius made amends for that defect. He had many followers, to whom he was contented to give his inſtructions viva voce, without dictating any thing to them. That was the reaſon they left him, to hear Jamblicus, under whom they could reap much more advantage, both by his Lectures and his Writings. Jamblicus having had ſeveral conferences with our Alypius, was much taken with his judgment and his genius, and even compoſed his life, in which he alſo praiſed his virtue and the ſteadineſs of his mind. Alypius died very old, in the city of Alexandria (a).

(a) Eunapius in vita Jamblic.

ALYPIUS, Biſhop of Tagaſte his own country (a), was one of St. Auguſtin's good friends. He was baptized with him at Milan, in 388. He travelled into Paleſtine five years after; and if on the one ſide the great good that he ſpoke of St. Auguſtin to St. Jerom ſerved to cement the friendſhip of theſe two fathers, it ſeems on the other ſide, that at his return to Africa, he a little cooled the affection of St. Auguſtin towards St. Jerom. It is thought it was by telling him the evil that St. Jerom's adverſaries at Jeruſalem ſpoke of that Father. Alypius was not promoted to his Biſhoprick of Tagaſte till 394, a year after his journey into Paleſtine. He was preſent in the year 403 at the Council of Carthage, where it was endeavoured to make the Donatiſts return to unity. The great preſents that Pinianus made to the church of Tagaſte, when he went thither in 409, accompanied with the two Melanii and by Albina his mother-in-law, expoſed Alypius to ſlander; as if, by his fine diſcourſes, and his artifices, he had extorted too much from theſe good and charitable perſons. The inhabitants of Hippona murmured furiouſly againſt him, becauſe they looked on him as the cauſe of their having loſt the prey that they thought ſure in their hands. They had obliged Pinianus whether he would or no, to promiſe that he would embrace the Prieſthood in their city, his great wealth had excited them to do this violence to him. The very next morning he went from Hippona, and returned to Tagaſte, not thinking himſelf obliged by ſuch a forced promiſe as his had been. Alypius was the only one of the ſeven Catholick Prelates who diſputed in 411 with ſeven Donatiſt Biſhops, in the famous conference of Carthage. He was deputed to Honorius in 419 by the African Churches. Pope Boniface received him with a thouſand marks of friendſhip, and charged with the ſending to St. Auguſtin ſome artful letters that the Pelagians ſpread about the Churches. It was deſired that St. Auguſtin, the beſt writer of that age, would refute them. He was not backward, but employed all his ſtrength in it (b); but Alypius confuted this hereſy ſtill more ſtrongly, by the ſevere ſentences that he obtained at the court of Honorius againſt the Pelagians [A]. We ſhould have known his merit and actions better, if we had had the work that St. Auguſtin promiſed upon it in a letter to St. Paulinus [B]. I have no more to ſay but that Alypius did not marry. See the note [B] of the article of St. AUGUSTIN.

(a) It is a city of Africa.

(b) Taken from the Annals of Baronius, at the years that are marked.

[A] He obtained ſevere decrees againſt the Pelagians.] Baronius does not affirm that the Churches of Africa ſent Alypius to the Emperor, to call upon the ſecular arm againſt the followers of Pelagius: he contents himſelf with conjecturing, and founds his conjecture upon the orders that were diſpatched the ſame year by the Emperor Honorius againſt the Pelagians of Africa. But Maimbourg does not ſpeak of this as a doubtful thing; for having made an odious compariſon between the conduct of the Proteſtant Miniſters and that of the Pelagians, he adds (1): "What has filled France with joy, is that ſo juſt "an ordinance was followed ſoon after by this great "edict of October, which has given the laſt fatal "ſtroak to the hereſy, by forbidding the public ex"erciſe of the pretended Reformed Religion, over"turning all its temples, and baniſhing thoſe amongſt "its Miniſters, who would not renounce their er"rors. And this is exactly what the Emperor Ho"norius did againſt the Pelagians, at the African "Clergy's requeſt, preſented by Alypius. For by "the Edict which this Prince granted him for the "benefit of the whole Church, this hereſy was "rooted out of the Empire: thoſe who could yet "be ſuſpected of it were forbidden to aſſemble "together, and thoſe falſe Biſhops were driven "from their Sees, who would not ſubſcribe to the "condemnation of that hereſy."

(1) Maimbourg, Hiſtoire du Pontificat de St. Leon. lib. 1. p. 35. edit. Holland.

[B] St. Auguſtin had promiſed the life of Alypius, in a letter which he wrote to St. Paulinus.] As what he ſays in this letter (2), may give a general idea of the merit of Alypius, it may not be amiſs to relate it here. Eſt etiam aliud quo iſtum fratrem amplius diligas, nam eſt cognatus venerabilis & verè beati Epiſcopi Alypii quem toto pectore amplecteris & merito: nam quiſquis de illo viro benigne cogitat, de magna Dei miſericordia & de mirabilibus Dei muneribus cogitat. Itaque cum legiſſet petitionem tuam qua deſiderare te indicaſti ut hiſtoriam ſuam tibi ſcriberet, & volebat facere propter benevolentiam tuam, & nolebat propter verecundiam ſuam, quem cum viderim inter amorem pudoremque fluctuantem, onus ab illo in humeros meos tranſtuli: nam hoc mihi etiam per epiſtolam juſſit. Cito ergo ſi Dominus adjuverit, totum Alypium inſeram præcordiis tuis: nam hoc ſum ego maximè veritus, ne ille vereretur aperire omnia quæ in eum Dominus contulit, ne alicubi minus intelligenti (non enim abs te ſolo illa legerentur) non divina munera conceſſa hominibus, ſed ſeipſum prædicare videretur, & tu qui nôſti quomodo hæc legas, propter aliorum cavendam infirmitatem fraternæ notitiæ debito fraudareris. i. e. "There is "alſo another reaſon why you ſhould love that bro"ther more, for he is a relation of the venerable "and truly holy Biſhop Alypius, whom you heartily "cheriſh and that not undeſervedly; for who"ſoever thinks kindly of that man, thinks of the "great mercy and wonderful gifts of God. There"fore when he read your petition to him to write "you his Hiſtory, and was willing to do it on ac"count of your friendſhip, he was unwilling thro' "his own modeſty; whom when I perceived to "fluctuate between love and ſhame, I removed the "load from his ſhoulders to my own: for this he "alſo commanded me in a Letter to do. There"fore, if God permit, I will ſoon fix Alypius en"tirely in your heart; for I was chiefly afraid of "this, that he would ſcruple to open all that the "Lord has conferred on him, leſt to a leſs under"ſtanding perſon (for it would not be read by you "only) he might ſeem to ſet forth himſelf, and not "the divine gifts that were beſtowed on men, and "you your ſelf who know how to read theſe things, "out of regard to the infirmity of others, would be "deprived of what is due to the memory of a brother.

(2) It is the 32d.

ALYPIUS (FALTONIUS PROBUS) brother of Q. Clodius Hermogenianus Olybrius (a) was Prefect of Rome in the reign of the Emperor Theodoſius. This is what Baronius proves from ſome inſcriptions (b), adding that ſeveral letters from Symmachus to this Alypius are ſtill extant [A]; he quotes the Roman Martyrology, where it is affirmed, that St. Almachius was put to death by the gladiators while Alypius was Prefect [B]: finally he conjectures; I, That Alypius, Governor of Egypt, with whom

(a) His daughter Demetriades is highly commended by the Fathers.

(b) Baronius ad ann. 395. num. 18.

[A] Baronius adds, that ſeveral letters from Symmachus to this Alypius are ſtill extant.] His words are: Ad eundem quoque Alypium complures extant epiſtolæ Symmachi, deque eo meminit in epiſtola ad Flavianum (1). i. e. "There are ſeveral Epiſtles extant "from Symmachus to the ſame Alypius, and he "mentions him alſo in an Epiſtle to Flavianus." He quotes the Letter 82 of the 2d Book. I find in the 58th Letter of my edition the following words: Jampridem domino & fratri meo Alypio comitatum ſacrum viſere atque adire cupienti.

(1) Baronius ad ann. 395. num. 18.

[B] Saint Almachius was put to death by the Gladiators while Alypius was Prefect.] On the Octave of Chriſtmas, that is on the New-year's-day, he endeavoured to put a ſtop to the worſhipping of idols, which coſt him his life. The words of the Martyrology January 1, are the following: Romæ S. Almachii Martyris, qui, jubente Alypio urbis præfecto, cum diceret, "Hodie octavæ dominici diei ſunt, ceſſate à ſuperſtitionibus idolorum, & à ſacrificiis pollutis, à gladiatoribus occiſus eſt (2). i. e. "St. Al"machius the Roman Martyr, who was killed at the "command of Alypius the Præfect of the City, for "ſaying, This is the Octave of the Lord's-day; for"bear your idolatrous ſuperſtitions and pollute ſacri"fices." Theodoret mentions in his Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 5. c. 26.

(2) Baronius ad ann. 395. num. 9.

whom John the Anchoret had a conference [C], and the Alypius, I mention in this article, were one and the ſame perſon; II, That in this conference Alypius was converted by the Anchoret. A learned Engliſhman conjectures that St. Almachius the Martyr is a chimerical Saint, and that his canonization is owing to the title of the Almanack [D].

c. 26, one Telemachus, a Monk, who came to Rome from the remoteſt parts of the Eaſt, with no other deſign than to employ his zeal in aboliſhing the ſports of the Gladiators, whom he ventured to inſtruct, even in the heat of their bloody combats. This provoked the ſpectators to ſuch a degree, that they ſtoned him to death: which Honorius hearing of cauſed the Monk to be honoured with the title of Martyr, and that kind of ſports to be quite aboliſhed. Baronius (3) would have this, and what I have quoted from the Martyrology, to be one and the ſame fact, being willing to perſuade us, that Theodoret miſtook Telemachus for Almachius; placed under the reign of Honorius, what happened under that of Theodoſius; and charged the ſpectators with the action he ought to have imputed to the Gladiators. At this rate Theodoret would be guilty of no leſs than three miſtakes.

(3) Baronius, ib. num. 20.

[C] Baronius imagines that it was Alypius with whom John the Anchoret had a conference.] He quotes to this purpoſe a long paſſage (4), which informs us, that Palladius took it very ill of the Anchoret, that he ſhould leave him to attend Alypius Governor of the province; and that the diſpleaſure he received on this occaſion, inſpired him with ſome contempt for the Anchoret, inſomuch that he reſolved to depart; and would have immediately retired had not the Anchoret ſent him word to ſtay a little longer. This convinced Palladius, that John had a great fund of devotion, and a peculiar talent in gueſſing at one's thoughts. He therefore waited till the Governor was gone, and then the Anchoret made his excuſes.

(4) Pallad. in Lauſiac. cap. 22. apud Lypom. tom. 3.

[D] Saint Almachius the Martyr is a chimerical Saint, and his canonization is owing to the title of the Almanack.] Such as do not underſtand the Engliſh book printed at London in 1688 under this title, The Enthuſiaſm of the Church of Rome, may recur to the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Vol. xi. p. 139; where they will find, agreeable to the Engliſh Writer's conjectures, that ſome ignorant Monks of the 7th or 8th Century, finding at the top of the firſt page of the Calendar S. Almanachum, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, abbreviated thus, S. Almâchum, miſtook this word, ſeldom uſed in thoſe times, for the name of a Saint; added the termination in us to it; and fixed this new Saint's feaſt on New-year's-day. Ignorance and chance had no ſooner given him birth, but ſome writers of Martyrologies made the Gladiators put him to death, in the Roman Amphitheatre, while Alypius was Prefect; becauſe he endeavoured to diſſuade them from fighting. We read no where in the ancient writers of ſuch a noble and heroic reſolution (5). Alcuin was the firſt that ſpoke of him in a doubtful manner *. .

(5) Theodoret however aſcribes it to the Monk Telemachus; ſee note [B].

* De Divin. Officio. cap. 4.

AMABLE, Prieſt of Riom in Auvergne, lived in the fifth Century, and is commended by Gregory of Tours as a man of an extraordinary ſanctity, and one that wrought a great many miracles (a). It is ſaid he commanded ſerpents: This is the expreſſion the Hiſtorian uſes; but he atteſts another thing as an eye-witneſs. I have ſeen at his tomb, ſays he, one, who was poſſeſſed with a Devil, ſet free: I have ſeen one that was guilty of perjury, become as ſtiff as an iron bar, and after the confeſſion of his crime become as free as he was before (b). When ſuch a writer as Gregory of Tours uſes an it is ſaid, we may conclude that the thing is not very certain; however this power over ſerpents is accounted the moſt certain of all the things that are aſcribed to St. Amable. One would think that ſuch a power had fallen to his ſhare, or, to ſpeak like a Malebranchiſt (c), that God had appointed him as an occaſional cauſe for the cure of ſuch as had been bit by ſerpents. A modern author, though a Canon in the City, whereof St. Amable is Patron (d), owns that he does not believe all the miracles that are reported of him in the Lives of the Saints of Auvergne, and in ſeveral other Legends (e); but at the ſame time proteſts, that he firmly believes that this Saint has a ſovereign power over ſerpents, becauſe every body ſince thirteen hundred years affirms [A] to have ſeen the marvellous effects of it, ... and becauſe he had the happineſs to ſee ſome of them himſelf (f). He queſtions much the truth of a certain tradition, that runs at Riom, touching this Saint, viz. that when he travelled to Rome on foot, the Sun attended him as a ſervant, carrying his gloves and cloak over his head like an umbrello, during the great heat, and in bad weather to keep off the rain (g). This tradition is accounted ſo certain in that country, that St. Amable's picture is ſeldom drawn without his gloves and cloak being repreſented hanging in the air by a Sun-beam. Credat Judæus Apelles (h), ſays he, non ego. This ſuffices to give this article the form this Dictionary requires, without adding any reflections of my own. The bare rehearſal of ſuch things is a heap of errors.

(a) Gregory of Tours upon the glory of Confeſſors, ch. 33.

(b) I follow the tranſlation of the Abbot de Villalein.

(c) See the Abbot Faydit, Supplement to the Diſſertation upon the Sermon of St. Polycarpe, p. 30.

(d) Riom.

(e) Faydit, Supplement to the Diſſertation upon the Sermon of St. Polycarpe, pag. 102.

(f) Ibid. p. 101.

(g) Ibid. 103.

(h) So he writes that word. Hor. Satyr. 5. l. 2. ver. 100, ſays Apella, which better agrees with the rules of Proſody.

[A] Every body ſince 1300 years affirms to have ſeen the marvellous effects of it.] This computation does not agree with what we read in the next page, viz. that St. Gregory of Tours lived but about fifty or ſixty years after St. Amable. It is uſeleſs to prove that the meaning of theſe words is not, that he was born fifty or ſixty years after that Saint; it being very plain they import, that he was a grown man fifty or ſixty years after St. Amable's death. According to this, the death of that Saint muſt have happened about the beginning of the ſixth Century; for Gregory of Tours lived but about fifty two years, and died in 594 (1). Now if about the end of the ſeventeenth Century, the miracles of the Saint of Riom had been ſeen for the ſpace of 1300 years, he muſt have flouriſhed about the end of the fourth Century; and if ſo, it cannot be ſaid, that a man of twenty, in 562, lived fifty or ſixty years after him.

(1) Labbe de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. p. 398. Moſt writers place his death in the year 596.

☞AMALTHEUS (ATTILIUS), was born of a family in Italy, eminent for having produced men of the greateſt merit and learning, and was the ſon of Jerom Amaltheus, and nephew of John Baptiſta, both of them diſtinguiſhed for their admirable talent in Poetry. But Attilius left the glory of excelling in that branch of polite Learning to his father and his uncle, and applied himſelf to the graver ſtudies of Civil and Canon Law, and that of Divinity, in all which he made a noble progreſs. His application application was so great, that even when he was employed by the Pope in writing in characters and cyphers, he attended every day upon the Lectures of Father Mutio de Angelis, and Gregory de Valentia, as we are informed by Nicius Erythræus, who was contemporary with him under those Professors (a). He afterwards engaged entirely in affairs of state, and was made Referendary to the Pope, and a few years after being appointed Archbishop of Athens by Paul V, he was sent to Cologne with the character of Nuncio; which office he discharged with great applause [A]. Upon his return to Rome he spent the remainder of his life in a most exemplary manner [B], and was buried in the church of Jesus.

(a) Pinacotheca 2. p. 328. edit. Lipsiæ 1712.

[A] Which office he discharged with great applause.] His sagacity and the extent of genius was very remarkable; nor was his integrity thro' his whole conduct less admired. He never sold any favour or decree, but acted solely upon the view of merit, without the least regard to any selfish consideration. He never shewed by a single instance, that his mind was actuated by the motives of interest. These virtues raised his character so prodigiously high in the opinion of the world, that every one considered him as a person sent immediately from heaven for the benefit of mankind. His charity to the poor was the most diffusive imaginable; and his bounty was particularly extended to those, who left the Protestant Religion, and were reconciled to the Church of Rome. This appears from a Letter of his to Cardinal Bellarmin, who had desired him to assist one of the new converts in his necessities. His answer was, that if he had an estate of an hundred thousand crowns a year, he would freely bestow ninety five thousand of them in the support and encouragement of such persons. Nicius Erythræus, who is a writer extremely devoted to the Church of Rome, was particularly pleased with this last instance of Amaltheus's charity in favour of that Church. We shall give that author's words, in which the character abovementioned is contained. Quam provinciam ita gessit, ut ingenium agnoscerent omnes, animi integritatem susciperent, abstinentiam admiratione prosequerentur. Nullum beneficium, nullum decretum vendebat, gratis fere omnia dabat. Nullum appetentis animi signum præbebat. Quamobrem eum omnes, tanquam à cœlo delapsum, intuebantur. Incredibili erat erga pauperes beneficentia, & in eos præsertim, qui ex hæreticorum castris in nostra præsidia confugissent; de quibus in quadam ad Cardinalem Bellarminum epistola, à quo rogatus fuerat, ut cujuspiam istorum necessitatibus subveniret, si mihi, inquit, centum annua aureorum millia contingerent, nonaginta quinque istorum usibus assignarem (1).

(1) Ubi supra.

[B] Spent the remainder of his life in a most exemplary manner.] He devoted himself wholly to God and to works of piety; he used to frequent the Society of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary in the college of the Jesuits; and even condescended to visit the Hospitals in person; where it was his custom to wait upon the sick, make their beds himself, give them their food, and perform many other even of the lowest offices of charity to them. In this manner he lived till old age put an end to his days: Romam reversus, totum se Deo ac pietatis operibus tradidit; Sodalitatem B. V. Assumptæ in domo professa Soc. Jesu frequentabat, Nosocomia adibat, ægrotantium cubilia circuibat, iisque sua manu lectos sternebat, cibum præbebat, atque alia, quantumvis sordida, pietatis officia præstabat; in quibus operibus senex est mortuus; atque in Æde nominis Jesu sepultura affectus (2).

(2) Idem, ibid.

T.

AMAMA (SIXTINUS) Professor of the Hebrew tongue in the University of Franeker, was a man of very great learning. He was born in Friesland, and had studied under Drusius [A]. The University of Leyden, which is ever endeavouring to rob the neighbouring Universities of their best Professors, by offering them larger salaries, tried to draw him away from the University of Franeker (a), with a design to substitute him to Erpenius, who had been one of the most skilful men of his age in the Oriental Languages. Amama did not refuse this offer, yet he did not accept of it, but upon condition his superiors in Friesland should grant him leave, which they refused (b); and, no doubt, bettered his condition in such a manner, that he had no reason to complain of his not being Professor at Leyden. The first book he published was a specimen of a very fine design, viz. to censure the vulgate translation, which the Council of Trent has declared authentic. Before his whole design was executed, he published a Criticism upon the translation of the Pentateuch (c). This was what raised him to the rank of an author (d). While he was carrying on this Criticism, he was obliged to take in hand another work, which was to collate the Dutch translation of the Scripture with the Originals, and the exactest translations. That translation had been done from Luther's German version. He gave the publick an account of his labour in a work, which appeared (e) at Amsterdam in the vulgar tongue, and was entitled Bybelsche Conferentie, and is mentioned in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary [B]. Amama was so much taken up with the care of collating, that the publishing of that work, and of some grammatical pieces, diverted him a long time from applying himself to the

(a) In 1616.

(b) See the Epistle Dedicatory of the Anti-Barbarus Biblicus.

(c) Censura Vulgatæ Latinæ editionis Pentateuchi Franekeræ 1620, in 4°.

(d) Te obstetricante (says he to Gomarus) primus ille adolescentiæ meæ fœtus in dias luminis oras prodiit. Anti-Barb. Biblic. Sixt. Amama p. 295. I think he had published before in 1618, a little treatise de Decimis Mosaicis, containing nine pages in 4°, which was reprinted at London in 1660.

(e) In 1623.

[A] Amama studied under Drusius.] This appears plain from several passages of the Anti-Barbarus Biblicus. As to Sinesius, whose disciple he is said to have been in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, I own he is altogether a stranger to me, and I question much whether he is known in the united Provinces.

[B] This work is mentioned in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.] We read in this Supplement, that, according to Mr. Simon, Sixtinus Amama's main aim in that book was, to shew that the Dutch Bible, which the Protestants of the Low Countries used, and had been translated from Luther's German translation, was full of faults; which, it is added, he makes appear very plain. To give a fuller information as to this matter, I must relate the very words of the author that are here quoted. The Protestants of the Low Countries, says Mr. Simon in his Letter to Mr. P. relating to the inspiration of the holy Scriptures, page 10, grounded their reformation only upon a Dutch translation, which had been done from that of Luther; but at last . . . . resolved to go about a new translation. For that purpose Sixtinus Amama wrote a book in Dutch, entitled Bybelsche Conferentie, where he shews at length, that it was necessary a new Bible should be published for the use of the Dutch Churches. He asserts, that the Dutch translation, which was used in their church and had been done from that of Luther, contained in some places more faults than verses, of which he gives in the cenſure of the vulgate (f), which he was ready to reſume, when he heard that Marinus Marſennus had confuted his critical remarks on the firſt ſix chapters of Geneſis [C]. Upon this, laying aſide every thing elſe, he applied himſelf entirely to make good his Criticiſm againſt the remarks of that Cenſor. This anſwer is one of the pieces contained in his Anti-Barbarus Biblicus, which he publiſhed in 1628. The other pieces are his cenſure of the vulgate on the Hiſtorical Books of the Old Teſtament, on Job, the Pſalms, and the Books of Solomon: to which are added ſome Diſſertations on particular ſubjects; particularly, one on the famous paſſage of the Proverbs, The Lord created me in the beginning of all his ways, wherein he ſhews, that thoſe who accuſed Druſius of favouring Arrianiſm were notorious ſlanderers. The Anti-Barbarus Biblicus was to contain two parts, and each part three books; but the author publiſhed only the firſt, which was reprinted after his death [D], and the fourth book was added to it, compriſing the criticiſm of the vulgate upon Iſaiah and Jeremiah. It is impoſſible to ward the blows he levels againſt the vulgate, or give a ſatisfactory anſwer to the reaſons whereby he ſhews the neceſſity of recurring to the originals. This is what few learned men of the Church of Rome deny; all they aim at is to maintain, for the reputation of their laſt council, that it did not pretend to ſubmit the originals to the authority of the vulgate. Whether this can be honeſtly ſaid, is a queſtion foreign to my ſubject. Our Sixtinus recommended ſo earneſtly the ſtudy of the original languages of the Bible, that ſome Synods, moved with the weight of his reaſons, decreed that ſuch only ſhould be admitted to the Miniſtry as underſtood, at leaſt in ſome degree, the Hebrew and Greek text of the Scripture [E]. I muſt not omit, among his other commendations, the zeal he ſhewed for rooting out a vice that prevailed as much in the Univerſity of Franeker as in the Univerſities of Germany, I mean the vice of drunkenneſs [F], which he inveighed againſt, with great energy, in a publick ſpeech which he made in 1621. He gave ſuch ſatisfaction to thoſe of Frieſland, that after his death, which that work a great many inſtances. At p. 11, Mr. Simon writes thus, ... It is true that the Calviniſts of the Low Countries rejected their ancient tranſlation, and compoſed a new one. But if they followed, in the new tranſlation, the method Sixtinus Amama propoſed in his Bybelſche Conferentie, it can by no means be exact; for in his emendations he is only directed by Pagninus, Junius and Tremellius, the Bible of Zurick, the French Bible of Geneva, the German of Piſcator, the Spaniſh of Cyprianus de Valera, the Italian of Diodati, the Engliſh of Geneva, and other modern tranſlations ... full of faults.

(f) Sixt. Amama, Anti-Barb. Biblic. p. 160.

[C] When he heard that Marinus Merſennus had confuted his critical remarks on the ſix firſt chapters of Geneſis.] He heard it from Mr. Rivet; and if he had not acquainted him with it, he might have been a long time without knowing any thing of the matter. He had never heard before that there was ſuch a man as Father Merſennus. He writes thus in his Epiſtle Dedicatory (1). Abſque te fuiſſet, Cl. Rivete, nomen Merſenni, qui VI priorum Geneſeos capitum adverſus meas ſtricturas ſuſcepit patrocinium, etiamnum juxta cum ignariſſimis ignoraſſem. Tu primus mihi indicium, tu voluminis copiam feciſti, tu ad modeſtam & manſuetam replicationem hortamentis tuis me animaſti. i. e. "Without you I had been entirely "ignorant of the name of Merſennus, who under- "took the defence of the ſix firſt chapters of Gene- "ſis againſt my criticiſm. You gave me the firſt no- "tice of it, you procured me the book, and you "encouraged me to a modeſt and civil reply." I am ſurprized he omitted in his Anti-barbarus the forerunner of his anſwer; for he had publiſhed it in 1627, under this title, Epiſtola προόδρομος ad Marinum Merſennum (2). Mr. Crenius has inſerted it in the third part of his Animadverſiones (3).

(1) It is dated the 27th of Dec. 1626.

(2) See Catalog. Bibliothecæ Oxonienſis, where inſtead of Marſennum we read Marſennam.

(3) Printed at Leyden in 1698.

[D] It was reprinted after his death.] At Franeker in 1656, 4to. This is the edition Mr. Baillet ſpeaks of in his Anti's Vol. II. pag. 315. I muſt not omit, ſays he, the Anti-Barbarus, which a Profeſſor of Hebrew in the Univerſity of Franeker in Frieſland, named Sixtinus Amama, publiſhed in 1656, 4°, upon the text of the Holy Scripture, in the town where he taught, ... The many ſhort diſſertations and diſcourſes this work is filled with do not make its œconomy very agreeable. Note that his Criticiſm upon the Pentateuch of the Vulgate, together with his notes In Libros Hiſtoricos, Pſalmos, Proverbia, & Eccleſiaſten, which had never been printed, have been inſerted in the new edition of the great Critics (4).

(4) The Dutch edition in 1698. See Bibliotheca novorum Librorum for July and Auguſt 1698. p. 453.

[E] Some Synods moved with the weight of his reaſons decreed, that ſuch only ſhould be admitted to the Miniſtry, as underſtood, at leaſt in ſome degree, the Hebrew and Greek text of the Scripture.] The words of the Act that was made upon this by the Synod of Frieſland held at Harlingeras in 1624, are as follow: Decretum eſt ut in poſterum Theologiæ candidati quotquot ad examen Miniſterii Eccleſ. admitti deſiderabunt, præter teſtimonia Senatus Academici & Theologiæ Profeſſorum exhibeant etiam teſtimonia Profeſſorum Ebreæ & Græcæ linguæ, quibus doceant ſe in prædictis linguis eos ſaltem progreſſus feciſſe, ut originalem veteris novique teſtamenti tantum mediocriter poſſint intelligere, utque in claſſe iſta, cujus examini ſe offerant, ejus quoque rei ſpecimen edere teneantur (5). i. e. "It is decreed that from henceforth ſuch Can- "didates of Divinity as ſhall deſire to be admitted "to the examination for the Eccleſiaſtical Miniſtry, "ſhall produce not only the teſtimonies of the A- "cademical Senate and of the Profeſſors of Divinity, "but alſo the teſtimonies of the Greek and He- "brew Profeſſors, importing that they have made "ſuch a progreſs at leaſt in thoſe tongues, as to "have gained a moderate knowledge of the ori- "ginal text of the Old and New Teſtament, and "that they ſhall be obliged to give a proof of it "in the claſs, wherein they offer themſelves to "examination." It appears from the ſame Act, that this commendable reſolution was owing to Amama's Supplex Paræneſis, whereof a great many copies were diſperſed among the members of the aſſembly.

(5) It is part of the Anti-Barbarus Biblicus, and had been already printed twice.

[F] I muſt not omit the zeal he ſhewed for rooting drunkenneſs out of the Univerſity of Franeker.] The vigorous reſolutions that were taken againſt that are not to be chiefly aſcribed to Sixtinus Amama: he indeed contributed much to them; and had he only exhorted, and publicly congratulated thoſe who cleared the Univerſity of ſuch an abuſe, he would deſerve great commendations. He owns that Ameſius Profeſſor of Divinity and Hackting Profeſſor of Logic being admitted into the Academical Senate, and finding themſelves ſupported by the Rector of the Univerſity, undertook, with great courage and equal ſucceſs, the reforming of that diſorder. He congratulates them on that account, and dedicates to them his Oration De Barbariæ morum. The reader will be glad to hear how he expreſſes himſelf, and what difficulties the Reformers had to ſtruggle with. Ad primam occaſionem ... intrepidis & commaſculatis animis horrendas illas & feroces belluas, ebrietatem & licentiam, quæ hic ſæviebantur, ex Academia ejeciſtis, ac Chriſtianam diſciplinam which happened in December 1629 (g), they ſhewed themſelves very generous to his children, as Nicholas Amama, who was one of them, acknowledges in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of a book [G].

(g) Therefore Konig, who makes him live in 1630, and F. Morin, who ſuppoſes in his Exercitat. Biblicæ, Part 1, p. 61, that he taught at Franeker in 1633, are miſtaken.

ciplinam jam deſperatum, Deo ſupra quam à quoquam ſperari potuiſſet benedicente, Academiæ redonaſtis. Cujus præclari & æterna gratitudine digniſſimi facinoris, ſicuti invidiam apud diſſolutam & barbaram juventutem ſuſtinuiſtis, & quaſi præpilatis haſtis objecti fuiſtis ſoli, ita & æquiſſimum cenſeo, ut vobis quoque præ aliis tam egregii operis gloriâ ſic tranſcribatur (6). i. e. "You have with intrepid and manly minds caſt out of the Univerſity thoſe abominable and ſavage beaſts, Drunkenneſs and Licentiouſneſs, that had their dens here, and have reſtored Chriſtian Diſcipline that had been deſpaired of, God giving a greater bleſſing than could have been hoped for by any man. Of which glorious deed that deſerves everlaſting gratitude as you have born the envy from the diſſolute and barbarous youth, and have alone expoſed your ſelves to their darts, ſo I think it very juſt, that the principal glory ſhould be aſcribed to you." He relates moſt hideous things concerning the debauchery that reigned in ſome Univerſities. All the new comers were enrolled in the ſervice of Bacchus, and forced to ſwear, with certain ſolemn ceremonies, by a wooden ſtatue of St. Stephen, that they would ſpend all their money. If any one happened to have more regard to the oath he had taken to the Rector of the Univerſity, than to the ſuppoſed oath to Bacchus, the debauched Students plagued him to ſuch a degree that he was obliged either to leave the Univerſity, or give himſelf up to the ſame vices. He has annexed to his Oration ſome Fragments of the complaints of Alſtedius upon the ſame ſubject. Bellarmin inveighs in his 20th Sermon againſt the ſame vice of drunkenneſs, which reigned in the Univerſity of Louvain (7).

(6) Sixtin. Amama in Præliminar. Anti-Barbari Biblici.

(7) Amama takes notice of it in the Epiſtle Dedicatory prefixed to his Oration De Ebrietate.

[G] As Nicholas Amama acknowledges in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to a book.] This book was printed in 1651, 8vo, containing pages 600, and entitled, Diſſertationum Marinarum Decas. The author ſhews a great deal of erudition, and often departs from Ariſtotle, without being attach'd to the principles of the modern Philoſophy. He has reformed the very Orthography.

☞AMAND (MARK ANTHONY GERARD, SIEUR DE SAINT) a French Poet of the 17th Century, was born at Roan in Normandy about the end of the year 1594. as he informs us himſelf in one of his Triolets (a), which was written in the year 1649, where he tells us, that he ſhould enter into the fifty ſixth year of his age at the cloſe of that year. Several authors have pretended, that he was the ſon of a Gentilhomme Verrier (b); but this ſtory is ſufficiently refuted by what he informs us himſelf in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the third part of his works, that his father commanded a ſquadron of ſhips in the ſervice of Queen Elizabeth of England for two and twenty years together, and that he was for three whole years priſoner in the Black Tower at Conſtantinople. Beſides he tells us, that his two brothers had been killed in a battle againſt the Turks, and that the youngeſt of them had been Cornet-Colonel of a French regiment under Guſtavus the Great King of Sweden, afterwards Captain of a Ship under Count Harcourt, and at laſt Colonel of a French regiment of foot in the ſervice of the Republic of Venice. He obſerves there, that the name of his family was Gerard; and therefore it is an error in Baillet and other writers to give it only as his Chriſtian name. His whole life was almoſt ſpent in a continual ſucceſſion of travels [A]; which, if we believe the celebrated Monſieur Boileau, was of no great advantage to his fortune [B]. We have a conſiderable number of miſcellaneous

(a) Quand l'an qui court ſe fermera, J'ouvrirai mon douzieme luſtre.

(b) Gentilhomme Verrier ſignifies a leſſer ſpecies of Nobility. The profeſſion of a dealer in glaſs [Verrier] is noble among the French; and a man does not debaſe his quality by engaging in it. See the Dictionary of Trevoux in the word Verrier.

[A] His whole life was almoſt ſpent in a continual ſucceſſion of travels.] He informs us of this in the Preface to his works, where he tells us, that he had never ſtudied, and was entirely ignorant of the Latin tongue. "It is true, continues he, the converſation which I have had with Gentlemen, and the variety of curious things which I have ſeen in my travels, as well in Europe as in Africa and America, joined to the ſtrong inclination which I have had from my earlieſt years to Poetry, have ſupplied the want of ſtudy in me." He values himſelf likewiſe in the Preface to his Poem, intitled, Moyſe Sauvé, upon his never having paſs'd thro' the Ferula, in hopes that his readers would have ſome regard to that conſideration, and treat his errors with the more indulgence. But ſeveral of the Criticks have ſhewn, that he was extremely miſtaken in that point. It appears alſo from his Poems, that in his youth he had ſeen Africa and America; that in the year 1643 he was in England in the retinue of Count Harcourt, Embaſſador Extraordinary from the Court of France; that in 1647 he was at Colioure in Rouſſillon; and that he ſent the ſame year part of his Moyſe Sauvé to the Queen of Poland. This Queen was Mary Louiſa de Gonzaga, who was married in 1645 to Ladiſlas Sigiſmond King of Poland, and in 1649 to Caſimir brother and ſucceſſor of Ladiſlas. Saint Amand made intereſt at that time for the place of Gentleman in ordinary of the chamber to that Princeſs, which he obtained two years after, viz. in 1649. The Abbé de Marolles in his Memoirs (1), claims the honour of having procured him this place with a penſion of three thouſand livres. He ſet out for Poland the ſame year, but being taken priſoner by the Scouts of St. Omers, he was carried to that town; where he continued for ſome time in priſon; ſo that he did not reach Poland till 1650. He did not ſtay there long, for he returned to France the year following, and ſpent the reſt of his days at Paris. It is not known when he took the voyages to Africa and America abovementioned (2).

(1) P. 167.

[B] Was of no great advantage to his fortune.] The Verſes of that celebrated Poet are as follows (3).

(2) Mem. pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 14. p. 354, 355.

(3) Satyr 1.

Saint Amand n'eut du ciel que ſa veine en partage,
L'habit qu'il eut ſur lui fut ſon ſeul heritage:
Un lit & deux placets compoſoient tout ſon bien,
Ou, pour en mieux parler, Saint Amand n'avoit rien.
Mais quoi, las de trainer une vie importune,
Il engagea ce rien pour chercher la fortune;
Et tout chargé de vers, qu'il devoit mettre au jour,
Conduit d'un vain eſpoir il parut à la cour.
Qu'arriva-t-il enfin de ſa Muſe abuſée?
Il en revint couvert de honte & de riſée,
Et la fièvre au retour, terminant ſon deſtin,
Fit per avance en lui ce qu'auroit fait la faim.

That is:

" What but his vein had St. Amand from fate?
" The cloaths he 'ad on him were his whole eſtate;
" A bed, and two or three old ſtools were all
" The goods he properly his own cou'd call.
" But in a fitter phraſe I might have ſaid,
" He 'ad nothing of his own, nor ever had:
" Yet tir'd with a vexatious life, he pawns
" That nothing, and for court preferment yawns.

Thither

miſcellaneous Poems of this author [C], the greateſt part of which are of the comic or burleſque, and the gallant or amorous kind. But we find ſome among them, which ſhew us that he had not entirely abandoned himſelf to his pleaſures and the irregularity of his imagination; and it is ſaid that he was reclaimed from his debaucheries in the latter part of his life. Some perſons aſcribed this reformation of his to the diſtreſs of his circumſtances, which prevented him from indulging himſelf in ſo extravagant a manner as before (c). We ſee ſtrong marks of his devotion in his Stanzas upon Mr. Corneille's tranſlation of the Imitation of Jeſus Chriſt, which are the laſt and beſt verſes which he publiſhed (d). Mr. Broſſette in his notes upon Boileau tells us, that Saint Amand wrote a Poem upon the Moon, in which he paid a compliment to Lewis XIV of France, and particularly upon his ſkill in ſwimming, for that King, while he was young and lived at St. German's, uſed to exerciſe himſelf in ſwimming in the Seine. But the King could not bear this Poem to be read over to him; which diſgrace touched the author ſo ſenſibly, that he did not ſurvive it long. However this be, it is certain that he died in 1661, being ſixty ſeven years of age. The Abbe Olivet (e) places his death

(c) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. Part 2. Art. 1493. p. 229. edit. Amſterd. 1725.

(d) Hiſt. de l'Academie Franç. avec des Remarques & des Additions de Mr. l'Abbe Olivet. tom. 1. edit. 2. Paris 1733. pag. 331.

(e) Ibid.

" Thither to make his fortune he repairs,
" And loads of rhymes, to recommend him, bears,
" But how came off the bubbl'd Muſe at laſt?
" Why badly, and the future's like the paſt.
" Cover'd with ſhame and laughter he returns:
" In vain his loſs of time and trouble mourns.
" A fever ſeizes him, and ends his days,
" Which hunger elſe had done, with all his bays."

The Abbé Olivet obſerves, that there is not perhaps any other foundation for this Satyr than Monſr. Boileau's imagination, who thought without doubt, that the mentioning a name ſo well known as that of St. Amand's, would render his narration the more lively and poignant. For our author's Poems ſhew, that he did not wait ſo long before he ſollicited the favour of the Court, or publiſhed the Verſes, which he had written with that view (4). However his poverty was generally acknowledged; and this was chiefly occaſioned by his irregular manner of life, ſince it appears, that he had ſufficient to ſupport himſelf, if he had obſerved the bounds of moderation (5).

(4) Hiſt. de l'Ac. Franc. par M. Peliſſon avec des Remarques & des Additions de Mr. Abbé Olivet. p. 331. edit. 2. Paris 1730.

(5) Mem. pour ſervir &c. ubi ſupra.

[C] We have a conſiderable number of miſcellaneous Poems of this author.] His works are as follows: I. Les Ouvres du Sieur de Saint Amand; i. e. "The "Works of the Sieur de Saint Amand;" Paris in 4to, three volumes; the firſt in 1627, the ſecond in 1643, and the third in 1649. Theſe Poems have been reprinted ſeveral times. Solitude, an Ode, which is one of the firſt of them, is his beſt piece, in the opinion of Mr. Boileau (6); but there is one defect in it, which is, that in the midſt of a great number of very agreeable images, the author preſents to the reader very unſeaſonably the moſt ſhocking objects in nature, toads, ſnails with all the froth about them, the skeleton of a man, who had hang'd himſelf, and other things of that nature.

(6) Reflexions Critiques ſur Longin.

Là branle la ſquelete horrible
D'un pauvre Amant qui ſe pendit.
That is,
—— " There ſhakes the dreadful skeleton
" Of a poor lover, who had hang'd himſelf."

Stephen Bachot, Phyſician to the King, tranſlated it into Latin Verſe, and it is publiſhed in that language with the French original oppoſite to it, in a book of that author's entitled, Parerga ſeu horæ ſubſecivæ, Paris, 1686, in 12mo. In the third volume of St. Amand's works there is a very remarkable piece; it is a petition to the Chancellor Seguier for a privilege for making glaſs, which he preſented to him about the year 1638. It is not known upon what account he ask'd it, or whether he obtained it. This might perhaps give occaſion to the Poet Maynard to call him a Gentleman of Glaſs in the following Epigram:

Votre Nobleſſe eſt mince,
Car ce n'eſt pas d'un Prince,
Daphnis, que vous ſortés;
Gentilhomme de verre,
Si vous tombez à terre,
Adieu les qualitez.

(7) Vol. 2. p. 88. edit. 3. Amſter. 1713.

In the Menagiana (7) we find this Epigram, with ſome little variation; for the fourth verſe is placed firſt, and in the fifth line there is par terre inſtead of à terre.

It may not be improper to obſerve here, that tho' there are great faults in all his Poems, yet he had the talent of reading them in ſo agreeable a manner, that every one was charmed with them; and it was our author, whom Gombaud intended in theſe verſes:

Tes vers ſont beaux, quand tu les dis,
Mais ce n'eſt rien quand je les lis;
Tu ne ſeux pas joujours en dire,
Fais-en donc que je puiſſe lire.
That is,
" Sweet is your verſe, when by your ſelf 'tis read;
" But when I read it, all its charms are fled:
" Since you're not always preſent to rehearſe,
" To make me read, give ſpirit to your verſe."

II. Stances ſur la groſſeſſe de la Reine de Pologne & de Suede, 1650. i. e. " Stanzas upon the pregnancy " of the Queen of Poland and Sweden." There are ſix Stanza's of nine verſes each. III. Moyſe ſauvé, Idyle Heroique; i. e. " Moſes ſaved, an Heroic Idyl- " lium." Paris, 1653, in 4to, and in 1660, in 12mo. This Poem at firſt had a great many admirers. Thoſe, who valued themſelves upon being eſteemed good Judges, extoll'd it highly, not excepting even Monſieur Chapelain himſelf, who calls this piece a ſpeaking Picture (8). But it has ſince fallen into great contempt, aud Monſieur Boileau had it in view, when he wrote as follows (9):

(8) Peinture parlante. See Chapelain's Preface to his Pucelle

(9) Art. Poetique, Chant. 3. ver. 264.

N'imitez pas ce fou, qui decrivant les mers,
Et peignant, au milieu de leurs flots entr' ouverts,
L'Hebreu ſauvé du joug de ſes injuſtes maitres,
Met pour les voir paſſer les poiſſons aux fenetres,
Peint le petit enfant, qui va, ſaute, revient,
Et joyeux à ſa mere offre un caillou qu'il tient;
Sur de trop vains objets c'eſt arrêter la vûe.
That is,
" Nor imitate that fool, who to deſcribe
" The wond'rous marches of the choſen tribe,
" Plac'd on the ſides, to ſee their armies paſs,
" The fiſhes ſtaring thro' the liquid glaſs;
" Deſcrib'd a child, who with his little hand,
" Pick'd up the ſhining pebbles from the ſand.
" Such objects are too mean to ſtay our ſight."
Sir WILLIAM SOAMES.

The ſame writer likewiſe, in his reflection upon the eighth chapter of Longinus, (wherein the latter obſerves, that it ſpoils all, to dwell long upon little things,) remarks the ſame fault in our Poet in chooſing ſuch low and trifling circumſtances, inſtead of enlarging upon the many great ones, which ſo noble a ſubject offered to him. He remarks alſo, that he ſeems to place the fiſh at the window in the following verſes:

Et là, pres des ramparts que l'œil peut tranſpercer
Les poiſſons ébahis les regardent paſſer.
That is,
" There near the walls, thro' which the eye may
" pierce,
" The wond'ring fiſh look'd out, and ſaw them paſs."

" There is no body, continues the Critic, but Monſieur " Perrault, who does not perceive ſomething comi- " cal death in the latter end of the year 1660; but as he tells us that he lived ſixty ſeven years, and it appears above that he was born about the end of the year 1594, we muſt fix it in the year 1661. Thoſe writers who place his death in 1659, are guilty of an error ſtill more flagrant (e). He was received a member into the French Academy from the firſt foundation of it by Cardinal Richelieu in the year 1633. And Mr. Peliſſon informs us (f), that in the year 1637, he deſired and obtained leave to be excuſed from the obligation of making a ſpeech in his turn, according to the regulation which had been made in that point, on condition that he ſhould compile, as he himſelf had offered, the comic part of the Dictionary, which the Academy had undertaken, and ſhould collect the groteſque and burleſque terms. This was a taſk very ſuitable to him; for it appears by his writings, that he was extremely converſant in that kind of language, of which he ſeems to have made a compleat collection among the markets and taverns, and places, where the lower rank of people reſort. Monſieur Boileau acknowledges (g), that he had genius enough for works of low humour and ſatyr, and that we find even in his ſerious writings ſeveral happy ſtrokes of wit; but the Critick adds, that he ſpoils all by the mean and trivial circumſtances which he every where makes uſe of. Mr. Roſleau likewiſe is of opinion (h), that he has written ſeveral good things amongſt a great many others, which are inordinately dull and inſipid.

(e) Mem. pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 14. p. 358. edit. de Paris 1731.

(f) Hiſt. de l'Académie Franc. p. 101.

(g) Reflexions Critiques ſur Longin. c. 8.

(h) Sentim. ſur quelques Ouvrages d'Auteurs qu'il a tûs. pag. 75.

" cal in theſe two verſes, by which one would think " the fiſh had hired windows to ſtand at, and ſee " the Hebrews paſs. This is the more ridiculous, " becauſe fiſh hardly ſee any thing thro' the water; " their eyes being ſo placed, that if their heads had " been out of the walls, they could not very eaſily " have diſcovered the march of the Iſraelites. Not- " withſtanding which Monſieur Perrault pretends to " juſtify theſe Verſes, but by ſuch trifling arguments, " that in reality I ſhould think it would be an abuſe " of paper, if I made uſe of it to anſwer them. I " ſhall ſatisfy my ſelf with referring him to " the compariſon Longinus mentions here out " of Homer. He may there ſee with what art this " divine Poet cloſes the great circumſtances, and " gathers them together. Yet I queſtion whether " he will conſent to this truth; for he is particu- " larly offended with Homer's compariſons, and " makes them the chief object of his pleaſantry in " his laſt Dialogue." IV. Stances à M. Corneille ſur ſon Imitation de Jeſus Chriſt; i. e. " Stanzas to " Monſieur Corneille upon his Imitation of Jeſus " Chriſt." Paris 1656, in 4to. There are ſeventy Stanza's of ſix verſes each. V. Rome riditule, which is publiſhed in the Collection of his works, was printed ſeveral times ſeparately or with other works of the ſame kind, in 4to and 12mo (10). There is an Italian tranſlation of it, which is printed. Mr. Chapelain in his MS. Letters, quoted by the Abbé Olivet (11), obſerves, that this piece was printed clandeſtinely at Paris in 1643, and that the Printer was thrown into priſon. There was likewiſe aſcribed to him a ſatyrical piece againſt the French Academy, entitled The Comedy of the Academy; but it appeared afterwards to be written by Monſieur St. Evremont (12).

(10) Mem. pour ſervir, &c. pag. 362.

(11) Ubi ſupra.

(12) See Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Franc. avec des Remarques & des Additions de M. l'Abbé d'Olivet, p. 61. edit. de Paris 1730.

T.

AMASEUS (ROMULUS) Profeſſor of Greek and Latin at Bologna in the ſixteenth Century [A], and Secretary to that Senate (a), gained great reputation by his learning and employments. He was originally of Bologna, but born at Udine in Friuli. Pope Paul III invited him to Rome, and made him Preceptor to his grandſon Alexander Farneſe (b). He was afterwards employed in affairs of greater conſequence, and ſent to the courts of the Emperor, of the Princes of the Empire, and of Poland. No man of learning was more eſteemed at Rome than he, during the Pontificate of Julius III, whom he ſerved in quality of Secretary. His tranſlation of Pauſanias, and of a work of Xenophon (c), prove that he underſtood well the Greek tongue. He wrote alſo a volume of Orations, and Scholas duas de ratione inſtituendi. The two books, in which he ſhews, that the Latin tongue is preferable to the Italian, were never printed (d). Some ſay he died in 1558, being ſixty nine years old [B]. He left one ſon, called Pompilius, no ways inferior to himſelf; for he underſtood, tranſlated, and even taught Greek at Bologna (e). I think he only tranſlated two fragments of the ſixth book of Polybius [C]; where he ſhews more ſkill than Perot and Muſculus have done in their tranſlations of that author (f). However a learned writer taxes him with paſſing over the hard paſſages, contenting himſelf to acquaint the reader, that he might find them explained

(a) See note [B].

(b) And not his nephew, as du Ryer renders the word Nepos in Thuanus.

(c) The expedition of Cyrus the younger.

(d) Thuanus, lib. 21. p. 432. and the Additions of Mr. Teiſſier.

(e) Bumaldus quoted by Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. p. 400.

(f) This is Caſaubon's judgment. See Baillet, ibid.

[A] Amaſeüs (Romulus) Profeſſor of Greek and Latin in the xvith Century.] Moreri was not miſtaken here in his Chronology, which therefore was not to be altered, as it has been in the Dutch edition, where the ſixteenth Century has been ſtruck out, and the fourteenth put in its room. I find three things in that article, which ought to have been corrected. I. It is too dry and empty. II. It ought to have been under the word Amaſeüs, and not under the word Romulus. III. It ought not to have been ſaid, that Amaſeüs tranſlated the works of Xenophon; but that he tranſlated the ſeven books, which Xenophon wrote upon the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

[B] Some ſay he died in 1558, being 69 years old.] Thuanus was under a miſtake when he wrote that Romulus Amaſeüs died in 1558. For this Romulus was dead in 1552. We can prove it from a Letter of Giovanni Antonio Serone, an intimate friend of Romulus, dated the 20*th October of that year, and to be found in Turchi's Collection, pag. m.* 257. This is what Mr. de la Monnoie has done me the honour to write to me. If it is true that Amaſeüs died in 1558, it is not without ground that ſome ſay he lived 69 years; for his birth-day is marked in the figures of Luke Gauric on the 24th of June 1489 (1). In this work of Gauric I have met with ſome particulars, which I ſhall inſert here. Amaſeüs was lean, very tall, bald, and had a little head. He was Secretary to the Senate of Bologna, and taught Rhetoric in that city with an annual ſalary of 300 crowns. He taught afterwards at Rome in the time of Paul III, and enjoyed on that account a penſion of 600 crowns a year: Nutu Pauli III, ex lectura in urbe habebat 600 aureos. This is what Thuanus was ignorant of.

(1) See fol. 72. verſo of the Venice edition in 1552, of theſe figures of Gauric.

[C] Pompilius Amaſeüs only tranſlated two Fragments of the ſixth book of Polybius.] Pompilius Amaſeüs after tranſlating theſe Fragments, which treat of the military diſcipline of the Romans, thought fit to illuſtrate them with a Commentary, which is lodged among the Manuſcripts of Thuanus's Library (2). This Manuſcript is in Italian. The author tranſlated the Fragments both into Latin and into his mother-tongue.

(2) See the Catalogue of this Library, p. 453.

explained elsewhere (g). As to his father, every body allows him to have been a great admirer of perspicuity and politeness of style: he enlarged what was too concise, shortened what was too prolix, and cleared up the obscure passages (b). His translation of Pausanias stood in need of Sylburgius's revisal.

(g) Huetius de claris Interpret. p. 122. edit. Batav.

(b) This is Mr. Huet's judgment, ibid.

AMASTRIS, niece of the last Darius, and wife of Dionysius, Tyrant of Heraclea. See his history in the article of that DIONYSIUS, where you will also find the city of Amastris founded by this Princess.

AMBOISE (FRANCIS D') deserves a place among those, whom the profession of learning has raised to honours in the world. He was son of a Surgeon to Charles IX, and maintained by that Prince in the College of Navarre, during his study of Rhetoric and Philosophy. He was afterwards school-master in the same College, for we find that in 1752 he had already taught the second form four years. In 1572 he was made Sollicitor of the French nation. He applied himself afterwards to the Law, and became one of the best Advocates of the Parliament of Paris. From this employment he passed to that of Counsellor in the Parliament of Bretagne; and lastly, was raised to be Master of Requests (a), and Counsellor of State (b). He travelled into several remote countries [A]. In his youth he published a great many French verses, and some Latin pieces too, which he must have looked upon as not very honourable to him, after he was raised to publick employments; for they savour much of a man who is ready to write upon whatsoever subject the present time offers, who sends his Muses to beg on all sides, sometimes with compliments of condolence, and sometimes with congratulations, as though he had been appointed the Compliment-bearer of Parnassus to the great Lords. I shall mention in the remarks, the titles of some of his works [B], which, in my opinion, will not contribute so much to the immortalizing of his name, as the pains he took to collect the manuscripts of Peter Abelard [C], and to add an Apologetic Preface to them, which is (a) Ex Midd. Thirioti Laudatione Hadriani Ambæsii. See p. 356, 709, and 800. Historiæ Gymnasii Navarræ. Joan. Launoj.

(b) In the edition of the works of Abelard, he has the title of Equitis, Regis in sanctiore Consistorio Consiliarii Baronis Chartæ, &c.

[A] He travelled into several remote countries.] (1) Du Verdier Vau-Privas observes, that Francis d'Amboise wrote at Warsaw a description of the Kingdom of Poland, when Henry Duke of Anjou, now King of France, was elected King of Poland (2). This is one of his travels. From the words I have quoted we cannot be positive whether he attended the new King on his journey into Poland, or was there when that Prince was elected. This last is the only one we should have taken them in, had du Verdier Vau-Privas been an exact writer.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Francoise, p. 86.

(2) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoise, p. 363.

See Francis d'Amboise's Treatise upon Devices, where it is recorded (3), that at the time of this election, he was in that country at the Bishop of Valence's house.

(3) Pag. 42.

This Treatise upon Devices is a posthumous work; and was printed at Paris in 1620 by Adrian d'Amboise, the author's son, who the following year published in the same city a small Treatise of his own composing, entitled Moral Devices.

[B] We shall mention the titles of some of his works.] An Elegy on the death of Anne de Montmorency, Peer and Constable of France, with a Latin Panegyric, and a French Ode on the misfortune that befell France, in 1568 (4). A Panegyric upon the marriage of Henry of Lorrain Duke of Guise, and Catherine of Cleves, Countess of Eu, in 1570 (5). The Tomb of Messire Gilles Bourdin, the King's Attorney-General in his court of Parliament at Paris, containing three Sonnets, an Elegy translated from the Latin of Anthony Valet, and some Latin Hendecasyllabic Verses, in 1570 (6). The Amours of Clion, containing, among other things, a Poem entitled, The desperate, or amorous Eclogues, in 1572 (7). Facetious Amours, containing several merry stories, and among others that which he styles, the Neapolitan Women, in 1584. This piece is the translation of an Italian Comedy. At the beginning of it he disguises himself under the name of Thierry de Timophile, G. Picard, and uses the same disguise in his Funeral Lamentations upon some Animals, which he translated from the Italian in 1576, and in his Dialogue, and Familiar Conversation of Ladies, which he published in 1583. La Croix du Maine, to whom I am indebted for these hints, tells us, that this writer understood many languages, and that he published divers works in Latin. His collection of Devices was published after his death, in 1620.

(4) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoise, p. 365.

(5) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoise, p. 87.

(6) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoise, p. 365.

(7) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoise, p. 87.

[C] The pains he took to collect the Manuscripts of Peter Abelard.] His care and diligence well deserve to be ackowledged by the Public; since we are indebted to him for an excellent edition of the works of that celebrated Logician. This edition contains, I, the Letters which Abelard and Heloisa wrote to each other, with the account he himself gave of his misfortunes, prefixed to them. II, The Letters he wrote to other persons, and those that St. Bernard, the Abbot of Clugni &c. wrote about his errors, his condemnation, and his death; together with some Treatises, which one of his Disciples published for him. III, Some Dogmatical Treatises of Abelard, as the Explanation of the Lord's Prayer, of the Apostles Creed, and of that of St. Athanasius; An Answer to some of Heloisa's Questions; A Commentary upon the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans. IV, Various Sermons on the chief Festivals. V, An Introduction to Divinity, which contains his book upon the Trinity. VI, The learned Notes of Andrew du Chêne upon the History of Abelard's Misfortunes. Besides these there are other works of this author, which have never yet been printed. Their titles are to be seen in Father Oudin's Supplement (8), which also informs us, in what Libraries they are lodged. Francis d'Amboise caused the rules, which Abelard wrote for the Nuns of Paraclet, to be translated into French. Many were displeased with his apologetic Preface; and some have given out, that it was the occasion of the proceedings of Rome against the work he published. And if the works of Abelard were lately, put into the Index Expurgatorius of Rome, that, in my opinion, is not to be imputed to him, but to the author of the Preface, who, instead of warning the reader against such and such passages in Abelard's works, takes upon him to defend him: and from thence sprung all the evil. Thus writes the author of the Antiquities of Melun, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris (9). It cannot be said, properly speaking, that he wrote the Life of Peter Abelard (10): he only gives a succinct account of his chief adventures, and that not without a great many mistakes, which it would not be proper to censure here. However, I may well say, without departing from my subject, that Francis Amboise by publishing Abelard's works did not do him that great honour he imagined. The public did not find that vast acuteness and energy in them which had gained him so great a reputation during his life. As to the works of Abelard, says Sebastian Roulliard (11), they do not answer, in my opinion, the great commendations which so many eminent writers have bestowed upon him. I am therefore persuaded that the whole excellence of this author consisted in a ready wit, an eloquent speech, and a philosophical genius, which render'd him formidable and invincible in all kinds of disputes. We have seen the like happen in our time, to two or three writers, who were greatly esteemed on account of some of these good qualities, and yet their works, when published, were far from answering the common expectation.

(8) Pag. 413.

(9) Sebast. Roulliard, p. 350. His book was printed at Paris 1628, 4°.

(10) It is however said in the Catalogus Autorum Catalogorum, &c. of Mr. Teissier, p. 590.

Judgment passed upon the works of Abelard.

(11) Hist. of Melun, p. 348.

is prefixed to the edition of 1616 [D]. This Preface informs me of what I had not read in the Hiſtory of the College of Navarre, viz. that he publiſhed a ſhort Treatiſe of the Council, and a Preface to the Hiſtory of Gregory of Tours [E], wherein he defends that Hiſtorian againſt the imputations of Flacius Illyricus, but does not vindicate him with relation to the two Dionyſius's, the Areopagite, and the Corinthian. He is placed in Mr. Baillet's catalogue of diſguiſed Authors, under the ſuppoſed name of Thierry de Timophile.

I have ſomething to add about that edition of Peter Abelard's works, which is generally aſcribed to our Francis d'Amboiſe [F].

[D] He added an Apologetic Preface to the works of Abelard, which is prefixed to the edition of 1616.] The conveniency of arithmetical figures is attended with great inconveniencies. The Printers commit a thouſand faults, which the correctors do not perceive; and this occaſions the multiplying of beings, without any neceſſity; whereof we have an inſtance here. Some place this edition of Abelard's works in 1606 (12), others in 1626 (13); which will make many Authors ſay, that the works of Abelard were printed three times in the ſpace of twenty years; and, as ſome aſſert, that they were printed in folio in 1616 (14), this is a new means for the multiplying of editions without neceſſity.

(12) Launoius, Hiſt. Gymnaſii Navarræ, pag. 801.
(13) Father Oudin, Supplement de Script. Eccleſiaſt. p. 413.
(14) Spizelius Specim. Biblioth. Univers; Konig, Bibl. vet. & nova; Chriſtoph. Hendreich, Pandectar. Brandenburg. initio.

[E] He publiſhed a Preface to the Hiſtory of Gregory of Tours.] I do not queſtion but this is the edition of which the Abbot de Marolles writes thus (15): His Hiſtory of France (he means Gregory of Tours) which is his chief performance, was formerly tranſlated by Claudius Bonnet, a Gentleman of Dauphine (16), who ſtyled himſelf Doctor of the Civil and Canon Law; upon this Hiſtory Mr. Hemery d'Amboiſe, Maſter of Requeſts, wrote a long Preface, addreſſed to Madam Henrietta Balzac, Marchioneſs of Verneuil, and printed at Paris by Claude de la Tour, 1610, 8vo.

(15) Preface upon Gregory of Tours.
(16) It is not to be found in Allard's Biblioth. de Dauphiné.

[F] I have ſomething to add about that edition of Peter Abelard's works, which is generally aſcribed to our Francis d'Amboiſe.] As this remark is not my own, I ſhall ſet it down in the words of the perſon that imparted it to me (17). "The name of Mr. d'Amboiſe is prefixed to ſome copies of Abelard's works; and the name of Andrew du Cheſne to others with this title, Petri Abælardi, Sancti Gildaſii in Britannia Abbatis, & Heloiſſæ conjugis ejus, quæ poſtmodum prima cœnobii Paraclitenſis Abbatiſſa fuit, opera, nunc primum eruta ex MSS. Codd. & in lucem edita ſtudio ac diligentia Andreæ Quercetani, Turonenſis. Pariſiis, Nic. Buon, 1616, in 4*to*. It is very likely that this edition is owing to Du Cheſne. For in the Epitome of the patent, which is at the beginning of Du Cheſne's copy, we read, among other things, that thoſe pieces were printed opera & ſtudio Quercetani; whereas in the copy, that bears the name of Amboiſe, no mention is made of the perſon that was at the pains to collect them. So that one would think, if it were allowed to indulge conjectures, that Du Cheſne, (out of ſome motive unknown to us, and which authors have not judged proper to tranſmit to poſterity,) yielded the glory of his undertaking to Mr. d'Amboiſe, who was then in a condition to make him a ſuitable return for a ſacrifice of this nature. But however that may be; the two copies I have ſeen of Du Cheſne and d'Amboiſe are not quite uniform; for inſtance, that of Du Cheſne begins with an Epiſtle Dedicatory addreſſed to Mre. Benjamin de Brichanteau, Biſhop of Laon, and Abbot of Saint Genevieve. The ſuppoſed edition of Mr. d'Amboiſe has neither this Epiſtle, nor the Preface which Du Cheſne added to it. In this Preface Du Cheſne after informing his reader, in general terms, who Abelard and Heloiſa were, gives an account of what he has done towards the perfecting, as far as lay in his power, the edition of that celebrated Logician's works: he commends all thoſe who helped him with their manuſcripts, and owns himſelf indebted to Mr. d'Amboiſe for the letters, and ſome other pieces. To this Preface are annexed the Teſtimonia veterum de Abælardo & Heloiſſa, which are not in Mr. d'Amboiſe's copy. As to Mr. d'Amboiſe's edition, it contains an Apologetic Preface in favour of Abelard, which is not in Mr. Du Cheſne's edition. In other regards the two editions are quite uniform, and anſwer one another page by page. It will not perhaps be amiſs to acquaint the Public with theſe two titles, leſt they ſhould give an occaſion to increaſe ſtill more the number of the editions of Abelard's works, as it has already been obſerved.

(17) Manuſcript Memoirs imparted by Mr. Lancelot Under-Librarian of Mazarine Library at Paris.

AMBOISE (ADRIAN D') a younger brother of the former, raiſed himſelf to as great preferments as the other, for he was advanced to the dignity of a Biſhop. He likewiſe had his ſhare in the liberality of Charles IX, who maintained him a long time in the College of Navarre, and was equally favoured by Henry III. He was Fellow of the College of Navarre (a) when he was choſen, in 1579, Rector of the Univerſity of Paris. During his Rectorſhip, the Univerſity begged of the King the confirmation of their privileges; and he addreſſed him as ſpeaker, being accompanied by many Doctors. He took the degree of Licentiate in Divinity in 1582; on that occaſion the panegyrical ſpeech was pronounced by Michael Thiriot, who, among other encomiums, mentioned his pedigree, ſaying, that he was deſcended of a very noble family [A]. He

(a) Socius Navarricus, Launoius Hiſtoria Gymnaſii Navarræ, p. 360.

[A] Thiriot among other Encomiums ſays he was deſcended of a very noble Family.] Nevertheleſs this author in his Panegyric upon the Son mentions in plain terms, that his father was a Surgeon. I have borrowed the word nevertheleſs from Mr. de Launoi, who writes thus, "Attamen Thiriotus ait, Hadrianum "fundatiſſima & nobiliſſima ſatum eſſe familia. His "enim verbis utitur: Franciſcus primum in duorum "inferiorum Navarræ ſodalitiorum diſciplinam re"ceptus eſt, & Caroli IX liberalitate ad Rhetoricas "& Philoſophicas Inſtitutiones eruditus. Deinde "humaniores literas ibidem docuit &c." i. e. "Ne"vertheleſs Thiriot ſays, that Adrian deſcended "from a very ancient and noble Family. For he ex"preſſes himſelf in theſe words: Francis was firſt "received into the ſchool of two of the inferior "ſocieties of Navarre, and by the liberality of "Charles IX inſtructed in Rhetoric and Philoſophy. "Afterwards he taught polite Literature in the ſame "place (1)." Theſe two authors might be eaſily reconciled, by ſaying that the Latin expreſſion nobiliſſima familia does not import what the French call a very noble family, ſince Surgery in France is not the profeſſion of a Gentleman: This is what Thiriot meant. If Mr. de Launoi took that expreſſion in the ſame ſenſe, the proofs he produces are both uſeleſs, and without any force. It is uſeleſs to prove that the character of a Gentleman is given to one, when he is ſaid, in expreſs terms, to come of a very noble family, in the ſenſe in which the French take that word; and if to prove a thing ſo plain in itſelf, one ſhould ſay, that ſuch a perſon had been a Fellow of the College of Navarre, or, that he had taught there the ſecond form; it would be very plain, that he minded not what he ſaid. Such proofs of Nobility were never admitted. It is therefore very likely

(1) Launoius, Hiſt. Gymnaſii Navarr. pag. 799, 800.

He was Preacher and Almoner to the King, and Head of the College of Navarre (b), when the Univerſity of Paris in 1594, took an oath of allegiance to Henry the Great. About the ſame time he was made Rector of the Pariſh Church of St. Andrew in Paris, and in 1604 Biſhop of Treguier. He died the 28th of July 1616, and was buried in his likely, that not only Michael Thiriot, but Mr. de Launoi too, underſtood by nobiliſſima familia, a family that deſerved ſome regard, and made a good figure; but not a Gentleman's family. This ought to be minded in the Latin Panegyrics upon Men of learning; for we ſhould be greatly miſtaken if we imagined all thoſe to be Gentlemen, of whom it is ſaid, nobili loco, nobili genere, nobili proſapia oriundi. I know that Francis d'Amboiſe ſtyles himſelf Eſquire, in his edition of Abelard's works, but that proves, at moſt, that either he, or his father, had been raiſed to the rank of a Gentleman, and not that his father was a Gentleman and Chirurgeon at the ſame time. A thought comes into my head, which you ſhall have as cheap as I have it, viz. that perhaps the Anceſtors of Francis d'Amboiſe fell from their rank, and he obtained the reſtoration of his family to its former dignity. Nay, who knows but that he was deſcended from a baſtard of the illuſtrious family of Amboiſe? This ſeems to have moſt appearance of truth; for he tells us, that he went to the Convent of the Paraclet to collect there all the works of Peter Abelard he could, and that he was well received by the Abbeſs Mary de la Rochefoucaut, his relation, whoſe grand mother by the father's ſide, ſays he, Antonietta d'Amboiſe, wife to the Lord of Barbeſieux, Knight of the Order, was the only daughter of Guy d'Amboiſe, and grand-daughter and heireſs to Charles Lord of Chaumont, Marſhal of France: ſo that the whole inheritance of that moſt ancient family fell to her, and ſhe transferred the eſtate of the elder branch to the family of Rochefoucaut. Totam vetuſtiſſimam familiam crevit, & primogenita noſtra ad Rupifocaldos tranſtulit (2). It is ſomewhat extraordinary that the ſon of a Surgeon to Charles IX ſhould have ſpoke in this manner (a). Note, that it is undeniable, that a branch of the illuſtrious family d'Amboiſe either remained obſcure, or fell into a mean condition. The Surgeon to Charles IX was perhaps come of that branch.

(b) Ibid. pag. 371, 372.

(2) Franc. Amboeſus, Præfatione Apologetica in opera Abælardi.

§ (a) This man's deſcendants ſuppoſe themſelves to be a branch of the illuſtrious family of Amboiſe, becauſe they bear the ſame name; but their ſuppoſition is evidently falſe, ſince there is no manner of doubt but that,

I, John d'Amboiſe, father of Francis d'Amboiſe, was a native of Douai in Flanders, and Surgeon to five Kings of France ſucceſſively, viz. Francis I, Henry II, Francis II, Charles IX, and Henry III; that he was naturalized by Letters dated the 29th of January 1566, in quality of Valet de Chambre and Surgeon to Charles IX; that he died the 13th of December 1584; and was enterred in the church of Saint Gervas at Paris, with Mary Fromager his wife, who was daughter to John Fromager, ſworn Surgeon to the Châtelet at Paris, and alſo Surgeon to the King.

II, That Francis d'Amboiſe, Son of John, was Baron of la Chartre on the Loire, and Lord of Hémeri and Vezeul in Touraine &c. Counſellor, and afterwards Preſident in the Parliament of Bretagne: Advocate general of the great Council in 1586; Maſter of Requeſts in 1597; a Privy-Counſellor; and laſtly Counſellor of State in 1604; that he married on the 15th of January 1594 Margaret Couſinet, daughter of a Notary of Meaux, who in 1634 was ſtill alive: that in the month of July 1589 he was knighted by Henry III in conſideration of the ſervices his father had done to four of that Prince's predeceſſors.

Here follows a copy of his Letters Patent of Knighthood; granted by King Henry III, in the month of July 1589 to Francis d'Amboiſe, Preſident of the Parliament of Bretagne.

HENRY by the grace of God King of France and Poland, to all thoſe that are, and ſhall be, greeting. As it is honeſt and reaſonable that men of virtue ſhould be raiſed to titles and honours ſuitable to their merit, in order to encourage others to aſpire, by the ſame means, to the ſame, or to more ſublime dignities; we do hereby notify, that we being duly informed of the great, commendable, and virtuous deeds, actions, and behaviour of our dear and well beloved Mre. Francis d'Amboiſe, Lord of Vezeul, Counſellor and Advocate General of our Great Council, and Preſident of the Parliament of Bretagne, remembring the ſervices his deceaſed father has done to four Kings our Predeceſſors, and to us, and conſidering the great, acceptable, and faithful ſervices the ſaid d'Amboiſe has done us, as well in many employments and commiſſions he has been truſted with in this our kingdom, and when he went into Poland at the time of our election, as in the diſcharge of his two employments, in two of our ſupreme courts, which ſervices the ſaid d'Amboiſe continues moſtly near and about our perſon in many and divers manners, and hoping that he will acquit himſelf ſtill better for the future, deſiring to confer ſome kind of reward upon him in conſideration of his ſervices, and to raiſe him to a title and degree of honour, as his virtue and actions well deſerve, that by his example both his poſterity and other men of virtue and honour may be encouraged to behave themſelves in the like manner towards us, and this our crown; on theſe and other motives inducing us thereunto, have created him Knight, and honoured him with this title, in the preſence of many Princes and Lords of our blood, and other perſons of great diſtinction, that he may thereby enjoy and uſe for the future the title of Knight, with all the rights of Nobility, and all the honours, authority, privileges, exemptions, prerogatives, and pre-eminencies in all honourable aſſemblies, as well in judgment as elſewhere, as in the whole latitude they are enjoyed by other Knights, whether created by us, or by the Kings our Predeceſſors. We therefore enjoin our beloved and truſty ſubjects, holding our Courts of Parliament, Bailiffs, Seneſchals, Sheriffs, Judges, or their Lieutenants, and all our beloved Juſtices, Officers and Subjects, each in his reſpective capacity, according to the tenor of theſe preſents, to make, ſuffer and allow the ſaid d'Amboiſe to enjoy and uſe fully and peaceably the ſaid rights of knighthood, honours, prerogatives, privileges, immunities and liberties belonging thereunto as above, and is cuſtomary on like occaſions. For ſuch is our will and pleaſure; and to the end this our gift and grant may remain for ever to the glory of the ſaid d'Amboiſe and his poſterity, we have cauſed our ſeal to be ſet to theſe preſents. Given at Pontoiſe in the month of July, the year of our Lord 1589, and 16th of our reign. Signed HENRY, and counter-ſigned by the King, POTIER, and aſide, viſa contentor. Signed COMBAUD, and ſealed with the great ſeal of green wax hanging by ſtrings of green and red ſilk.

III, That Anthony d'Amboiſe, his ſon, Baron of Hemeri &c. married, the 20th of October 1632, Anne de la Hiliere daughter of John Gabriel de la Stiliere, Governor of Amboiſe, and of Louiſa du Gaſt; and that after being Lieutenant of the Artillery in 1634, Colonel of the Regiment of Touraine, and Governor of the town and caſtle of Trino in Piedmont, he died Lieutenant General of the King's forces.

IV, That Charles Julius d'Amboiſe his ſon, likewiſe Colonel of the Regiment of Touraine, married Charlot du Gaſt, his own couſin, the 22d of September 1672.

And V, That of this marriage was born Giles-Anthony d'Amboiſe living in the city of Amboiſe in Touraine, where he married the 17th of January 1700, Paule Guichard daughter of the Mayor of the ſaid city, by whom he had one ſon and two daughters, who were alive in 1716.

It is ſuppoſed in a ſmall book, entitled Index funereus Chirurgorum Pariſienſium ab anno 1315 ad annum his Cathedral, where we read great commendations of him in his epitaph [B]. He wrote no books, to my knowledge, except a French Tragedy entitled, Holophernes, which was printed in 1580 (c).

(c) Launoi, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarr. p. 800.

* James d'Amboiſe, brother of Francis, married Mary Longis, daughter of Joſeph Longis, Procurator to the Parliament, died the 5th of Auguſt 1605, and was buried in the church-yard of St. Nicholas in the Fields at Paris. He was father of Anne d'Amboiſe, his only daughter, married to David de Mondezir, Governor of la Fere in Picardy, and afterwards Lieutenant Gov. of Verdun.

num 1714, printed at Trevoux by Stephen Ganeau, in 1714, 12mo, that Francis Adrian, and James d'Amboiſe * ſons of John, were ſprung from the illuſtrious family d'Amboiſe †: and upon this falſe ſuppoſition, he, who is the only one that now remains of the iſſue of Francis d'Amboiſe, takes upon him to wear the entire coat of arms belonging to that noble family.

Had the late Mr. Bayle adviſed with me, when he began his Hiſtorical Dictionary, he would have wrote with more exactneſs and better grounds, on ſeveral things concerning Genealogies, which are advanced in his work, and, as they have not been afterwards redreſſed, will remain, in contradiction to truth, in all the editions of this excellent work ‡. REM. CRIT.

[B] We read great commendations of him in his Epitaph.] The reader perhaps will be glad to find his Epitaph here: I ſhall therefore copy it from Mr. de Launoi.

Amboeſi, pater eruditionum,
Argiva & Latia madens Minervâ,
Paulina in cathedra diſerte præco,
Idemque hæreſeos ſevere cenſor,
Priſcorum nova norma Epiſcoporum,
Antiſtes pie, pauperum patrone,
Cuſtos virginitatis atque amator,
Tu quocunque ieris, ſequeris agnum.

" Amboiſe, the father of learning,
" Well vers'd in Greek and Roman literature,
" Eloquent Preacher in St. Paul's chair,
" And ſevere cenſurer of hereſy,
" The new law of old Biſhops
" Pious Prelate, the Patron of the poor,
" The preſerver and lover of chaſtity;
" Wherever thou goeſt, thou ſhalt follow the " lamb.

† M. Joannes d'Amboiſe, pater Caſtelletti Chirurgus Regius ex nobiliſſima Amboeſiorum gente oriundus, tres habuit filios, in ſuo quiſque ſtatu percelebres . . . . Franciſcus, ſcilicet, Adrianus & Jacobus. Index funereus Chirurgorum Pariſienſium, p. 22, 30, 32, &c.

‡ From Memoirs imparted by Mr. d'Hozier in 1716.

AMBOISE (JAMES D') a younger brother of the former, followed his father's profeſſion, and attained to a great ſkill in it; but after having given ſufficient proofs of his capacity in Surgery, he roſe ſome degrees higher, and took the degree of Doctor of Phyſick [A]. This promotion happened between the year 1582 and 1597; for Pineau witneſſes in a book he wrote in 1597 upon the ſigns of virginity, that James d'Amboiſe was then Doctor of Phyſick, but that he was only Maſter of Arts and Batchelor of Surgery, when with great dexterity he diſſected in the preſence of many famous Maſters a woman that was hanged in 1597 for the murder of her own child (a). Beſides, it is certain, that in 1582 he was but a Surgeon (b), and that he was Licentiate in Phyſick, and the King's Phyſician in 1594, when he was elected Rector of the Univerſity of Paris (c). The oath of allegiance which that Univerſity took to Henry the Great, and the action they entered againſt the Jeſuits happened in his Rectorſhip. There are ſtill extant two Latin Orations, which James d'Amboiſe pronounced, as Rector, before the Parliament, the 12th of May, and the 13th of July 1594; they are very ſevere againſt the Jeſuits. He had been a Member of the College of Navarre before he was Rector (d).

(a) See note [A].
(b) Mich. Thiriot Laudat. Hadri. Amboſii 1582. apud Launoium, Hiſtoriæ Gymnaſii Navarræ, p. 799.
(c) Apud Launoium, Hiſt. Gym. Navarr. p. 368. See alſo Apology for Chaſtel, p. 194.
(d) Launoius, ibid.

[A] He followed his father's profeſſion, and attained to a great skill in it, and took the degree of Doctor of Phyſic.] This may be proved from two paſſages: the one of Thiriot (1); Natu minimus paternam, hoc eſt, ulceribus medendi artem amplexatus, multis ſalutarem manum feliciſſimè præbet; i. e. " The youngeſt followed his father's profeſſion, that of curing " wounds, and has had a ſucceſsful hand with many." The other of Pineau; Jacobus Amboſianus in artibus magiſter, & in chirurgia Baccalaureus (nunc autem in utrâque medicinâ doctor & medicus regius (2);) i. e. " James d'Amboiſe, Maſter of Arts " and Batchelor in Surgery, but now Doctor in " both faculties of Phyſic and Royal Phyſician." Mr. de Launoi takes this to be the Surgeon of Charles IX, but is miſtaken.

(1) Apud Launoium, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarr. p. 799.
(2) Pinæus de Virgin. notis lib. 2. cap. 8.

AMBOISE (MICHAEL D') Eſquire and Seignor of Chevillon, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth Century. In his works he choſe a warlike, or rather a poetical name (a), which was no great imbelliſhment to them, nor could prevent his being buried in oblivion together with the vaſt number of his Poems. We neither find him, nor Francis d'Amboiſe, in Mr. Baillet's immenſe Collection, though he imagined, as we may preſume, that the title of his works would entertain for a long time the curioſity of the readers. One of his books entitled Venereal Epiſtles, Fancies, Complaints, Epitaphs, thirty four Rondeaux, and three Ballads, was printed at Paris in 1556. Another of his works is entitled Le Blaſon de la Dent (b). The Counter-Epiſtles of Ovid (c); that is, the letters he compoſed in anſwer to thoſe, which Ovid's Heroines wrote to their huſbands or gallants, promiſed great charms, but yet underwent the fate of his other poetical pieces, and are equally unknown. He ſet up for a tranſlator, and rendered into French verſe four Satyrs of Juvenal (d), the 10th book of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, the Eclogues of Baptiſta Mantuanus (e), and the Italian treatiſe of Antonio Phileremo Fregoſo, entitled the Laughter of Democritus, and Tears of Heraclitus (f). He wrote in heroic verſe a Lamentation on the death of Meſſire William du Bellai, Lord of Langey (g), and in proſe, the Guidon des gens de guerre (h). See the Bibliotheque of du Verdier Vau-Privas.

(a) The fortunate Slave.
(b) Printed at Lyons in 1537.
(c) Printed at Paris 1541.
(d) Printed at Paris 1543.
(e) Printed at Paris 1530.
(f) Printed at Paris 1547.
(g) Printed at Paris 1543. La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franſoiſe, p. 122.
(h) Printed at Paris 1543.

☞AMBOISE (GEORGE D') a famous Cardinal, and prime Miniſter to Lewis XII King of France, of a noble and ancient family [A], was born in the year 1460. As he was

[A] Of a noble and ancient family.] His father Peter d'Amboiſe, Lord of Chaumonte upon the river Loire, was deſcended from Peter Lord of Berrie, who lived in the beginning of the twelfth Century, and whoſe grandſon Stephen married Margaret d'Amboiſe, by whom he had John, who after the death

was a younger ſon his parents reſolved to make him a Clergyman, and accordingly he was made a Doctor of Canon Law, while he was ſtill very young, and before he had made any conſiderable progreſs in learning: People of Quality thinking at that time that learning would diſgrace them, it was much eaſier to obtain the title of Doctor, than to acquire the neceſſary qualifications for it. D'Amboiſe was but fourteen years of age when part of the Canons of Montauban choſe him for their Biſhop. Though the reſt of their brethren had elected a Prieſt of that Church, who was a man of years, of great learning, merit, and experience, yet young d'Amboiſe carried it againſt him, by the intrigues of his brethren, and by the credit, which the eldeſt of them had with King Lewis XI. Some time after he was made Almoner to that King, in which poſt he behaved himſelf with great caution and prudence, which was abſolutely neceſſary under a Prince ſo ſuſpicious as Lewis was, who conſidered as ſo many enemies all thoſe who did but in the leaſt diſpleaſe him (a). Lewis XI dying the 30th of Auguſt 1483, his ſon Charles VIII ſucceeded him, and being but fourteen years of age, there aroſe great diſputes at the court of France concerning the Regency; and though the States of the Kingdom ordered that there ſhould be no Regent, that the King ſhould be crowned immediately, and the Kingdom governed in his name by a Council, of which the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon ſhould be Preſidents, and that the Lady De Beaujeu, Lewis XI's eldeſt daughter, ſhould take care of the King's education. The Duke of Bourbon readily complied with theſe regulations, but the Duke of Orleans was exaſperated, and would have immediately ſhewn his reſentment, had not his friends repreſented to him, that it was proper he ſhould ſtrengthen his party before he undertook any thing againſt the preſent eſtabliſhment. D'Amboiſe, who was one of his moſt zealous partizans, and who had daily acceſs to the King, reſolved to inſpire him with as much inclination and eſteem for the Duke as he could, and to make him hate the Lady De Beaujeu (b), who being the King's Siſter and Governeſs, ruled the whole Kingdom in his name. He prevailed ſo far with him, that at laſt he conſented that his friends ſhould carry him away, to deliver him from the ſlavery in which the Lady De Beaujeu kept him. But this miſcarried through the treachery of the perſon who was to carry d'Amboiſe's letters to thoſe who were in the plot, and who communicated them to the King's Governeſs. D'Amboiſe was thereupon arreſted with one of his brothers, and with the celebrated Philip de Commines; and being queſtioned about this affair, returned an anſwer, which put it out of the power of his enemies to find him guilty [B]; yet he continued two years in priſon, and was at laſt (c) ſet at liberty by the means of the Lady de Beaujeu's Confeſſor, on condition that he ſhould not appear at court, but retire into his dioceſe. He bore this kind of baniſhment very impatiently [C], and wrote ſeveral very ſubmiſſive letters to the Dutcheſs of Bourbon (d), but to no purpoſe. She ſuſpected him, and thought, that if he returned to court, he would oppoſe her deſign, and contrive ſome plot to ſet the Duke of Orleans, his good friend and patron at liberty, who had been impriſoned, becauſe he had lately been engaged in a civil war againſt the King (e). Though d'Amboiſe employed the credit of his brothers and of all their friends, who were very numerous, the Dutcheſs could not be prevailed upon to give him leave to come to court. However after fifteen months ſhe granted it, but only on condition that his brothers ſhould anſwer for him, that he would not engage in any intrigue, which might diſpleaſe that Princeſs. D'Amboiſe would have promiſed any thing to be at liberty, but he was ſo firmly attached to the Duke of Orleans, that notwithſtanding all his promiſes, he was reſolved to let no opportunity ſlip, in order to deliver his patron out of priſon, and he employed all his endeavours ſo vigorouſly in this affair, that at laſt he brought it to a happy iſſue [D].

(a) Le Gendre, Vie du Cardinal d'Amboiſe, Liv. 1. tom. 1. p. 7. 10.

(b) Hiſt. de Louis XII. par St. Gelais, 4to, pag. 51. ap. eund. ib. p. 17.

(c) In the month of Feb. 1489.

(d) Thus the Lady de Beaujeu was called, after her husband had inherited the Dutchy, and all the eſtate of the elder branch of the houſe of Bourbon. Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, p. 33.

(e) Le Gendre, ibid. p. 26.

death of his couſin Mathilde or Mahaut d'Amboiſe (who left no iſſue) inherited all the eſtate of the houſe of Amboiſe, and took the name and arms of that family. This happened in the year 1256; ſince that time none of John's deſcendants ever bore the name of Berrie; they all took that of Amboiſe, and have ennobled it by their merit as well as by the high poſts and dignities they have enjoyed. Peter d'Amboiſe, our Cardinal's father, was Lord Chamberlain to Charles VII and Lewis XI Kings of France; he married Ann de Beüil, Daughter of John IV, Lord of Beüil, great Maſter of the Ordnance, and Colonel of the Infantry of France. Peter had eight daughters and nine ſons by Ann his wife, and our George d'Amboiſe was the youngeſt or at leaſt the youngeſt but one of all theſe ſons (1).

(1) Le Gendre, Vie du Cardinal d'Amboiſe, tom. 1. Liv. 1. p. 1-3.

[B] An anſwer which put it out of the power of his enemies to find him guilty.] Being asked by the Commiſſaries choſen by the Parliament, whether he was not one of the Conſpirators, and whether he did not do all that lay in his power, to have the King carried away, he anſwered boldly, that he had his orders for what he had done, and that he referred to what the King himſelf would declare. This anſwer rendred the action that was begun againſt him ſo difficult, that thoſe, who had begun it, thought fit to drop it. For how could they proſecute a man, who ſpoke thus? How could they puniſh him for a crime, of which the King himſelf, who was then about ſeventeen or eighteen years old, was alſo guilty (2)? This is my author's obſervation; but I doubt whether it will appear very juſt to the reader. For tho' the King had conſented to the reſolution of thoſe, who would reſcue him out of the hands of the Regent, yet it was treaſon to inſpire the King with ſuch a deſign. If d'Amboiſe's plea is good, any Counſellor, who adviſes a King to do an evil action, may plead the King's conſent, and thus evade the puniſhment, which he deſerves for his criminal advice.

(2) S. Gelais, Hiſt. de Louis XII. p. 57. ap. eund. ibid. p. 25.

[C] He bore this kind of baniſhment very impatiently.] Though he was then about thirty years of age, he was not yet conſecrated Biſhop, and having not acquired thoſe virtues and qualities, which are requiſite in a Biſhop, he could not exerciſe his functions with dignity: and beſides being uſed to the buſineſs and intrigues of the Court, he did not like ſuch a retired life as he was obliged to lead in his Dioceſe; ſo that he deſired nothing more than to come and exerciſe his function of Almoner to the King (3).

(3) Le Gendre, ibid. p. 36.

iſſue [D]. The Duke of Orleans being at liberty, and having procured the marriage of the King with Ann Princeſs Sovereign of Britany, he was in great favour at court, and d'Amboiſe his favourite ſoon felt the happy effects of it. For he was ſoon made Archbiſhop of Narbonne, but that See being too diſtant from the court, he left it with pleaſure for a See more conſiderable ſtill, I mean, that of Roan [E] in Normandy, having been choſen by the Chapter the 21ſt of Auguſt 1493. As ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion of that Archbiſhoprick, the Duke of Orleans, who was Governor of Normandy, made him his Lieutenant General in that Province, with a power to act as if he had been Governor in chief. That Province was then in the utmoſt confuſion; the Noblemen oppreſſed the people, the Judges were corrupted or awed, the ſoldiers, who had been diſbanded ſince the late wars, infeſted the whole country, robbing and murthering all the travellers whom they met, but in leſs than a year's time d'Amboiſe by his conduct and prudence had the pleaſure to ſee the publick peace and tranquillity reſtored in the Province, which had been committed to his care. Charles VIII having reſolved in 1494 to conquer the Kingdom of Naples, and to go himſelf into Italy for that purpoſe, the Duke of Orleans ſet out before him, and d'Amboiſe, who ſeldom left the Duke, thought proper to viſit his Dioceſes, where he ſtaid but a very little while, but during his ſhort ſtay he regulated every thing ſo well, that he was in hopes to leave it in as good order as if he had reſided there. However he was not without ſome ſcruples about his non-reſidence; but as his Hiſtorian obſerves (f), ſome perſons of good ſenſe, who had not leſs probity, though they did not affect a ſevere air, or an outward ſhew of reformation, repreſented to him, that if he adhered to the perſon of the Duke, he would be able to procure infinitely more good to the Church and State, than if he reſided in his Dioceſe. D'Amboiſe yielded to this advice, and reached the Duke ſoon enough to be a witneſs of the victory he gained over the Fleet of the Neapolitans. After this victory Charles VIII made himſelf maſter of the whole Kingdom of Naples in eight days time. D'Amboiſe was in hopes that the Duke of Orleans being in Italy would go to Rome and procure him a Cardinal's Cap, but he was diſappointed by the Duke's ſickneſs, which prevented his journey to Rome, and obliged him to ſtay at Aſt (g). The King of France having ſoon after loſt his conqueſts in Italy, reſolved to recover them again; and to avoid the danger of loſing them a ſecond time, he entered into a treaty with ſome of the Princes of Italy, the firſt article of which was, that he ſhould begin with making himſelf maſter of the Milaneſe, which Dutchy was to be given to the Duke of Orleans, who was made Generaliſſimo of this new expedition. Accordingly the Duke ſent his equipage before him, but when every one expected that he was going to put himſelf at the head of the army, he ſuddenly altered his reſolution, and (f) Id. ibid. p. 64.

(g) A city in Piedmont.

[D] He uſed his endeavours ſo happily in this affair, that he brought it to a happy iſſue.] Finding it was impoſſible to prevail with the Dutcheſs of Bourbon, who was inexorable, he thought the beſt way was to inſinuate himſelf into the King's favour, and to inſpire him by degrees with favourable ſentiments for the Duke. Charles VIII was now twenty years of age, and ſuffered impatiently, that his ſiſter ſhould rebuke him; and the young Lords, with whom he uſed to divert himſelf, often upbraided him with being too much ſubject to his ſiſter. D'Amboiſe uſed to take hold of theſe opportunities to ſpeak to the King in behalf of the Duke of Orleans. But what contributed moſt to the Duke's liberty was the following incident. Francis II was Duke of Britany, Ann his eldeſt daughter was to inherit his Dutchy. She was but twelve years old, when her father died, and had lately been married by Proxy to the Archduke Maximilian, ſon of the Emperor Frederic III (4); but this marriage was not yet conſummated. This marriage alarmed the Court of France, who could not but be extremely diſpleaſed to ſee that the Province of Britany would be annexed to the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria. The Earl of Dunois, who was very much in favour with Ann of Britany, undertook to break her marriage with the Archduke, and to marry her to the King of France. She was a very beautiful Lady, and the King was already in love with her. But the greateſt difficulty was to perſuade that Princeſs, becauſe the King of France was actually in war againſt her; and ſhe could not eaſily conſent to marry an enemy. Dunois finding it very difficult to perſuade her, deſired d'Amboiſe to acquaint the King, that nobody was ſo proper to prevail with that Princeſs as the Duke of Orleans, who had been in love with her, and to whom that Princeſs bore ſtill ſome good will, tho' he was then married (5). Tho' the King earneſtly deſired to have this affair ſucceed, yet he was ſo much uſed to follow his ſiſter's (6) dictates, that he did not dare to take any reſolution without her knowledge. But at laſt being encouraged by d'Amboiſe, and by the young Courtiers, who could not bear to ſee him in a manner his ſiſter's ſlave, he went himſelf to deliver the Duke of Orleans out of Priſon, without giving the Dutcheſs of Bourbon the leaſt notice of his deſign. The Princeſs of Britany had ſtill ſome good will for the Duke of Orleans, as we have obſerved; but as there was then no probability that ſhe could ever marry him, he prevailed with her to marry the King (7).

(4) Or IV, according to ſome authors.

(5) With the King's youngeſt ſiſter.

(6) The Dutcheſs of Bourbon.

(7) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, p. 415, 53.

[E] He left it for that of Roan.] When the Archbiſhoprick of Roan was become vacant, the King and the Duke of Orleans ſent a ſolemn deputation to the Chapter of that Cathedral, deſiring them to elect d'Amboiſe. The Deputation was compoſed of the moſt eminent and powerful Lords of the Court, and of the principal Officers of the city of Roan, and Province of Normandy. The Canons anſwered that they had a very great reſpect for the King, that they honoured the Duke, and eſteemed the perſon propoſed to them; but as it was a matter of conſcience, they would act with the utmoſt caution and prudence, and examine thoroughly what was moſt conducive to the welfare and happineſs of their Church. But this anſwer was calculated only to ſalve the appearances, and to keep at leaſt a ſhadow of liberty; for how could they refuſe conforming to the dictates of the Court (8)? This is my author's reflexion, who ſeems thereby to diſapprove that Princes ſhould meddle with the elections of Biſhops. It does not become us to determine which is moſt for the peace and ſecurity of Church and State, that Clergymen ſhould be choſen either by the people, by their brethren, or by the Sovereign; but we cannot forbear laying before the reader an obſervation of the celebrated Father Paul. That excellent author lays it down as matter of fact, that the beſt Biſhops were made by Princes, and that whenever the Clergy had the conducting of their own elections infinite diſorders enſued (9).

(8) Id. ibid. p. 57.

(9) See Fra Paolo Sarpi, Traité des Benefices, § 9.

and gave ſome frivolous pretence for his ſtaying at home. The King was exceedingly diſpleaſed at this, and accuſed d'Amboiſe of being the author of the Prince's change; and indeed this Prelate had repreſented to the Duke, that the King being in a bad ſtate of health could not live long; that therefore the Duke would act very imprudently to be abſent from court at a time that he was very near mounting the throne (h), for he was now the next heir to the crown, ſince the death of the Dauphin, the King's only ſon, which happened a little while after the conqueſt of Naples. This advice which d'Amboiſe gave the Duke would have coſt him dear [F], if the King had lived ſome time longer, but he died April the 7th, 1498, and by his death the Duke of Orleans aſcended the throne under the name of Lewis XII, and d'Amboiſe became his prime Miniſter. The firſt thing he did in the very beginning of his adminiſtration made him very much beloved by the whole nation: It was the cuſtom in France, when a King came to the crown, to lay a tax upon the people for defraying the charges of the Coronation, and for wiſhing joy to the new Sovereign; but by d'Amboiſe's advice this tax was not levied at the acceſſion of Lewis XII, which perſuaded the people, that the prime Miniſter was ſincere, when he promiſed to do all that lay in his power to eaſe the nation of the burden under which ſhe had long groaned. And indeed immediately after the Coronation d'Amboiſe diminiſhed a tenth part of all the taxes, and ſtill continued to leſſen them, till he had reduced them to one third of what they were before (i), and notwithſtanding the wars in which the Kingdom was involved afterwards, yet none of the taxes that had been taken off were again laid upon the people, during d'Amboiſe's adminiſtration (k). This is ſo much more to the honour of this Miniſter, that there are few, very few, on whom ſuch an encomium can be juſtly beſtowed. D'Amboiſe's Hiſtory is henceforth ſo much interwoven with the Hiſtory of France and the adjacent countries, that it is almoſt impoſſible to give an account of that famous Stateſman, without tranſcribing the whole Hiſtory of his time; and as this would make this article run to an exorbitant length, we muſt content ourſelves with ſelecting ſuch particular circumſtances in his life, as are moſt remarkable. Moſt of the Judges in all the Courts of France being mercenary, they ſuffered themſelves to be bribed or awed, ſo that thoſe perſons that were poor or unſupported could never have juſtice done them againſt the rich or powerful. Another grievance was, that all law-ſuits laſted ſo long, were ſo expenſive, and attended with ſo many ebicanes and captious evaſions, that people choſe rather to give up their own property, than to endeavour to recover it by a tedious and precarious courſe of law. D'Amboiſe reſolved to redreſs all theſe grievances: He ſent for thoſe Judges and Lawyers, who paſſed for the moſt honeſt and learned, and charged them to examine what was to be done in order to have juſtice impartially adminiſter'd, to leſſen the time and expences of law-ſuits, and to prevent corruption and all ill practices in the Judges (l). When the perſons, whom he had appointed for that purpoſe, had declared what was to be altered in the ancient laws, and what new laws it was proper to enact, d'Amboiſe took upon himſelf the trouble of examining exactly their performance, and having made ſome improvements in it, he publiſhed theſe new regulations thro' the whole Kingdom, by the King's authority. And having been made Governor in chief of Normandy, ſince the King's acceſſion to the Crown, he went himſelf into that Province, with the important title of General Reformer, to eſtabliſh his new code there (m). Whilſt this affair was upon the carpet, the Prime-Miniſter undertook another more difficult ſtill, which was to diſſolve the King's marriage with Jane of France, Lewis XI's eldeſt daughter. Tho' this was a very difficult attempt [G], d'Amboiſe found means (h) Le Gendre, ibid. p. 78.

(i) Father Daniel (Hiſt. de Franc. tom. 7. p. 7.) ſays only, the King remitted the people one third of all the taxes.

(k) Le Gendre, ibid. Liv. II. p. 87, 88.

(l) Id. ibid. p. 92.

(m) Idem, ibid. p. 102, 103.

[F] D'Amboiſe's advice to the Duke would have coſt him dear.] The King ſuſpecting d'Amboiſe of being the author of that advice, was exaſperated againſt him, and could not forgive him that he ſhould look upon him as a dying man. D'Amboiſe's enemies knowing he was under the King's diſpleaſure took that opportunity to ruin him entirely. This Prelate had been obliged to uſe ſome ſeverity in order to reſtore the public peace and tranquillity in the Province of Normandy, by which means he had provoked againſt him a great many perſons, who uſed to enrich themſelves by plundering and oppreſſing the people. They reſolved to be revenged, and repreſented to the King that in a little time he would loſe all his authority in Normandy, that the Duke of Orleans acted in that Province more like a Sovereign than like a Governor, and that d'Amboiſe his Lieutenant or Deputy exerciſed there an unlimited authority. The intention of this cabal was to deprive the Duke of Orleans of his government, and to have d'Amboiſe baniſhed to Aſt; the King being very much diſpoſed to hearken to their inſinuations, they would certainly have compaſſed their deſign, if the King's death had not prevented it (10).

(10) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, p. 79, 81.

[G] This was a very difficult attempt.] The Prime-Miniſter knew very well, that this deſign would expoſe him to the cenſure not only of thoſe, who love to co-oppoſe in every thing the conduct of the Government, but alſo of pious perſons, who conforming their actions to the moſt ſtrict rules of morality, think it a crime in others to recede in the leaſt from thoſe rules, tho' it be to promote the public good. But d'Amboiſe deſpiſed ſuch cenſures; he conſidered that the intereſt of the Kingdom required, that the King ſhould have children; but Lewis XII had none, and no hopes of having any by his Queen. The greateſt difficulty for the divorce was to have the Pope's conſent. To prevail with the holy Father, the King promiſed to marry Cæſar Borgia his ſon to a daughter of the King of Naples and to give him a good penſion. On theſe conditions the Pope conſented to name Commiſſaries for enquiring into the cauſes of the divorce. Theſe reaſons were, that Lewis had never given his conſent for this marriage, and that he had not conſummated it. Theſe reaſons would have been good, ſay my author, if they had been true. But it was obſerved with regard to the firſt, that Lewis had never complained of his being forced to marry Jane of France, or if he did complain at firſt, yet he had lived a long time with means to bring it to a happy iſſue, by procuring to Cæſar Borgia, Pope Alexander VI's ſon, the Dutchy of Valentinois, with a penſion of twenty thouſand Livres. Alexander in return ſent d'Amboiſe a Cardinal's Hat, and the King augmented his ſalary. The new Cardinal procured afterwards the King's marriage with Ann of Britany, the late King's widow, though the inhabitants of Britany were very much averſe to it [H]. When Lewis XII was proclaimed King, he added to his titles that of Duke of Milan, which he claimed as principal heir of Valentine his grandmother, only ſiſter and ſole heireſs of Duke Philip-Maria, the laſt legitimate Prince of the houſe of Viſconty (n). Accordingly the Cardinal-Miniſter engaged the King to invade the Milaneſe, and that he might not be diſappointed, he prevailed with all the powers of Italy not to oppoſe this undertaking [I]. D'Amboiſe, though Archbiſhop of Roan, Cardinal, and Prime-Miniſter, was at that time honoured with a new dignity. The Pope, to ſecure him to his own intereſt, made him his Legate through the whole Kingdom of France, at which every one was very much ſurprized [K]. But d'Amboiſe acted in that poſt with ſo much prudence and wiſdom, that both the King and the Pope were ſatisfied with his conduct (o). When he had taken poſſeſſion of his Legateſhip, he went with the King into Italy, where, by the good orders he had given, the French army ſucceeded ſo happily, that in twenty days (p) the Dutchy of Milan and the State of Genoa (q) fell into the hands of Lewis XII (r). But he did not keep this conqueſt long, for the Milaneſe revolted ſoon after the King and the Cardinal were returned into France. This revolt made all the French murmur againſt the Cardinal, as if he had been the occaſion of it; and indeed it is very difficult to excuſe him entirely [L]. The King himſelf, though he loved him, began to be moved with the reproaches that were caſt upon his Miniſter. But d'Amboiſe had ſo great an aſcendant over his maſter, that he (n) Id. ibid. pag. 86.

(o) Ibid. p. 124.

(p) Daniel, Hiſt. de France, tom. 7. p. 27.

(q) Genoa was at that time in the power of the ſons of Francis Sforza. Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, p. 130.

(r) In 1419.

ſoon

with her, without proteſting againſt his marriage. As to the ſecond reaſon, it could hardly be believed, that he had cohabitated ſo long with her, without conſummating his marriage, eſpecially after his ſpouſe had done all that lay in her power, and took a great deal of pains, to deliver him out of priſon in the reign of Charles VIII. Theſe conſiderations would have rendred the divorce very difficult, if the queſtion had been about private perſons; but when the public good is concerned, when a whole Nation deſires that a Prince ſhould have children, mere probabilities become ſtrong proofs, eſpecially if one of the parties concerned, who might juſtly exclaim againſt the divorce, ſeems to conſent to it. Jane of France did not oppoſe her divorce, either thro' inſenſibility, or becauſe ſhe had no hopes of having juſtice done her. She ſubmitted to the ſentence by which her marriage was declared void, having been perſuaded to it by d'Amboiſe, in whom ſhe confided very much. The Pope confirmed that ſentence, and Cæſar his ſon brought the Bull into France; and in return the King married him, not to the Princeſs of Naples, who refuſed him, tho' ſhe was herſelf deſcended from a baſtard; but to Charlotte of Albret, a Princeſs of great merit and perfect beauty (11).

(11) Idem, ibid. p. 94, 98.

[H] The inhabitants of Britany were very much averſe to the marriage of Ann of Britany with Lewis XII.] Lewis had been in love with Ann of Britany for twelve years, and ſhe loved him before ſhe was married to Charles VIII, to which marriage ſhe conſented only to prevent the entire ruin of her Dutchy of Britany. Finding it was now her intereſt as well as her inclination to marry Lewis XII, ſhe eaſily gave her conſent to it. They were nearly related, but it was eaſy to get the Pope's diſpenſation, ſince the King had already done ſo much for him. One thing only vexed the Queen Dowager, and that was, the fear ſhe was in, that if ſhe married the King, the Dutchy of Britany would become a Province of France, to which ſhe would by no means conſent, deſiring to ſecure the independency that Dutchy had enjoyed till then. It was for this ſame reaſon that the inhabitants of Britany were againſt the intended marriage, and for that very reaſon the French deſired it. The expedient, which the Miniſter found out to remove the fear of the former, and to ſatisfy at the ſame time the deſire of the latter, was to inſert in the marriage-contract, that Britany would be ſubject to the King's authority in ſuch a manner as to preſerve its liberty, and that it ſhould be governed by its own ancient laws and cuſtoms; and the Queen herſelf ſhould receive the revenues of that Dutchy (12). The event has ſhewn that the fears of the Queen Dowager, and of the inhabitants of Britany were but too well grounded, that Province having like the reſt of the Kingdom been ever ſince ſubject to the abſolute authority of the Kings of France.

(12) Id. ibid. p. 100, 101.

[I] He prevailed with all the powers of Italy not to oppoſe this undertaking.] It was very natural for them to fear, that if the King of France became powerful in Italy, they ſhould all very ſoon be reduced to the condition of ſubjects, or vaſſals to him: But d'Amboiſe knew not only how to remove their fears, but alſo to raiſe their hopes. He promiſed the Pope that the French ſhould aſſiſt his ſon Cæſar Borgia to conquer Romagna. He flattered the Florentines, that thoſe places, which Charles VIII had taken from them, and had delivered to thoſe of Piſa, ſhould be reſtored to them: And by this means he engaged them to aſſiſt the French with troops, proviſions, and money. He promiſed the Venetians, that they ſhould have for their ſhare Cremona with its territory, and all the country that lies beyond the river Adua. How blind muſt all theſe Powers have been, ſince they did not perceive, that if they ſuffered the King of France to eſtabliſh himſelf in their neighbourhood, they gave themſelves a Maſter, who would certainly ruin them all at one time or other! The true intereſt was to unite all their forces in order to keep the French beyond the Alps (13).

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 120, 121.

[K] The Pope made him his Legate . . . . at which every one was very much ſurprized.] One might quote on this occaſion theſe words of our Lord, No man can ſerve two maſters (14): For how was it poſſible for the ſame perſon to be at once the Pope's and the King's Miniſter? How could the Pope and the King, who have often different intereſts to debate, truſt their affairs in the hands of the ſame perſon? And when theſe Princes happen to be at variance, how can the ſame perſon be faithful to both at the ſame time? D'Amboiſe did not regard ſuch diſcourſes, which were common at court, and among all ſorts of people. As he had a great inclination to be Pope, he was glad to act in a manner as a Pope in France, till he could do it over all Chriſtendom. His Hiſtorian adds, that he was ſo prudent that he exerciſed his Legateſhip in ſuch a manner, as never to act either againſt the authority of the Pope, or the liberty of the Kingdom, even during the greateſt miſunderſtanding and diviſions between the King and the Pope (15).

(14) Matt. vi, 24.

[L] It is very difficult to excuſe him entirely.] 1. He had given the government of Milan to a man (16) ſo haughty, proud, and covetous, that he ſoon made himſelf extremely odious to the inhabitants of Milan. D'Amboiſe knew his character, but he thought that being an Italian, he would be better obeyed, than a foreigner. 2. He gave the brave

(15) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, p. 124.

(16) John James Trivulce.

ſoon pacified him, after which he did not much regard the envious inſinuations of his enemies. He immediately reſolved to repair the loſs, which the Kingdom had ſuſtained, by endeavouring to recover the Milaneſe. He went himſelf again into Italy, and in a little time he made himſelf maſter of the whole Dutchy, and took Lewis Sforza priſoner (s), but his conduct at that time was very far from being generous [M], for it was rather by means of money, and by treachery, than by the bravery and courage of his army, that he vanquiſhed the enemy. Being at Milan he treated that city in a very haughty manner [N], though he ſpared the lives of the inhabitants. He now took much better meaſures to ſecure his conqueſts than he had done the firſt time. He deprived John James Trivulce of the government of Milan, becauſe by his haughtineſs and his extortions he had very much contributed to the late revolt. Chaumont d'Amboiſe, the Miniſter's nephew, was put in Trivulce's place, and was alſo made General of the armies in Italy. Chaumont was a very young man of great hopes, but had not yet any conſiderable reputation or experience, ſo that the choice his uncle made of him was generally diſapproved. But he ſoon convinced all the world by his courage and prudence, that he was not unworthy the high poſts with which he was intruſted. The Cardinal alſo reſtored the military diſcipline, made new regulations, and took effectual methods to have the Laws put in execution. He put in the ſeveral cities ſuch garriſons as were ſufficient

(s) April the 10th 1500.

Stuart d'Aubigny a ſhare in the command of the army with Trivulce: but for this he was very much blamed; becauſe theſe Generals being both very haughty could never agree, and their miſunderſtanding could not but create new conteſts not only among the inhabitants, but even in the very army. And indeed they could not ſuffer one another; and their miſunderſtanding came to ſuch a height, that if the one deſired any thing, it was a ſufficient reaſon for the other to oppoſe it. 3. He left but very few troops in the towns of the Milaneſe, being afraid to oppreſs the people, and in order to gain their affection. But this, ſaid his enemies, was very imprudent, conſidering the unſteady, reſtleſs, and ſeditious temper of the people (17). Theſe are the reaſons for which d'Amboiſe was blamed, and it muſt be confeſſed, that if he acted as a generous man, who had a good opinion of his friends, and of the people he conquered, he acted alſo as a bad Politician, who ought never to truſt thoſe, whom he has vanquiſhed by the force of arms. Conqueſts cannot be kept but by the ſame means by which they are made.

(17) Le Gendre, ibid. p. 132-139.

[M] His conduct at that time was far from being generous.] Part of Lewis Sforza's army conſiſted of Swiſs; and Sforza not receiving money, as he expected, to pay them, they threatned him, ſometimes to plunder his towns, ſometimes to return into their own country, or to join the French army. D'Amboiſe knowing their diſcontent and murmurs, he ſent ſome Emiſſaries among them, who promiſed them a large ſum of money, if they would abandon their General, and a much greater ſum, if they would deliver him up to the French. His offers were accepted; the Swiſs of Sforza's army told him, they were reſolved not to fight againſt the Swiſs, their friends and relations, who were in the French army; and immediately they all retired into the city of Novara. The unhappy Prince not knowing which courſe to take, was obliged to follow theſe traytors. He had no ſooner enter'd the city, but the French army ſurrounded it, leſt he ſhould eſcape out of their hands. In this laſt extremity the only reſource of Sforza was to entreat the Swiſs, and to offer them money to induce them to maintain a ſiege in Novara, or at leaſt make a general ſally to conceal his eſcape. But they would not hearken to him, becauſe he had nothing to give them at that time. The only favour he could obtain from them, was, that he ſhould be permitted to go out with them in the habit of a Swiſs, to try if he could eſcape in that diſguiſe; for they had agreed with d'Amboiſe that they ſhould go out of Novara like a vanquiſhed army with their pikes reverſed, and their colours folded up. But this was not enough for the Cardinal; fearing to loſe his prey, he required that the Swiſs ſhould go out of the city two together only, and file through the French army drawn up in two lines. This was a moſt ſure way to prevent Sforza's eſcape; and indeed he was ſoon taken, having been either betrayed, as it was then the general opinion, or diſcovered, notwithſtanding the diſguiſe he was in (18).

(18) Id. ibid. p. 149-153.

[N] He treated that city in a very haughty manner.] As ſoon as Sforza was in the power of the French, the Citizens of Milan ſent deputies to d'Amboiſe to implore his mercy. The Cardinal anſwered their prayer only by a ſevere look; and going to Milan, he did not lodge in the Duke's palace, as the inhabitants had deſired him, but in the caſtle, where there was ſtill a French garriſon; and the cannons of the caſtle were turned againſt the city, as though the intention had been to deſtroy it: The citizens were under a terrible conſternation; they let d'Amboiſe know that they ſubmitted their poſſeſſions and their lives to his mercy, and to mitigate his reſentment, the men, women and children, ſome in mourning clothes, others in ſack-cloth, all in tears, went to the caſtle, and falling upon their knees before the gate of it, cried in a doleful manner, Mercy! Mercy! A rumour had been ſpread, that the Garriſon was going to ſally out, to deſtroy the city by fire and ſword. But the Cardinal's intention was only to ſtrike a terror upon the citizens; yet without ſhewing that he was inclined to mercy, he ordered them to meet on Good-friday (19) in the court of the town-houſe, there to hear their ſentence. Accordingly the Gentry, Citizens and common people of Milan met at the appointed time and place; not in a crowd and in confuſion, but in ſeveral bodies diſtinguiſhed by different ſtandards, forming a proceſſion, at the head of which were placed the young children, in order to move the Cardinal's compaſſion, who from a window of the caſtle viewed the proceſſion. When they were arrived at the town-houſe, D'Amboiſe began his march, being cloathed in the Cardinal's garments, and having his croſs carried before him. In this kind of a triumph he was attended by all the Nobility of the army, and by an infinite number of people, who followed him to the town-houſe. At the upper end of the court there was a large amphitheatre; in the midſt of which they had erected a throne, on which the Cardinal ſeated himſelf, having on each ſide the principal Officers civil and military. As ſoon as he arrived, the Nobility, Citizens and people of Milan, who waited for him in the court, fell down upon their knees, and continued in that ſituation, whilſt their Speaker bare-headed and on his knees, made a long ſpeech to beg pardon for what they had done, promiſing in their name, that they would be faithful and loyal for the future. The Speaker happening to quote the example of St. Peter, and to ſay that this Apoſtle's fall ſerved to ſtrengthen his faith, the Cardinal interrupting him, ſaid with a threatening voice, St. Peter denied his Maſter three times; but if this people ſhould commit again the ſame fault, there will be no more pardon for them; Milan will be deſtroyed to the very foundation, and all the people put to the ſword without the leaſt mercy. Theſe words tho' ſevere, yet gave the people hopes that for this time they ſhould be pardoned; and accordingly, when another perſon, who ſpoke by the Cardinal's command, had reproached them in a very ſtrong tho' noble manner with their inconſtancy and infidelity, d'Amboiſe with a loud voice pronounced the Act of Grace in the King's name.

(19) A. D. 1500.

(20) Id. ibid. p. 158-162.

ſufficient to prevent a new revolt of the inhabitants (t). He ſent the reſt of the French army to ſerve one part under the Florentines, and another much more conſiderable under Ceſar Borgia Duke of Valentinois I; but in this he ſeems to have conſulted his private intereſt much more than that of his King and Country, as we ſhall ſhew in the Remark [O]. D'Amboiſe having ſettled every thing in the Milaneſe returned into France, where he was received by the King, the Nobility, and the People, with the greateſt honours that can be imagined. Lewis XII maſter of the Milaneſe and of Genoa, reſolved alſo upon the conqueſt of the Kingdom of Naples. Ferdinand King of Caſtile and Arragon had the ſame deſign, though the King of Naples was his relation. The King of France and Caſtile entered into a treaty, by which they agreed to divide the Kingdom between them. Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria; and Lewis's ſhare was Abruzzo, Terra-di-Lavoro, and the city of Naples. D'Amboiſe was the author of this partition-treaty, and all the people of France murmured againſt him, for having made ſuch an alliance with Ferdinand, who having no regard for his oath or promiſes, would one time or other find means to deprive the French of their ſhare. D'Amboiſe to excuſe himſelf ſaid, that this partition had already been mentioned in the reign of Charles VIII; but it was anſwered that times were now altered, and that Lewis being maſter of the Milaneſe and of Genoa, was in a much better condition than his predeceſſor, to conquer the Kingdom of Naples, and to keep it after it was conquered. D'Amboiſe not regarding theſe murmurs, thought of nothing elſe but of putting his ſcheme in execution; and accordingly the Kingdom of Naples was conquered in a very little time, and ſoon became the occaſion of a war between Lewis and Ferdinand, each of them claiming the Capitanate (u). Lewis pretended that it belonged to Abruzzo, and Ferdinand maintained that it was a part of Apulia. This diſpute made the people murmur more than ever againſt the treaty which the Cardinal had made, becauſe they were afraid that this would involve them in a dangerous war againſt the King of Caſtile. D'Amboiſe was in hopes of avoiding the war, by making a treaty with Philip Archduke of Auſtria, ſon-in-law to Ferdinand, and father of the famous Emperor Charles V. But General Gonſalvo, who commanded Ferdinand's army in the Kingdom of Naples, refuſed to proclaim the peace, which the Archduke

(t) Le Gendre, ibid. 160--166.

(u) It is a ſmall county of the Kingdom of Naples, but ſo fruitful, that from an hundred leagues round about, people ſend their cattle to graze there in the winter, and the duty paid for it to the King amounts yearly to two hundred thouſand ducats; that is, about an hundred thouſand pounds.

[O] He ſeems to have conſulted his private intereſt, more than that of his King and Country.] With regard to Piſa, the Cardinal can be charged only with having acted imprudently, tho' perhaps he had no private view. Piſa and Florence were formerly two famous Commonwealths; and as they were neighbours, they were jealous of one another, and had been a long time at war together, till at laſt Piſa was entirely ſubdued by the Florentines. When Charles VIII went into Italy to conquer the Kingdom of Naples, he reſtored Piſa to its ancient liberty; and that city was ſince ſo well fortified, that the Florentines durſt not beſiege it. After the death of Charles VIII, the Florentines offered Lewis XII his ſucceſſor to aſſiſt him with money and proviſions for the conqueſt of the Milaneſe, if in return he would promiſe to lend them, if not money, at leaſt his troops to take Piſa. Lewis having agreed to this propoſal, no ſooner was the war of Milan finiſhed, but the Florentines preſſed him to perform his promiſe. Thoſe of Piſa on the other hand made ſeveral offers to the King, to diſſuade him from aſſiſting their enemies. The King's anſwer was, that he referred this affair to d'Amboiſe's deciſion. The Cardinal was very much perplexed to determine this matter; General Trivulce and ſome other Lords maintained, that it was not the King's intereſt to encreaſe the power of the Cities and Princes of Italy, but to keep them all in ſo low a condition, that they might be an eaſy prey for the French, whenever they ſhould think proper to attack them. On the other ſide, it appeared not only juſt, but even prudent to perform the promiſe that had been made to ſuch powerful Allies, as the Florentines then were. This reaſon, ſays my author, prevailed with d'Amboiſe, and engaged him to aſſiſt the Florentines (21). We may obſerve here, that with reſpect to the juſtice of aſſiſting the Florentines, there is no probability, that d'Amboiſe much regarded it; but as to the prudence of this action it may be very much diſputed, ſince the French were at that time ſo powerful in Italy, that they had no occaſion to fear the Republic of Florence. Or if that Republic was then formidable, would it not become much more ſo, by conquering Piſa and all the tetritories belonging to it? Nay it appeared ſoon after, that the Cardinal did not much fear the Florentines: They had not been able to conquer Piſa, tho' aſſiſted by the French troops. And the Piſans offering a ſum of money to the King of France, if he would take them under his protection, the King accepted their propoſal, notwithſtanding the complaints of the Florentines, who were themſelves obliged to enter with d'Amboiſe into a treaty, by which they promiſed to aſſiſt the French with money, proviſions, and men for the expedition of Naples (22). This makes me ſuſpect that the Cardinal had ſome ſecret reaſon for aſſiſting the Florentines againſt the Republic of Piſa. But as to the ſuccour he ſent to the Duke of Valentinois (23), it is plain that he acted from a view to his own private intereſt. His Hiſtorian tells us, that d'Amboiſe could hardly perſuade General Trivulce and ſome other great Officers of the neceſſity there was to ſend a body of troops to Borgia, to aſſiſt him in conquering all the cities of Romagna. France had no reaſon to be ſatisfied with that Duke's conduct, nor with that of his Father Pope Alexander VI. Tho' the Pope had promiſed to aſſiſt the French with men and money for the conqueſt of Milan, he had been ſo far from keeping his word, that a great many ſuſpected him, of having fomented the late revolt, and of being entred ſecretly into the league, which ſome Princes of Italy had made, to reſtore the family of Sforza. Beſides, Borgia the Pope's natural ſon was a very dangerous man, who made no ſcruple to break his word, and therefore was not to be truſted: and it was to be feared, that when he ſhould have made himſelf powerful by the help of the French, he would ſoon become the worſt of their enemies, and would do his utmoſt to ſend them back again beyond the Alps. Theſe reaſons were very ſtrong againſt aſſiſting him; but ſince the French had promiſed it, ſays my author, they could not refuſe it, without offending the Pope, which would have been very dangerous in thoſe circumſtances. But he adds, that there was another reaſon, which perhaps affected d'Amboiſe more; which was, that the time of his Legateſhip was juſt expiring, and he very much deſired, that the Pope would ſtill continue him his Legate. Alexander VI never did any thing out of generoſity, but uſed always to ſell his favours very dear. So that d'Amboiſe, to obtain from the Father what he deſired for himſelf, was obliged to aſſiſt the ſon (24). This was the true reaſon, why he ſent a great part of the French army to ſerve under the Duke of Valentinois, and in return the Pope continued him Legate in France, with a much greater power than that he had before (25).

(21) Id. ibid. p. 166--168.

(22) Id. Liv. 3. p. 182.

(23) Cæſar Borgia.

(24) Id. Liv. 2. p. 168--170.

(25) Id. ibid. p. 170.

Archduke had ſworn to in the name of his father-in-law, till he had received orders from Spain, and in the mean time he attacked the French ſo ſucceſsfully, that in eighteen months he drove them out of all the places they held in the Kingdom of Naples. This gave the enemies of the Prime-Miniſter a freſh occaſion to murmur againſt him, as though he had neglected to ſend freſh ſupplies to the French army in Italy. The Cardinal, to appeaſe theſe complaints, raiſed a powerful army, by which he was in hopes of recovering the Kingdom of Naples. But his own ambition rendered this new expedition unſucceſsful. The French troops in their march to Naples were come within about ſix leagues diſtance from Rome, when the Cardinal heard that the Pope was dead. He went immediately to Rome, and was ſo much the more in hopes of being choſen Pope, that he had a ſtrong party amongſt the Cardinals, and that thoſe Princes who had the greateſt intereſt to exclude him, ſeemed inclined to promote his advancement. The Emperor had ſeveral times flattered him that he would ſupport his intereſt; and the artful King of Caſtile had given the King of France ſome hopes of a ſpeedy peace, and aſſured the Miniſter that he would facilitate his acceſſion to the Papal Chair, in order to prevent them both from carrying on the war vigorouſly againſt him. D'Amboiſe depending too much upon theſe fair promiſes [P], thought he could not fail of the triple crown. But no ſooner were the Cardinals met in the Conclave, but he found he was diſappointed. Cardinal Francis Piccolomini Archbiſhop of Sienna was unanimouſly choſen, and took the name of Pius III; but as he died the twenty ſixth day after his election, d'Amboiſe conceived new hopes [Q], and was a ſecond time diſappointed, Cardinal Rovera having been choſen without oppoſition, who took the name of Julius II. This Pope, to comfort d'Amboiſe for the loſs of St. Peter's Chair, continued him in the Legateſhip of France, and made him alſo his Legate for Avignon and Britany (x). D'Amboiſe's impatient deſire of the Popedom was very detrimental to the affairs of France. For having delayed, at the requeſt of the Cardinals, the army that marched to Naples, they arrived a whole month too late to make an advantage of the weak condition in which the Spaniard's then were, and thus gave them time to ſtrengthen themſelves. Some other circumſtances, too long to be related here, concurred alſo to ruin entirely the affairs of the French in the Kingdom of Naples (y). D'Amboiſe ſeeing there were no hopes left to recover that Kingdom, thought now of ſecuring the Milaneſe, which the King of Caſtile threatened to attack [R]. But the moſt formidable enemy was the Emperor, who was ready to march into Italy with a very powerful army, either to invade the Milaneſe for himſelf, or to reſtore it to Sforza's family. D'Amboiſe went himſelf to the Emperor, and managed him with ſo much art and prudence, repreſenting to him that it was his intereſt to diſtruſt the King of Caſtile, and to enter into an alliance with France, that he prevailed with him to conclude a treaty, by which it was agreed, that Charles, the Archduke of Auſtria's ſon, and the Emperor's grandſon ſhould marry Lewis XII's daughter, though they were both ſtill but children. Another condition of the treaty was, that the Emperor ſhould give the inveſtiture of the Milaneſe to the King of France, who in return was to pay the Emperor an hundred and twenty thouſand crowns in two payments, and a pair of golden ſpurs every year. This treaty was very advantageous to France, becauſe it maintained the King in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, and obliged the King of Caſtile to ſign a truce with France. It was very happy for the Prime-Miniſter to have made this alliance, ſince if he had miſcarried in his undertaking, he would probably

(x) Britany was not yet annexed to the crown of France.

(y) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, Liv. 3, p. 173–264.

[P] D'Amboiſe depended too much upon thoſe fair promiſes.] He took ſo little care to hide his ambition, that he choſe for his Motto theſe words of the 119th Pſalm, O Lord, put me not to ſhame (26), or ſuffer me not to be diſappointed in my expectation. But the Cardinal's friends could not believe that the Emperor and the King of Caſtile were ſincere in the promiſes which they had made him; becauſe it was natural for them to think, that if d'Amboiſe was raiſed to be Pope, he would declare himſelf againſt them in favour of Lewis, his ancient Maſter, his friend, and his benefactor. D'Amboiſe could alſo eaſily perceive, that the Cardinals in the Conclave had no thoughts of raiſing him to the Papal Chair. For the Heads of the ſeveral parties publickly declared, that in the preſent circumſtances it was neceſſary for the good of the Church and the holy See, to make choice of a Pope, who would not favour particularly any of the Princes of Europe, and eſpecially thoſe of Italy, and who by his reſolution and wiſdom would unite thoſe who were at war together, and who without eſpouſing any party, would only apply himſelf to reſtore the public peace and tranquillity (27). Theſe conſiderations ſhould have perſuaded our Cardinal that his hopes were vain and ill-grounded. But ſuch is the weakneſs of men blinded by ambition, that they are always inclined to flatter themſelves, and to hope, that what they earneſtly wiſh for, will certainly come to paſs.

(26) Ver. 31.

(27) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, Liv. 3. p. 252.

[Q] He conceived new hopes.] The Duke of Valentinois and Cardinal Aſcanius Sforza gave him their words, that he ſhould certainly be now choſen. Nay the former appeared ſo zealous for d'Amboiſe, that he obliged all the Cardinals who were his dependants to promiſe upon oath, that they would vote for him. But notwithſtanding their oath, it was not likely, that to oblige Borgia, who had but very little power ſince his father's death, they would act againſt the intereſt of the King of Spain, who was their Sovereign, by placing a Frenchman in St. Peter's Chair. Beſides there was no reaſon to think, that Cardinal Sforza was ſincerely in d'Amboiſe's intereſt, ſince the only hope of Sforza's unhappy family was, that a new Pope would reſtore to them the Duchy of Milan, which they could not expect from ſuch a man as d'Amboiſe, who was entirely devoted to the King of France (28).

(28) Id. ibid. p. 255, 256.

[R] The King of Caſtile threatned to attack the Milaneſe.] A rumour had been ſpread that the Spaniſh army was advanced to conquer the Milaneſe; whereupon d'Amboiſe made all the haſte poſſible to go into that Dutchy, to keep the people in awe, and fortify the cities, and augment their garriſons. This rumour was ill-grounded; for Gonſalve (29), ſurnamed the Great Captain, who had the command over the Spaniſh Forces in Italy, was wholly employed in ſecuring his conqueſts, without having then the leaſt thought of making any other (30).

(29) His name was Gonſalve Ferdinand de Corduba.

(30) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, p. 274.

bably have loſt all his credit with the King, conſidering the ſtrong party that was formed againſt him at court [S]. But the ſucceſs of his negotiations with the Emperor put it into his power to avoid the ſtorm. He gained ſo much glory and reputation by them, that being returned to court his enemies durſt not ſpeak a word againſt him (z). Not long after d'Amboiſe's return into France the ſtate of affairs was changed entirely by the death of Iſabella or Elizabeth (aa), Queen of Caſtile, which occaſioned great diviſions in that Kingdom [T]. Ferdinand deſiring to keep in his hands the adminiſtration of Caſtile, which by the Queen's death fell to Jane of Caſtile, who was married to the Archduke of Auſtria, was willing to enter into a treaty with France. The Cardinal, who knew it was the intereſt of that Kingdom to weaken the power of the Archduke, entered into a treaty with Ferdinand, who conſented to marry Germana de Foix, ſiſter of Gaſton Duke of Nemours, on condition that the King of France ſhould renounce the right he pretended to have over part of the Kingdom of Naples, adding only, that if Germana ſhould die without iſſue, the King's pretenſions ſhould remain in full force. The Cardinal's view by this marriage was, that if Ferdinand happened to have a ſon by his ſecond wife, that ſon would inherit the Kingdoms of Aragon and Sicily, of which the Archduke would be thus deprived. Notwithſtanding this view, the treaty was diſliked by ſeveral perſons of Lewis's Council, who ſaid that the King would have done better to give the Princeſs a dowry in money, than to renounce his right. But the Cardinal repreſented that the circumſtances were ſuch, that there was no hope of recovering at any time the Kingdom of Naples, without exhauſting France of men or money (bb). It would engage us in the entire hiſtory of France and Spain, if we were to give a farther account of d'Amboiſe's negotiations in Italy, Spain, and Germany, and what we have ſaid of him being ſufficient to give the reader a notion of his character and abilities, we ſhall conclude this article, with obſerving that he died at Lyons in his way to Italy, in order to carry on the war againſt the Venetians, the 25th of May 1510, in the fiftieth year of his age, and the twelfth ſince he had been made Prime-Miniſter. His death was occaſioned by the gout in his ſtomach, to which he was very much ſubject, becauſe he could not forbear drinking a little more than was neceſſary. Never was the funeral of any King or Queen more ſumptuous, than that which was made for him (cc). Mr. Le Gendre, who wrote his hiſtory, gives him the nobleſt character that ever any Prime-Miniſter had. And what will certainly ſeem ſtrange in our days is, that this Cardinal never held but one Church-preferment at once, and had no other revenue but that of his Biſhoprick, and his ſalary as Prime-Miniſter, beſides his own eſtate, which was inconſiderable, and the preſents which he received ſometimes from the King. During his adminiſtration he took all poſſible care to make the ſciences and trade flouriſh. He was a great encourager of learning, and very generous, of which we ſhall give ſome inſtances in the Remark (V). So that we muſt not wonder, that he was as much beloved by the generality of the people as by his own

(z) Idem, ibid. p. 274-279.

(aa) She died Nov. the 26th, 1504.

(bb) Id. Liv. 4 p. 283, 296.

(cc) Id. lib. 5. p. 459.

[S] A ſtrong party was formed againſt him at court.] The Head of that party, and the moſt dangerous of the Prime-Miniſter's enemies was the Marſhal De Gié, a man of quality, of the illuſtrious family of Rohan, and one who had very great credit, becauſe he was in favour with the Queen, who had a prodigious influence over the King. The Queen eſteemed and loved De Gié, becauſe he was born her ſubject, was related to her (31), and had always been very zealouſly affected to her intereſt. This Lord, tho' loaded with riches and titles of honour, yet proud of the protection of a powerful Queen, paſſionately deſired to be at the head of the State; and inceſſantly told the Queen, that affairs would have been attended with much better ſucceſs, if he had had the management of them; and that it was d'Amboiſe's fault, that things ſucceeded ſo unfortunately. Tho' the King was perſuaded of his Miniſter's merit and fidelity, yet he was ſenſibly afflicted to have loſt in leſs than a year's time his reputation, the Kingdom of Naples, his armies, and his fleet, and the large ſums of money, which had been ſpent in raiſing his armies, and fitting out his fleet (32); ſo that it was eaſy for d'Amboiſe's enemies to exaſperate the King againſt him. But the treaty, which he concluded with the Emperor, ſoon gained him the King's favour again, and turned the edge of his reſentment upon De Gié, who was baniſhed the court by a ſentence of the Parliament of Toulouſe, the moſt ſevere of all the Parliaments in the Kingdom (33).

(31) The houſe of Rohan had been a long time ally'd to that of Britany.

(32) Le Gendre, ibid. p. 276, 277.

(33) Id. ibid. p. 281, 282.

[T] Iſabella's death occaſioned great diviſions in the Kingdom of Caſtile.] She had left by Will the Kingdom to Ferdinand her husband to govern it, and enjoy the revenues of it during his life, under the title of Adminiſtrator for their daughter, Jane of Caſtile. This occaſioned the diſcontent of all the Grandees, who favoured the Archduke. But Ferdinand without regarding their murmurings, continued to govern the Kingdom as he had done before the Queen's death, yet without taking any more upon him the title of King of Caſtile, for fear of exaſperating more and more the people againſt him. He had loſt their eſteem becauſe he had been too ſubmiſſive to the will of his Queen, and they hated him, becauſe he had been too ſevere againſt them. He endeavoured now by all poſſible means to regain their love and eſteem, but to no purpoſe; all his arts, his careſſes, his promiſes were unſucceſsful, which obliged him to have his recourſe to France. He propoſed to Lewis XII to enter with him into an alliance; his intention was to prevent the French from aſſiſting the male-contents, and to engage them to help him, if he had occaſion for it. For the male-contents had already ſent ſome perſons ſecretly into France, to ſollicit aſſiſtance of that Kingdom. But d'Amboiſe was far from granting their requeſt; becauſe if on the one ſide it was the French King's intereſt to keep up a diviſion between the Grandees of Caſtile, it was on the other ſide much more for his advantage, to hinder the Archduke, as much as was poſſible, from taking poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, for fear leſt in caſe of a war, which was very likely to break out ſoon, that Prince ſhould be in a condition of doing great prejudice to France, if he ſhould attack it at the ſame time on the ſide of the Pyrenean mountains, and on the ſide of Flanders (34).

(34) Id. ibid. lib. 4. p. 289, &c.

[V] He was a great encourager of learning, and alſo very generous.] He ſent for the moſt learned Men, who were then in Europe, and ſettled them at Genoa, Milan, and eſpecially in France. He gave the famous Paulus Emilius a Canonſhip at Paris, that by the opportunity of own maſter, which is perhaps the greateſt encomium that can be beſtowed on a Prime-Miniſter (dd).

(dd) Le Gendre, ubi ſupra, tom. 2. liv. 6. pag. 1-120.

living in that city, he might eaſily conſult the Regiſters of the Parliament, and ancient Records for the Hiſtory of France, which he was writing (35). As for d'Amboiſe's generoſity, his Hiſtorian gives us this particular inſtance of it: The Cardinal had built a very magnificent palace upon a ſpot of ground belonging to the Archbiſhoprick of Roan. A Gentleman, who had a piece of land near that palace, wanted to ſell it, and deſired one of the Cardinal's ſervants to offer it his Maſter. The ſervant ſoon found an opportunity to ſpeak to the Cardinal, and told him that he had prevailed upon the owner to ſell it cheap. This was far from the Gentleman's intention. As he knew that the Cardinal was very generous, he was in hopes that he would give a good price for it. He was not diſappointed in his expectations. The Cardinal ſent for him, and told him, that he was in the wrong to diſpoſe of an eſtate, which had been a long time in the family. But the Gentleman anſwered, that he had married his daughter, and wanted ready money to pay her portion; and that the reſt of the money, which he ſhould receive for his land, being put out at intereſt, would yield him as much income as his land did. D'Amboiſe replied, that he would do better to borrow money for a long term of years, and without intereſt. It is true, ſaid the Gentleman, but where ſhall I find a perſon, who will lend money without intereſt, and for a long term of years? There are ſome ſtill, who will do it, replied the Cardinal, and I will lend you the money, which you want for your daughter's portion, and grant you ſo much time to pay that ſum, that part of your yearly income will be enough for it, and you ſhall not be obliged to ſell your eſtate. Mr. Le Gendre obſerves on this occaſion, that he doubts, whether it is poſſible to find in the Hiſtory of the Romans, Greeks, or any other Nation, a more ſhining inſtance of generoſity than this (36).

(35) Id. tom. 2. lib. 6. p. 71.

(36) Id. ibid. p. 61-63.

AMBROISE, General of the Order of Camaldoli, ſee CAMALDOLI.

☞AMBROSE of an illuſtrious and rich family, but more eminent ſtill for his wit and happy genius, and eſpecially for his piety, lived in the third Century (a). He was engaged at firſt in the hereſies of the Valentinians [A], but he was reclaimed from his errors by Origen's diſcourſes (b), and became one of his greateſt friends. He not only adviſed him, but alſo aſſiſted him in the works he compoſed, by ſupplying him abundantly with every thing he wanted. He procured him above ſeven perſons to write under him by turns what he dictated, and ſome young girls, who wrote a very good hand, to tranſcribe his books; and paid generouſly all the charges that were neceſſary to maintain theſe ſeveral perſons (c). He was made a Deacon of Alexandria, and lived often with Origen; they ſtudied together ſo cloſely, that even during their meals they could not forbear comparing together the books of the holy Scripture; nay they uſed to ſpend part of the night in their ſtudies, as Origen himſelf tells us (d), who often ſent his books to Ambroſe, deſiring him to correct them. But it ſeems Ambroſe was not always faithful to his friend, and publiſhed to the world what was intended for him only as an intimate friend [B]. During the perſecution which the church ſuffered under Maximinus, Ambroſe was in great danger, but far from ſinking under the weight of the perſecution, he gloriouſly maintained the cauſe of Chriſtianity, together with one Protoctetus a Prieſt of the church of Cæſarea; for which reaſon Origen addreſſed to them both his book of Martyrdom (περὶ μαρτυρίου) (e), Moreri and his Dutch tranſlators (f) have miſtook Euſebius's meaning in this place [C]. Ambroſe wrote ſome letters, which are mentioned by St. Jerom (g), who ſays they are full of wit. The time when Ambroſe died is unknown.

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Lit. Vol. 1. pag. 85.

(b) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 18. ed. Reading, fol. Cambridge, 1720. p. 278.

(c) Id. ibid. cap. 23. p. 287.

(d) Apud Cave, ubi ſupra.

(e) Euſebius, ib. cap. 18. p. 293.

(f) David Van Hoegſtraten en Mattheus Brouërius Van Nidek, and A. G. Luïſcius.

(g) In Catal. c. 16.

[A] He maintained at firſt the hereſies of the Valentinians.] This we learn alſo from Origen himſelf, in the preface to the fifth volume of his Expoſition of St. John's Goſpel (1). However ſome Authors have ſaid, that Ambroſe did not follow Valentinus's hereſy, but that of Marcion: For Epiphanius writes, τινὲς δὲ Ἀμβρόσιον ἔφασαν αὐ μὲν Μαρκιωνίτην, οἱ δὲ Σαβελλιανὸν; that is, "Some ſay, Ambroſius was a Marcioniſt, o-"thers a Sabellian:" where Epiphanius wrote by miſtake a Sabellian, for a Valentinian (2).

(1) See Valeſii Annot. ad Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 7. cap. 18. not. 2.

(2) Valeſius, ib.

[B] Ambroſe was not always faithful to his friend, and publiſhed to the world, what was intended for him only.] When Origen was accuſed of having publiſhed ſome errors and hereſies, his friends endeavoured to excuſe him, by ſaying that ſeveral things had been inſerted in his works by his enemies (3). But St. Jerom aſſerts (4), that Origen's works had not been corrupted nor altered, and that the errors, which are found in them, were held by him: He adds, that Origen himſelf confeſſed it in a Letter he wrote to Fabianus Biſhop of Rome, in which he ſays, that he repented of having written as he had done, and charges Ambroſe with raſhneſs and temerity, who had made public what had been compoſed in private (5). It appears by this complaint of Origen, that Ambroſe had not been ſo faithful to him, as he ought to have been; unleſs we ſay, this was only an evaſion of Origen, who notwithſtanding was not diſpleaſed that his books were in every one's hands.

(3) Rufinus, ap. François Bourgoign, Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 1. Liv. 7. p. 970.

(4) Epiſt. ad Pammach. &c. ap. eund.

(5) Bourgoign, ibid. p. 971.

[C] Moreri and his Dutch Tranſlators have miſtaken Euſebius's meaning in this place.] They ſay, that Origen made an excellent exhortation to Ambroſe and Protoctetus, to encourage them to undergo the martyrdom. But Euſebius does not ſay this; his words are (6): Τότε καὶ Ὠριγένης τὸν περὶ μαρτυρίου συντάξει, Ἀμβροσίῳ καὶ Πρωτοκτήτῳ πρεσβυτέρῳ τῆς ἐν Καισαρείᾳ παροικίας ἀναθεῖς τὸ συγγράμμα, ὅτι δὴ ἄμφω περίφασις οὐχ' ἡ τυχοῦσα ἐν τῷ διωγμῷ κατειλήφει. i. e. "At that "time (under the Emperor Maximinus) Origen wrote "his book of Martyrdom, which he addreſſed to "Ambroſe, and to Protoctetus a Prieſt of the Church "of Cæſarea; becauſe they had both been expoſed "to no inconſiderable danger." There is no mention here of Origen's exhortation to them. P.

(6) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 28. p. 293.

☞AMBROSE (ST.) Biſhop of Milan, and one of the moſt eminent Fathers of the fourth Century, was deſcended of an illuſtrious Roman family, and born in Gaul in the year 333, as Dr. Cave informs us (a), or in 340, as Mr. Du Pin aſſerts (b). His father, who was of the ſame name, was at that time Præfectus Prætorio in Gaul, and reſided at Arles, the Capital of Gallia Narbonenſis (c), or at Treves, as others are of opinion (d). The birth of Ambroſe is ſaid to have been followed with a remarkable preſage

(a) Hiſt. Litt. Sæc. 4. ad ann. 374. p. 165. ed. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(b) Bib. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 250. edit. de Paris 1693.

(c) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(d) See Du Pin in note (b) pag. 293, 294. t. 2.

preſage of his future eloquence, for a ſwarm of bees came and ſettled upon his mouth as he lay in his cradle in the court of his father's palace; which prodigy happened likewiſe to Plato. Upon his father's death his mother returned to Rome with Ambroſe, who was then very young, and Marcellina his ſiſter, and Satyrus his elder brother, and took a particular care of their education. Marcellina took upon her a vow of Virginity, and received the veil from the hands of Pope Liberius. Ambroſe was excited by the domeſtic examples of piety, which he ſaw in his mother and ſiſter, to apply himſelf very early to the practice of religion. He made himſelf maſter of all the ſeveral parts of ſecular learning, and pleaded cauſes before Probus, who was Præfectus Prætorio, with ſo much eloquence, that he appointed him his aſſeſſor, and ſoon after made him Governor of the Provinces of Liguria and Æmilia. It is ſaid, that when he took his leave of Probus, the latter ſpoke to him in this manner; Go, and govern as a Biſhop, and not as a Judge. This was conſidered as a prediction of what followed. He ſettled at Milan, till in the year 374, upon the death of Auxentius Biſhop of that city, there was a prodigious conteſt between the Catholicks and Arians concerning the choice of a new Biſhop. This diſpute was ready to break out into an open ſedition among them, when Ambroſe thought it was his duty as Governor to go to the Church, in order to compoſe the tumult. He addreſſed himſelf to the people in a gentle and pathetic ſpeech, and exhorted them to proceed to their choice in a calm and friendly manner. While he was yet ſpeaking to them, the whole aſſembly cried out with one voice, Let Ambroſe be Biſhop (e). Such a ſudden and unexpected incident ſurprized him extremely, ſo that he retired immediately, and made uſe of every artifice to divert them from their reſolution of chooſing him [A]. But at laſt he was obliged to comply, and was baptized, being but a Catechumen before, and ordained Biſhop towards the latter end of the year 374, or the beginning of 375 (f). Soon after this he beſtowed all the money which he was poſſeſſed of upon the poor, and having intruſted his brother Satyrus with the management of his affairs, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, and the diſcharge of his Epiſcopal Functions. About the year 377 the barbarous nations making an incurſion into the Roman Empire, he fled to Illyricum, and afterwards went to Rome (g). He had a peculiar averſion to the Arian Doctrine, and procured Secundianus and Palladius to be condemned in the Council held at Aquileia in 381. In the year 384 he was ſent to the tyrant Maximus, who had uſurped the Empire [B], and prevailed upon him not to paſs over into Italy. The Heathens being encouraged by theſe inteſtine commotions in the Empire, attempted to reſtore their religion, and employed Q. Aur. Symmachus, Prefect of Rome, a man of diſtinguiſhed eloquence, to plead their cauſe. This gave occaſion to the famous conteſt

(e) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 30.

(f) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, p. 251.

(g) Cave, ubi ſupra, p. 166.

[A] Made uſe of every artifice to divert them from their reſolution of chooſing him.] He aſcended his tribunal, and commanded ſeveral criminals to be brought before him in chains, whom he ordered to be put to the torture, that he might appear to be a man of a cruel diſpoſition, and conſequently unworthy of the Prieſthood. When this method did not ſucceed, he procured ſeveral women of a proſtitute character to come to his palace, in order to raiſe a ſuſpicion upon his character. But the people ſaw, that all this was affectation and pretence, and perſiſted in their choice; ſo that he went away in the night to go to Pavia, but miſtaking the way, after he had travelled for a conſiderable time, he found himſelf at the gates of Milan. When it was diſcovered, that he had attempted to eſcape, the people ſet a watch over him, and ſent an account to the Emperor of what had paſs'd; while on the other hand Ambroſe wrote to him, in order to obtain his diſcharge. But the Emperor being highly ſatisfied with the choice, which they had made, not only confirmed his election, but gave orders to the Governor (1) of Italy to ſee that affair executed. Ambroſe made his eſcape again, and concealed himſelf at the houſe of a perſon, whoſe name was Leontius; but the Governor of Italy having publiſhed a Proclamation againſt thoſe who knew where he was, and would not declare it, Leontius thought himſelf under an obligation to diſcover him; ſo that all Ambroſe's efforts failing him, he was obliged to ſubmit (2). When he was baptized, and received ordination, Valentinian the Emperor, who was preſent, cried out with the utmoſt tranſport of Joy, "I "thank thee, O Almighty God, and our Saviour, "that thou haſt given to this man the direction of "ſouls of thoſe, whoſe bodies I had before intruſted to "his government; and haſt by this means declared "my choice of him to have been juſt." Ἐπειδὴ δὲ καὶ τῆς θείας τοῦ παναγίου βαπτίσματος ἀπήλαυσε δωρεᾶς, καὶ τὴν ἀρχιερατικὴν ἐδέξατο χάριν, τοῦτον ὁ πάλαι ἄριστος Βασιλεὺς προσευλογοχέναι λέγεται τῷ Σωτῆρι & δεσπότῃ τὸν ὕμνον. καὶ γὰρ τοῖς γεγενημένοις παρῆν. Χάρις σοι, δέσποτα παντοκράτορ καὶ σῶτερ ἡμῶν, ὅτι τῷδε τῷ ἀνδρὶ ἐγὼ μὲν ἐνεχείρησα σώματα, σὺ δὲ ψυχάς. καὶ τὰς ἐμὰς ψήφους δικαίας ἀπέφηνας (3).

(1) Vicarius Italiæ.

(2) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, p. 251.

(3) Theodor. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 4. c. 7.

[B] Sent to the Tyrant Maximus, who had uſurped the Empire.] He had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by many noble exploits againſt the Scots, whoſe King Eugenius he had defeated and killed in battle. The Writers of thoſe times are not agreed of what country he was; ſome ſay he was born in Spain, and others in Britain; but he pretended himſelf that he was deſcended from Conſtantine the Great, and accordingly aſſumed the name of Flav. Clemens Maximus. Gratian the Emperor at firſt deſpiſed him as a perſon incapable of executing his treaſonable deſigns; but Maximus raiſed a conſiderable army againſt him, and attempted at firſt to deſtroy him by open force; however being diſappointed in that, he had recourſe to a ſtratagem, in which he ſucceeded. He procured ſome perſons about Gratian to inform him, that his wife was coming to him, and intended to meet him on this ſide the Rhone, which runs by the city of Lyons, where the Emperor then was, who went out to meet her. In the mean time an aſſaſſin had by Maximus's orders placed himſelf in a litter, in which Gratian was told the Empreſs was. The Emperor with open arms ſtood ready to receive her, and the villain, whoſe name was Andragathius, ſuddenly ſtarted forth, and killed him upon the ſpot. Maximus having gained this point, ſent Ambaſſadors to Theodoſius to offer peace, and upon his acceptance of it to unite himſelf in a league with him againſt the enemies of the Roman Empire; or in caſe he rejected thoſe terms, to denounce war againſt him. Theodoſius received the Embaſſadors very honourably, and ſeemed to comply with the tyrant's demands; for he was apprehenſive leſt a refuſal ſhould provoke him to invade Italy and ſurprize Valentinian, who was then but thirteen years of age, and had neither conteſt between St. Ambroſe and him about repairing the Altar of Victory. But Symmachus not only loſt his cauſe, but was ſoon after expelled the city (b), and commanded not to approach within an hundred miles of it (i). The petition which he preſented to the Emperor Valentinian the younger is ſtill extant; he employed all the ſtrong figures of rhetoric and the whole force of his eloquence in it (k); but with regard to the ſtrength and conviction of reaſon, we are not to expect it there. St. Ambroſe confuted this petition by two pieces, which have ſtill more eloquence in them. But Mr. Bayle in one of his letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (l), is of opinion, that his reaſoning is very inconcluſive, and that he has been guilty of a great many paralogiſms; in ſhort, that he has advanced things entirely contrary to what he had aſſerted upon other occaſions, or affirmed afterwards. And yet he proteſts, that he endeavoured only after ſolidity of reaſoning, leaving Symmachus all the glory of eloquence and politeneſs, becauſe it is the peculiar privilege of the Pagan Philoſophers to amuſe the mind with colours as falſe as their idols, and to ſay great things, not being capable of ſaying true ones (m). We ſhall give the reader the ſubſtance of Mr. Bayle's exceptions [C]. St. Ambroſe

(b) Proſper de Promiſſ. pag. 3. cap. 38.
(i) Cave, ubi ſupra.
(k) Vide Symmachi Epiſt. l. 10. Epiſt. 54.

(l) Nouvellet Lettres de l'Auteur de la Critique Generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme, tom. 1. Lett. 2. p. 32. edit. Amſterd. 1715.
(m) See Mr. Flechier Vie de Theodoſ. lib. 3. n. 31.

neither experience nor forces ſufficient to oppoſe ſo formidable an enemy, who was now become Maſter of Gaul and Spain. And Valentinian himſelf was ſo ſenſible of the danger which he was in, and diffident of the integrity of ſome who were near him, that he ſent St. Ambroſe to ſee if by the reputation of his wiſdom and ſanctity, he could reſtrain the Tyrant's unbounded thirſt of Empire, and prevail upon him to continue on the other ſide of the Alps. Maximus ſeemed highly pleaſed with St. Ambroſe's Embaſſy, either becauſe he had not as yet ſettled his affairs in Gaul and Britain, or at preſent was in want of money, the ſinews of war, without which his future attempts would prove vain and ineffectual. He careſſed St. Ambroſe in a very extraordinary manner, and asked him why Valentinian himſelf did not come in perſon, aſſuring him, that he ſhould have been as welcome to his arms, as if he had been his own ſon. St. Ambroſe excuſed Valentinian in a very handſome manner, telling him, that he was too young for ſuch a fatiguing journey over the Alps at ſo unſeaſonable a time of the year; and concluded, that he was not come to give him an account of his Maſter's actions, but to ſettle a mutual confidence and agreement between them, if he thought proper to accept it. In ſhort, he managed this affair in ſo dextrous a manner, that a peace was concluded according to his deſire, and Maximus was prevented from marching over into Italy (4).

(4) Roman Hiſtory, Vol. 3. pag. 199, &c. 5th edition 1720. See Du Pin, ubi ſupra; and Cave, ubi ſupra, and Fra. Ignat. Hyacinth. Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 100.

[C] We ſhall give the reader the ſubſtance of Mr. Bayle's exceptions.] He ſuppoſes at firſt that a man of St. Ambroſe's warm imagination, and torrent of eloquence, would very frequently in the pulpit diſplay to the people the ſeverity of God's juſtice, who puniſhes the ſins of men by war, and peſtilence, and famine. It is morally impoſſible, that a man who preaches often, ſhould not have many times urged this topic. He muſt therefore contradict himſelf when he ridiculed Symmachus for repreſenting to the Emperor, that the Gods had ſent famine upon the earth, in order to revenge the injuries, which had been done to their Miniſters (5). "If "their Gods, ſays St. Ambroſe, revenge themſelves "upon the whole Empire on account of the injury "which had been done to a few particular perſons, "they are unjuſt, and the revenge is worſe than the "crime." Quæ autem æquitas ut paucis ſacerdotibus dolentes victum negatum, ipſi omnibus denegarent, cum inclementior eſſet vindicta quam culpa (6). This ſuppoſes that God never puniſhes the people in general for the injury which has been offered to ſome particular perſons; and the foundation of ſuch a manner of reaſoning muſt be this, that the juſtice of God does not permit him to involve the innocent with the guilty in the ſame puniſhment. Now this propoſition is directly oppoſite to the doctrine, which St. Ambroſe may juſtly be ſuppoſed to have frequently preached, that the plague, and war, and famine are the ſcourges, which God makes uſe of to puniſh men; ſince theſe calamities involve promiſcuouſly the good and vicious. Beſides this aſſertion is likewiſe contrary to the Scripture, which teaches us, that the ſingle vanity of David was the cauſe of God's deſtroying ſeventy thouſand of the Iſraelites. Add to this the conſideration of original ſin, which alone ought to have prevented St. Ambroſe from running on too precipitately in his confutation. His reaſoning is alſo inconſiſtent with a paſſage in the code of Theodoſius, which is as follows (7): Shall we ſuffer any longer that the ſeaſons ſhould be reverſed by the wrath of heaven, the conſtitution of which has been ſo diſturbed by the perfidiouſneſs of the Pagans, that it cannot any longer obſerve the proportions of nature. For whence comes it that the Spring has loſt its uſual beauties? That the Summer deprived of its products has deceived the labour of the husbandman? That the immoderate cold of the Winter has rendred the earth barren; but from this cauſe that the order of nature has been interrupted, that the impiety of men might be chaſtiſed? What could St. Ambroſe ſay to this? He muſt have been obliged to acknowledge either that the Emperor's Edict repreſented God as unjuſt, or that Symmachus had been refuted by an inconcluſive argument. It is ſtrange, that there ſhould be ſome certain maxims, which all religions make uſe of almoſt equally, but in ſuch a manner, that after they have made their advantage of them, they do not at all ſcruple to reject them, if they perceive, that the enemy thinks proper to make uſe of them. While the Pagans attacked the Chriſtians by imputing to them the miſeries of the Empire, the latter ridiculed this argument as trifling; but they themſelves applied it afterwards. Mr. Bayle then proceeds to ſhew St. Ambroſe's Paralogiſms, which he endeavours to do in the following obſervations; I, St. Ambroſe is not contented with treating Symmachus's opinion as abſurd, becauſe the vengeance of the Gods would extend to too many perſons; but he demands of him with an air of triumph, Why they had ſuffered for ſo long a courſe of years, that the privileges of their temples ſhould be deſtroyed? Why they had ceaſed to revenge themſelves in one year only, as appeared from the plenty of the following? And why ſome provinces were fruitful enough even in the very year that the famine raged (8)? This manner of reaſoning is juſt the ſame with the objections, which unbelievers ſo often urge againſt the Divine Providence. For if we ſpeak of the ſcourges which God makes uſe of to puniſh the violation of his Laws, they ask immediately, why he does this ſo late, or why he does not continue it? And they point out whole Nations, which, tho' they are not better than others, yet enjoy a perfect proſperity amidſt an almoſt univerſal calamity. II, Symmachus having introduced the City of Rome entreating the Emperors to reſtore to her that ancient Religion, which had reſcued her from the attacks of Hannibal and the Gauls: St. Ambroſe urges in reply to this two things, which are not the leaſt ſolid or convincing. He rallies in the firſt place the Roman Deities for not delivering the City till after it had been attack'd and beſieged by the enemy; and asks where Jupiter was, when nothing but the noiſe of the geeſe ſaved the Capitol. He obſerves in the ſecond place, that Hannibal having worſhipped the ſame Gods who were revered at Rome, it muſt neceſſarily happen, that they would have been conquered in the Carthaginian army, if they had proved victorious among the Romans. But he ſhould have reflected that the Scripture in an infinity of places mentions, that the enemies of the people of God inſulted him in the ſame manner, as himſelf did the Roman Deities. The Jews were baniſhed,

(5) Nec rubigo ſegetibus obfuit nec avena fruges necavit. Sacrilegio annus exaruit. Neceſſe enim fuit perire omnibus, quod religionibus negabatur. Sym. l. 10. Ep. 54.
(6) Ambroſ. Epiſt. 31.

(7) Vid. Novel. lam 3 Theodoſii de Judæis, &c.

(8) St. Ambroſ. Epiſt. 31.

Ambroſe met likewiſe with great oppoſition from the Arians, againſt whom he acted with the warmeſt zeal imaginable [D]. He was ſent a ſecond time to the tyrant Maximus ed, the temple of Jeruſalem burnt, and the churches of the Chriſtians were frequently deſtroyed. With regard to the ſecond anſwer, to ſee the weakneſs of it, we need only conſider the monuments, which the French and Spaniards have conſecrated to God by way of thankſgiving for ſome victory or other. They are of the ſame Religion, and conſequently the ſame God who triumphed in France, muſt have loſt the advantage in Spain. III, Symmachus had repreſented to the Emperors, that they ought to ſecure to themſelves principally the ſecret aſſiſtance of the Religion of Rome, which had done ſuch great ſervices to their anceſtors. Let this Religion, ſays he, protect you, and let us perform the duties of it (9). St. Ambroſe replies, that he would not have the protection of idols, and that if they could protect their followers, they might do it. Thus far he ſpeaks reaſonably enough; but when he proceeds in this manner, addreſſing himſelf to the Emperors, If theſe Gods cannot aſſiſt thoſe, who worſhip them, how can they protect you, who pay no regard to them? he ſeems to copy the manner of ſpeaking of the Pagans themſelves, when the Chriſtians promiſed the Emperors the aſſiſtance of their prayers, tho' at the ſame time they were perſecuted themſelves. IV, But what ſhall we ſay of the difference which he makes between the Gentiles and Chriſtians? The former, ſays he, deſire the Emperors to grant peace to their Gods; and the latter to pray Chriſt to grant peace to the Emperors. This ſentiment is entirely falſe, and nothing but mere point and antitheſis. He ſhould have attacked the ſenſe of his antagoniſt, and not have refined upon his expreſſions. It is plain that Symmachus by this peace, which he deſired of the Emperors for his Gods, meant only the liberty of worſhipping them according to the ancient cuſtom; and we ſee evidently from his petition, that he promiſed the Emperors the protection of thoſe Gods. Where is then the oppoſition between the Chriſtians and Pagans, which Ambroſe imagined? Had he forgot that the Apologiſts of the primitive Church exhorted the Emperors not to perſecute it? Was not this asking peace for Jeſus Chriſt of the Emperors in the ſame ſenſe as Symmachus deſired it for his idols? V, Ambroſe likewiſe takes notice of other differences between them. The former, ſays he (10), cannot bear the leaſt retrenchment of their revenues without complaining; while the latter diveſt themſelves of their fortunes, and even reſign their lives voluntarily. Privileges and penſions muſt be given to the Veſtals, as if they could not be chaſte for nothing; whereas the Chriſtian Virgins are contented with a coarſe veil, which covers their face, and renounce for ever the riches as well as the pleaſures of life; they find all the reward of virtue in virtue itſelf. This is excellently well expreſſed; but Ambroſe muſt inevitably draw upon him the reſentments of the whole Catholic Church for nine or ten hundred years at leaſt; for he has condemned all the Prieſts and Monks, who have ever pleaded for the conſervation or recovery of their revenues; ſo that the difference between the Pagans and Chriſtians in theſe reſpects has been almoſt abſolutely extinguiſhed. Mr. Bayle afterwards attempts to ſhew, that theſe paralogiſms of Ambroſe are in ſome reſpect contradictions; becauſe there is no manner of doubt, that if an unbeliever or an heretic had attacked him in the manner, which will be propoſed immediately, he would have anſwered the very reverſe of what he replied to Symmachus. Suppoſe for inſtance, that an unbeliever ſhould have objected the victories gained over the Jews by the Pagans, the profanation of the temple of Solomon, the miſeries of the primitive Church, and ſhould have concluded from all theſe conſiderations, that the God of the Jews and Chriſtians was not the true God, it is certain Ambroſe would have evidently ſhewn the impertinence of theſe objections. He would therefore have contradicted himſelf, for he would have rejected at one time what he had urged as ſolid at another. Suppoſe that an heretical Emperor having deprived the Biſhops, Prieſts and Nuns of their revenues, ſhould have been petitioned to reſtore them, and have given their petition to an Advocate, to be examined. Suppoſe this Advocate in writing againſt this petition ſhould have addreſſed himſelf to the petitioners in this manner: Gentlemen, you are thought to be ſincere Chriſtians; you ought therefore to renounce the advantages of this world; your Nuns ought to be chaſte without any reward, and to find the reward of virtue in virtue itſelf; is it not a thing beyond the leaſt doubt, that St. Ambroſe would have diſapproved of the conduct of this Advocate? He would therefore have blamed in one place the reflections, which he had made uſe of in another; as was obſerved above, that he was diſpleaſed that the Pagan Prieſts and Veſtals would not live without their ſtipends. Thoſe, ſays Mr. Bayle, who are acquainted with the vigorous reſiſtance, which he made to the Emperor Valentinian, when the latter wanted to take away a Church from the orthodox three years after his confutation of Symmachus, will not doubt of the reaſonableneſs of this conjecture.

(9) Symmach. Epiſt. 54. l. 10.

(10) See Mr. Flechier, Vie de Theodoſ. l. 3.

[D] Met with great oppoſition from the Arians, againſt whom he acted with the warmeſt zeal imaginable.] Juſtina the Empreſs, and mother of Valentinian, who was an Arian, reſolving to reſtore Arianiſm at Milan, began with demanding of St. Ambroſe one of the churches, which was called the Portian Church, but he refuſed it; and the people ſurrounding the palace in a body, ſhe was obliged to leave him in poſſeſſion of his church, and even to deſire him to pacify the people. Some time after the Empreſs ſent and required of him in the Emperor's name not only that church, but the New Church likewiſe. He refuſed to obey this command, and anſwered with ſuch an intrepidity and reſolution of mind, as aſtoniſhed thoſe, who came with the Emperor's orders. This happened in the beginning of the year 385. On Palm-Sunday the ſame year Officers were ſent to take poſſeſſion of the Portian Church, while Ambroſe was officiating in the New Church. But the people being prodigiouſly enraged at this attempt, run thither immediately, and having ſeized one Caſtulus an Arian Prieſt, were juſt ready to raiſe a ſedition, if Ambroſe had not ſent his Prieſts and Deacons to appeaſe them. The Emperor ordered ſeveral of the ſeditious to be ſeized, and ſent ſoldiers to take poſſeſſion of the church by violence. But this was not executed. On Holy-Wedneſday the ſoldiers were ordered to ſeize the New Church; but the people prevented it, and ſpent the whole day and night in ſinging Pſalms in it; and the next day the Emperor being touched with the reſolution and prudence of Ambroſe, who had prevented a ſedition, at the ſame time that he had continued inflexible in maintaining his cauſe, commanded the ſoldiers, who ſurrounded the church, to retire. The year following theſe conteſts were ſtill maintained, and the Emperor renewed his ſevere treatment of St. Ambroſe by an Edict in favour of the Council of Rimini. It was reſolved to give the Arians poſſeſſion of the Portian Church, and even to baniſh St. Ambroſe himſelf; but he was protected by the people of Milan, who ſecured him in his church, where he paſſed ſeveral days and nights in ſinging Pſalms and Hymns with them. It was propoſed to him, that he ſhould go to the palace, and hold a diſputation with Auxentius the Arian Biſhop; but he refuſed that offer, becauſe thoſe, who were to judge of this conference, were Laymen and Pagans. He agreed to ſubmit the determination of this diſpute to a Council, tho' he thought it was unreaſonable to diſturb the peace of the Church on account of a ſingle perſon, and to debate again what had been already decided. He then made a ſpeech againſt Auxentius; which highly provoked the Empreſs Juſtina againſt him. But at laſt ſhe ceaſed perſecuting him, when ſhe found, that his prudence and reſolution, and the prodigious eſteem, which he had among the people, render'd him ſuperior to all her efforts againſt him. Some writers have repreſented, as if the diſcovery of the relicks of St. Gervaſe, and St. Protaſe, and the miracles, which appeared at that time, contributed very much to reſtore the peace of the Church. This ſeems to be a very ſtrange and unintelligible reaſon, and it is extremely difficult to conceive any connexion

mus but without ſucceſs [E]. About three years after this he ſhewed a juſt indignation againſt the Emperor Theodoſius on account of the cruel maſſacre at Theſſalonica [F]. In the year 392 Valentinian the Emperor being aſſaſſinated by the contrivance of Arbogaſtes, nexion between ſuch a cauſe and the effect abovementioned. But it is very probable that, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves (11), the true reaſon, which prevented Juſtina and the Emperor Valentinian from carrying things to an extremity, was the danger, which threatned the Empire from the tyrant Maximus's deſigns againſt it. Theſe unhappy circumſtances render'd Ambroſe's aſſiſtance of great importance.

(11) Ubi ſupra, p. 252.

[E] He was ſent a ſecond time to the tyrant Maximus, but without ſucceſs.] Valentinian found no perſon ſo proper to negotiate with Maximus as St. Ambroſe; and therefore ſent him to Treves, where the tyrant then reſided. He ſpoke to him with a great deal of ſpirit and reſolution; but he could not obtain any thing of him (12). On the contrary Maximus ſoon after marched into Italy, and made himſelf Maſter of all the Weſtern Empire; ſo that Valentinian was obliged to retire with his mother Juſtina, and Galla his ſiſter to Theſſalonica in Illyricum, in order to deſire Theodoſius's aſſiſtance, who defeated Maximus, and reſtored Valentinian to the Empire. This happened in the year 387. St. Ambroſe reſided during theſe commotions upon his Biſhoprick. When Theodoſius came into the Weſt, he ſhewed the ſame inflexibility towards him, as he had done towards Valentinian; and oppoſed his deſign of granting a Synagogue to the Jews (13).

(12) Cave, ubi ſupra, p. 166. and Fr. Ignat. Hyacinth. ubi ſupra.

(13) Du Pin, ib. and Ign. Hyacinth. Hiſt. Eccleſ. ubi ſupra.

[F] On account of the cruel maſſacre at Theſſalonica.] While Theodoſius continued in Italy, after the defeat of Maximus, an inſurrection happened at Theſſalonica, upon the following occaſion. There was a Charioteer, who had a violent affection for the Butler of Buthericus, the Emperor's Lieutenant in Illyricum, and having ſollicited him to the unlawful gratification of his deſires, was caſt into priſon. But there happening to be an horſe-race, the people of Theſſalonica demanded, that he ſhould be ſet at liberty, becauſe he was a neceſſary perſon upon that occaſion. This being refuſed them, they raiſed a ſedition, and killed Buthericus himſelf (14), and ſtoned ſeveral of the Magiſtrates, and drag'd them along the ſtreets (15). Theodoſius being informed of this, commanded a certain number of the inhabitants to be put to death promiſcuouſly; by which means the city was filled with the blood of a great many innocent perſons; and among the reſt ſeveral ſtrangers, who were but juſt come to the city (16). No regard was had to any diſtinction of perſons; no form of trial obſerved; but they were cut down like corn in the Harveſt, as Theodoret expreſſes it (17), to the number of ſeven thouſand. Ἑπτὰ γὰρ, ὡς φάσιν, ἀνηρέθησαν χιλιάδας, ὑ κρίσεως ἠγησαμένης, καὶ τῶν τὰ δεινὰ ἐκεῖνα τετολμηκότων κατακριθέντων, ἀλλ' ὡς ἐν ἀμήτῳ πολλῶν ὁμοῦ δίκην ἀσταχύων καταῤῥιφθέντων. Sozomen gives a remarkable ſtory or two, which happened in this maſſacre. A Merchant came and offered himſelf to death to ſave his two ſons, who were ſeized, and promiſed all the gold that he had in reward for the favour. The ſoldiers being touched with pity gave him leave to chooſe one of his ſons; for they declared that they could not diſmiſs them both, becauſe they wanted to fill up their number. The father ſtood in a dreadful ſuſpence, looking ſometimes upon one of his ſons, ſometimes upon the other, with all the agony that can be imagined, and incapable of determining which of them he ſhould chooſe; till they were both of them put to death before his eyes. We are told likewiſe of a ſervant, who ſubmitted to death, to ſave his Maſter's life. At this time an aſſembly of Biſhops was held at Milan, who all expreſſed how much they abhorred ſo exceſſive a ſeverity in the Emperor. Upon which Ambroſe wrote a Letter to Theodoſius, in which, with a confidence not the leaſt injurious to the reſpect due to him, he repreſented the enormity of his crime, and exhorted him to make an atonement by a ſincere ſubmiſſion and repentance (18). The Emperor being arrived at Milan, was going to perform his devotions in the Great Church, when Ambroſe met him at the door, and denied him entrance, in theſe terms (19): "You do not, I believe, conſider, O "Emperor, the guilt of the maſſacre, which you "have committed; and tho' the violence of your "paſſion be now over, yet your reaſon has not yet "ſuggeſted to you the full extent of your crime. "Perhaps your Imperial Dignity may prevent you "from perceiving it, and caſt a cloud over your "underſtanding. However you ought to reflect upon the conſtitution of human nature, which is "very weak and obnoxious to mortality; and that "we are derived from the duſt, and muſt neceſſarily "be reſolved into it at laſt. Let not the ſplendor "of the purple, which inveſts you, deceive you ſo "far, as not to conſider the infirmity of the body, "which it covers. They are men of the ſame nature with yourſelf, nay they are your fellow-ſervants, whom you govern; for there is one Lord "and Sovereign of all, he, who created the univerſe. With what eyes will you therefore view "the temple of our common Sovereign, and with "what feet will you tread the ſacred floor? How "can you ſtretch out thoſe hands, which have been "defiled with ſo much innocent blood? How can "you receive the holy Body of our Lord in ſuch "polluted hands, or touch with your mouth his "precious blood, when you have commanded in "your paſſion the blood of ſo many perſons to be "unjuſtly ſhed? Depart therefore, and do not aggravate your former guilt by new provocations. "Receive the bond, which God himſelf, the Lord "of all nature, approves and recommends; for it "has a ſalutary power in it." The Emperor ſtruck with theſe words returned to his palace in all the diſtreſs of mind imaginable. About eight months after, at the ſeaſon of our Lord's Nativity, he ſat weeping in his palace, when Rufinus, an intimate confident of his, came and asked him the cauſe of his ſorrow. He told him that he thought himſelf inexpreſſibly unhappy, that when the church was open to the loweſt orders of mankind, it was ſhut to him; nay, that he was excluded from any hopes of heaven, becauſe Chriſt expreſly ſays, Whomſoever ye ſhall bind on earth, ſhall be bound in heaven. Rufinus offered to go, and perſuade the Biſhop to be reconciled to him; but Theodoſius alledged it was to no purpoſe, becauſe the ſentence was juſt, and Ambroſe would never pay ſo much regard to the Imperial Dignity, as to violate God's commands. But Rufinus ſtill perſiſting, and aſſuring him, that he could certainly prevail upon Ambroſe, the Emperor ſent him immediately to him, and being full of hopes of his ſucceſs, followed him ſoon after. But Ambroſe, when he ſaw Rufinus, expoſtulated with him in very ſevere terms, and asked him, whether he was not aſhamed to appear, ſince he had been the adviſer of ſo bloody a maſſacre? But when Rufinus began to entreat him, and told him, that the Emperor would be ſoon there, Ambroſe aſſured him, that he would refuſe him entrance into the church. "But if, ſays "he, he will carry his power ſo far as to act the "tyrant, I will readily ſubmit to death." Rufinus upon hearing this ſent the Emperor an account of the Biſhop's reſolution by a Meſſenger, and deſired him to continue in his palace. But the Emperor was upon the way thither when he heard this, and declared, that he would go and ſuffer the reproaches, which he deſerved. However he would not enter into the church; but deſired the Biſhop, who ſat in an apartment adjoining to it, to releaſe him from his bonds. Ambroſe told him, that his coming was tyrannical and preſumptuous, and that he trampled upon the Laws of God. "No, replied the Empe-"ror, I do not preſume to break thoſe Laws; nor "deſire to enter into the church contrary to the "conſtitutions of it; but I only entreat you, to "looſe me from my bonds, and to conſider the mercy of God, and not ſhut the door to me, which "he has opened to all ſincere penitents." "But "what inſtance of repentance, ſays Ambroſe, have "you ſhewn for ſo enormous a crime? By what "methods have you healed your wounds?" "It is "your office to preſcribe that, returned the Empe-"ror, and mine to ſubmit to it." Ambroſe upon this told him, that ſince he had before followed the dictates

(14) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 7. c. 25.

(15) Theodorit. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 5. c. 17.

(16) Sozomen. ubi ſupra.

(17) Ubi ſupra.

(18) Roman Hiſtory, vol. 3. c. 2. p. 230.

(19) Theodorit. l. 5. c. 18.

bogaſtes, and Eugenius uſurping the Empire, Ambroſe was obliged to leave Milan, but he returned thither the year following, when Eugenius was defeated. He died there the fourth of April 397, being fifty ſeven years of age, as Mr. Du Pin (n), and other writers are of opinion (o), or as Dr. Cave and Olearius (p) think, ſixty four years old. He was buried in the great church at Milan. He wrote a great many works, the moſt conſiderable of which is that De Officiis [G]. His ſtyle is not always equally elevated, but he adapts it, as St. Auſtin obſerves, to the ſubject which he treats of. It is ſometimes very negligent, at other times very elaborate, but it is always grave and noble. He is conciſe and ſententious in his manner of writing, and full of turns of wit. Thoſe pieces dictates of his paſſion in giving ſentence, and executing it, he ſhould now make a Law, by which all criminals might have a reſpite of thirty days allowed them between the pronouncing of the ſentence and the execution, that there might be an opportunity of examining coolly whether the ſentence was juſt or not. This Theodoſius immediately aſſented to, and confirmed it with his own hand. When he was admitted into the church, he proſtrated himſelf upon the ground, and ſhewed all the marks of a ſincere repentance. After this he went up to the altar, and made his offering there, and then ſtood within the chancel (20), as he uſed to do. But Ambroſe ordered the Archdeacon to tell him, that this place was only allowed to the Prieſts, and not to others of any rank whatſoever; and to deſire him to retire from thence, and ſtand amongſt the reſt of the people. For the purple, ſays he, makes Emperors, but not Prieſts. Ἁλουργὶς γὰρ βασιλέας, οὐχ' ἱερέας ποιεῖ. The Emperor, ſtruck with this remonſtrance, anſwered, that he did not place himſelf within the chancel out of pride, but becauſe it was the cuſtom at Conſtantinople; however he thank'd him for correcting him in this point likewiſe. Theodorit is highly pleaſed with this inſtance of virtue both in the Biſhop and the Emperor. "I "admire them both equally, ſays he; the one on "account of his freedom of ſpeech, and the other "for his ready ſubmiſſion; I eſteem the ardent zeal "of the former, and the purity and ſincerity of the "latter's faith." Τοσαύτη καὶ τηλικαύτη καὶ ὁ Ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ ὁ Βασιλεὺς διέλαμπον ἀρετῇ. Ἀμφοτέρων γὰρ ἔγωγε ἄγαμαι, τοῦ μὲν τὴν παῤῥησίαν, τοῦ δὲ τὴν ὑποπίθειαν· καὶ τοῦ μὲν τὴν τοῦ ζήλου θερμότητα, τοῦ δὲ τὴν τῆς πίστεως καθαρότητα.

(n) Ubi ſupra.

(o) Fr. Ignat. Hyacinth. Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 100. edit. Auguſtæ Vindelicor. 1727.

(p) Bibliab. Script. Eccleſ. vol. 1. p. 40. ed. Jenæ 1711.

(20) Παρὰ τὰς πυλίδας. Theod. ubi ſupra.

[G] The moſt conſiderable of which is that De Officiis.] This is a Diſcourſe divided into three books upon the Duties of the Clergy; for tho' the word Clergy or Miniſters is retrenched in the edition of Rome and the later editions, yet it is expreſſed in all the Manuſcripts, and it is plain from the work itſelf, that Ambroſe wrote it for their uſe. But tho' he addreſſes himſelf to them, yet he treats of the duties common to all Chriſtians; of which he makes a particular application to the Clergy. It appears to have been written ſeveral years after he had been Biſhop, and very probably about the year 390 or 391, when peace was reſtored to the Church after the death of the tyrant Maximus (21). He has imitated in theſe three books the deſign and œconomy of Cicero's works De Officiis. He confirms, ſays Mr. Du Pin (22), the good maxims, which that Orator has advanced; he corrects thoſe, which are imperfect; he refutes thoſe, which are falſe; and he adds a great many others, which are prodigiouſly more excellent, pure, and elevated. The ſix firſt chapters of the firſt book are a Preface to the whole work, in which he enquires, when and how it is proper to ſpeak or to be ſilent. Biſhops are obliged by their function to explain the Word of God; but they ought to do it with humility, and to learn at the ſame time, that they teach others, in order to inſtruct them. This he applies to himſelf: "For having been removed at once, ſays he, from "the Tribunal of Juſtice and Civil Offices, and raiſed "to the Prieſthood, I have taught you what I had "not learned before, and was obliged to learn and "teach at the ſame time." He ſhews then the advantages of being ſilent upon proper occaſions; not that we are always to be ſo; ſince it is very reaſonable to ſpeak, if we do it with humility and moderation, and reſtrain our tongues within the bounds of reaſon. After this Preface he enters upon his ſubject concerning Offices or Duties; and obſerves that this word was not only in uſe among the Philoſophers, but that we find it likewiſe in Scripture. The Philoſophers diſtinguiſhed offices into three kinds, the Honeſtum, the Utile, and the Dulce. But St. Ambroſe tells us, that Chriſtians only acknowledge the firſt diſtinction, ſince they reſolve all into the happineſs of a future life; whereas the conveniences and pleaſures of this world are no real advantages or true pleaſures. He treats therefore of Duties only, with relation to the Honeſtum; and tells us, that this term of Honeſtum and Decorum was known to David, before the Philoſophers made uſe of it; to prove which he quotes Pſalm lxii. ver. 2. Te decet hymnus, Deus, in Sion; that is, "Praiſe becometh thee, O God in Sion." He adds ſeveral paſſages from St. Paul, where he ſpeaks of Decency and Honeſty. He obſerves, that Pythagoras followed David in enjoining ſilence to his Diſciples, but he makes a great difference between their precepts; becauſe that Philoſopher abſolutely prohibited them from ſpeaking, whereas David only directed them to ſpeak with moderation, and to be ſilent, when there was occaſion. He diſtinguiſhes duties into two kinds, one leſs perfect, which he calls medium or middle Duty, and the other moſt perfect. He explains this by Chriſt's words to the young man, who enquired of him what he muſt do to inherit eternal life. Our Saviour bid him at firſt keep the commandments. Theſe were the leſs perfect duties, to which ſomething elſe was wanting. The perfect duties are intimated in the following words; If thou wilt be perfect, ſell all that thou haſt, and give it to the poor, and thou ſhalt have treaſure in heaven, and come, and follow me. This gives occaſion to St. Ambroſe to recommend alms-giving, as one of the principal duties of a Chriſtian life. He treats there very amply concerning Providence, and ſhews in contradiction to the Philoſophers, that it extends over all creatures. But why then are the wicked in proſperity and affluence? This is the common objection. St. Ambroſe anſwers in the firſt place, that this proſperity does not make them really happy even in this life, becauſe the remorſe of their conſciences gives them inexpreſſible pain. He adds in the ſecond place, that we are not to be ſurprized at their ſeeming ſo happy in this life, whereas the good are often miſerable, ſince this is not a ſtate of reward or puniſhment, which is reſerved to another life, when the treatment of mankind ſhall be proportioned to their particular behaviour here. In ſhort, that God gives wicked men the advantages of this life, that they may have no excuſe at the day of judgment for tranſgreſſing his commandments. Having eſtabliſhed theſe general principles, he enters into a particular examination of the duties of every ſtate of life. He begins with thoſe which relate to the youth, and recommends to them above all things modeſty, which he proves to be very neceſſary to the Clergy. He adviſes them not to enter too much into the gaities of life, to avoid banquets and the familiar converſation with women, but to apply themſelves to the functions of their office. He gives them rules for the reſtraint of their anger and other paſſions, and for the regulation of their converſation, which ought not to be too full of raillery and ridicule; and then he preſcribes three maxims for their conduct, the firſt of which is, to keep their paſſions in ſubjection to their reaſon; the ſecond, to obſerve a due moderation; and the third, to do every thing properly and in order. He illuſtrates theſe rules by examples from the Old Teſtament. Having laid down theſe general rules, he proceeds to the particular virtues, comparing the ideas, which Chriſtians have of them, with thoſe of the Pagan Philoſophers; and endeavours to ſhew the ſuperiority pieces which he wrote with care are full of vivacity, judgment and ſpirit, and adorned with all the flowers of rhetorick. The reſt, though leſs poliſhed, have their graces likewiſe. His terms are well choſen, and his expreſſions noble. He diverſifies his ſubject by an admirable copiouſneſs of thought and language. He is very ingenious in giving an eaſy and natural turn to every thing which he treats of, and he does not want ſtrength and pathos where there is occaſion for it. As he was remarkable for joining in his conduct a ſurprizing generoſity and inflexibility with all the prudence and moderation imaginable, ſo he knew how to unite in his writings the freedom and authority of a Biſhop with the utmoſt meekneſs and charity. His treatiſes upon morality are the beſt part of his works, and thoſe which he laboured to moſt perfection. There are ſome of his letters which may be conſidered as maſter-pieces in their kind, eſpecially ſuperiority of the former. Juſtice, for inſtance, among Chriſtians, will not permit them to return evil for evil; it will not allow any ſelfiſh conſideration, and takes place not only with regard to friends, but even open and declared enemies. The benevolence of Chriſtians muſt be univerſal, and extend even to their adverſaries. It is not vanity, but charity, which is the foundation of their liberality; they are obliged to give not only what is ſuperfluous to themſelves, but even what is neceſſary. Their fortitude conſiſts chiefly in ſuffering with reſolution and conſtancy, in defending the weak from violence, in ſubduing their paſſions, in deſpiſing the advantages of this world, and in loving and purſuing nothing but virtue. They preſerve an equality of temper, and a mind ſerene and undiſturbed amidſt the ſevereſt misfortunes. However, they never expoſe themſelves raſhly to danger, and do not ſcruple to fly when they find themſelves too weak to reſiſt perſecutions. In ſhort their temperance conſiſts in tranquillity of mind, meekneſs of diſpoſition, perfect modeſty, and exact honeſty. St. Ambroſe gives a particular account of the ſeveral branches of theſe virtues, and preſcribes rules for the obſervance of them, and propoſes ſome noble inſtances of them from Scripture, and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. At the end of this book he inſiſts chiefly upon the virtues neceſſary to the Clergy, and recommends to them particularly diſintereſtedneſs and purity of manners; and he appears to incline ſtrongly to the opinion, that they were under an obligation to live in celibacy (23). He begins his ſecond book by enquiring, in what true happineſs conſiſts, which he reſolves into the knowledge of the Deity, and integrity of life; he obſerves, that all other advantages are ſo far from being our ſovereign good, that they do not render us the leaſt happier; while on the other hand, the evils and inconveniences of life do not make us more wretched; that temporal enjoyments, as riches, are real evils, becauſe they draw us off from attending to our greateſt and moſt important concern; whereas thoſe circumſtances, which are generally conſidered as wretched, as pain, and affliction are of advantage to us, by giving us an opportunity of improving in virtue. He proceeds then to ſhew, that there can be no real profit ſeparate from honeſty, and treats of friendſhip, fidelity, liberality, benevolence, civility, readineſs to aſſiſt the poor and afflicted, hoſpitality, and other virtues neceſſary to ſupport ſociety and commerce among men. He tells us, that nothing is ſo uſeful, as to be loved and reſpected, and nothing more diſadvantageous than the contrary. Mildneſs, civility, and modeſty procure an univerſal eſteem. Theſe virtues are as proper for Kings and Princes, as for private perſons. A man, who is generally loved, has the greateſt confidence placed in him. When we want advice, we muſt apply our ſelves to one who is as remarkable for his juſtice as his prudence. Theſe two virtues are inſeparable. Our charity ought to be regulated by reaſon, and directed in ſuch a manner, as to effect the greateſt good. He juſtifies himſelf for ſelling the ſacred veſſels, in order to redeem the captives. "The Church, ſays he, is eſtabliſhed without gold; if ſhe has it now, it is only with a deſign to beſtow it, and not to keep it for her ſelf; it is in order to aſſiſt the poor in their neceſſities. What can a Biſhop ſay for himſelf, who ſhould ſuffer the living members of Chriſt to periſh, merely to preſerve inanimate veſſels. Can he plead, that he was unwilling that the temple of the Lord ſhould be deprived of its ornaments? Will it not be anſwered, that it is not neceſſary that the Sacraments of the Altar ſhould be diſtributed in gold or ſilver; that the redemption of captives is an ornament infinitely more agreeable in the ſight of God; that theſe veſſels can never be rendred more valuable, than when they are employed in ranſoming the lives of Chriſtians; that the true treaſure of the Lord is that, which has the ſame effect as his blood. That we then ſee evidently, that it is a veſſel of the Lord, when we obſerve a double redemption in it, ſo that the outward veſſel redeems from the enemy thoſe very perſons, whom Chriſt has redeemed from ſin." In the firſt chapter of the third book he ſhews, that Scipio's maxim, that he was never more employed and leſs alone, than when he was alone, is older than Scipio; and that it was verified in a more illuſtrious manner in the characters of Moſes, Elijah, Eliſha, and the Apoſtles, who performed ſo many miracles, when they ſeemed to be engaged in no employment. He adds, that a good man is never alone, becauſe he is perpetually preſent with God; that he is never unemployed, becauſe he is always meditating; that he ſeems to be unknown, and yet ſtands in the moſt eminent point of view; that when death ſeems to extinguiſh him, he enjoys a more happy ſtate of exiſtence; that he is never more joyful, than when he ſeems to be in affliction; never richer, than when he ſeems poor, becauſe all his happineſs conſiſts in the rectitude of his mind. He affirms, that a good man ſhould never ſeek his own advantage at the expence of others; but on the other hand prefer their intereſt to his own. He enlarges upon this maxim, and ſhews, that it is contrary to the example and laws of Chriſt, to the laws of nature, the dictates of conſcience and the civil laws, to injure our neighbour, for our own intereſt. Upon this principle he determines, that a Chriſtian in caſe of a ſhipwreck ought not to take away a plank from his brother to ſave his own life; nay he proceeds ſo far as to aſſert, that it is not lawful for him to kill a robber, who attacks him; and to eſtabliſh this for a general maxim, that we ought never to preſerve our own lives at the expence of another's. The Philoſophers had advanced, that a wiſe man, tho' he were ſure of not being diſcovered, would not do any thing contrary to his duty; but as they had no example to prove this, they had recourſe to the fable of Gyges's Ring. St. Ambroſe confirms this by the examples of David and John the Baptiſt. In ſhort he evinces, that men ought in all caſes to prefer honeſty to profit. Upon which principle he maintains, that a man, who has a great ſtore of corn, ought not to keep it in his granaries, in order to ſell it dearer in time of famine. He condemns the practice of thoſe, who endeavour to inſinuate themſelves into the favour of others, that they may be their heirs. This is criminal in every perſon, but more eſpecially in the Clergy, who ought to leave dying perſons a full liberty of making their wills, as they think proper, without pretending to direct or influence them. He concludes this book with ſeveral obſervations with regard to friendſhip; which, he tells us, ought always to give way to honeſty. We ſhould never favour our friend, when he is in the wrong, or do him injuſtice, when he is in the right. We ought to reprove him, when he acts amiſs; to uſe the utmoſt freedom and ſincerity with him, and to ſupport him in all his exigencies. The foundation of friendſhip is a due regard to the Deity, without which there is no ſecurity of the continuance of it. Religion preſerves it, and forms an equality among friends. There can be no ally thoſe which he wrote to the Emperors. We ſee, that the writer of them was a man educated under all the advantages of a court, and who had all that free and eaſy air which is only to be gained by a knowledge of the world. The manner which we may obſerve in moſt of his actions and diſcourſe, ſhews him to have been uſed very early to the management of great affairs, and that he had all the qualifications neceſſary for it. He was but very moderately learned, eſpecially in Eccleſiaſtical Matters. But as he lived in an age, wherein learning was cultivated, and had a penetrating genius, and a great facility of expreſſing himſelf, and continually employed himſelf in reading the Fathers, who wrote before him, he was enabled to diſcharge his function with great ſucceſs. This is the character which Du Pin gives of him (q). But Eraſmus tells us, that he has a great many quaint and affected ſentences, and frequently very obſcure ones (r). And it is certain, that with all his virtues, his writings are intermixed with many ſtrange and peculiar opinions [H]. It is ſaid, that he borrowed many things from the writings of the Greek Fathers, and eſpecially St. Baſil Archbiſhop of Cæſarea, who claimed them as his own (s); Baronius therefore is of opinion, that this was the reaſon why St. Jerom ſuſpended his judgment concerning him, leſt on the one hand he ſhould be accuſed of flattery, and on the other the truth ſhould give offence (t). However the Antients in general had a great opinion of his writings (u), and particularly St. Auguſtin, and Pelagius himſelf [I]. Paulinus wrote his life, and dedicated it to St. Auguſtin. This life is prefixed to St. Ambroſe's works, the beſt edition of which is that publiſhed by the Benedictine Monks in two volumes in folio at Paris in 1686 and 1690.

(21) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, p. 258.

(22) Ibid.

(23) Idem, pag. 260.

(q) P. 291, 292, tom. 2.

(r) Ambroſius habet argutias, & ſententias affectatas, ſæpe etiam ſubobſcuras. See Biſhop Wilkins's Eccleſiaſtes, or, The Gift of Preaching. 9. edit. London 1718, p. 128.

(s) Oudin, Comment. de Script. & Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. Sæc. 4. fol. 655. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

(t) Ne in alterutram partem aut adulatio in me reprehendatur, aut veritas. St. Hierom. de Viris Illuſt. cap. 124.

(u) See Proſper in Chronic. & Caſſian. l. 7. De Incarnatione Domini.

no friendſhip between perſons of different tempers; and it ought not to be founded upon intereſt; for friendſhip is a virtue, and not a mere traffic for advantage. It muſt be abſolutely exempt from every ſpecies of flattery (24). This work of St. Ambroſe was highly eſteemed formerly, and thoſe, who had leiſure, made abridgments of it, ſeveral of which are ſtill extant.

(24) Id. p. 262, 263.

But Mr. Barbeyrac, in the Preface to his French tranſlation of Puffendorf's treatiſe of the Law of Nature and Nations, appears to have no favourable opinion of St. Ambroſe's writings in general, and particularly of this work de Officiis. "We ſee, ſays he (25), "by the title and the manner in which he treats his "ſubject, that he deſigned to imitate Cicero's Offices. "But notwithſtanding what has been ſaid by a Lu"theran Divine (26), who publiſhed this work at "Wirtemberg in the year 1698, with ſome diſſerta"tions of his own; if we except the particular prin"ciples of the Goſpel, which Ambroſe has ſcattered "about in his work, with the examples and paſſages "of holy Scripture, which he perpetually cites, but "generally very ill applied, I don't ſtick to ſay, that "the copy is infinitely below the original, whether "you conſider the purity and eaſineſs of the ſtyle, or "the compoſition of the work, and the order of the "things contained in it, or the ſolidity of the "thoughts, and the juſtneſs of the reaſoning." Mr. Barbeyrac proceeds then to ſome particular objections againſt that work.

(25) See a Pamphlet intitled, The Spirit of Eccleſiaſtics of all Sects and Ages as to the Doctrines of Morality, and more particularly the Spirit of the antient Fathers of the Church, &c. p. 26, &c.

(26) Fortſchius, a Profeſſor.

[H] His writings are intermixed with many ſtrange and peculiar opinions.] He maintained, that all men indifferently are to paſs thro' a fiery trial at the laſt day; that even the juſt are to ſuffer it, and ſo be purged from their ſins; but the unjuſt are to continue in it for ever: that the faithful will be raiſed gradually at the laſt day, according to the degree of their particular merit (27); that the bow, which God promiſed Noah to place in the firmament after the deluge, as a ſign, that he never intended to drown the world again, was not to be underſtood of the rain-bow, which can never appear in the night, but ſome of viſible token of the Almighty. He carries the eſteem of virginity and celibacy ſo far, that he ſeems to regard matrimony as an indecent thing. He ſays very plainly (28), that before the law of Moſes, and that of the Goſpel, adultery was not forbidden. And he ſeems to condemn lending money to uſury, without any exception (29).

(27) See Dallæus de vero uſu Patrum, pag. 270, 271.

(28) Lib. 1. De Patriarch. Abrah. c. 4. See Daillè, de Uſu Patrum. p. 270, 271.

(29) De Tobia, c. 3. and 15. See Noodt, de Pœn. & Uſur. l. 1, c. 4. 10. p. 64.

[I] Particularly St. Auguſtin, and Pelagius himſelf.] The former makes uſe of his authority againſt the Pelagians (30), and tells us, that he was an excellent Miniſter of the Goſpel, whom he reverenced as a father, having been baptized by him; and that he himſelf had experience of his firmneſs in all circumſtances and dangers for the defence of the Catholic Faith both in ſpeech and writing; and that all the Roman Empire acknowledged the ſame. Adhuc audi alium excellentem Diſpenſatorem, quem veneror ut patrem, in Chriſto enim per Evangelium ipſe me genuit, & eo Chriſti miniſtro lavacrum regenerationis accepi. Beatum loquor Ambroſium, cujus pro Catholicâ fide gratiam, conſtantiam, labores, pericula, ſive ſermonibus, ſive operibus, & ipſe ſum expertus, & mecum non dubitat orbis prædicare Romanus. Pelagius likewiſe extols him very highly in a paſſage quoted by St. Auguſtin (31), where, he ſays, that the Roman Faith ſhines forth with a peculiar luſtre in his writings, and that he is the Flower of the Latin Writers; and that his doctrine and exact knowledge of the Scriptures could never be attacked by his enemies themſelves. Ambroſius Epiſcopus, in cujus præcipuè libris Romana elucet fides; qui ſcriptorum inter Latinos flos quidem ſpecioſus enituit; cujus fidem & puriſſimum in Scripturis ſenſum ne inimicus quidem auſus eſt reprehendere. T.

(30) Contra Julian. l. 1. c. 3.

(31) De Gratia Chriſti, c. 43.

☞AMBROSIUS (AURELIANUS) a famous General of the Britons in the fifth Century, was a man of the firſt quality, and of Roman extraction (a). It is the common opinion, that he was ſon to one of the Britiſh Monarchs, elected after the departure of the Romans (b). And ſome writers aſſert that he was ſon to Conſtantine, who was beheaded by Honorius. Gildas likewiſe informs us (c), that his parents had a ſovereign character, and were killed with their purple about them. As he was very young when his father died, he lay under no ſuſpicions from thoſe who ſucceeded to the crown. But when Vortigern was elected King, a powerful party declaring in Ambroſius's favour, he ſought every method to deſtroy the young Prince. This obliged Ambroſius to retire to Aldroen King of Armorica, who was related to him, where he waited for a favourable opportunity to put himſelf at the head of his party. Vortigern's jealouſy of him induced him to call in the aſſiſtance of Hengiſt the General of the Saxons. But this proved the ſource of great calamities to the nation, ſo that the Britons had recourſe to King Aldroen, who ſent over Ambroſius to relieve them [A].

(a) Gild. Hiſt. p. 16, 17.

(b) Rapin, Hiſt. of England, tranſlated into Engliſh by Mr. Tindal, vol. 1 B. 2. p. 97. 1ſt edit. 8vo, 1728.

(c) Ubi ſupra. See Beda, Eccleſ. Hiſt. Gentis Anglor. l. 1. c. 16.

them [A]. His ſucceſs was ſo conſiderable, that he had the weſtern part of the Kingdom, which was divided by the Roman High-way, called Watling-ſtreet, aſſigned to him. Hengiſt finding himſelf diſappointed of all his hopes of becoming maſter of Britain, endeavoured to effect that by fraud, which he could not accompliſh by force, and maſſacred in the moſt treacherous manner imaginable three hundred Britons [B]. This ſtruck the people with the utmoſt horror and indignation againſt the Saxons; and as Vortigern was ſuſpected to have been an accomplice in the maſſacre, becauſe he alone was ſpared, all his ſubjects in general deſerted him, and went over to Ambroſius. As ſoon as he ſaw himſelf ſole Monarch of the Britons he aſſumed the Imperial Purple, after the manner of the Roman Emperors, and created Arthur, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the war by many brave actions, a Patrician (d). He likewiſe renewed the war againſt the Saxons, and defeated Ella, one of their Generals, in the year 487. He is ſaid to have conven'd the Princes and Great Men at York, where he gave orders for repairing the churches which had been deſtroyed by the Saxons [C]. We have different accounts in authors concerning his death [D]. Gildas the Hiſtorian (e) extols him highly on account of his probity, temper and courage.

(d) Rapin, pag. 107, 108.

(e) Ubi ſupra.

AMELIA

[A] Had recourſe to King Aldroen, who ſent over Ambroſius to relieve them.] Guithelin, Archbiſhop of London, and Head of Ambroſius's party, repreſented to the Britons, that as this King had always ſhewn himſelf ready to aſſiſt them, they might now expect it upon ſo great an exigence; and ſince Vortigern, and Vortimer his ſon were not to be depended upon, it was neceſſary to invite over Ambroſius, who was deſcended from illuſtrious anceſtors, and had all the qualifications proper to reſcue them from their preſent danger. The Britons immediately give their aſſent to him; and the Archbiſhop went over to the King of Armorica, who ſent ten thouſand men, under the command of Ambroſius, who all landed ſafely at Totneſs. This General was received with prodigious demonſtrations of joy; but this joy was not univerſal; for Vortimer's party, which was ſtill powerful, conſidered Ambroſius as one, who was come to uſurp the Crown under pretence of defending it. And Vortimer himſelf threatned to puniſh ſeverely thoſe, who ſhould join with him. This occaſioned inteſtine diviſions among the Britons, and expoſed them to the common enemy. "Ambroſius and Guithelin, ſays Mr. Rapin (1), ſeeing "this a fit time for their purpoſe, plotted together "the ruin of Vortigern and Vortimer. They began "with repreſenting to their party, that the ſon was "a Prince without courage or experience, and the "father an enemy to the Nation, as appeared by his "ſtrict ſtriendſhip with the enemies of the State, not "to mention his exceſſive liberalities, which obliged "his ſubjects to take the adminiſtration of affairs "out of his hands. That in vain therefore were "their preparations to drive out the foreigners, if "they did not firſt deſtroy theſe two domeſtic ene-"mies, who were in arms only to favour and aſſiſt "them. On the other hand, Vortigern and Vor-"timer told their friends, that Ambroſius under a "pretence of aſſiſting, was come to ſubdue them. "That the Archbiſhop was an ambitious man, who "ſought to put the crown on the head of Ambro-"ſius, only to get the adminiſtration of the govern-"ment in his own hands; than which, by reaſon "of his arrogance, nothing could more be dreaded "by the Britons. That they muſt ſhut their eyes "not to ſee that the deſigns of theſe two Heads of "their party were directly oppoſite to the good of "the Kingdom: That inſtead of marching their freſh "troops againſt the Saxons, they had done nothing "ſince their arrival, but plotted how they might op-"preſs thoſe, who were in arms for the defence of "their country." Theſe animoſities became ſo violent between the two parties, that they produced a civil war, which continued till the year 465. But at laſt they came to an agreement, that the Kingdom ſhould be divided between them.

(1) Ubi ſupra, p. 101.

[B] Maſſacred in the moſt treacherous manner imaginable three hundred Britons.] As ſoon as the peace was concluded between Hengiſt and the Britons, he affected to appear extremely well ſatisfied with it, and acted in ſuch a manner, as ſhewed, that he had no deſign of enlarging his conqueſts. The latter, charmed with this moderation of his, and unwilling to provoke a Prince, whoſe valour they had ſo often experienced, lived in the moſt friendly manner imaginable with him; and their averſion to the Saxons by degrees entirely vaniſhed. "Hengiſt omitted "nothing to keep them in a ſecurity, which would "draw them into the ſnare he was preparing for "them. He let them know, that his intent being to "live in perfect union with them, he ſhould be "glad from time to time to keep up a good under-"ſtanding between the two nations by mutual in-"terviews for pleaſure. Vortigern, a paſſionate "lover of ſuch diverſions, joyfully accepted his "propoſal, and went ſo far as to pay him the firſt "viſit, accompanied with three hundred of his prin-"cipal ſubjects. Hengiſt received them ſeemingly "in a very reſpectful and cordial manner. His en-"tertainment was ſplendid, and nothing was want-"ing, that might divert them. But towards the "end of the feaſt, the ſcene was changed. Hengiſt "had ordered matters ſo, that having artfully raiſed "ſome ſubject of diſpute, at a certain ſignal given, "the Britiſh Lords were all murthered. Vortigern, "becauſe Hengiſt had need of him, was only made "a priſoner. In vain did he complain of his baſe "treachery; he could not obtain his liberty without "delivering up to the Saxons a great part of his "Dominions bordering upon Kent, which they di-"viding into three Counties, gave them the names "of Suſſex, Eſſex, and Middleſex, which they re-"tain to this day. Not content with this, Hen-"giſt ravaged the neighbouring country in a merci-"leſs manner, and got poſſeſſion of London, Lin-"coln, and Wincheſter (2)." Dr. Stillingfleet (3) doubts of the truth of this maſſacre, becauſe Witichind relates one like it, which happened in Germany. But this does not prove, but that it might be repeated in Britain (4). Ambroſius is ſaid to have built Stone-Henge near Salisbury in memory of it.

(2) Ibid. p. 106, 107.

(3) Antiquit. of Britiſh Churches.

(4) See Note on Rapin, ubi ſupra, p. 107.

[C] Where he gave orders for repairing the churches deſtroyed by the Saxons.] This is related by Geoffrey of Monmouth; Dr. Stillingfleet (5) is of opinion, that this account is agreeable to matter of fact. For the Britons having a conſiderable reſpite, after their advantage in the field, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Ambroſius and the reſt of the people ſhould endeavour to rebuild their churches, and reſtore the conveniences and honour of Religion. This relation of Geoffrey is confirmed by Matthew of Weſtminſter (6), who gives an ample account of the great zeal of Ambroſius in encouraging the Clergy, repairing the churches, and bringing divine worſhip into the former condition of ſolemnity and order. Beſides Geoffrey tells us, that in a Council of the Britons, Ambroſius gave directions for two Metropolitans to ſupply the vacancies of York and Caerleon, Sampſon being promoted to the firſt, and Dubricius to the other (7). This Matthew of Weſtminſter affirms was done in 490, and tells us, that they both flouriſhed to the year 507. He adds, that Sampſon being afterwards obliged to leave the country went over to Armorica, and was made Archbiſhop of Dole (8).

(5) Ubi ſupra, c. 5. p. 328.

(6) Flores Hiſtor. A. D. 438. See Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. 1. B. 1. Cent. V. p. 56. ed. Lond. 1708.

(7) Stilling. p. 329.

(8) See Collier, ubi ſupra.

[D] We have different accounts in authors concerning his death.] We are told by Geoffrey of Monmouth (9), and Matthew of Weſtminſter (10), that twelve years after Ambroſius's ſucceſs againſt Ella, King of the South-Saxons and his ſons, Paſcentius, one of

(9) Lib. 5. c. 6.

(10) Flores Hiſt. A. D. 497.

AMELIA a city of Italy, called anciently Ameria, is ſituate between the Tiber and the Nera. Cato tells us, that it was founded nine hundred and ſixty four years before the war with Perſeus (a): As this war began the 581ſt year of Rome, Ameria, according to Cato's computation, was founded three hundred and eighty three years before Rome. Feſtus calls the founder of this city Amirus. It is plain from ſome inſcriptions, that this city was one of thoſe which the Romans called Municipium, as appears alſo from Tully's excellent Oration for Roſcius Amerinus. It acquired the right of a Roman Colony in the reign of Auguſtus (b). This city ſtands in a fruitful ſoil, and the hills that ſurround it, are covered with beautiful vineyards (c). It is not certain that the vines of Ameria were eſteemed by the Ancients. As I make this article only to rectify that of Moreri, I ſhall not enlarge upon it [A]. Leander Albertus ſtands in need alſo of correction [B].

(a) Apud Pliniu, lib. 3. c. 14.

(b) Cluverii, Ital. Antiq. lib. 2. cap. 7.

(c) Leandri Alberti, Deſcriptio Italiæ, p. 144.

Vortigern's ſons hired a Saxon to poiſon him at Wincheſter, which accordingly took effect. But we have a very different account given us by Henry of Huntington (11), and other Hiſtorians. They inform us, that in the battle which was fought between Ambroſius and Cerdick, a Saxon General, the former broke through the right wing of the Saxons, commanded by Cerdick, and routed them. But whilſt he was eagerly purſuing his victory againſt a body which made but a faint reſiſtance, Kenrick the ſon of Cerdick having had the ſame advantage over the right wing of the Britons, inſtead of purſuing them fell upon Ambroſius in the flank, and by that means gave Cerdick time to rally his troops, and complete the victory by an entire defeat of the Britons. Ambroſius, enraged to ſee the victory wreſted from him, exerted himſelf to the utmoſt to renew the battle. He threw himſelf, in ſpite of his age and infirmities, into the midſt of the enemy, in order to animate his troops; but all his efforts, as Mr. Rapin obſerves (12), ſerved only to crown his glorious life with an honourable death. This happened in the year 508, near a place called by the Saxons, Cerdick's Ford, and now Chardford in Hampſhire. The name of Nazaleod, given by Hiſtorians to the Britiſh Monarch ſlain in this battle, occaſioned ſome writers to imagine that it was not Ambroſius. But Mr. Rapin prefers the opinion of Camden, and ſeveral other good Authors, who aſſert the contrary, "All "the Hiſtorians, ſays he (13), agree that Ambroſius "fell in battle. Now after the beginning of this "Prince's reign, there was no other battle, except "this, wherein a Britiſh Monarch was ſlain. Be"ſides, Hiſtorians would not have omitted to mark "the time of the death of ſo famous a Prince, had "it happened in ſome other action". Mr. Rapin's aſſertion, that all Hiſtorians agree that Ambroſius fell in battle, is too general; for we have ſhewn above, that Geoffry of Monmouth, and Matthew of Weſtminſter tell us, that he was poiſoned at Wincheſter. T.

(11) Lib. 2. See Rapin, ubi ſupra, p. 117.

(12) Pag. 118.

(13) Ibid.

[A] I make this article only to rectify that of Moreri.] I. No author ever wrote, that Ameria was built, during the war with Perſeus. II. Pliny does not maintain, that it was built before this war, in 964. He only tells us that Cato ſaid ſo. III. Tully did not plead the cauſe of a Player born in this city: the Roſcius Amerinus for whom he pleaded was not Roſcius the Player, whoſe cauſe he likewiſe defended. IV. Theſe words of Virgil, Atque Amerina parant lentæ retinacula viti (1), i. e. "Amerian bands "ſuſtain the feeble vine," do not prove that the vines of Ameria were eſteemed in his time. The meaning of this verſe is, that the country about this city abounded with twigs, as pliable as oſiers, which were of great uſe in dreſſing the vines. Virgas de quibus vites religantur: quæ virgæ abundant circa Amerinum oppidum.... Alii genus ſalicis dicunt, diſpari colore à cætera ſalice; nam eſt rubra, & ad connectendum aptior, quia præter morem lenta eſt (2). i. e. "The twigs with which vines are faſtned grow in "plenty about Ameria.... Others ſay it is a kind of "oſier different from the other ſorts, in being red, and "fitter to faſten vines on account of its pliableneſs."

(1) Virgil. Georgi l. 1. ver. 265. This verſe is quoted very wrong by Moreri, Atque Amerina parent lenta retinacula viti.

(2) Servius in Virgil. ibid.

[B] Leander Albertus ſtands in need alſo of correction.] He makes Cato ſay that Ameria was rebuilt above 900 years before the war with Perſeus, and that it was firſt built by the Veientes, a people of Tuſcany, under the conduct of Ameroe daughter of the Italian Atlas and of Pleione. He ſuppoſes Pliny to have ſaid, that it was built 964 years before the war with Perſeus; and thus makes Cato and Pliny the broachers of two different opinions. Afterwards he endeavours to reconcile them in the following manner: The Chronology of the one, ſays he (3), agrees pretty well with the Chronology of the other. Cato ſays, above 900 years before the war with Perſeus, and Pliny writes, 964 years before the ſame war, They may therefore be eaſily reconciled. Tho' the one uſes the word rebuilding, and the other the word building, we muſt not infer from thence, that they contradict one another; for the word condere uſed by Pliny is indifferently taken both for founding and repairing. Theſe frivolous and chimerical diſputes will vaniſh, to the author's ſhame, by recurring to Pliny; for it is plain, that he broaches no opinion, but only ſays, Ameriam..... Cato ante Perſei bellum conditam annis 964 prodidit (4). i. e. "Cato "has related that Ameria was built 964 years before "the war with Perſeus."

(3) Leandri Alberti, Deſcriptio Italiæ, p. 144.

(4) Plinius lib. 3. cap. 14. in fine.

AMELIUS, a Platonic Philoſopher in the third Century, was a native of Tuſcany. His true name was Gentilianus; and he preferred the ſurname of Amerius to that of Amelius. He was twenty four years a diſciple of Plotinus at Rome, from whence he retired to Apamea, a city of Syria, and was there when Plotinus died. He adopted one Juſtin Heſychius of the ſame city (a); and this is, without doubt, what gave occaſion to the miſtake of Suidas, who wrote, that Amelius was a native of Apamea. That Author is equally miſtaken in aſſerting that Porphyrius was a diſciple of Amelius [A]. What we know for certain is, that Plotinus had a great eſteem for his diſciple Amelius, and that Amelius anſwered that eſteem with a particular veneration for Plotinus.

(a) Porphyrius in vita Plotini.

[A] Suidas aſſerted, that Porphyrius was a diſciple of Amelius.] Porphyrius himſelf writes, that when he began to ſtudy under Plotinus, Amelius had been eighteen years under the diſcipline of that Philoſopher (1). He adds, that he was Amelius's fellow-diſciple for the ſpace of ſix years, and that afterwards they both retired from Rome; he for Sicily, and the other for Apamea. They remained in their reſpective retirements, at leaſt to the death of Plotinus. Now as Porphyrius was then about thirty eight years of age, and had raiſed a greater reputation in Rome, than Amelius, it is not at all probable, that he became his diſciple. To this may be added, that Amelius in dedicating to him his Apology of Plotinus, deſires him to excuſe and correct his faults (2). To conclude, is not the ſilence of Porphyrius an argument of great weight againſt Suidas? Porphyrius is perpetually mentioning Amelius in the Life of Plotinus; and is it likely he would never have ſpoke of his ſtudying under him, had he really been his diſciple? Suidas perhaps was miſled by Theodoret, who calls Amelius, the Head of the School of Porphyrius (3).

(1) Ibid.

(2) Ibid.

Plotinus. When he began his ſtudies under that celebrated Philoſopher, he only knew what he had learnt of one Lyſimachus (b); but by his diligence and application got the ſtart of all his ſchool-fellows. He knew part of the inſtructions of Numenius by heart, and had been at the pains to collect and copy moſt of them. He made alſo copious collections of whatever he heard in the Philoſophical Conferences, and compoſed out of them an hundred treatiſes, with which he preſented his adoptive ſon. This is all he had brought to light when Porphyrius came to Rome (c); that is, after he had improved under the diſcipline of Plotinus for the ſpace of eighteen years. Afterwards he compoſed forty Books againſt Zoſtrianus, one of thoſe antient Hereticks both in matters of Philoſophy and Religion, who introduced ſuch a monſtrous mixture of the doctrines of the Goſpel and of the Philoſophers. The many Hereticks that ſprung up in the time of Plotinus, obliged him to arm againſt them. The province he choſe for himſelf was to defeat the Gnoſtics, while Amelius ſhould engage Zoſtrianus, and Porphyrius attack the pretended revelations of Zoroaſter. After this Amelius hearing that Plotinus was accuſed, as if he had adorned himſelf with the ſpoils of Numenius, drew his pen in defence of his maſter, and in three days time compoſed a work, which he dedicated to Porphyrius, and entitled, Of the Difference between the Doctrine of Numenius, and that of Plotinus. What I ſhall now relate is a ſtrong proof of the value Plotinus had for Amelius. As Plotinus was not at all fond of making a ſhew of his abilities, he was apt to leave ſome doubts in the minds of his hearers, and wanted, in ſome meaſure, to be forced, before he would diſplay the beſt of his Learning. This made Porphyrius propoſe ſeveral objections to him, in order to prove, that our ideas are not in our intellect (d). This is what Father Mallebranche has revived in our time. Plotinus, after reading the objections, deſired Amelius to anſwer them. The Opponent replied; Amelius anſwered his reply; and at laſt Porphyrius, having thoroughly underſtood the principals of Plotinus, yielded, and read his retractation in a full auditory. It is true that Longinus, whoſe judgment was ſo ſure, and criticiſm ſo formidable, thought his works too verboſe, but nevertheleſs placed him among the few Philoſophers, whoſe writings, in his opinion, deſerve any kind of eſteem [B]. He wrote a long letter againſt that which he received from Amelius concerning the nature of the Philoſophy of Plotinus. Amelius was very much addicted to Paganiſm, and a great obſerver of new Moons and Feaſts (e) [C]. In one of his books he quoted the beginning of St. John's Goſpel to confirm Plato's doctrine. This paſſage is cited by Euſebius (f), but more at length by Theodoret (g) and St. Cyril (h).

(b) He was a Stoic Philoſopher.

(c) In 263.

(d) Διὸ καὶ ἀντιγράψας προσήγαγον διακῦναι πειρώμενος, ὅτι ἔξω τῶ ὑφίστα τὸ νόημα. Porphyr. in vita Plotini.

(e) Life of Plotinus by Porphyrius.

(f) Præparat. Evangel. lib. 11. cap. 19.

(g) Græc. Affection. lib. 11. pag. 500.

(h) In Julian. lib. 8.

(3) Theodor. Græcar. Affect. p. 500.

(4) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empires tom. 3. pag. 1084. Bruſſels edition.

rius (3), that is, according to Mr. Tillemont's explanation, of the School of Plotinus, in which Porphyrius ſtudied (4). Suidas likewiſe ſuppoſes him to have been Porphyrius's Maſter, continues Mr. Tillemont; and we may alſo reckon Caſtricius Firmus among his diſciples, a man.... who did Amelius all manner of ſervice. So that this modern author falls into the miſtake of Suidas, and goes even farther; for it manifeſtly appears from the Life of Plotinus, to which he refers us for what regards Caſtricius, that Plotinus was alive, while Caſtricius ſhewed at Rome ſuch an attachment for Amelius. Now it is certain, that while the latter was at Rome, he had no diſciples; but was himſelf a diſciple of Plotinus, and did not ſet up altar againſt altar.

[B] Placed him among the few Philoſophers, whoſe writings in his opinion deſerve any eſteem.] Their number is ſo ſmall, that it compriſes but two authors, Plotinus and Amelius; ſo much the greater was the glory of Amelius; nevertheleſs his works loſt very ſoon the eſteem they were in at firſt. Eunapius puts them in the ſame rank with thoſe of the two other fellow-ſtudents of Porphyrius, and pronounces the following ſentence againſt them all: Συγγράμματά γε αὐτῶν περισώζεται, λόγος δὲ αὐτῶν οὐδεὶς (5). Quorum extant quidem volumina, ſed exiſtimatio prope nulla eſt (6). i. e. "Theſe writings are "preſerved, but are in no eſteem." The reaſon he gives for this is, that they were without any politeneſs of language, and meerly dogmatical.

(5) Eunap. in vitis Sophiſtarum, p. 20.

(6) I quote the tranſlation of Hadrianus Junius, in which the word prope ſeems ſuperfluous.

[C] He was a great obſerver of new Moons and Feaſts.] I am ſenſible, that inſtead of new Moons it would be better to ſay with Marſilius Ficinus (7), the firſt days of the month; but I thought my expreſſion would be eaſier underſtood. Porphyrius expreſſes himſelf thus: Φιλοθύτου ὁ γεγονότος τοῦ Ἀμελίου, καὶ τὰ ἱερὰ κατὰ νουμηνίαν, καὶ τὰς ἑορτὰς ἐκπερίοντος (8). Now who can tax the Philoſophers with irreligion? Had they been impious and irreligious men, they would never have writ ſo much in favour of Paganiſm; nor would they have been the only writers, whom the Chriſtians had to ſtruggle with; for as to their Prieſts, their ignorance diſpenſed them from meddling with matters of that nature.

(7) Per calendas ſacra faceret, ſays he.

(8) Porphyr. in vita Plotini.

☞AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAI (ABRAHAM NICHOLAS) was born at Orleans in February 1634 (a). As after all our inquiries we could not procure an account of his life, we muſt content our ſelves with laying before the reader what we know of his writings. We may affirm however, that he was eſteemed at the court of France, ſince he was Secretary of an Embaſſy, which that court ſent to the Commonwealth of Venice, as appears by the title of his tranſlation of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent. Another circumſtance of his life, which we learn from Mr. Bayle (b) is, that having been ſo bold as to publiſh ſome unwelcome truths, he was impriſoned in the Baſtile (c). The celebrated author who relates this, has not thought fit to tell us the particular reaſon for which Amelot was impriſoned. The firſt works which he printed were, The Hiſtory of the Government of Venice, and that of the Uſcocks (d). In the year 1683 he publiſhed three works, by which he gained much reputation, namely, a French tranſlation of Machiavel's treatiſe intitled (El Principe); The Prince; of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent; and (Diſcours Politiques ſur Tacite) Political Diſcourſes upon Tacitus (e). Theſe works were very well received by the publick; and indeed it appeared by them, that Amelot was a man very well ſkilled in Politicks, who wanted

(a) Moreri, Paris ed. 1732.

(b) Nouvel. de la Repub. des Let. 1684. tom. 1. p. 457.

(c) A Caſtle at Paris, which ſerves as a priſon for ſtate-criminals.

(d) A people of Croatia, who to avoid the tyranny of the Turks, fled to Segna or Zeng in Hungary: they are the greateſt Pyrates that infeſt the Gulf of Venice.

(e) Bayle, ubi ſupra, pag. 521. Theſe three books were printed at Amſterdam.

wanted neither that genius neceſſary to conceive the moſt elevated thoughts, nor the terms requiſite to expreſs them in their full ſtrength (f). He did not prefix his own name to the two laſt works we have mentioned, but diſguiſed himſelf under the name of La Mothe Joſſeval. No ſooner was his tranſlation of Father Paul publiſhed in France, but it was violently attacked by the Partizans of the Pope's unbounded power and authority; on which occaſion Amelot himſelf tells us a particular, which deſerves to be taken notice of in a Remark [A]. It is well known how different the opinions are, which the oppoſite parties of the church of Rome entertain concerning this work of Father Paul. At Rome he is ſtiled a notorious Heretick, whilſt the Venetians openly declare in his favour. In France Amelot's tranſlation had a wonderful ſucceſs; all the zealous aſſertors of the liberty of the Gallican Church, promoted the ſale of that book to the utmoſt of their power, though at the ſame time three different memorials were preſented to have it ſuppreſſed (g). But this ſerves only to ſhew the merit not only of the book itſelf, but alſo of the notes and reflections, which the Tranſlator has added to it, and that the reader may form a notion of thoſe reflections, we ſhall give ſome of them in a Remark [B]. When the ſecond edition of this tranſlation was publiſhed, it was violently attacked by the Abbé St. Real, in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Bayle, dated October 17, 1685 (h). Amelot defended himſelf in a letter to Mr. Bayle (i), and St. Real replied (k). Theſe authors writing againſt one another with great vehemence, and uſing ſome expreſſions which ſeemed too harſh, and unbecoming men of letters,

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Bayle, Rep. des Let. Octob. 1688. pag. 1169.

(i) Rep. des Let. Dec. 1685, pag. 1361. and Ouvr. de St. Real. tom. 3. p. 190.

(k) In his Works, tom. 3. p. 194.

(h) Inſerted in Bayle's Rep. des Let. Oct. 1688. p. 1170. and in St. Real's works, tom. 3. p. 186. Hague ed. 1676.

Mr.

[A] Amelot tells us a particular, which deſerves to be taken notice of.] "A Batchelor of the Sorbonne, ſays he, asked one of my Printers, whether "the tranſlator of Father Paul was a good Catholic. If I had been preſent, I would have anſwer'd, as children do in the Catechiſm, Yes by the "Grace of God; and I ſhould not have told a lye; for "I am a good Catholic, as well as my whole family "has been above three hundred years. But this Gentleman's queſtion came from an higher quarter; "as he ſhewed ſoon after, by ridiculouſly railing a-"gainſt me, tho' he did not know me, and againſt "my book, which he had not read; for he did "not ſcruple to ſay, that whoever dared to read it, "was excommunicated ipſo facto. Therefore I think "myſelf obliged to declare, that I do firmly believe, "whatever Church Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Roman "commands me to believe, and whatever the holy "general Council of Trent has decided concerning "matters of faith. But having been educated and "inſtructed in the Gallican Church, and in the "Univerſity at Paris, of which I have the honour "to be a member, I do and will always believe, "what they believe and teach concerning matters of "diſcipline and eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction. This is "all that I intend to anſwer to three abuſive memorials that have been preſented by the Monks "againſt my book, the greateſt fault of which is, "that it is not favourable to their intereſt; but "this, I think, is not a ſufficient reaſon to favour "them ſo far as to ſuppreſs it (1)." Thus far Amelot; whence it appears, that he did not much regard the clamours of the Monks; tho' in the Preface to his tranſlation, in which he undertakes the defence of Father Paul againſt Cardinal Pallavicini, he tells us, that he will not attempt a formal apology for that famous Hiſtorian, not being inclined to enter the liſt againſt a mob of Friars, who bark againſt Father Paul, without knowing why. Another conſequence we may draw from his declaration is, that being a good Catholic, he is ſo much the more to be depended upon in what he ſays againſt thoſe of his own communion, or in favour of the Proteſtants.

(1) Amelot's declaration after his Preface, in the 2d and 3d ed. of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent.

[B] We ſhall give ſome of his reflections in a remark.] Father Paul obſerves (2) from St. Jerom, that the primitive Churches were in an ariſtocratical ſtate, being governed by the common Presbytery. Whereupon Amelot tells us, that "the Presbytery "was the Eccleſiaſtical College, in which the Biſhop indeed preſided, or was the Head, but which "exerciſed together with the Biſhop, the power "of ordaining, as well as of judging, as appears "from theſe words of St. Paul to Timothy (3), Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given "thee by Prophecy, with the laying on of the hands "of the PRESBYTERY. And Father Paul ſays (4), "that the ancient government of the Church was de-"mocratical, ſince all the faithful had a ſhare in "the moſt eſſential deliberations: But that government was really ariſto-democratical (5)." In the next page he makes another reflection, which is very free for a Roman Catholic. Father Paul ſays, that the Pope was highly pleaſed with the conduct of ſome Convents, which exempted themſelves from the juriſdiction of their Biſhop, to depend only upon the See of Rome. But by exemptions the Pope acquired in every city a great many ſubjects, who being protected by him, became in their turn his protectors, and the greateſt defenders of his power and authority. "Therefore, ſays Amelot (6), one cannot have too "watchful an eye upon the Monks, who form im-"perium in imperio, a foreign Monarchy within "the very bowels of the ſtate." This obſervation holds good with regard to the whole Roman-Catholic Clergy, who are more dependant on the Pope than on their ſecular Prince; and the ſame may be ſaid of thoſe Proteſtant Eccleſiaſtics, who would have the Clergy independent on the Civil Magiſtrate. In another place Father Paul (7) gives us the ſubſtance of a Remonſtrance drawn up by the Roman Catholic Divines in Germany, in which they repreſented the lawfulneſs of the Clergy's marriage. Upon which Amelot obſerves, that "the celibacy of "the Clergy is a Law eſtabliſhed to prevent the alie-"nating of the Church's eſtate; for which reaſon "Pope Pelagius was unwilling to confirm the Biſhop "of Saragoſa in his See, becauſe he had a wife and "family; and when he confirmed him, it was on "condition that his wife and children ſhould inhe-"rit nothing of his eſtate, but what he was poſ-"ſeſſed of at the time of his confirmation (8)." We ſhall not diſpute the reaſon alledged by Amelot, for the celibacy of the Clergy, tho' it appears by the example of England and Ireland, that the alienating of the Church lands may be prevented notwithſtanding the marriage of the Clergy. But there is another reaſon for their celibacy in the Church of Rome, which is, that married men are generally more attached to their country, and cannot ſo eaſily quit it, as ſingle men, who for that reaſon can better ſtudy how to obey or pleaſe the Court of Rome, tho' in oppoſition to their own Sovereign: And if they are obliged to leave their country, they can do it eaſily, as leaving no dear pledges behind them; which cannot be ſaid of married people. Their wives and children may generally ſpeaking be conſidered, as a kind of ſecurity to the whole ſtate of their loyalty and faithful behaviour. It is therefore the intereſt of the State, tho' not of what is called the Church, that Clergymen ſhould be married. Tho' Mr. Amelot's reflections be for the moſt part juſt and accurate, yet he is ſometimes miſtaken; of which we will give but one inſtance. Speaking (9) of Philip Landgrave of Heſſe, who was baſely deceived and impriſoned by Charles V. Amelot tells us, that "Charles put into the treaty which he made "with the Landgrave an n inſtead of a w, namely "einich which ſignifies with, inſtead of ewith which "ſignifies without; ſo that the condition, on which "the Landgrave ſurrendred himſelf to the Emperor, "became

(2) Hiſt. du Conc. de Trente, Liv. 2. p. 202.

(3) 1 Tim. iv. 14.

(4) Traité des Benefic. § 16. p. 83.

(5) Amelot, Trad. du Conc. de Trente, ubi ſupra, marginal note •.

(6) Ibid. p. 1203. note *

(7) Ibid. Liv. 8. p. 799.

(8) Amelot, ibid. note d.

(9) Ibid. p. 252. note d.

Mr. Bayle took upon him to ſuppreſs what was only perſonal, and to ſoften what appeared too violent (l). We ſhall give ſome account of this diſpute in a Remark [C]. In 1686 he printed La Morale de Tacite, De la Flaterie, in 12mo. In his critical diſcourſe prefixed to this work he gives us his opinion concerning the ſeveral Tranſlators and Commentators on Tacitus; he anſwers particularly d'Ablancourt, and ſhews by ſeveral inſtances, that he has committed a great many blunders in his tranſlation. In the courſe of his work, Amelot has collected about a hundred particular facts and maxims, which repreſent in very lively colours the genius of the Court Flatterers, and the dreadful force of their poiſoning diſcourſes. In the year 1690 he publiſhed at Paris a French tranſlation of the ſix firſt books of Tacitus's Annals, with hiſtorical and political remarks, which are not all equally conſiderable or juſt [D]. Beughem appears to be miſtaken, when he aſcribes to Amelot a tranſlation of Machiavel's Political Diſcourſes upon the firſt Decad of Livy [E]. Amelot having employed his pen for ſeveral years together in writing on hiſtorical and political ſubjects, thought fit to try his ſtrength on religious ſubjects, and in 1691 he printed at Paris a tranſlation of Palafox's Theological and Moral Homilies upon the Paſſion of our Lord, in 12mo. Palafox was firſt Biſhop of Angelopolis, or Los Angeles in America, and afterwards of Oſma in Old-Caſtile. He had intitled his book on Chriſt's Paſſion, The injuſtice committed in the death of Jeſus Chriſt our Redeemer (m). But that title not ſounding well in French, Amelot thought fit to alter it. That book contains ſeveral juſt obſervations, of which the reader will perhaps be pleaſed to ſee ſome inſtances [F]. We ſhould have obſerved that in 1684 Amelot printed at Paris a French tranſlation of Baltaſar Gracian's Oraculo Manual, with the title of L'homme de Cour, in 4to (n). He has illuſtrated his tranſlations with ſeveral remarks, which contain either curious facts, or beautiful ſentences borrowed from Pliny the younger, Tacitus, &c. In his preface he defends Gracian againſt Father Bohours's

(l) See Bayle, ubi ſupra, pag. 1174, and 1360.

(m) We don't find that book in the catalogue given by Nic. Antonio (Art. Joannis de Palafox) except it be included in the general title of Homilias de Tempore.

(n) And in 12° at the Hague.

"became by that alteration contrary to his expec"tation, which was that he ſhould be kept without
"perpetual impriſonment; whereas the word einich
"made the words ſignify, with perpetual impriſon-
"ment." Thus far Amelot; it appears by this that he did not underſtand High Dutch, and that he truſted to his memory when he related this circumſtance, which he has entirely perverted; for it is thus. The Landgrave ſtipulated that he would ſurrender himſelf on condition that he ſhould not be impriſoned. The words were without any impriſonment; (Einige in High Dutch ſignifying any). But in the writings that were drawn up, they put Eiwige inſtead of einige, ſo that the words were, without perpetual impriſonment, of which the Landgrave did not take notice: and he was no ſooner in the Emperor's power, but he was put in priſon, and Charles thought, he ſhould ſufficiently perform his promiſe, if the Landgrave was ſet free but an hour before his death.

[C] We ſhall give ſome account of his diſpute with Abbé St. Real.] The Abbot having ſaid, that Amelot's tranſlation of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent is full of errors, mentions four, which in his opinion are very material. The firſt indeed is a miſtake of the tranſlator, who finding theſe words in his author, Fu da tutti allegato il Concilio Laodiceno, Innocentio Primo Pontifice, il terzo Concilio Carthaginenſi, & Gelaſio Papa, placed the Council of Laodicea under Pope Innocent I, and the third Council of Carthage under the Pope Gelaſius; whereas Father Paul ſpeaks of four different decrees, viz. thoſe of the Council of Laodicea, of Pope Innocent I, of the third Council of Carthage, and of Pope Gelaſius. Amelot owned this miſtake. The two next errors laid to his charge, are ſo trifling, if they be errors, that they do not deſerve any notice. The laſt is ſomewhat more conſiderable; Amelot tranſlates theſe words Diſciplina de Coſtumi, by the word Diſcipline, inſtead of the Doctrine concerning manners (10). In anſwer to this critic, he aſſerts, that there is no difference between the ſenſe of the word Diſcipline, and that of the Doctrine concerning manners; and that if he had ſaid the Diſcipline of the Church, or the Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, it would have been equivocal. But this is no ſatisfactory anſwer, as St. Real very juſtly obſerved in his reply (11); for in French the word Diſcipline always ſignifies the particular laws and practices, which relate to the governing or regulating the Church, and never what we call Morality les mœurs. However, ſuch inconſiderable errors ſhew that Amelot's tranſlation muſt be good, ſince if it had given room for a more ſevere cenſure, St. Real, who intended to diſcredit it, would not have ſpared it.

(10) La Doctrine des Mœurs.

(11) In his Works, tom. 3. p. 197, 198.

[D] His remarks upon Tacitus are not equally conſiderable or juſt. Here follows the judgment of an ingenious author upon Amelot. "Mr. Amelot de "la Houſſaye, ſays he (12), has made a large col"lection of political Obſervations upon Tacitus, as "far as the thirteenth Annal inclusive; ſome of "them are pertinent and uſeful, but many of them
"inſipid and little worth. The very firſt which he "makes is flat and poor, Dèſque la Royauté com- "mence a degénerer en Tyrannie, le peuple aſpire à
"la liberte, i. e. ("As ſoon as a King's government
"begins to degenerate into tyranny, the people
"long for liberty.)" Mr. Gordon adds ſome other inſtances of Amelot's reflections, which, it muſt be owned, are trite, and void of force and inſtruction: But it cannot be denied that the greateſt part of them are of another ſtamp. As to Amelot's tranſlation, the ſame judicious author juſtly prefers it to that of d'Ablancourt (13), who if he has any advantage over Amelot, it is only with regard to his ſtyle and language, which is a very ſmall advantage. Mr. de Beauval (14) ſays, "If Amelot's tranſlation is more "accurate than that of d'Ablancourt, it may be doubt-
"ed whether it be more polite." But who would not chuſe accuracy before politeneſs?

(12) Gordon, Diſcourſes upon Tacitus, prefixed to his tranſlation, Vol. 1. Diſc. 2. Sect. 12. p. 28.

(13) Ibid. p. 30.

(14) Hiſt. des Ouvr. des Sçavans, 4 Juin, 1690, p. 465.

[E] Beughem is miſtaken, when he aſcribes to Amelot a tranſlation of Machiavel's Political Diſcourſe upon the firſt Decad of Livy (15).] He refers us for this to the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, T. xx. pag. 328; and indeed we find there an account of that tranſlation, and Amelot is mentioned as the tranſlator of Machiavel's Prince; to which tranſlation he added notes of his own, and alſo juſtified his author againſt thoſe, who have attacked him. It is ſaid in that account, that the new tranſlator of Machiavel's Political Diſcourſes, has alſo endeavoured to juſtify him; but it is not ſo much as inſinuated that Amelot is the tranſlator. So that Beughem muſt be guilty here of a miſtake.

(15) In his Bib. Erud. Curioſa, tom. 2. p. 9.

[F] Some obſervations contained in Palafox's book of Homilies.] It contains very uſeful inſtructions for perſons of every rank, and eſpecially for Biſhops, Preachers, Governors, and Judges. The author having explained Judas's crime and his misfortune, exhorts them to avoid, as a dangerous precipice, all covetouſneſs, and meddling with money. In explaining that particular paſſage of the xith chapter of St. John's Goſpel, where the Apoſtle deſcribes the Council, which the Princes of the Prieſts and Phariſees held againſt Jeſus Chriſt, and in which it is ſaid, What do we? For this man doeth many miracles &c. (16), the Biſhop of Angelopolis is of opinion, that theſe words were pronounced by Caiaphas only, (16) Vers. 47.

Bouhours's Critique, and tells us why he aſcribes this book to Baltaſar, and not to Laurence Gracian; on which occaſion he relates ſeveral particulars concerning that author and his writings, of which he gives us a catalogue. Baltaſar Gracian was a Spaniſh Jeſuit, who died in 1658, aged fifty four years (o). Beſides his own obſervations Amelot has alſo added to this work of Gratian ſeveral chapters taken from this author's other books, either entire, or the ſubſtance of them. He alſo tells us, that he has altered the title, becauſe it appeared too oſtentatious and hyperbolical; and that that of L'homme de Cour, The Courtier, was more proper to expreſs the ſubject of the book, which is a kind of a political code, or a collection of the fineſt maxims for regulating a court-life. Frederic Leonard a bookſeller at Paris, propoſed in the year 1692 to print a collection of all the treaties of peace between the Kings of France and all the other Princes in Europe, ſince the reign of Charles the Seventh to the year 1690. Amelot who had read theſe treaties publiſhed a ſmall volume in 12mo (p), containing a preliminary diſcourſe upon theſe treaties, full of political reflections, by which it appears, that Politicks may be defined the art of impoſing upon men as well as of governing them. For Amelot ſhews, that moſt Princes, when they enter into a treaty, think more how they may evade the performance of what they agree to, than how they ſhall accompliſh their promiſes; on which occaſion he tells us two facts, which deſerve to be communicated in a Remark [G]. Amelot alſo publiſhed a new edition of Cardinal D'Oſſat's Letters (q) in 1697, with ſeveral obſervations of his own, which, as he himſelf tells us in his advertiſement or preface, may ſerve as a ſupplement to the Hiſtory of the reigns of Henry III and Henry IV Kings of France." Laſtly, we have hiſtorical and political obſervations by Amelot, inſerted in the ſecond volume of the Recueil des Traitez de Paix &c. publiſhed at the Hague in four volumes in folio, by James Bernard, afterwards Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Miniſter at Leyden. But we own we cannot tell whether theſe Obſervations be different from the preliminary diſcourſe mentioned above; Beughem diſtinguiſhed them (r), but I very much ſuſpect him to be miſtaken. Amelot, notwithſtanding his great genius, his elevated mind, and his elaborate works, had the fate of moſt of the learned men, to live in want; and would have fallen into the utmoſt diſtreſs, had it not been for the help he received from a certain Abbot, diſtinguiſhed by his learning and merit, as much as by his birth, if we may credit the continuators of Moreri's Dictionary (s). Amelot died at Paris in December 1706, being then very near ſeventy three years of age. We need not give here his character. He has himſelf drawn his own picture in his works, and the few abſtracts we have given of them in our remarks are ſufficient to give thoſe readers, who have not read his books, an idea of his genius.

(o) Bayle, Repub des Lett. 1684. tom. 1. p. 521, 523.

(p) It contains but 290 pages.

(q) Reprinted at Amſterdam in 1732, in five vol. 12mo, with ſome additional remarks of Amelot, not to be found in his edition of 1697.

(r) See his Bibliographia Eruditorum Curioſa, tom. 2. p. 10. and tom. 4. p. 4.

(s) In the word Amelot.

only, who preſided in the Council, and that the text aſcribes them to the whole Council, becauſe they all admitted the Preſident's opinion, without contradicting it. Whereupon he makes a long diſcourſe, to ſhew how dangerous it is, that one, who preſides in any aſſembly, ſhould open his opinion firſt, becauſe by this he awes in a manner the other Judges, and deprives them of the liberty of giving their advice (17). This is a very juſt obſervation, and ſhould be taken notice of in more than one place.

(17) Journal des Savans, tom. 19. anno 1691, pag. 245. Amſterd. edit.

[G] Two facts, which we will communicate to the reader.] The firſt is as follows: Lewis XI King of France hearing of the powerful league that was forming againſt him, deſired Francis Sforza, to adviſe what conduct he ſhould follow. Sforza anſwered him, that to render the league ineffectual, he muſt refuſe nothing of what they demanded of him; and that when he ſhould have granted to every one in particular what they asked, it would not be difficult for him to wreſt it afterwards out of their hands. Lewis hearkened to this advice, and it ſucceeded according to his wiſhes. The ſecond fact is this: Ferdinand V ſurnamed the Catholic was ſo far from concealing his treacherous manner of acting under any ſpecious pretence, that he uſed to glory in it; and one day as Quintana told him, that Lewis XII King of France complained, that Ferdinand had impoſed upon him twice already. Twice! cried he with an oath, he lies, a drunkard as he is, for I have impoſed upon him more than ten times (18). We need not make any reflection upon theſe facts. We ſhall only add what Villeroy, Secretary of State to a King of France, ſaid, "The intention of Princes "and of Miniſters of State is not, nor ought to be "ſubject to what they ſign even with their own "hand, but rather, what they ſign muſt be ſub-"ject to their intention." This may be a very good maxim; but the only fault of it is, that it renders all treaties uſeleſs and of no effect.

(18) Biblioth. Univerſ. & Hiſt. tom. 22. p. 517, 518.

☞AMELOTE (DENNIS) born at Saintes in the year 1606, was a famous writer amongſt the Roman Catholicks. He was ordained Prieſt in 1632, and maintained a great correſpondence with the Fathers of the Oratory (a); he wrote the life of Charles de Gondren the ſecond Superior of that Congregation, and publiſhed it at Paris in 1643 (b). In that life he ſaid ſomething of the famous Abbot of St. Cyran, which very much diſpleaſed the Gentlemen of Port-Royal [A], who to be revenged of him publiſhed a Libel againſt him intitled, Idee generale de l'Eſprit & da Livre du P. Amelote; that is, "A general repreſentation of F. Amelote's genius, and of his book." He was

(a) A Congregation of Prieſts, founded by Philip of Neri at Rome, about the year 1575, and in France the Oratory of Jeſus was founded by Cardinal Berulle in 1611. The Fathers of this Congregation are all Prieſts, and employ their time in teaching youths, and inſtructing young Clercs deſigned for Seminaries, Miſſions, &c.

(b) French Moreri, Article AMELOTE.

(1) John du Verger de Hauraxe, Abbot of St. Cyran, has gained a great reputation not only by his own writings, but alſo by the fame of his diſciples, Mr. Arnauld, Nicolle, and other Gentlemen of Port-Royal.

[A] In the life of Gondren Father Amelote ſaid ſomething of the Abbot of St. Cyran (1), which very much diſpleaſed the Gentlemen of Port-Royal.] We have not ſeen that life, but what Father Simon relates concerning the opinion, which Father Gondren had of the Abbot of St. Cyran, deſerves to be taken notice of. He tells us, that a friend of Father Amelote asked him one day, what he propoſed by attacking with ſo much vehemence the doctrine of the Port-Royaliſts, ſince he was a Thomiſt, and the principles of the Thomiſts appeared to ſeveral perſons more rigid and ſevere than thoſe of the Janſeniſts. --- Father Amelote, without anſwering this queſtion, ſaid, that Father Gondren, whoſe diſciple he had been, had given him a very ſtrange account of the Abbot of St. Cyran, and of his whole party.--- That was so much exasperated by this Satyr, that he did all that lay in his power to injure them [B], so that they received more prejudice from him alone, than from the whole Society of the Jesuits (c). Father Amelote made a French translation of the New Testament with annotations, in four volumes 8vo, which were printed in the years 1666, 1667, and 1678. This translation is not very exact, if we may credit F. Simon, who tells us (d), that it contains some very gross blunders, especially in what relates to Criticism. This translation was dedicated to Mr. de Perefixe Archbishop of Paris, and the Translator used the Gentlemen of Port-Royal very ill in his discourse to that Prelate [C]; for which reason when the bookseller intended to print a new edition of Father Amelote's New Testament (e) after his death, the Port-Royalists used all their endeavours to suppress the dedication [D], which was done accordingly (f). When Father Amelote's translation was published, the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, who had also one ready for the press, published a report that F. Amelote had seen theirs, and even pretended to tell how their manuscript had been communicated to him. And indeed, says F. Simon, these two translations are very much alike in several places; but he adds, that those who have seen F. Amelote's original manuscript, assure us that it is full of rasures, and corrections of his own hand writing. His principal care in this translation was to find expressions more proper and elegant than those of the former versions; for which reason he committed his work, or at least the first part of it into Mr. Conrart's hands, to polish it, and correct whatever he should judge to be inelegant or improper. Mr. Conrart was a Protestant [E], perfectly skilled in the French tongue, but understood neither Greek nor Latin; so that it happened sometimes, that when he endeavoured to give a period a better turn, he dropped the true sense of the text, or at least enervated the force of it, for want of consulting the original [F] (g). F. Amelote also wrote

(c) F. Simon, Bibl. Critique, tom. 3. ch. 16. p. 182.

(d) Ibid. ch. 17. p. 183, 184.

(e) This second edition was printed in 1688, 4to.

(f) F. Simon, ibid.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 188, 189.

That Father Gondren found by the conversations he had with that Abbot, that he held unaccountable opinions concerning several matters of Religion, and openly ridiculed a great many decrees of the Council of Trent, saying very freely, that this Council was only an assembly of School-men, little acquainted with the doctrine of the Fathers, and especially with that of St. Austin (2). It is no wonder that Father Amelote should have offended the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, in his Life of Father Gondren, where he speaks of the Abbot of St. Cyran, since he enterained such a notion of that Abbot, who was the Hero of the Jansenists. We shall observe by the way, that the friend, who had that conversation with Father Amelote, is no other than Father Simon himself (3).

(2) Simon, Bib. Critique, tom. 3. ch. 17. p. 187, 188.

(3) Ibid. p. 186. in the note.

[B] Father Amelote did all that lay in his power to hurt them (the Gentlemen of Port-Royal.)] They had made a new French translation of the New Testament, and desired to have it printed. For that purpose they endeavoured to procure an approbation from some Doctors of the Sorbonne, and a privilege from the King. They had indeed some friends among the Doctors of Divinity, but at the same time very powerful enemies. And as to the privilege, it was impossible for them to prevail with the Chancellor Seguier to grant them one, for he hated them; and Father Amelot, whose advice the Chancellor generally followed in matters of Religion, broke all their measures (4), not only out of zeal for what he thought the true doctrine, or out of aversion to the Port-Royalists, but also out of a view to his own interest, since being shortly to publish his own translation, he was probably afraid, that the other would prejudice the sale of his.

(4) Id. ibid. ch. 16. p. 181, 182.

[C] He used the Gentlemen of Port-Royal very ill in his discourse to that Prelate (Archbishop Perefixe.] "You will be confirmed, says Father Amelote to "that Prelate, in that zeal, which obliged you to "take up the holy arms to defend the true Grace "of God, and the decrees of the holy See, against "the new heresy (5): You will daily strengthen "your self against these blind rebels, whose fury, "impostures, and calumnies add new splendor to "your glory, which they endeavour to cast a blemish upon. They place you in the same rank "with the Athanasius's and the Hilary's, when they "abuse you in the same manner as the Arians did "those great and holy Bishops (6)." Father Amelote's whole Dedication was full of such harsh and abusive language; but it was in return for the ill usage he had met with from these Gentlemen in the piece, which we have mentioned in the text of this article.

(5) That of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, and the other Jansenists.

(6) Simon, ubi supra, ch. 17. p. 185.

[D] The Port-Royalists used all their endeavours to suppress the Dedication.] Archbishop Perefixe, to whom Father Amelote had dedicated his translation, being dead, when the Bookseller undertook to publish a new edition of that translation, the Gentlemen of Port-Royal represented to him, that the old Dedication could be of no use, since the person to whom it was addressed was dead; that it was therefore his interest to make a new Dedication to the new Archbishop (7). This was a very prevailing reason with the Bookseller, who was Printer to that celebrated Prelate; so that he consented to what was desired of him (8). The same Gentlemen had already endeavoured to have that Dedication suppressed before Father Amelote's death. The famous Mr. Arnauld desired a Doctor of the Sorbonne, called Diroys, to speak to a friend of Father Amelote (9), and to represent to him, that the disputes concerning Jansenism being ended, and peace having been restored to the Church, the Gentlemen of Port-Royal were no longer to be styled heretics or rebels. Father Amelote answered that he would readily consent to the suppressing of his Dedications, if his antagonists would suppress the Libel they had published against him (10), and retract what it contained. Mr. Diroys having made his report to Dr. Arnauld, that Doctor, who was not much inclined to retract his libels, as Mr. Simon observes, promised, that it should never be reprinted. Upon which Father Amelote said, that if it was so, things should remain as they were. The author from whom we have extracted these particulars, adds (11) that Mr. Nicole is the author of the Libel against Father Amelote, and that to draw his character better, he went himself to pay a visit to that Father, who did dot know him personally.

(7) Mr. de Harlai.

(8) Simon, ibid. p. 184.

(9) That friend was F. Simon himself, see the quot. (3).

(10) Idee generale de l'Esprit & du Livre du P. Amelote.

(11) F. Simon, ubi supra, pag. 185, 186.

[E] Mr. Conrart was a Protestant.] "Do not wonder, says Father Simon (12), at Amelote's conduct, "who being a man of great piety, and rigidly orthodox, committed a book of such importance (13) "to the revisal of a Calvinist, who was extremely "zealous for his Religion. Weak men only can be "offended at this kind of correspondence. The illustrious Father Senauld had shewed Father Amelote the way. Tho' he was very eloquent for "his time, yet he used to give his works to Mr. Conrart to revise them. The Minister Claude has done "the same, and has very much improved by Conrart's directions, who was an excellent Master in "the French tongue." Why should the difference of opinions in matters of Religion hinder learned men from conversing with one another, and from giving one another all the assistance, in their power? None but bigots can object against this.

(12) Ibid. p. 189.

(13) His translation of the New Testament.

[F] He dropt the force of the text &c. for want of consulting the original.] Mr. Conrart had been wrote an Abridgment of Divinity, a Catechiſm for the Jubilee, and a kind of Chriſtian Manual for every day (Journée Chretiéne) (b). Though this Father had always been a very zealous Anti-Port-royaliſt, yet he was very ill rewarded for all his labour and trouble. Towards the end of his life he ſued for a very ſmall Biſhoprick (i), and had the misfortune of meeting with a refuſal, though he had all the qualities requiſite to a Biſhop. He could not forbear complaining of this uſage to his friends, telling them that thoſe, whom he had often ſerved very effectually, had been very cold to him on this occaſion (k). He entered into the Congregation of the Oratory in 1650, and continued amongſt them till his death, which happened in 1678 (l).

(b) Moreri, ubi ſupra.

(i) That of Sarlat in the Province of Perigord.

(k) F. Simon, ubi ſupra, ch. 16. p. 182.

(l) Moreri, ubi ſupra.

deſired by the Proteſtant Synod in France, to correct the ancient tranſlation of the Pſalms, in verſe; but it was ſoon found that he was not equal to ſuch a task, notwithſtanding all his abilities, becauſe he did not underſtand Hebrew. If it be ſaid, that Marot ſucceeded very well in the tranſlation of thoſe Pſalms, which he undertook to put in verſe, tho' he was unacquainted with the original, we may anſwer that Marot was directed by the learned and judicious Vatablus. If the French Proteſtants had had a Vatablus among them, they would have found a Marot (14).

(14) Simon, ubi ſupra, pag. 190, 191.

AMES or AMESIUS (WILLIAM) an Engliſhman, and Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker in 1622. He was greatly engaged in diſputes with the Arminians, and wrote ſeveral books againſt them [A]. He is one of the reformed Divines who has treated caſes of conſcience with moſt exactneſs and method. It is almoſt needleſs to mention that he wrote againſt Bellarmin (a); for every one knows that all the Proteſtant Controvertiſts of his time levelled their writings againſt the works of that Jeſuit. Ameſius compoſed a book entitled Medulla Theologiæ; and ſome pieces againſt the Socinians, againſt Metaphyſics, and in favour of Puritaniſm, of which he was himſelf a ſtrict profeſſor [B]. He publiſhed this laſt work in England in 1610. I ſhall not mention his Lectures on the Pſalms, nor his explanation of the Epiſtles of St. Peter. He did not die in 1639, as Henning Witte affirms in his Diarium Biographicum. The Epiſtle Dedicatory which was prefixed to his Lectures on the Pſalms in 1635, ſhews that he was dead at that time. The ſame Preface acquaints us, that after having ſerved the Univerſity of Franeker twelve years, he obtained leave to accept of the Profeſſorſhip at Rotterdam.

(a) His book is intitled, Bellarminus enervatus.

[A] He wrote ſeveral books againſt the Arminians.] He began his diſputes, by word of mouth, with Grevinchovius, Miniſter at Rotterdam; but not having diſcharged his mind, becauſe interrupted, he continued them by Letters, and publiſhed both his own objections, and his adverſary's anſwers. The redemption of man by the death of Jeſus Chriſt, and Election founded upon the previſion of faith, were the ſubjects of the controverſy. Grevinchovius publiſhed another edition of their diſpute, at Rotterdam 1615, 4to. Ameſius replied, and entitled his reply, Reſcriptio ſcholaſtica & brevis, &c. He alſo wrote a book entitled, Coronis ad Collectionem Hagienſem, wherein he confutes the anſwers given by the Arminians to the Dutch Miniſters. His Anti-Synodalia contains remarks on the Scripta Synodalia of the Remonſtrants. It was printed at Franeker in 1629, and at Amſterdam in 1646, 12mo, &c.

[B] He wrote in favour of Puritaniſm, of which he was a ſtrict Profeſſor.] Some extracts of the book he publiſhed againſt Epiſcopacy in 1610, are to be found in the Preface I quote (1). This Preface informs us, that in his opinion there were no honeſt men in England, beſides the Puritans. They diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their averſion to theatres, oaths, balls, games, entertainments; the others were all gameſters, drunkards, ſwearers, and children of Belial. There was no medium between theſe two extremes, either to aboliſh Epiſcopacy, or to call back the Church of Rome from hell. Hi ſcilicet ſoli inter Anglos viri boni, ſimplices, quadrati; quos ex ſcelerifugio ſit cognoſcere, quibus ex repudio ſpectaculorum, juramentorum, chorearum, alearum, & commeſſationum, inditum ſit nomen Puritanorum: reliqui verò inſignes aleatores potatores ſtrenui, religionis officia ſuſque deque habentes, verſati inſtitores Papiſtarum, ambitionibus pravis corrupti, juratores impii, homines denique vani, injuſti, turpes, & omnes filii Belial. . . . Adeoque vel è medio tollendum ementitum hunc Epiſcoporum ordinem, vel denuo Papam revocandum ab orco (2).

(1) Grevinchovij Præf. Diſſertationis Theolog. de duabus Quæſtionibus, &c.

(2) Idem, fol. iii.

AMESTRIS, wife of Xerxes King of Perſia. See the firſt note of the Article MASISTES.

☞AMMIRATO or AMMIRATI (SCIPIO) an eminent Hiſtorian of the ſixteenth Century, was born at Lecca a city in the territory of Otranto in the Kingdom of Naples the 27th of September 1531. The family of Ammirato was originally of Florence, from whence it was expelled by the Gibelins. It produced ſeveral eminent perſonages, and among the reſt Thomas Biſhop of Lecca. Our Author was the ſon of James Ammirato. He began his ſtudies at Poggiardo, and continued them at Brunduſium, and in 1547 he went to Naples, in order to go through a courſe of Civil Law. But his natural inclination directed him chiefly to polite Literature, which expoſed him to ſome inconveniences [A]. Being at Barri with his father, he was deputed by that city to manage ſome affairs at Naples, which he executed with great ſucceſs.

[A] His natural inclination directed him to polite Literature, which expoſed him to ſome inconveniencies.] He made but very little progreſs in the ſtudy of the Law during the four years, which he continued at Naples; he had an averſion to it, and applied himſelf to it only out of obedience to his father. Beſides he was not well qualified naturally for that ſtudy, on account of the weakneſs of his memory, which would not permit him to retain the Laws, which were read to him. But above all he found ſo many charms in Poetry and the Belles Lettres, as engaged his whole attention. Being ſeized by a dangerous diſtemper, he was obliged to return to his native city, where he found his father highly diſpleaſed at the little progreſs, which he had made in the Law, and was ordered by him to return to Naples, as ſoon ceſs. This began to inſpire him with ſentiments of ambition, which he thought he could not gratify by any method more effectually than by entering into the church; upon which he took holy orders from the Biſhop of Lecca, who had a great value for him, and gave him a Canonſhip in his church. This Prelate ſent him likewiſe to Rome, in order to ſollicit the Pope in his favour, and to procure him ſomething of more importance than a Biſhoprick. But the latter had maintained too vigorouſly the prerogatives of Biſhops in the Council of Trent, to gain the leaſt credit with the Popes, and ſo Ammirato could obtain nothing. This diſappointment, and the impoſſibility which he laboured under of continuing at Rome for want of money, put him upon a deſign of going to Venice, and entering into the ſervice of ſome Embaſſador, in order to ſee the ſeveral courts of Europe, that he might fix where he had the greateſt proſpect of ſucceſs (a). But he was diverted from this deſign, and returned to Lecca [B]. Marcellus Cervini being choſen Pope in 1555, under the name of Marcellus II, Ammirato, who knew that Nicolao Majorano Biſhop of Molfetta, a city near Barri, had been formerly an intimate friend to the Pope, perſuaded him to go to Rome, and congratulate him upon his election, being in hopes that by attending the Biſhop in this journey, he might procure ſome place under the nephews of that Pope. But as they were preparing for this journey, the death of Marcellus broke all his meaſures, and deſtroyed his hopes. Upon this he retired to a country ſeat of his father's, where he applied himſelf very intenſely to his ſtudies. But having afterwards formed other ſchemes for his advancement, he was diſappointed in them likewiſe [C]. At laſt he determined to return to Naples, in order to engage again in the ſtudy of the Law, and to take his degrees in it. His reliſh for this profeſſion was not in the leaſt increaſed, but he thought that the title which he might procure would be of advantage to him in ſome reſpects. However he did not abſolutely execute this deſign, for he had not been ſix months at Naples, before he grew weary of it, and entered ſucceſſively into the ſervice of ſeveral Noblemen as Secretary to them, though he continued but a ſhort time with them. Upon his return to Lecca he was appointed by that city to go and preſent a petition to Pope Pius IV in their favour, which office he diſcharged with ſucceſs. As ſoon as he returned to Lecca he was invited by the city of Naples to ſettle there, and write the Hiſtory of that Kingdom. But the cold reception which he met with from the Governors, who had ſent for him, ſoon diſguſted him ſo highly, that he left the city with a reſolution never to return. They repented afterwards of their neglect of him, and uſed all poſſible means to recall him, but he continued inflexible. He went therefore to Rome, where he procured himſelf a great many friends, but not one patron to ſupport him; and having travelled over part of Italy he went to Florence, where he reſolved to ſettle, being engaged by the kind reception which the Grand Duke gave to Men of Letters. He was appointed to write the Hiſtory of Florence, and he received many inſtances of that Prince's bounty, which was increaſed after his work was publiſhed; for he was preſented ſoon as he was recovered. But if he proved ſo deficient in the ſcience, which his father had ſo great a fondneſs for, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on the other hand by his knowledge of polite Learning. His merit in this point raiſed him a great many admirers, and at the ſame time excited the envy of others; who endeavouring to find out ſome opportunity or other to injure him, met with one very favourable to their purpoſe, when he was obliged by a ſecond fit of ſickneſs to return to Lecca. There was publiſhed juſt at that time a Satire againſt the principal Men of the city; and this was immediately aſcribed to Ammirato. He being apprehenſive of the conſequences of ſuch an affair, thought proper to retire to Venice; but as his father would not ſupply him with money; he was ſoon obliged to return to Lecca, where the falſe report, which had been raiſed againſt him, was already cleared up (1).

(a) Mem. pour ſervir a l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 4. p. 101, &c. edit. de Paris, 1728.

(1) Ib'd tom. 3. p. 99, 100.

[B] He was diverted from his deſign, and returned to Lecca.] Alexander Contarini, who had heard of him, perſuaded him to change his reſolution of travelling, and engaged him to continue with him at Venice; which he conſented to, and during his reſidence there had an opportunity of contracting a friendſhip with the learned Men of that city. But fortune, which had been hitherto very unfavourable to him, would not permit him to continue long in that eaſe, which he enjoyed with his patron. The wife of the latter, who uſed to take a great deal of pleaſure in our author's converſation, having ſent him a preſent as a token of her friendſhip for him, ſome ill-natured perſons went to the husband, and repreſented that action to him in the moſt aggravating terms imaginable. This was ſufficient to excite the reſentments of a jealous husband. Ammirato was obliged to fly away immediately, in order to ſave his life, and return to Lecca. When he came thither, he could not find his father, who was then at Barri; upon which he went thither, but met with a very cool reception from him, his father being extremely angry to find him in no probable way of making his fortune, becauſe he had neglected the ſtudy of the Law, which he reproached him with very frequently.

[C] He was diſappointed in them likewiſe.] Cardinal Caraffa being choſen Pope under the name of Paul IV, his hopes of preferment began to revive; and he attended upon that Pope's niece to Rome, who profeſſed a great regard for him. But he ſoon after found himſelf diſappointed in his views by the diſputes, which happened in the Pope's family; and the reports, which were told to his miſtreſs concerning him, enraged her ſo prodigiouſly againſt him, that ſhe diſmiſſed him in the moſt ignominious manner. Upon this he returned home to his father, who received him, as he uſed to do, with all the terms of reproach imaginable, and aſcribed all his misfortunes to his ill conduct. But our author applied himſelf then to the ſervice of the Church, of which he was Canon, without neglecting however the ſtudy of polite Literature, which was the greateſt conſolation to him amidſt all the circumſtances of his diſtreſs. He likewiſe took the pains to form an Academy, to which he gave the name of Tranſformati. He ſpent four years in this calm and ſtudious manner of life; after which he applied himſelf to the Queen of Poland, Bonna, Sforza, the widow of Sigiſmond I, King of Poland, by the advice of John Laurentio Papacoda, who was afterwards Marquiſs of Capurſo (2); but the expectations, which he had conceived from that quarter, did not continue long; and he returned to his former retirement.

(2) Ibid. tom. 10. p. 135.

ſented with a Canonſhip in the Cathedral of Florence. The eaſy ſituation in which he was now placed, gave him an opportunity of applying himſelf more vigorouſly to his ſtudies, and writing the greateſt part of the works which we have of him [D]. He died in that city the 30th of January 1600, in the ſixty ninth year of his age (b). (b) Ibid. p. 107.

Some

[D] The works, which we have of him.] He wrote the Arguments in Italian verſe of the Canto's of Arioſto's Orlando Furioſo, which were firſt publiſhed in the edition of that Poem at Venice in 1548, in 4to. Il Dedalione, Dialogo del Poeta, at Naples, 1560 in 8vo, and in the third volume of his tracts, 1642. Dedalion is one of the two interlocutors in this Dialogue, in which the author enquires into the qualifications, which are neceſſary to form a Poet. Iſtorie Fiorentine dopo la Fondatione di Firenze inſino all' anno 1574; i. e. "The Hiſtory of Florence "from the foundation of it to the year 1574," printed at Florence 1600, fol. in two volumes. Con l'aggiunte di Scipione Ammirato il Giovane; i. e. "With the Additions of Scipio Ammirato the "Younger," at Florence 1647, in 4to. Scipio Ammirato the Younger, who made theſe additions to this work, and publiſhed ſeveral other works of our author, was named Chriſtoforo del Bianco, and was of Montajone, a caſtle in Tuſcany. He was not the leaſt related to Scipio Ammirato; but the latter having a great affection for him, made him a companion in his ſtudies, and left him all his eſtate by will, on condition that he would aſſume his name and arms. Diſcorſi ſopra Cornelio Tacito; i. e. "Diſcourſes upon Cornelius Tacitus," at Florence, 1598 in 4to, at Venice 1599 in 4to, at Helenopolis 1609 in 4to, at Padua 1642 in 4to. It was tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed under this title; Scipionis Ammirati Diſſertationes politicæ; ſive Diſcurſus in Cornelium Tacitum nuper ex Italico in Latinum verſi, quibus præmiſſæ ſunt ex eodem Tacito excerptæ Digreſſiones politicæ à Chriſtophoro Pflugio Equite Miſnico; i. e. "Scipio Ammirato's political "Diſſertations or Diſcourſes upon Cornelius Tacitus, "lately tranſlated from the Italian into Latin; to which "are prefixed political Digreſſions extracted from "the ſame Tacitus by Chriſtopher Pflug Knight of "Miſnia," at Helenopolis 1609 in 4to. This work was extremely well received. Theſe Diſcourſes of our author upon Tacitus are forty two in number. Father Rapin gives the following judgment of them (3). Having obſerved that Tacitus had given a wrong turn to the minds of a great many perſons, by inclining them to the ſtudy of Politics, he proceeds thus: "It was upon this rock, that ſo many "Spaniſh Writers, as Antonio Perez, and ſo many "Italians, as Machiavel and Ammirato have ſplit. It "is only on account of the pompouſneſs of his ſtyle, "that the latter pleaſes the Wits ſo extremely, "whereas he is very little regarded by men of judg- "ment; for he deters them by the ſubtlety of his "reaſonings and reflections. He is ſo obſcure in his "expreſſions, that a perſon muſt be very converſant "in his ſtyle in order to underſtand his ſentiments. "His manner of criticizing is fine of itſelf; but it "becomes very groſs on account of the perpetual "inclination that he has to criticize upon every "thing. He has a great deal of ſublimity, becauſe "his ſentiments are always grand; by this means he "impoſes upon the reader; and he writes, not ſo "much with a deſign to pleaſe and inſtruct, as to "raiſe our admiration. There is ſomething great "and uncommon in him, which makes us excuſe "moſt of his faults; but there are ſo many things "to be ſaid of this author both for and againſt him, "that it is impoſſible to end, when we have once be- "gun. He is a man of a peculiar kind of genius, which "is of no uſe but for oſtentation; and can never "be reduced to the ordinary converſation of man- "kind." Mr. Amelot de la Houſſaye, who quotes part of this judgment of Rapin in his critical Diſcourſe upon the authors, who have written Commentaries upon Tacitus, prefixed to his tranſlation of the Annals of that Hiſtorian, adds as follows: "I find however a great deal of good ſenſe in his "reaſonings and reflections, and I cannot but ac- "knowledge, that his maxims are very juſt and "proper. He affects very often to maintain prin- "ciples directly oppoſite to thoſe of Machiavel, "which he cenſures in a variety of places. What "is remarkable in him is, that tho' he quotes him "almoſt every where, and always with a deſign to "confute him, yet he never mentions him by name, "but only by the title of Autor de Diſcorſi, i. e. the "Author of the Diſcourſes, ſometimes by that of Al- "cuno, i. e. a certain perſon, and Altri, i. e. others, "as if he were afraid of caſting a blemiſh upon "his writings by naming Machiavel in them. His "ſtyle is nervous and conciſe, as that of Tacitus is, "which renders it ſometimes obſcure; and perhaps "he affected this particular fault in order to reſem- "ble his author the more. He intermixes very of- "ten modern examples with the ancient, that every "perſon may ſee, as he tells us in one of his Diſ- "courſes, that the truth of things is not changed "by the difference of times. In ſhort his Commen- "tary is unqueſtionably one of the beſt that we have "upon Tacitus." Delle Famiglie Nobili Napollane, i. e. "Of the Noble Families in Naples," part I. at Florence, 1580, in fol. Part II, at Florence, 1651, fol. Diſcorſi delle Famiglie Paladina & l'Antoglietta, i. e. "Diſcourſes upon the families Paladina and An- "toglietto," at Florence, 1605, in 4to. Albero & Storia della Famiglia de Conti Guidi coll' aggiunte di Scipione Ammirato il Giovane, i. e. "The Tree and "Hiſtory of the family of the Counts Guidi, with "the Additions of Scipio Ammirato the Younger," at Florence, fol. 1640, and 1650. Delle Famiglie Fiorentine, i. e. "Of the Families of Florence," at Florence, 1615, fol. The author wrote a ſecond part, which was never printed. Veſcovi de Fieſole, di Volterra, e d'Arezzo, con l'aggiunta di Scipione Ammirato il Giovane, i. e. "An account of the Biſhops of "Feſula, Volterra, and Arezzo, with the Additions "of Scipio Ammirato the Younger," at Florence, 1637, in 4to. Ammirato wrote theſe Lives, which are very ſhort, at the deſire of the Biſhops of thoſe cities, Orazioni a diverſi principi, interno a i proparamenti, che s'avrebbono a fare contro la potenza del' Turco; i. e. "Orations to ſeveral Princes con- "cerning the preparations, which are neceſſary for "them to make againſt the power of the Turks," at Florence, 1698, in 4to. Opuſcoli varii; i. e. "Various Tracts," at Florence, 1583, in 8vo. Rime varie; i. e. "Miſcellaneous Poems," printed in a collection of Poems by different authors, at Venice in 1553 in 8vo, and in Dolce's Collection at Venice 1564 in 12mo, and reprinted in 1586. Poeſie Spirituali; i. e. "Spiritual Poems;" at Venice 1634 in 4to, His Poetry is very pure and elegant. Annotazioni ſopra la ſeconda parte de' Sonetti di Bernardino Rota, fatti in morte di Porzia Capece ſua moglie; i. e. "Notes upon the ſecond part of "Bernardino Rota's Sonnets upon the death of his "wife Portia Capece;" at Naples 1560 in 4to. Il Rota, o vero dell' Impreſe; at Florence 1598 in 4to. Della Segretezza; i. e. "Of Fidelity," at Venice 1599 in 4to. Gli Opuſcoli; i. e. "Tracts," at Florence 1640, in three volumes in 4to. This Collection contains ſeveral of the works mentioned above, beſides a great many others, which were never publiſhed before. We find among his Opuſcoli or Tracts the ſpeeches which he made upon different occaſions, ſeveral of which were publiſhed ſeparately; and particularly the following. Orazione nella morte di Franceſco Duca di Toſcana; i. e. "An "Oration upon the death of Francis Duke of Tuſ- "cany," printed at Florence 1587 in 4to. Orazione a Clemente VIII; i. e. "An Oration to Pope "Clement VIII," Florence 1594 in 4to. Orazione a Filippo II, Re di Spagna; i. e. "An Oration to "Philip II, King of Spain," Florence 1594 in 4to. Orazione a Clemente VIII; i. e. "An Oration to "Clement VIII," Florence 1595 in 4to. This Speech is called the ſecond Clementine, and the following the third. Orazione a Clemente VIII; i. e. "An Oration to Clement VIII," Florence 1596 in 4to. Orazione al Chriſtian. Enrico IV di Francia doppo la pace fatta con Spagna; i. e. "An Oration

(3) Inſtruction pour l'Hiſtoire, p. 145. See Memoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 10. p. 135. edit. de Paris 1730.

Some writers have erroneouſly placed his death in 1603, and particularly Lorenzo Craſſo (c).

(c) Elogii, tom. I.

" to the moſt Chriſtian King Henry IV of France " after the peace concluded with Spain," Florence 1598 in 4to. Orazione in morte di Filippo II. di Spagna; i. e. " An Oration upon the death of King " Philip II of Spain," Florence 1598 in 4to. We are obliged to him for the firſt edition of the Italian Poems of Bernardin Rota, a Neapolitan, which he publiſhed at Naples in 1560 (4). T. (4) Ibid. p. 138, 139.

AMMONIUS. There have been ſeveral writers of this name. Atheneus quotes two very different works, both compoſed by one, whom he calls Ammonius. For one of them treats of Altars and Sacrifices (a), and the other of the Courtezans of Athens [A]. It is true he does not tell us, in expreſs terms, that they were both written by one and the ſame Ammonius; but neither does he inſinuate any thing to the contrary, or mention either the country of this Ammonius, or the age in which he flouriſhed. We are informed by others [B], that the author who treats of altars and ſacrifices, was a native of Lampria (b). Suidas, as now extant, mentions only Ammonius Saccas; but it is plain, that the genuine Suidas ſpoke of another; for what we read in his Dictionary could never have been ſaid of one and the ſame perſon. It is impoſſible the ſame Ammonius ſhould have renounced the Chriſtian Religion, and ſucceeded Ariſtarchus in the ſchool of Alexandria, before the reign of Auguſtus. And nevertheleſs this is what we read in Suidas about Ammonius. Could he be ſo ignorant as to believe things that were ſo incompatible? This, in my opinion, has not the leaſt appearance of truth. Some writers are of opinion (c) that the paſſage is not entire (d), that part being wanting, ſay they, in which Suidas ſpeaks of the Ammonius whom Atheneus mentions. If this their conjecture be true, it would follow from thence, that the treatiſe of Altars and Sacrifices, or that of the Courtezans of Athens, or both, was compoſed by a Grammarian who ſucceeded Ariſtarchus. The ſecond Ammonius, whom I deſign to give an account of in this article, was an Egyptian Philoſopher (e), and is frequently mentioned by Plutarch, who was his diſciple. See particularly pages 70 and 385 of his moral works, Franckfort edition 1620. But it is falſely aſſerted in Moreri's Dictionary, that Plutarch commends him chiefly near the end of Ariſtotle's life [C]. Moreri is equally miſtaken in what relates to Ammonius, ſon of Hermeas [D], to whom, among other books, he aſcribes one compoſed in the reign of Valentinian. This Ammonius was ſon and brother of the Philoſopher (f), and is thought by the Learned to have flouriſhed under the Emperor

(a) Athen. lib. 11. p. 476.

(b) A town of Attica.

(c) Jonſius de Scriptor. Hiſt. Philoſ. p. 169, and in the Index.

(d) Geſner quotes it in his Bibliotheca, and ſeems not to have been appriſed of the abſurdity it contains.

(e) Eunapius, Proœmio Vitar. Sophiſt.

(f) Suidas in Ἑρμείας. See the Article HERMIAS.

[A] A treatiſe of the Courtezans of Athens (1).] Thoſe, who in latter ages have written Del Putaniſmo di Roma, or of ſome other great city, were not the firſt who handled ſuch ſubjects. Divers works of this nature appeared in ancient times; but by good luck none of them have reached us.

(1) Athen. lib. 13. p. 567.

[B] We are informed by others, that the author who treats of altars and ſacrifices was a native of Lampria.] We are not told ſo by Harpocration, as Mr. Lloyd aſſerts; but by the author of the book De Differentiis Vocum, who by Voſſius and ſeveral others is called Ammonius. Had Mr. Lloyd copied Voſſius faithfully he would never have ſaid, Ammonius Hiſtoricus ἐν τῷ περὶ Βωμῶν καὶ Θυσιῶν citatur ab Harpocratione in Ἀμφαζόνιον, uti & in voce Ἐσχάρα. Ex quo etiam diſcimus Lamprienſem fuiſſe, ut Geſnerus falſo Alexandrinum vocet. Such are the faults of the Epitomizers, which I have ſo often taken notice of. Voſſius, after having ſaid what I have quoted down to the word Ἐσχάρα, adds, ἐν πρώτῳ περὶ Θυσιῶν ab Ammonio lib. de differ. voc. in Βωμός. Ubi & Λαμπρεὺς fuiſſe dicitur, ut Geſnerus falſo Alexandrinum vocet (2). Lloyd, to ſave himſelf the trouble of copying the entire paſſage of Voſſius, and skipping a line tells us a notorious falſhood, Harpocration having no where ſaid, that the Ammonius he ſpeaks of, was a native of Lampria. If he had a mind to leave out any part of this paſſage, he ought to have pitched upon the laſt line, in which Voſſius is quite miſtaken; ſince Geſner never ſaid, that Ammonius, the author of the book of ſacrifices, was of Alexandria. There is ſtill another paſſage in Harpocration, where our Ammonius is quoted (3): Ἀμμώνιος ἐν τετάρτῃ περὶ Βωμῶν γράφει ταῦτα; i. e. " Ammonius " writes this in his fourth book of Altars." Thus the text of Harpocration has been corrected by the learned Mauſſacus: he puts βωμῶν inſtead of κώμων, ſince no one ever ſaid, that this author wrote a book of Towns or Villages. Valeſius approves of this emendation (4). As Ammonius wrote a book of the Courtezans of Athens, it would not be a quite improbable conjecture, if one ſhould ſay, that he compoſed another on debauched Feaſts, περὶ κώμων. Thus we ſhould have no reaſon to ſuppoſe that he wrote a book (according to the common reading of Harpocration,) upon the boroughs, or people of Attica. However the correction of Mauſſacus ſeems to me the moſt probable; and it ſeemed ſo to Voſſius alſo, who publiſhed it as his own. Valeſius quotes a paſſage out of the Scholiaſt of Hermogenes, wherein the author of the treatiſe upon Altars is called Ammonius of Lampria (5).

(2) De Hiſt. Græcis. p. 502.

(3) At the word Φίλος.

(4) Henr. Valeſius, Notis in notas Mauſſaci ad Harpocration. p. 111.

(5) Idem, ibid.

[C] It is falſely aſſerted in Moreri's Dictionary, that Plutarch commends him chiefly near the end of Ariſtotle's Life.] This Life of Ariſtotle is a mere chimera. Moreri confounds Ariſtotle with Themiſtocles; for near the end of Themiſtocles's Life Plutarch mentions Ammonius; but neither commends nor diſcommends him.

[D] Moreri is equally miſtaken in what relates to Ammonius, ſon of Hermeas.] He is guilty at leaſt of three or four palpable miſtakes. I, He knew not that Proclus flouriſhed under Theodoſius the Younger, and a long time after the reign of that Prince; for had he known it, would he ever have ſaid, that Ammonius, a diſciple of Proclus, wrote a book under the reign of Valentinian? would he have copied ſo faithfully the miſtakes of Father Rapin (6)? II, After what a ſtrange manner does he mark the reigns of the Emperors? Three Valentinians have reigned, and by the bare name of Valentinian, every one underſtands Valentinian the firſt, who died in 375. Now I leave the reader to judge, whether Proclus could have written under that Emperor. III. Had Moreri underſtood the author he copied, (I mean Father Labbe) he would have learned that Ammonius, diſciple of Proclus, and ſon of Hermeas, flouriſhed under the Emperor Anaſtaſius, who began to reign above thirty five years after the death of Valentinian III. IV, Father Labbe obſerves, that one Ammonius is frequently mentioned in the Catena's of the Greek Fathers on the Goſpel of St. John, and on other books of the Scripture; and inſinuates that this Ammonius, and Ammonius the ſon of Hermeas, are two different perſons. Inſtead of this, Moreri tells us, that ſome authors aſcribe the explanation of the Greek Fathers upon the Goſpel of St. John to Ammonius the ſon of Hermeas.

(6) Proclus under Julian, the ſecond Ammonius his diſciple, who wrote ſo well upon the book of Ariſtotle de Interpretatione, under the reign of Valentinian. Rapin, Parallel between Plato and Ariſtotle, p. 391.

peror Anaſtaſius, at the beginning of the ſixth Century, and to have written the Commentaries, that paſs under the name of Ammonius, upon ſome treatiſes of Ariſtotle, and particularly upon the book de Interpretatione (g). The author of this laſt Commentary tells us, in the very beginning of his work, that he was a diſciple of Proclus; and to him ſome aſcribe the Life of Ariſtotle, that goes under the name of Ammonius (b). It is he, without doubt, whom Zachary of Mitylene refuted: ſee Note [H] of the following article. Of him likewiſe muſt be underſtood a paſſage (i) of Photius, where mention is made of an Ammonius, who took great delight in explaining the antient Poets, and making critical remarks on the Greek tongue (k); and this is what has induced ſome writers to aſcribe to him the treatiſe of the difference of Greek words (l); though Menage takes Herennius Philo to have been the author of it (m). The ſame Ammonius, whom Photius mentions, had an Aſs, that reliſhed Poetry to ſuch a degree, that he uſed not to touch the food he had before him, but ſuffer hunger, rather than to interrupt his attention to the reading of a Poem (n). The third Ammonius, whom I ſhall take notice of here, was a Poet who lived in the fifth Century, and wrote a Poem upon the war carried on againſt Gainas King of the Goths, which he pronounced before Theodoſius the younger, who greatly commended it (o). I ſhall mention, in ſeparate articles, not only ſome moderns, who have born the name of Ammonius, but alſo an antient Philoſopher, who alone did it more honour than all the others together.

(g) Voſſius, de Philoſoph. Sectis, p. 90 and 113. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 59.

(b) Jonſius, Hiſt. Philoſ. p. 300.

(i) Id. ibid.

(k) Photij Bib. num. 242, pag. 1040.

(l) Jonſius, Hiſt. Philoſ. p. 300.

(m) Menagius in Diogenem Laërt. lib. 2. num. 5.

(n) Photius, Bibliotb. num. 242, ex Damaſcio in vita Iſidori Philoſophi.

(o) Socrates, Hiſtor. Eccleſiaſt. lib. 6. cap. 6; & ex eo Nicephorus, lib. 13. cap. 6.

AMMONIUS, ſurnamed Saccas [A], was born in Alexandria, and flouriſhed about the beginning of the third Century, and was one of the moſt celebrated Philoſophers of his age. He was brought up from his infancy in the Chriſtian Religion, and profeſſed it to his death, as his works ſufficiently witneſs. Euſebius relating this, accuſes Porphyry of a moſt notorious falſhood (a); for he tells us, that Ammonius renounced Chriſtianity, in which he had been educated, and embraced the common religion as ſoon as his age allowed him to philoſophize [B]. This eminent Philoſopher added a great luſtre to the ſchool of Alexandria, and raiſed the ſcience he profeſſed to a very honourable condition, though he had found it ſtrangely corrupted by the vain cavils of diſputants. Even the Chriſtian religion has proved the bad effects which attend ſuch idle ſpeculations, in the controverſies that have been raiſed by the Thomiſts and Scotiſts, by the Realiſts and Nominaliſts, who all pretended indeed to follow Ariſtotle, but could never put an end to their quarrels. What hot diſputes then muſt have reigned among the ancient Philoſophers, while being divided into various ſects, ſome condemned Ariſtotle, others Plato &c.? Their Philoſophy muſt have been a meer chaos of querks and cavils, which diſgraced their profeſſion. The only means to reſtore that ſcience to its former ſplendor was, to baniſh all manner of uſeleſs diſputes, and ſtick to the principles in which Plato and his diſciple had agreed, it being plain that ſuch principles were both the moſt certain and moſt important. And this was what induced Ammonius to make the reconciling of theſe two heads of different ſects his chief buſineſs [C]; and to clear up thoſe points, on which their ſuppoſed oppoſition was founded. The reputation he gained thereby can hardly be expreſſed. He was generally looked upon as an inſpired man, and one, whom God himſelf had taught [D], and put into that method. Moreri,

(a) Euſebius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 6. c. 19.

[A] Ammonius ſurnamed Saccas.] We are told by Ammianus Marcellinus (1) and Suidas (2), that he had this ſurname. He is commonly believed to have been at firſt a Porter, and this opinion is grounded on a paſſage of the ſame Suidas. I ſhall produce the words of the learned Henry Valeſius relating thereto: Saccas videtur ex eo dictus Ammonius, quod mercibus ex portu Alexandrino comportandis victum ſibi quæſiviſſet, cujuſmodi homines Saccarios antiqui vocabant; ut videre eſt in codice Th. tit. De Saccariis portus urbis Romæ. Suidas, Πλωτῖνος, inquit, μαθητὴς Ἀμμωνίου γενομένου σακκοφόρου (3). i. e. "Ammonius "ſeems to have been called Saccas, becauſe he lived "by carrying goods from the port of Alexandria, for "the ancients called ſuch people Saccarii. Suidas "ſays, Plotinus the diſciple of Ammonius, who had "been a Porter."

(1) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 22. circa fin.

(2) Suidas in Πλωτῖνος.

(3) Henr. Valeſ. in Ammian. Marcellin. l. 22.

[B] Porphyrius tells us falſely, that Ammonius renounced Chriſtianity . . . . as ſoon as his age allowed him to philoſophize &c.] His words are: Ὅτι δ' φρονεῖν καὶ τῆς φιλοσοφίας ἥψατο, εὐθὺς πρὸς τὴν κατὰ νόμους πολιτείαν μετέβαλετο (4). i. e. "As ſoon as he "came to the age of diſcretion, and had taſted of "Philoſophy, he immediately conformed himſelf to "the manner of living eſtabliſhed by the Laws." Theſe words proceed from the Spirit I have ſpoke of in the remark [E] of the article upon ABULPHARAGIUS.

(4) Porph. l. 3. adverſus Chriſtianos, apud Euſebium, Hiſt. Eccl. l. 6. cap. 19.

[C] He made the reconciling of Plato and Ariſtotle his chief buſineſs.] This is what we read in a book which Hierocles wrote upon Providence; of which ſome extracts are to be found in Photius's Bibliotheca. Such only, ſays he, as were poſſeſſed with the ſpirit of contradiction, fond of diſputes, or biaſſed by prejudices and ignorance, detected any oppoſition between the principles of Ariſtotle and Plato. Τὺς μὲν ἐκόντας ἔριδι καὶ ἀπονοίᾳ σφᾶς αὐτὺς προσαναθέντας, τὺς δὲ καὶ προλήψει καὶ ἀμαθίᾳ δεδουλωμένους (5). The diſputants he mentions firſt were very numerous, before Ammonius cleared up the points that afforded matter to their controverſies: Ammonii aliquando ſapientia orbi illuxit, quem etiam divinitus edoctum appellari prædicat. Hunc enim veterum Philoſophorum opinionibus perpurgatis, & rejectis, quæ utrimque excreverant, nugis, in præcipuis quibuſque & maxime neceſſariis dogmatibus concordem eſſe Platonis & Ariſtotelis ſententiam demonſtrâſſe (6). i. e. "The wiſ- "dom of Ammonius ſhone upon the world, who, "he ſays, was called the divinely taught. For he "purged the opinions of the ancient Philoſophers, "and cut off the trifles with which they were over- "grown, and ſhewed the agreement in the opini- "ons of Plato and Ariſtotle in the principal and "moſt eſſential doctrines."

(5) Photius, Bib. num. 214. p. 549.

(6) Hierocles, apud Photium, ibid.

[D] He was generally looked upon as a man inſpired.] We have juſt now quoted a paſſage out of Hierocles, containing the words, ὃν καὶ θεοδίδακτον ἐπικαλεῖσθαι ὑμνῶ, i. e. "who, he ſays, was called the "divinely taught." We ſhall now produce another, in which the ſame author acquaints us, that the diſciples of Plato and Ariſtotle were ſo fond of immortalizing their diſputes, that they even falſified the text of their Principals, in order to make them contradict one another. This diſorder reigned to the time of Ammonius, God's own diſciple, who, being taught reri, and ſeveral others were ſtrangers to the true motive of ſuch high commendations [E]. Thoſe who affirm, that he inſtructed his diſciples in the Chriſtian religion, under an oath of ſecrecy, are greatly miſtaken [F] Some have confounded his theological works with thoſe of other writers [G], but at laſt every one has had his own. Ammonius had, among his other diſciples, Plotinus and Origen. He died about the year 230 (b). He

(b) According to Cave, Hiſt. Lin. pag. 72.

the philoſophical truths by inſpiration, examined the grounds of the two ſects to the bottom, reconciled them, and propoſed to his diſciples a new ſyſtem, quite free from ſuch trifling points as fomented uſeleſs diſputes. Ἕως Ἀμμωνίου τοῦ Θεοδιδάκτου, οὗτος γὰρ πρῶτος ἐνθουσιάσας πρὸς τὸ τῆς φιλοσοφίας ἀληθινὸν, καὶ τὰς τῶν πολλῶν δόξας ὑπεριδὼν, τὰς πλείστων ὄντως φιλοσοφίαν προσιεμένους, εἶδε καλῶς τὰ ἑκατέρου, καὶ συνήγαγεν εἰς ἓν καὶ τὸν αὐτὸν νοῦν καὶ ἀγασίασεν τὴν φιλοσοφίαν παραδέδωκε πᾶσι τοῖς αὐτοῦ γνωρίμοις, μάλιστα δὲ τοῖς ἀρίστοις τῶν αὐτῷ συγγενομένων Πλωτίνῳ καὶ Ὠριγένει καὶ τοῖς ἑξῆς ἀπὸ τούτων (7). i. e. "Till the divinely "taught Ammonius. For he firſt of all being led "by a kind of rapture to the truth of Philoſophy, "and deſpiſing the opinions of many, who had "brought a great reproach upon Philoſophy, gained "a thorough inſight into the doctrine of each ſect, "and reconciled them, and delivered a Philoſophy "free from contentions to all his hearers, particu-"larly to his learned ſucceſſors, Plotinus and Ori-"gen."

(7) Ibidem, num. 251. p. 1381.

[E] Moreri, and ſeveral others were ſtrangers to the true motive of ſuch commendations.] "Ammo-"nius, ſays Moreri, applied himſelf chiefly to the "divine Philoſophy of Jeſus Chriſt; in which ſtu-"dy he ſucceeded ſo well, that he was looked up-"on as one, who had been inſtructed by God him-"ſelf; whence he was called Theodidactus." In this he is quite miſtaken. I do not mean thereby to queſtion Ammonius's learning in matters of Divinity; all I intend is, that however skillful he was in Divinity, he did not acquire the name of Theodidactus by that knowledge, but by his lectures of Philoſophy, in which he ſpoke of Plato and Ariſtotle; but not a word of Jeſus Chriſt, or the Goſpel. As his auditory was made up indifferently of Pagans and Chriſtians, he did not meddle with matters of Religion, and much leſs of piety. Surely Hierocles, who was a Pagan Philoſopher, would never have beſtowed ſuch elogiums upon him, had the name of Theodidactus been owing to his knowledge in points of Religion. I am apt to believe that Ammonius did not paſs for a Chriſtian among the Pagans; and this perhaps was what gave Porphyry occaſion to ſay, that Ammonius had abandoned the Chriſtian Religion, as ſoon as he began to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. The Chriſtians knew who he was, and his book, in all appearance unknown to the Pagans, were to his brethren ſo many proofs of his belief. Had Plotinus known, that he was an enemy to the reigning Religion, he would not have ſhewn ſuch an attachment to his diſcipline; for the Chriſtians in thoſe times made no great figure.

[F] Thoſe, who affirm, that he inſtructed his diſciples in the Chriſtian Religion under an oath of ſecrecy, are greatly miſtaken.] I was ſurprized to find Father Labbe guilty of this miſtake. Idem Porphyrius, ſays he (8), in vita Plotini, Platonicæ ſectæ Philoſophi, narrat Ammonium Religionis Chriſtianæ arcana diſcipulis ſuis ſub ſilentii religione communicaſſe, & Herennium, Originem, atque Plotinum obſtrinxiſſe, cumque Herennius primus eam fregiſſet, nec Originem, nec Plotinum promiſſis ſtetiſſe. i. e. "The "ſame Porphyry, in his Life of Plotinus the Platoniſt, "relates, that Ammonius communicated the ſecrets "of the Chriſtian Religion to his diſciples, under "an obligation of ſecrecy, and that he bound after "this manner Herennius, Origen and Plotinus; and "that, when Herennius had firſt broken his pro-"miſe, neither Origen nor Plotinus would keep "their promiſes." Theſe words contain two palpable miſtakes: in the firſt place, it is falſe, that Ammonius obliged his diſciples to ſwear, that they would diſcover what they ſhould learn from him to nobody. In the ſecond place, it is falſe, that Porphyrius ſpeaks of any thing but philoſophical matters. All that Porphyrius ſays, may be reduced to this: Herennius, Origen, and Plotinus had agreed among themſelves not to impart to others what they had learnt of Ammonius, it ſeeming to them exceeding noble and curious. Plotinus was as good as his word; but not Herennius, whoſe example was followed by Origen. This is not a proper place to ſhew, that the Origen mentioned here is not the Origen that wrote ſo many books, and made ſo many allegorical explanations of Scripture; but as moſt of my readers may not have at hand a Plotinus to recur to, I ſhall ſet down here his very words: Ἑρεννίῳ δὲ καὶ Ὠριγένει καὶ Πλωτίνῳ συνθηκῶν γεγενημένων μηδὲν ἐκκαλύπτειν τῶν Ἀμμωνίου δογμάτων, ἃ δὲ ἐν ταῖς ἀκροάσεσιν αὐτοῖς ἀνεκεκάθαρτο, ἔμενε καὶ ὁ Πλωτῖνος, σεμνὸν μέν τισι τῶν προσιόντων. τηρῶν δὲ ἀνέκπυστα τὰ παρὰ τοῦ Ἀμμωνίου δόγματα. Ἑρεννίου δὲ πρώτου τὰς συνθηκὰς παραβάντος, Ὠριγένης μὲν ἠκολούθει τῷ φθάσαντι Ἑρεννίῳ (9). i. e. "But when Herennius, and Origen, and Plotinus "had agreed together not to reveal the doctrines "of Ammonius, which they had admired as the "moſt pure they had heard, Plotinus continued "ſtedfaſt, entertaining indeed thoſe who came to "him, but yet keeping the ſecrets of Ammonius "unrevealed. Herennius firſt broke the agreement, "and Origen followed his example." Both the miſtakes of Father Labbe are to be found in Lucas Holſtenius (10), which is ſurprizing.

(9) Porphyrius, in vitâ Plotini.

(10) Lucas Holſten. de vita & Scriptis Porphyrii, pag. 28.

[G] Some have confounded his theological works with thoſe of other Writers.] St. Jerom ranks Ammonius among the Eccleſiaſtic Writers, and aſcribes to him, beſides other works, the invention of the Evangelical Canons (11); adding that they ſerved Euſebius as a model for the compoſing of a great work. If this be true, Euſebius is a great impoſtor; for in one of his Letters (12), wherein he explains the nature and uſe of his ten Canons upon the Concordance of the Goſpels, he aſſures us that they were contrived by himſelf on occaſion of a work of Ammonius, entitled Monoteſſaron, or Diateſſaron. The following text ſhews us in what this work differs from the Evangelical Canons. Theſe Canons are but indexes of ſuch paſſages of the Goſpel as are to be found in one, two, three, or four Evangeliſts, whereas the harmony or concordance of Ammonius (entitled alſo Diateſſaron, or Monoteſſaron) contains the entire text of the four Evangeliſts. Euſebius made uſe of this work in compoſing his Canons, which refer thereto, and are, as it were, an index to it (13). It is therefore falſly aſſerted by Moreri, that the Evangelical Canons, and the Harmony of the Goſpel are one and the ſame work. Victor Biſhop of Capua, Zachary Biſhop of Chryſopolis, Trithemius, and ſeveral moderns, follow St. Jerom in aſcribing the invention of the Evangelical Canons to Ammonius, without minding the above mentioned Letter of Euſebius. We find here another great miſtake. The Bibliotheca Patrum contains two Harmonies of the four Goſpels; one of them was aſcribed to Tatianus by Victor Biſhop of Capua, who tranſlated it into Latin (14) about the year 545, and prefixed a Preface to it (15). Upon this Ammonius was ſuppoſed to have written the other. But it happens quite otherwiſe; for the harmony, which the Biſhop of Capua aſcribes to Tatianus, contains all the genealogies of Chriſt, that are recorded by the Evangeliſts; whereas Tatianus left out all ſuch paſſages of the Goſpels as could prove that Chriſt was the ſon of David (16). On the other hand, theſe paſſages are wanting in the Harmony which are aſcribed to Ammonius (17). Sixtus Senenſis, Georgius Ederus, and divers others have followed Victor's. But Zachary, Biſhop of Chryſopolis, made it plainly appear, above five hundred years ago, that Ammonius is the true author of this Harmony (18); and his opinion is followed by Baronius. Father Oudin's obſervation, relating to this ſubject, deſerves particular notice. He tells us, that the Harmony, which was tranſlated into Latin by Ottomarus Luſcinius, and is aſcribed to Ammonius in the Bibliotheca Patrum printed in 1575, was neither written by Ammonius, nor Tatianus (19). The book Ammonius wrote De Conſenſu Moſis & Jeſu,

(11) Hieronym. de Script. Eccleſ. cap. 55.

(12) Ad Carpianum; it was printed together with the ten canons, de conſonantia quatuor Evangeliorum, and prefixed to Robert Stephens's new Greek Teſtament, Paris edition in 1550. See F. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p 308, and p. 58.

(13) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 120. Amſterdam edition.

(14) Bellarmin. de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 226. Oudin, Supplem. de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 15.

(15) Labbe de Script. Eccleſ. p. 57.

(16) As it is atteſted by Euſebius and Theodoret. See Labbe de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 57.

(17) Cave, Hiſt. Litt. p. 72.

(18) Commentar. in eam Harmoniam, apud Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 57.

(19) Oudin, de Script. Eccleſ. p. 15.

(8) Labbe de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. p. 58.

He ought, in my opinion, to be diſtinguiſhed from Ammonius the Peripatetic [H], who was, according to Philoſtratus, the moſt learned and beſt read man of his age.

I find a great miſtake in one of the Commentators upon Boëtius. For he imputes chiefly to Ammonius the depraving of Plato's doctrine about the eternity of the world [I], which is a notorious untruth.

Jeſu, has not reached us: nor any other of his works, if we give credit to Henry Valeſius: Hujus Ammonii, quod ſciam, hodie nihil extat, i. e. "there is nothing "of this Ammonius extant that I know of," ſays he in his Commentary on the laſt chapter of the 22d book of Ammianus Marcellinus. Had he then forgot the Harmony of the Goſpels inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, or did he take that work not to have been done by Ammonius? As Hadrian Valeſius has made no remarks on this paſſage in the ſecond edition, he was, as plainly appears, of his brother's opinion.

[H] He ought, in my opinion, to be diſtinguiſhed from Ammonius the Peripatetic.] A very learned writer is not for making any ſuch diſtinction. Hic eſſe videtur, ſays he (20), Ammonius Peripateticus Philoſophus, quem πολυγραμματώτατον fuiſſe ſeculi ſui teſtatur Philoſtratus in Sophiſtæ Hippodromi vita, quo qui plura legiſſet neminem ſe vidiſſe. i. e. "He ſeems "to be Ammonius the Peripatetic Philoſopher, whom "Philoſtratus, in the Life of Hippodromus the So-"phiſt, teſtifies to have been the moſt voluminous "writer of his age, and that he had never ſeen "any one who had read more." But had he minded the paſſage of Longinus that is quoted in Plotinus's Life, he would have diſtinguiſhed theſe two Philoſophers without the leaſt heſitation. Longinus obſerves, that ſome Philoſophers wrote books, and that others taught viva voce; he names ſome Platonics, as well as Stoics, or Peripatetics, of each claſs, and places in the ſecond Ammonius and Origen, both, according to him, diſciples of Plato; adding that he was acquainted with them, and that they excelled all the Philoſophers of their age. Οἷς ἡμεῖς τὸ πλεῖστον τοῦ χρόνου προσεφοιτήσαμεν, οὐδ' ἁπάσιν οὐκ ὀλίγῳ τῶν καθ' ἑαυτὸς εἰς σύνεσιν διενεγκοῦσι (21). Afterwards he names ſome Stoics of the ſame claſs; that is, among thoſe, who either did not write at all, or wrote very little; and laſtly ranks in the ſame claſs two Peripatetics, viz. Ammonius and Ptolomæus; adding, that they both, but particularly Ammonius, ſurpaſſed, in Philology, all the learned men of their age. Ἀμμώνιος καὶ Πτολεμαῖος φιλολογώτατοι μὲν τῶν καθ' ἑαυτὸς ἄμφω γενόμενοι, καὶ μάλιστα ὁ Ἀμμώνιος. ὁ γὰρ ἔστιν ὅστις ἐκείνῳ γέγονεν εἰς πολυμαθείαν παραπλήσιος (22). This is the Ammonius Philoſtratus mentions, and, of courſe, a different perſon from the Ammonius, who taught Philoſophy at Alexandria, and was Maſter to Plotinus and Origen. Longinus's Letter acquaints us, that theſe two learned Peripatetics only wrote ſome Poems and Speeches. This great Critic believes they did not deſign that their works ſhould be tranſmitted to after-ages, becauſe with that view they would have written with more exactneſs.

[I] It has been wrongly imputed to Ammonius that he depraved Plato's doctrine relating to the eternity of the world.] That the miſtake may appear in its full light, I ſhall ſet down, at length, the Commentator's own words. Nulla autem Platonis ſententia eſt, quam fœdius corruperint, & obſtinatius defende-rint veteres Platonis interpretes; ſeu quia eorum alii ita ſentirent, ſeu ut Chriſtianam fidem impugnarent. Eorum ſignifer Ammonius fuit, fidus alioquin & illuſtris doctrinæ Platonicæ aſſertor; quem Zacharias dialogo cui AMMONIUS titulus eſt, confutavit. Mox ejus diſcipuli, Plotinus paſſim libris ſuis; & quod mirum eſt ne à magiſtro diſſentiret, fax illa fidei, Origenes; cujus errorem S. Methodius lib. περὶ τῶν γενητῶν, ut eſt apud Photium, redarguit (23). i. e. "There "is no opinion of Plato which the old Commenta-"tors on that author have more ſhamefully corrupt-"ed, and more obſtinately defended: whether be-"cauſe ſome of them thought ſo, or to oppoſe the "Chriſtian Faith. Ammonius was the ring-leader, "who in other reſpects was a faithful and illuſtrious "aſſertor of the Platonic doctrine; whom Zacharias, "in his Dialogue intitled Ammonius, confuted. He was "followed by his diſciple Plotinus, every where in his "books; and what is ſurprizing, by Origen, that light "of the faith, leſt he ſhould diſſent from his maſter; "whoſe error is confuted by Methodius in his book "περὶ τῶν γενητῶν, as it is in Photius." It is plain he ſpeaks here of Ammonius, the Preceptor of Origen. Could he have been guilty of ſuch a miſtake, had he had recourſe to the originals, and not quoted from others the treatiſe of Zachary? For in the very beginning of that treatiſe we are informed, that the Ammonius, againſt whom it was compoſed, was ſtill alive, and taught at Alexandria, with great oſtentation, after having ſtudied at Athens under Proclus. The author, I mean Zachary, Biſhop of Mitylene, lived in the 6th Century, aſſiſted at the Council of Conſtantinople in 536; and therefore could not refute the Preceptor of Origen. However it is true, that the Philoſopher Ammonius, whom he confutes, taught, that God and the world were, and ever would be, coeternal. This work of Zachary was tranſlated from the Greek into Latin by Genebrard, and inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum (24). Poſſevin obſerves, that Caniſius cenſures Geſner, for having ſaid, that Zachary's work De Mundi Æternitate was different from his other work entitled Ammonius (25). This cenſure would have been as juſt, with regard to the Epitomizer of Geſner, as it is unjuſt upon Geſner himſelf, who ſays in expreſs terms, that the dialogue entitled Ammonius, and the treatiſe De Rerum Æternitate, ſeem to him to be one and the ſame work. I cannot help obſerving here, how much I was ſurprized to find, that in the 6th Century, a Pagan Philoſopher was Profeſſor in Alexandria, and allowed to maintain the eternity of the world, in oppoſition to the Chriſtian belief. He was ſo far from concealing his opinion, that he openly taught it, and no doubt it was publicly known, that he gained over to his party a great many of his diſciples. One of theſe (26) was afterwards firſt Profeſſor of Phyſic in the ſame city, and maintained, with great earneſtneſs, the ſame opinion. This is what we gather from the treatiſe of Zachary of Mitylene.

(20) Hadr. Valeſius, in Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 22. p. 344. edition folio.

(21) Longinus, apud Porphyr. in vitâ Plotin.

(22) Idem, ibid.

(23) Renatus Vallinus, not. ad lib. 5. Boëtii de Conſolat. Philoſoph. p. 96.

(24) It is to be found in the 11th volume of the Biblioth. Patrum, p. 331, &c. of the Paris edition, in 1644.

(25) Poſſevinus Appar. tom. 2. pag. 552.

(26) His name was Geſſius. See the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. 11. pag. 339.

AMMONIUS (ANDREW) a native of Lucca, went to ſeek his fortune in England about the beginning of the ſixteenth Century, where in all likelihood he would have made it, had he not been prevented by death [A]. He applied himſelf to the Belles Lettres, and Latin Poetry; and it is chiefly in regard of his Latin verſes, that [A] He would in all likelihood have made his fortune in England, had he not been prevented by death.] This is not a conjecture of mine, but the opinion of Eraſmus. Periit, ſays he (1), & apud Gallos Fauſtus, & apud Britannos Andreas Ammonius, quorum alter diu regnavit Lutetiæ, alter ad ſummam dignitatem emerſurus erat, ſi vita diuturnior contigiſſet. That is, "Fauſtus died in France, and Andrew Ammonius in "England, the firſt of whom flouriſhed a long time at "Paris, and the other would have riſen to the high-"eſt dignity, if he had lived longer." He thought ſo, not only while the wound was recent, that is, ſoon after his death, when his grief might have made him break out in ſuch praiſes; but alſo many years after when the firſt impreſſions of ſorrow were worn out. Quam multos, writes he in 1524 (2), hic ex veteri ſodalitio deſidero. Primum Andream Ammonium Lucenſem: Deum immortalem, quanta ingenij dexteritate, quam fideli memoria præditum! Tum animus quam erat excelſus, quam alienus a livore, quam alienus a ſordibus! Hunc & ſuis dotibus, & omni principum applauſu florentem, maximis rebus deſtinatum, ſubita mors intercepit natu minorem annis quadraginta. Cujus equidem deceſſum non poſſum non dolere, quotie-

(1) Eraſmi, Ep. 24. lib. 2. pag. 132. Scripta an. 1518.

(2) Idem, Ep. 5. lib. 23. p. 1210.

that he deſerves to be ranked among authors [B]. There paſſed a great friendſhip and correſpondence by way of letters between him and Eraſmus. Ammonius lodged for ſome time in Sir Thomas Moor's houſe (a), and afterwards in St. Thomas's College (b), for he was not in ſuch circumſtances as to hire or keep a houſe of his own. He wrote to Eraſmus, that he was ſorry he had left Rome, and no ways pleaſed with his circumſtances in England (c). The advice which Eraſmus gave him is ſo very agreeable to the artful methods which are made uſe of in puſhing one's fortune [C], that we cannot think he ſuggeſted it in good earneſt. He alſo wrote ſome Iambics in his praiſe, which are exceeding fine, and ſhew that Ammonius was endowed with a thouſand good qualities both of body and mind (d). But as poetical commendations are not to be much relied upon, we ſhall produce in our remarks ſome paſſages of Eraſmus's proſe-compoſitions, which will redound more to the glory of his friend. Fortune at laſt began to ſmile upon Ammonius, for he was made Secretary to Henry VIII (e), and honoured by Pope Leo X with a publick character at the court of that Prince (f). He might have riſen higher, if he had not died before he was forty years of age. He was in the army in 1513, when the Engliſh gained the battle of the Spurs, and made themſelves maſters of Teroüenne and Tournay. He wrote verſes on theſe victories, and alſo on that which the Engliſh obtained over James IV King of Scotland. He died of the Sweating Sickneſs [D] in (a) Eraſmi, Ep. 2. lib. 8. p. 408.

(b) Idem, Ep. 23. p. 424
(c) Idem, Epiſt. 25. p. 426. Ep. 11. p. 413.
(d) Idem, Ep. 22. p. 422.
(e) Balæus ap. Simlerum, Epit. Geſneri.
(f) Andreas Ammonius tuæ ſanctitatis, apud Anglos Nuncius literis ſignificabit. Eraſmus, Ep. 6. lib. 2. p. 104.

ties in mentem venit, quam mihi fuerit jucunda ejus familiaritas. That is, "How many of my old companions have I loſt? In the firſt place Andrew Ammonius of Lucca. Good God, what a lively genius he had, and what a faithful memory! And then, how lofty was his ſoul, how free from envy, how free from baſeneſs! When his own qualifications and the applauſe of Princes had opened him a way to the greateſt affairs, he was ſuddenly ſnatched away before he was forty years of age. Whoſe loſs I cannot but lament, as often as I recollect how delighted I was with his acquaintance.

[B] It is chiefly in regard of his Latin verſes that he deſerves to be ranked among authors.] The catalogue of Ammonius's poems is to be found in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca. It contains the following pieces; Scotici conflictus Hiſtoria, lib. 1; Bucolica, ſeu Eclogæ, lib. 1; de Rebus nihili, lib. 1; Panegyricus quidam, lib. 1; Epigrammata, lib. 1; Poëmata diverſa, lib. 1. Balæus is quoted for this catalogue. The piece entitled Panegyricus quidam, is a Poem on the victories obtained by the Engliſh at the battle of the Spurs, and at the taking of Terouënne, Tournay, &c. Eraſmus paſſes his judgment on this Poem in one of his letters (3) dated the day of St. Thomas 1510, which is a convincing proof that the dates have been afterwards added to ſome of his letters, and that very careleſly too. Beſides, his letters are ſtrangely diſpoſed, and ſome anſwers placed ſeveral pages before the letters to which they are anſwers (4).

(3) The 20th of the 8th book.
(4) See the article CARMILIANUS.

[C] Artful methods which are made uſe of in puſhing one's fortune, &c.] "Be aſhamed of nothing, "ſays he to him, thruſt your ſelf into every one's "buſineſs; elbow out whomſoever you can, give no "quarter (5): ſupplant every one; meaſure your "love and hatred with your profit; give nothing but "to ſuch as will return it with uſury; be complaiſant "to every one, and in every thing; have always "two ſtrings to your bow; give out you are courted by others; feign that you will depart, and get "every thing ready for your journey; ſhew letters "inviting you elſewhere with great promiſes." Principio perfrica frontem, ne quid uſquam pudeat. Deinde omnibus omnium negotiis te miſce, protrude quemcumque potes cubito. Neminem nec ames, nec oderis ex animo, ſed omnia tuo compendio metiare. Ad hunc ſcopum omnis vitæ ratio ſpectet. Ne quid des, niſi unde ſperes fœnus; aſſentare omnibus omnia. At iſta vulgaria ſunt, inquis. Age, quando ita vis, accipe peculiare conſilium, ſed heus in aurem. Noſti τὴν Βρεττανικὴν ζηλοτυπίαν, hac in tuum bonum abutere. Duabus ſedeto ſellis. Suborna diverſos procos qui te ambiant. Minare & appara diſceſſum. Oſtende literas, quibus magnis pollicitis avocaris. Subducito te nonnunquam, ut ſubtracta copia deſiderium acuat (6). Alciat uſed this trick (7).

(5) This is one of Moliere's verſes in his Remercîment au Roi. The paſſage is as follows. Jettez-vous dans la foule, & tranchez du notable; coudoiez un chacun, point du tout de quartier, preſſez, paſſez, faite le diable, pour vous mettre le premier.
(6) Eraſmi, Ep. 13. l. 8. p. 414.
(7) See Remark [D] of the article ALCIAT.

[D] He died of the Sweating Sickneſs.] See the hiſtory of Henry VIII's divorce by Mr. le Grand, who informs us what kind of a diſtemper this was. It was called "the Sweating Sickneſs, becauſe ſuch "as were ſeized with it died ſweating. This kind "of plague broke out firſt in 1486, for it had never "been heard of till that time. All remedies proved "unſucceſsful; ſo that it ſwept away vaſt numbers "of people, before the Phyſicians knew what to "preſcribe for their patients. It ſeemed at firſt to "be a puniſhment ſent from heaven upon the Engliſh alone; for they were every where ſeized with "it, at the ſame time that it ſpared the foreigners "with whom they lived (8)." Mr. le Grand produces, among other pieces, atteſting the truth of what he advances (9), a Letter of the Biſhop of Baionne, who was then Embaſſador from France at the court of England, wherein mention is made of this diſtemper. The Embaſſador himſelf was ſeized with it, and Anne Bullen likewiſe; for at laſt it neither ſpared Engliſh nor foreigners, and our Ammonius, tho' an Italian, died of it in 1517, notwithſtanding his ſobriety, which he relied upon. On this occaſion Sir Thomas More wrote to Eraſmus thus: In his, that is, among the many that are dead, (quod tibi quoque dolori eſſe doleo) Andrea noſtro Ammonio, in quo & literæ, & omnes boni magnam fecere jacturam. Is valde ſibi videbatur adverſus contagionem victus moderatione munitus: qua factum putavit, ut quum in nullum pene incideret, cujus non tota familia laboraverat, neminem adhuc è ſuis id malum attigerit; id quod & mihi, & multis præterea jactavit non admodum multis horis antequam extinctus eſt, nam hoc ſudore nemo niſi primo die perit. Ego, uxorque & liberi adhuc intacti, reliqua familia tota revaluit. Hoc tibi affirmo, minus periculi in acie, quam in urbe eſſe (10). i. e. "Amongſt the dead "(which I know you alſo will be ſorry for) is Andrew Ammonius, in whom the learned world and "all good men have had a great loſs. He thought "himſelf ſufficiently defended againſt the contagion "by his temperance in diet: which he thought was "the cauſe, that, when there was hardly any body "ſeized with it whoſe whole family had been not "infected, all his own had eſcaped, of which he "boaſted to me and many others but a few hours "before he died, for no body dies of this ſweat but "on the firſt day. I and my wife and children have "eſcaped hitherto, and all the reſt of the family is "recovered. This I affirm to you, that there is leſs "danger in the fields than in the city.

(8) Le Grand, Hiſt. of Henry VIII's Divorce, tom. 1. p. 94; he quotes Godwin.
(9) See vol. 3, of his Hiſtory of Henry VIII: Divorce, p. 137, 152.
(10) Mori Epiſt. 4. lib. 7. inter Eraſmianas, p. 386.

* [It may not be improper in this place to add a more particular account of the Sweating Sickneſs, from our learned Caius, as he is quoted by Dr. Freind (1). *"It began at firſt in 1483, in Henry "the ſeventh's army, upon his landing at Milford-"Haven, and ſpread itſelf in London, from the 21ſt "of September to the end of October. It returned "here five times, and always in Summer: firſt in "1485; then in 1506; afterwards in 1517; when "it was ſo violent, that it killed in the ſpace of "three hours: ſo that many of the Nobility died, "and of the vulgar ſort, in ſeveral towns, half often periſhed. It appeared the fourth time in 1528, "and proved mortal then in the ſpace of ſix hours: "many of the Courtiers died of it, and Henry the "eighth himſelf was in danger. In 1529, and only "then, in 1517 [E]. One of the chief ſervices he did Eraſmus, was to ſend him now and then down to Cambridge ſtore of wine [F]. What he writes to him in one of his letters, viz. that the burning of ſo many Hereticks had raiſed the price of wood, muſt be looked upon as an Hyperbole [G].

(1) Hiſt. Phyſ. vol. 2. p. 333, &c.

" then, it infeſted the Netherlands and Germany, " in which laſt country it did much miſchief, and " deſtroyed many, and particularly was the occaſion " of interrupting a conference at Marpurgh between " Luther and Zuinglius about the Euchariſt. The " laſt return of it with us, was in 1551: in Weſt- " minſter it carried off 120 in a day, and the two " ſons of Charles Brandon, both Dukes of Suffolk, " dyed of it. At Shrewsbury particularly, where " our author Caius reſided, it broke out in a very " furious manner. The deſcription he gives of it is " terrible like the plague of Athens. He very pro- " perly calls it a peſtilent contagious fever, of one " natural day: the ſweat itſelf he reckons, only as " a ſymptom or criſis of this fever. The manner " of its ſeizure was thus: firſt it affected ſome par- " ticular part, attended with inward heat and burn- " ing, unquenchable thirſt, reſtleſsneſs, ſickneſs at " ſtomach and heart, (tho' ſeldom vomiting) head- " ach, delirium, then faintneſs and exceſſive drow- " ſineſs. The pulſe quick and vehement, and the " breath ſhort and labouring. Children, poor, and " old people leſs ſubject to it. Of others ſcarce any " eſcaped the attack, and moſt died: in that town, " where it laſted ſeven months, periſhed near a thou- " ſand. Even by travelling into France, or Flan- " ders: they did not eſcape: and what is ſtranger, " even the Scotch were free, and abroad the Eng- " liſh only affected, and Foreigners not affected in " England. None recovered under twenty four hours: " at firſt the Phyſicians were much puzzled how to " treat it; the only cure was to carry on the ſweat, " which was neceſſary, for a long time; for if ſtopt, " it was dangerous, or fatal. The way therefore " was to be patient, and lie ſtill, and not to take cold. " If nature was not ſtrong enough to do it, art " ſhould aſſiſt her in promoting the ſweat, by " cloaths, medicines, wine, &c. The violence of " it was over, in fifteen hours; but no ſecurity till " twenty four hours were paſſed. In ſome there " was a neceſſity to repeat the ſweating; in ſtrong " conſtitutions, twelve times. Great danger to re- " move out of bed; ſome who had not ſweated " enough fell into very ill fevers. No fleſh in all the " time, nor drink for the firſt five hours. For in " the ſeventh, the diſtemper encreaſes; about the " ninth, delirium; ſleep to be avoided by all means. " It appeared by experience, as the Lord Bacon ob- " ſerves, that this diſeaſe was rather a ſurprize of " nature, than obſtinate to remedies, if it were in " time well treated. For when proper care was " taken, the patient generally recovered."]

ADD. REM.

[E] He died in 1517.] As the Letter of Sir Thomas More I have juſt now quoted, is dated the 19th of Auguſt 1520, it ſeems that the death of Ammonius did not happen in 1517; for is it likely, that Sir Thomas More would have let three years paſs without mentioning it in his Letters to Eraſmus? I anſwer, that this objection does not at all counterballance the Letters, in which Eraſmus himſelf writes of the death of Ammonius. He obſerves in the 24th Letter of his ſecond book, and in the 20th of his third book, both dated 1518, that that year proved fatal to the men of learning, to Muſurus, Paleottus, Fauſtus Andrelinus, and Ammonius. In the 31ſt Letter of the third book, dated the 9th of September 1517, he mentions the death of Ammonius (11). There is no miſtake in the date of this Letter, for Eraſmus ſpeaks in it of the King of Spain's departing, as of a thing that happened then; and it is certain that he ſailed at the beginning of September 1517. Balæus therefore was miſtaken by a year, when he placed the death of Ammonius in 1518 (12); and Eraſmus might have truly ſaid in 1518, many great men are dead this year. For one of the Letters was written in March; and he, by the expreſſion this year meant the ten or twelve preceding months. This is confirmed by a Letter of Bombaſius (13), dated (and without any miſtake) the 6th of December 1517, wherein it is ſaid, that Muſurus died at Rome that Autumn, and that Paleottus died eight months before.

(11) Ammonij mortem acerbiſſime fero. Eraſmi Epiſt. 31. lib. 3. pag. 198.

(12) Apud Simlerum in Epitom. Geſneri.

(13) The 23d of the 2d book.

[F] He uſed to ſend down to Eraſmus at Cambridge ſtore of good wine.] In the Letters theſe two friends wrote to one another, they often mention the ſending of wine; but the following paſſage will better convince us than any other, that Eraſmus was no enemy to wine, and that he would have choſen to live in a place infected with the plague, rather than to drink water. Simul atque Anglicum ſolum tetigi, ubi locorum eſſes rogare cœpi, ſiquidem Cantabrigienſem peſtem fugere te ſcripſiſti. Unus tandem Sixtinus mihi dixit, te quidem Cantabrigiam ob peſtem reliquiſſe, & conceſſiſſe neſcio quo, ubi cum vini penuria laborares, & eo carere gravius peſte duceres, Cantabrigiam repetiiſſe, atque inibi te nunc eſſe. O fortem Baſſarei commilitonem, qui in ſummo periculo ducem deſerere nolueris (14). i. e. " As ſoon as I arrived in England, I began " to ask where you was, for you had writ me word " that you had fled from the plague at Cambridge. At " length I was told by Sixtinus alone, that you had left " Cambridge indeed on account of the plague, and " gone I know not whither; but when you found " you could get no wine, and thought that want to " be worſe than the plague, that you was gone to " Cambridge again, and was there at preſent. O " the brave fellow ſoldier of Bacchus, that would " not forſake your General in the greateſt danger.

(14) Ammonius Epiſt. ad Eraſm. inter Eraſmianas Ep. 40. lib. 8.

[G] What he writes to him in one of his letters, viz. that the burning of ſo many Hereticks (α) had raiſed the price of the wood, muſt be looked upon as an Hyperbole.] Theſe were neither the Papiſts, nor the Proteſtants, whom Henry VIII perſecuted, without diſtinction, after he had denied the Pope's Supremacy. They differed widely from both, for the letter, in which mention is made of the puniſhments inflicted upon them, bears date November 1511. All the fires that they could kindle, were not ſufficient to root them out, as appears from what follows. Lignorum precium auctum eſſe non miror, multi quotidie Hæretici holocauſtum nobis præbent, plures tamen ſuccreſcunt. Quin & frater germanus mei Thomæ, ſtipes verius quam homo, ſectam (ſi diis placet) & ipſe inſtituit, & diſcipulos habet (15). That is, " I do not wonder that the price of " wood riſes, for we have many hereticks ſacrificed " every day, and yet more come up in their room. " Nay my Thomas's own brother, more a ſtock than " man, has inſtituted a ſect of his own forſooth, and " has diſciples.

(15) Ammonius Ep. 8. lib. 8. inter Eraſmianas, pag. 410.

§ (α) They were ſome Wickliffiſts who ſtill remained. See Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation. REM. CRIT.

(a) So he is named by Eraſmus. Valerius Andreas calls him Lævinus.

AMMONIUS (LIVINUS) (a) diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the Carthuſians of Flanders, not only by the employment of Procurator, with which he was honoured in Ghent, his native country, but likewiſe by his learning and piety (b). He was greatly eſteemed by Eraſmus, who, as appears from two letters he wrote to him, looked upon him, as one who had got the better of the prejudices and paſſions which are common to men of his profeſſion [A]. He imparted, in confidence, to Eraſmus the uneaſineſs he

(b) Livinus Ammonius vir eruditione juxta ac pietate inſignis. Eraſmi, Epiſt. 23. lib. 28. page 1704.

[A] Eraſmus looks upon him as one who had got the better of the prejudices and paſſions which are common to men of his profeſſion.] Otherwiſe Eraſmus would never have been ſo free with him as to write to him, that the enemy of mankind had been concerned in the inſtitution of Cloyſters; tho' he might he was under, and the reſolution he had taken to bear with patience the hardſhips of his condition. No doubt but he wiſhed for more leiſure to improve his mind with better ſtudies; but that was what his ſuperiors did not like, chuſing rather to keep him in ignorance, and wholly taken up with the external obſervances of the Order. He deſerved however to be ranked among authors, and the titles of his works are to be found in Moreri; but the citation of Vander Linden is not to be depended upon [B]. (c) The 94th of the 20th book, and the 20th of the 25th.

might well have told him, that the moſt ſtupid and ignorant are generally the moſt eſteemed in the Monaſteries, where the chief merit is placed in obſerving with exactneſs their rules and ceremonies. Quum interdum mecum reputo, Ammoni cariſſime, cujuſmodi ingenia premantur ac ſepeliantur in iſtis ceremoniis, interdum ſubit animum cogitato fortaſſis humana, iſtiuſmodi vitæ ergaſtula non ſine inſtinctu Satanæ fuiſſe inducta. . . . Ac fere fit, ut quo quiſque indoctior ſtupidiorque eſt, hoc in iſto vitæ inſtituto pluris habeatur, tumidus fiducia ceremoniarum, & alieni ſpiritus iniquus æſtimator (1). i. e. "When "I ſometimes reflect, my dear Ammonius, what "genius's are oppreſſed and buried in thoſe cere- "monies, I cannot help thinking that ſuch Cloiſters "were inſtituted by the influence of Satan... and "it generally happens that the more unlearned and "ſtupid any one is, the more he is eſteemed in this "way of life, being vain with the dependance on "ceremonies, and an unjuſt judge of another's mind."

(1) Eraſm. Epiſt. 20. lib. 25. pag. 1361.

[B] The citation of Vander Linden is not to be depended upon.] This author did not write the Bibliotheca Belgica, where his name has been put for that of Valerius Andreas. It was the Catalogue of Phyſical Writers that he compoſed.

☞AMONTONS (WILLIAM) was born the laſt day of Auguſt 1663. His father was a Lawyer, who having left Normandy ſettled at Paris. Mr. Amontons was ſtill in the third form of the Latin School, when after a conſiderable illneſs he remained ſo deaf, that he was obliged to renounce almoſt all converſation with men. Being thus abandoned to his own reflections, he began to think of inventing new machines, and undertook at firſt one of the moſt difficult deſigns in Mechanicks, or perhaps the only one that is impoſſible, I mean, the perpetual motion. He ſoon found out that there were ſome principles in that Science which he muſt abſolutely know, if he would not ſpend his time and labour in vain. He applied himſelf therefore to the ſtudy of Geometry, though his relations endeavoured to diſſuade him from it, in which they were certainly in the right, if the Sciences are conſidered only as a way to preferments. It is poſitively affirmed, that Mr. Amontons would never employ any remedy to cure his deafneſs, either becauſe he thought it incurable, or becauſe it increaſed his attention, like that antient Philoſopher who is ſaid to have put out his eyes, that he might not be diſturbed in his profound meditations. Mr. Amontons applied himſelf to the arts of Drawing, of Surveying Lands, and of Building; but in a ſhort time he formed a more noble deſign, and added to that part of Mechanicks which relates to the common arts and neceſſaries of life, the knowledge of thoſe more ſublime laws which regulate the whole Univerſe. He ſtudied with great care what regards the Barometers, Thermometers, and Hygroſcopes, and in the year 1687, being yet but twenty four years of age, he preſented a new Hygroſcope to the Royal Academy of Sciences, which was very much approved. He alſo propoſed to Mr. Hubin, a famous Enameller, the thoughts he had conceived concerning new Barometers and Thermometers, but Mr. Hubin had prevented him in ſome of his thoughts, and did not much regard the other, till he made a voyage into England, where the ſame thoughts were propoſed to him by ſome of the Fellows of the Royal Society. There is an invention of Mr. Amontons, which may perhaps be looked upon only as a piece of wit, and nevertheleſs is very ingenious; he found out a method to acquaint people at a great diſtance in a very little time of whatever one pleaſed [A], ſo that a perſon at Paris, for inſtance, might in three or four hours time acquaint a perſon at Rome with a piece of news, without diſcovering it to any one elſe in the whole interval between thoſe two cities. In the year 1695 Mr. Amontons publiſhed a book intitled, Remarques & experiences Phyſiques ſur la conſtruction d'une Nouvelle Clepſydre, ſur les Barometres, Thermometres & Hygrometres (a). That is, "Obſer- "vations and Experiments concerning the manner of making a new Hour-glaſs, and "concerning Barometers, Thermometers, and Hygroſcopes." This is the only book which he wrote, beſides the pieces, which we have of him in the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences, and in the Journal des Sçavans. Tho' the Hour-glaſſes made with water, ſo much in uſe among the Ancients, be entirely laid aſide, becauſe the Clocks and Watches are much more uſeful, yet Mr. Amontons took a great deal of pains in making his new Hour-glaſs, being in hopes that it might ſerve at Sea, it being made in ſuch

(a) Printed at Paris, in 12mo.

[A] A method to acquaint people at a great diſtance of whatever one pleaſed, in a very little time.] The method was as follows. Let there be people placed in ſeveral ſtations at ſuch a diſtance from one another, that by the help of a teleſcope a man in one ſtation may ſee a ſignal made in that next before him; he muſt immediately make the ſame ſignal that it may be ſeen by perſons in the ſtation next after him, who communicate it to thoſe in the following ſtation, and ſo on. Theſe ſignals may be as letters of the Alphabet, or as a cypher underſtood only by the perſons who are in the two diſtant places, and not by thoſe who make the ſignals. The perſon in the ſecond ſtation making the ſignal to the perſon in the third, the very moment he ſees it made in the firſt, the news may be carried to the greateſt diſtance in as little time as is neceſſary to make the ſignals in the firſt ſtation. The diſtance of the ſeveral ſtations, which muſt be as few as is poſſible, is meaſured by the reach of a teleſcope. Mr. Amontons tried this method in a ſmall tract of land before ſeveral perſons of the higheſt rank at the court of France. For tho' he had not the art of introducing himſelf into the world, yet his merit had made him known to the greateſt Princes (1).

(1) Fontenelle, Hiſt. & Mem. de l'Academ. des Sciences, ann. 1705, p. 191.

ſuch a manner, that the moſt violent motion could not alter the regularity of its flowing, whereas a great agitation infallibly diſorders a Clock or a Watch. One may ſee in Mr. Amontons's book with how much art his Hour-glaſs was made, and there is no probability that he fell in with any thing of what the Ancients had invented. When in 1699 the Royal Academy was newly regulated, Mr. Amontons was admitted a Member of it, and read there that ſame year his new Theory of Friction (b), in which he has happily cleared up a very important part of the Mechanicks. Afterwards he produced his new Thermometer, an invention not only uſeful in practice, but which alſo opens a new ſcene for ſpeculation. We ſhall give in a remark a catalogue of all the pieces which Mr. Amontons [B] either read in the Royal Academy, or which are printed in the Journal des Sçavans. Amontons had a particular genius for making experiments; his notions were delicate and juſt; he knew how to prevent the inconveniencies of his new inventions, and had a wonderful ſkill in executing them, ſo that the ſpirit of the famous Mariote, ſo famous for the ſame talents, ſeemed to revive in him. He enjoyed a perfect health, and as he led a very regular life, he was not ſubject to the (b) Concerning bodies, whoſe motion is retarded by their rubbing againſt one another.

[B] A Catalogue of Mr. Amontons's writings.] Beſides the book mentioned in the text of this article, he wrote Deſcription d'un Hygrometre nouveau; i. e. "A Deſcription of a new Hygroſcope," inſerted in the Journal des Sçavans of March the 8th, 1688 (2). Lettre touchant la Conſtruction d'un nouveau tube pour faire le vuide à une ſi petite hauteur perpendiculaire qu'on voudra; i. e. "A Letter concerning the "conſtruction of a new tube, to make a vacuum at a "perpendicular but as little a height as is deſired," inſerted in the ſame Journal March the 10th, 1688 (3). Both theſe pieces have been tranſlated into Latin, and inſerted in the Tranſactions of Leipſic (4). Moyen de ſubſtituer commodement l'action du feu a la force des hommes & des chevaux. i. e. "A Method "to employ eaſily the activity of the fire, inſtead "of the ſtrength of men or horſes," inſerted in the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences (5). De la reſiſtence cauſée dans les machines, tant par les frottemans des parties, qui les compoſent; que par la roideur des cordes qu'on y employe, & la maniére de calculer l'un & l'autre; i. e. "Of the reſiſtance "produced in machines, not only by the friction "of their ſeveral parts, but alſo by the ſtiffneſs of "the ropes employed in them; with a method to "calculate the reſiſtance produced by both theſe "cauſes." Mr. Amontons added to this piece a table of the different degrees of reſiſtance. All this is inſerted in the ſame Memoirs (6). Diſcours ſur quelques proprietez de l'air, & le moyen d'en connoitre la temperature dans tous les climats de la terre. i. e. "A Diſcourſe upon ſome qualities of the air; "with a method to know its temperature in every "climate of the earth (7)." Mr. Amontons gives us in this Diſcourſe a deſcription of a new and accurate Thermometer, and tells us that in order to pitch upon a fixed degree of heat he takes boiling water, becauſe he has found by experience, that when water boils, it has the greateſt degree of heat it can ever have, ſo that here is a common ſtandard, which every one may eaſily know. But Mr. Bernard in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (8) made ſome objections againſt Mr. Amontons's ſuppoſition, which the reader will perhaps be pleaſed to find here. "The water boils, ſays he, when its parts have mo- "tion enough to ſurmount the weight of the air, "which preſſes upon it, and bubble up. But it is "not true, that the ſame degree of heat is always "requiſite to produce that effect; for according as "the air will be more or leſs heavy, or, which a- "mounts to the ſame, according as it will be more "or leſs elaſtic, the water will want more or leſs "heat, or more or leſs ſtrength to bubble up, that "is to ſurmount the preſſion of the air: ſo that in "thoſe places, where the quick-ſilver is ſupported "at a greater height in the Barometer, water, when "boiling, will be hotter, than on thoſe places "where the quick-ſilver falls lower, and in one and "the ſame country, according as the weather will "be dry or wet, water, when boiling, will be "more or leſs hot, becauſe it will want more or "leſs heat in order to boil, that is, to ſurmount the "reſiſtance of the air. This obſervation is ſo cer- "tain, that if water, which to the touch appears "but luke-warm, and conſequently is ſtill very far "from boiling, be put under the recipient, it be- "gins to boil as ſoon as the air is drawn out of "the recipient. I might obſerve further, that all "ſorts of waters not being equally heavy, the ſame "degree of heat is not requiſite to make them boil." Notwithſtanding theſe obſervations, which ſeem very juſt, it may be affirmed, that the heat of boiling water is a ſtandard as exact as can be deſired in matters of natural Philoſophy, in which we muſt not hope ever to attain a mathematical exactneſs. In his Diſcourſe which gave us occaſion to make theſe remarks, Mr. Amontons proves, that "one and the "ſame degree of heat, tho' never ſo little, can en- "creaſe more and more the power of the air's ela- "ſticity or ſpring, provided the weight, with which "the air is preſſed, becomes greater and greater." And in another Diſcourſe (9) he proves, that "the "new experiments we have concerning the weight "and elaſticity of the air make it known, that a "very ſmall degree of heat can reduce the air in- "to ſo violent a condition, as alone to cauſe the "moſt terrible earth-quakes." That ſame year, he read a Diſcourſe intitled, Le Thermometre reduit à une meſure fixe & certaine; & les moyens d'y rapporter les obſervations faites avec les anciens Thermometres; i. e. "The Thermometer reduced to a fixed and "determinate meaſure, with a method to determine "by it the obſervations made by the ancient Ther- "mometers." On the 24th of July 1703 Mr. Geoffry read before the Academy of Sciences at Paris a Table of the different degrees of heat extracted from the Philoſophical Tranſactions (10), and the 4th of Auguſt 1703 Mr. Amontons made ſome obſervations (11) upon that Table. He ſays there, that there is no reaſon to place the fixed degree of heat or cold to the inſtant in which water begins to freeze, as the author of that Table does, ſince there are other liquors which freeze with more or leſs difficulty than water. But to this it might be anſwered, that water being the moſt common of all liquors, this was a ſufficient reaſon to make uſe of it. We make this obſervation only to ſhew that the moſt ingenious authors love ſometimes to cavil. In 1704 he wrote a piece (12) to ſhew that all the effects of the Barometers either double or ſingle, which had been made till then, were produced not only by the greater or leſſer weight of the air, but alſo by its greater or leſſer heat, and gave a method to prevent ſuch a defect for the future. That ſame year he read another Diſcourſe upon Barometers (13). In 1705 he gave a deſcription of a Barometer without mercury, to be uſed at ſea (14). He alſo ſhewed in another Diſcourſe, that "thoſe experiments, which are "alledged to prove, that liquors are condenſed and "cooled immediately before they are dilated or "rarified at the approach of heat, do not prove any "ſuch thing, but that this apparent condenſation "is only the effect of the dilatation of the glaſs, "or the other veſſels in which theſe liquors are con- "tained (15)." That ſame year he communicated to the Academy "the experiments on the chymical "liqueſactions, and cold fermentations made by Mr. "Geoffry, and repeated in the vaults of the Aca- "demy's Obſervatory (16)." And likewiſe ſome experiments concerning the rarefaction of the air (17). Laſtly, he read four Diſcourſes concerning the height of the quick-ſilver in Barometers (18). This is all the account we can give of Mr. Amontons's writing. A fuller account would require draughts, which are not proper for a work of this kind.

(2) Niceron, Mem. pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hom. Illuſt. tom. 13. p. 355.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 356.

(4) Acta Eruditorum, ann. 1688, p. 374, 376.

(5) An. 1699. p. 154.

(6) Pag. 157--182.

(7) Mem. de l'Acad. des Scien. Ann. 1702, pag. 204, &c.

(8) Ann. 1706, Sept. pag. 253.

(9) Mem. de l'Acad. des Scienc. Ann. 1703. pag. 125.

(10) Of April 1701.

(11) Extant in the Mem. de l'Acad. 1703, pag. 233.

(12) In the Memoirs for that year.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Ibid. Ann. 1705. p. 62.

(15) Ibid. p. 100, &c.

(16) Ibid. pag. 111.

(17) Ibid. p. 155.

(18) Ibid. the three firſt from p. 300 to 310, the fourth in p. 352, &c.

the leaſt infirmity, but all of a ſudden he was ſeized with an inflammation in his bowels, which ſoon mortifying, became the occaſion of his death, which happened the eleventh of October (c) 1705, he being then forty two years and near two months old. He had a wife, by whom he left but one daughter, aged two months at the time of his deceaſe. When death ſnatched him away he was meditating ſome new and uſeful inventions concerning Printing, Building of Ships, and the Plough. What we have of him ſhews, that whatever he thought poſſible muſt be ſo beyond exception, for the genius of invention, which generally ſpeaking is ſubtle, bold, and ſometimes too preſuming, was in him attended with all the judgment, caution, and even diffidence, that was neceſſary to aſcertain the ſucceſs of his new diſcoveries. His moral character was not leſs ſhining than his philoſophical genius. A natural honeſty appeared through all his conduct, with ſo little affectation, that one might eaſily perceive he could never deviate from it. His candor and ſincerity were ſuch, that if he could maintain them in the little correſpondence he had with men, he would never have acquired them by converſing with mankind. His modeſty and baſhfulneſs hindered him from rendering himſelf known otherwiſe than by his works, and his merit alone making his court for him, it was almoſt impoſſible for him to advance in the way to preferment (d). This is Mr. de Fontenelle's reflection, which is very little to the honour of the preſent age.

(c) The Author of the Nouvelles de la Repub. les Lett. is miſtaken, when he places Mr. Amonton's death in the latter end of Sept. See Rep. des Let. 1706. Fevrier, p. 217.

(d) Hiſt. & Mem. de l'Academie des Sciences, Ann. 1705, pag. 189, 194. Dutch edit.

AMPHARES, one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori, was the chief means of the tragical death of King Agis. We have related elſewhere (a), that this Prince, after the reſtoration of Leonidas his Collegue, took ſanctuary in a temple, whither Amphares, and many others went frequently to viſit him with great familiarity, and uſed to accompany him when he went from thence to the baths, and from them back to the temple. But one day as he was returning home, Amphares ſeized him in order to oblige him to appear before the Ephori, and give an account of his conduct. He was hurried away to priſon, whither the Ephori, and their Aſſiſtants went immediately to try him. The King proteſted, that he had had no other deſign than to ſettle matters on the ſame foot as Lycurgus had left them, and that he ſhould never repent of ſuch a commendable deſign. It was upon this they condemned him to death, and commanded him to be carried to the place of execution (b). But thoſe, whoſe province that was, thought it ſuch a ſtrange and unheard of thing to lay their hands on the King's perſon, that they ſhewed themſelves averſe from complying with that order (c); inſomuch that Demochares, one of Amphares's friends, was obliged to take the executing of it upon himſelf. In the mean time Ageſiſtrata, mother of Agis, being informed of the danger her ſon was in, haſtened to the gate of the priſon, with Archidamia her mother, demanding that her ſon might be allowed to plead his cauſe before the people. Upon this Agis was immediately ſtrangled; and at the ſame time Amphares came out to aſſure Ageſiſtrata that no harm ſhould be done to her ſon, and that both ſhe and her mother, if they pleaſed, might go in and ſee him. They both went into the priſon; but Amphares cauſed Archidamia immediately to be hanged, and Ageſiſtrata to be conducted to the place where her mother had been executed. The firſt object that preſented it ſelf to the eyes of this Lady, was the body of her ſon lying on the ground, and that of her mother hanging by it. She helped the executioners to take it down, laid it on the ground by the body of her ſon, and kiſſing Agis, cried out, that he had undone himſelf, and drawn them into that misfortune by his too great lenity and good-nature. At theſe words Amphares told her, that ſince ſhe approved of her ſon's conduct, ſhe ſhould be treated after the ſame manner. Ageſiſtrata, without any ſurprize, offered her neck to the executioner, only ſaying, that ſhe heartily wiſhed the whole might redound to the good and welfare of her country (d). The people were highly provoked at ſuch a violent and extraordinary proceeding, but came to no reſolution; for the maxim, People make a great noiſe, and then grow eaſy, which is proper on a thouſand occaſions, proved very true on this. The fear Amphares was in of being obliged to return to Ageſiſtrata what ſhe had lent him, inſpired him with ſuch a wicked reſolution. Plutarch, to whom I am indebted for this article, tells us what was ſaid on occaſion of King Agis's death [A]. I ſhall relate it, as I have promiſed to do (e).

(a) In the article AGIS.

(b) It was in the priſon, and called Decas.

(c) Ἀποστρεφομένης καὶ φυγόντας τὸ ἔργον, ὡς ὁ Θίμιτον ἀνδὰ νενομισμένον Βασιλέως σώματι τὰς χεῖρας προσφέρειν. Plutarch. in Agide, pag. 804.

(d) Μόνη γὰρ συνηνέγκαι ταῦτα τῇ Σπάρτῃ Plutarch. in Agide, p. 804.

(e) In the article of AGIS.

AMPHIARAUS,

[A] Plutarch tells us what was ſaid on occaſion of King Agis's death.] Theſe three executions did not ſtrike ſuch terror into the people, that they durſt not ſhew their concern for Agis, or hatred to Leonidas and Amphares. They looked upon the putting of theſe three perſons to death, as the moſt enormous and deteſtable crime that had been committed at Lacedæmon from the firſt coming of the Dorians into Peloponneſus, to that time. For even the enemies had a particular regard, in the heat of the battles, for the perſon of the Kings of Sparta; and uſed, out of veneration to the Majeſty of thoſe Princes, to face about, when they ſaw them coming up to them. And this is the reaſon, why the Spartans in ſo many battles with the other nations of Greece had loſt but one King (1), till the time of Philip father to Alexander the Great. They did not allow the Maſſenians, that Theopompus had been killed by Ariſtodemus, but that he had been only wounded by him. Agis was the firſt King that was put to death in the city; a Prince, who had formed a very noble deſign, and worthy of his country, at an age which makes men wink at ſome faults and overſights. His friends had better reaſon to complain of him than his enemies; his friends, I ſay, for they reproached him with too much good nature and indulgence, with ſaving Leonidas, and truſting others. His mother's words deſerve to be recorded; Ἡ πολλή σε, ὦ παῖ, εὐλάβεια καὶ τὸ πρᾶον καὶ φιλάνθρωπον ἀπόλεσε μεθ' ἡμῶν. i. e. "O ſon, "your great modeſty, good nature, and humanity "have deſtroyed you and us." This is what Plutarch relates in the Life of Agis.

(1) Viz. Cleombrotus at the battle of Leuctra.

I have related preciſely what Plutarch ſays; but now

AMPHIARAUS, one of the moſt celebrated Prophets among the Pagans, was ſon to Oïcleus, and great-grandſon to Melampus [A], who had received part of the Kingdom of Argos as a reward for a very conſiderable piece of ſervice he had done the women of that country (a). This diviſion of the Kingdom occaſioned the diſcords that reigned in the time of Adraſtus King of Argos, who, not being able to withſtand Amphiaraüs's party, was forced to abandon his Kingdom (b). For Amphiaraüs had uſurped the crown, after having put to death Talaüs, Adraſtus's father (c). However the match that was afterwards concluded between Amphiaraüs and Eriphyle, ſiſter to Adraſtus, put an end to that quarrel, and reſtored Adraſtus to his throne. I mention this elſewhere (d); and alſo the new broils, in which Eriphyle, to whom both parties had referred the difference, decided in favour of Adraſtus to the prejudice of her huſband. The trick ſhe played her huſband, during the preparations for the expedition of Thebes, was a very baſe action. Amphiaraüs, knowing by the ſpirit of Prophecy, that he ſhould loſe his life in that war, hid himſelf in order to avoid it, but his wife being prevailed upon by a preſent, diſcovered the place he lay hid in (e), ſo that he was forced to accompany the other Princes in that expedition, which proved fatal to him; for the earth being ſplit aſunder by a thunderbolt, both he and his chariot were ſwallowed up in the opening [B]. Thoſe who write that this happened the very day the army encamped before Thebes are miſtaken (f), for he died the day of the retreat, and

(a) See the article of MELAMPUS.

(b) Pindarus, Od. 9. Nemeor. pag. 608.

(c) See Benoit, Comments upon Pindar, ibid. p. 608, 609.

(d) See Note [F] of the article ADRASTUS.

(e) See the article ALCMEON ſon of Amphiaraus.

(f) Charles Stephens and Lloyd in their Dictionaries. Oliver on Val. Max. near the end of the 8th book, and divers others.

now ſhall add to his account one reflection, which is, that in Hiſtory we ſhall find that more good-natured, or weak Princes, have been driven from the throne on account of their good nature and weakneſs, than bad Princes by reaſon of their wickedneſs. The latter find in their own wickedneſs more reſources againſt all the contrivances of their enemies, than the former in the juſtice of their cauſe, or the loyalty of their ſubjects. See note [F] in the article upon EDWARD IV.

[A] Amphiaraüs was great-grandſon to Melampus.] Here follows the Genealogy of Amphiaraüs. His father Oïcleus was ſon of Antiphates, ſon of Melampus, ſon of Amythaon, ſon of Cretheus and Tyro, which Tyro was daughter of Salmoneus, who reckoned Deucalion as his great-grandfather by the father's ſide (1). This is what we are told by Diodorus Siculus. Homer (2) goes no higher than to Melampus, father of Antiphates, father of Oïcleus, father of Amphiaraüs. Melampus was, according to theſe two authors, great-grandfather to Amphiaraüs; but, according to the Scholiaſt of Æſchylus, only his grandfather; for he diſpoſes the generations thus: Amphiaraüs ſon of Oïcleus, ſon of Melampus, ſon of Amythaon, ſon of Cretheus, ſon of Æolus, ſon of Hellen, ſon of Jupiter (3). We muſt not forget, that Hypermneſtra (4) daughter of Theſtius (5) was Amphiaraüs's mother, and that Apollo, according to ſome authors, was his father (6). We read in Apollodorus, as well as in the Scholiaſt of Æſchylus, that Cretheus was ſon of Æolus (7); and, of courſe, brother of Salmoneus, of Siſyphus &c. Tyro, his niece, had had two twins by Neptune, before ſhe was married to him, viz. Pelias and Neleus (8). He had three ſons by her, viz. Æſon, Amythaon, and Pheres (9). See Apollodorus, where you will find that Amphiaraüs was related to almoſt all the illuſtrious perſons of Greece.

(1) Diodorus Siculus lib. 4. cap. 70. p. 257, 258.

(2) Homerus, Odyſſ. lib. 15. p. 460, 461.

(3) Schol. Æſch. in ſeptem ad Thebas, ver. 575.

(4) Pauſan. lib. 2. p. 63.

(5) Hygin. cap. 70.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Apollod. lib. 1. pag. 27, 43.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 45.

[B] Both he and his chariot were ſwallowed up in the opening.] Pindar and Apollodorus are in the number of thoſe, who tell us, that the earth was ſplit aſunder by a thunder-bolt, and that Jupiter did it out of kindneſs to him; becauſe otherwiſe he had had the diſhonour to be killed by Periclymenes, who purſued him.

ὁ δ' Ἀμφιάρεϊ σχίσεν κεραυνῷ πατρὸς ἐξ
Ζηνὸς τὰν βαθύστερνον χθόνα, κρύψεν δ' ἅμ' ἵπποις,
ἀνδρὶ Περικλυμένῳ πρὶν
νῶτα τυπέντα μαχατὰν θυμὸν αἰσχυνθῆμεν (10).

(10) Pindari, Nemeor. Od. 9. p. 611, 612. See Apollodorus, l. 3. pag. 193.

" Now Periclymenes drew near,
" And aiming well his pointed ſpear
" Had pierc'd Amphiaraüs back
" With a diſgraceful wound:
" But pitying Jove inclin'd to ſave
" The honour of a man ſo brave,
" His pow'rful light'ning threw,
" Which gave the earth a hideous crack.
" Down ſunk the Hero and his horſes too
" Within the yawning ground."

From this paſſage, and another of the ſame Poet (11) appears, that Amphiaraüs, and his chariot were ſwallowed up at the ſame time; and this is the common tradition (12), tho' we are told by ſome, that his chariot, (he being fallen from it in the battle) was carried empty to another place (13). As the temple of Amphiaraüs ſtood at ſome diſtance from a certain village, called Harma (which name it muſt have had from his chariot) they ſuppoſe, that the temple was raiſed in the place, where the Prophet died, and the village built in the place, whither his chariot had been carried (14). Pauſanias calls it a city, and ſays in expreſs terms, that it was built in the place, where Amphiaraüs and his chariot were ſuppoſed to have been ſwallowed up by the earth (15). This was the opinion of the Tanagrians; but the Thebans ſhewed another place on the high-way, that leads from Potniæ to Thebes, ſurrounded with pillars, of which they told the two following miracles, viz. that the birds never ſettled upon them, and that no animal ever offered to touch the graſs that grew there (16). Stephanus Byzantinus tells us, in contradiction both to the common tradition, and to the very author he quotes (17), that the city of Harma was ſo called, becauſe Amphiaraüs retired thither on his chariot and the inhabitants refuſed to deliver him to thoſe who purſued him (18). Does he not ſuppoſe thereby, that he ſaved himſelf, and gave the lye to a great many authors, who take for granted, that he was ſwallowed up by the earth? The great Salmaſius imagined, that two or three words were wanting in this article of Stephanus Byzantinus; namely, that after mentioning the chariot of Amphiaraüs, he ſpoke of the chariot of Adraſtus, to whom belongs what he relates about the denial of the inhabitants (19). This is a very ingenious conjecture, and may be confirmed by a paſſage out of Strabo, where we are told, that the inhabitants of Harma in Bœotia, ſaved Adraſtus, after his chariot had been broke in that place (20). There is no room for ſuch a conjecture in favour of Euſtathius; it being plain, that, according to him (21), Amphiaraüs and not Adraſtus was ſaved by thoſe of Harma.

(11) Pindar. Od. 6. Olymp. p. 98.

(12) See Diodorus Siculus, l. 4. cap. 68.

(13) Strabo, lib. 9. p. 278.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 296.

(16) Idem, ibid. p. 288.

(17) He quotes Pauſanias, l. 9.

(18) Steph. Byzant. at the word Ἅρμα.

(19) See Berkelius's notes on this paſſage of StephanusByzantinus.

(20) Strabo, lib. 9. p. 278.

(21) Euſtath. in Iliad. l. 2. pag. 266.

It is to be obſerved here, that Strabo fell into a miſtake, which Salmaſius takes care to cenſure. Ἐν ταύτῃ δέ πῃ, καὶ τὸ Ἀμφιαράειον ἐστὶ τετιμημένον ποτὲ μαντεῖον, ὅπῃ φυγόντα τὸν Ἀμφιάραον, ὡς φησὶ Σοφοκλῆς,

Ἐδέξατο μεγῆσα Θηβαία χθὼν
Αὐτοῖσιν ὅπλοις, καὶ τετρωρίστῳ δίφρῳ (22).

(22) Strabo, l. 9. p. 275.

That is, " About which place there is an Oracle of " Amphiaraüs, that was formerly much regarded, " where, according to Sophocles,

" The Theban earth wide gaping ſwallow'd up
" Arms, horſes, chariot, and the charioteer."

and the ſiege had laſted ſome time. This tragical adventure has afforded matter to a great many writers, and from thence it proceeds, that the circumſtances of it have been related very differently. This kind of death gave occaſion to ſome bad reflections [C]. The Strabo intends to prove, that the Oracle of Amphiaraüs, in the territory of Oropus, ſtood in the place, where that Diviner had been ſwallowed up by the earth; and to this purpoſe produces two verſes from Sophocles, in which it is averred, that the earth opened in the territory of Thebes, to ſwallow up Amphiaraüs and his chariot. This is what Salmaſius cenſures, and indeed with a great deal of reaſon (23). Iſaac Voſſius takes Strabo's part; but ſhews on this occaſion, that an eager deſire of finding out faults in the works of an adverſary, is a very dangerous guide. Deſinat quoque mirari, ſays he (24), quod multi Oropum urbem in regione ſive agro Thebano collocârint. Recte enim hoc ab illis factum, cum Oropus non ſui juris, ſed propria fuerit Thebanorum. Hoc manifeſte Dicæarchus docet, Ἡ δὲ πόλις τῶν Ὠρωπίων οἰκεῖα Θηβῶν ἐστί. i. e. "Let him ceaſe alſo to wonder, that many "have placed the city Oropus, in the country of "Thebes. For they were in the right ſo to do, "ſeeing Oropus was not a free town, but under the "juriſdiction of the Thebans; as is plainly told by "Dicæarchus, in theſe words, The city of the Oro- "pians belongs to the Thebans." In the firſt place, Dicæarchus's propoſition, taken without any limitation of time, is falſe; for Oropus was the ſubject of a long diſpute between the Athenians and Thebans, and at laſt conquered by the Athenians, after the city of Thebes was ſubdued by Philip King of Macedon (25). In the ſecond place, if Oropus belonged to the Thebans, it does not follow, that it was ſituate in the territory of Thebes, in agro Thebano. An author, whom Plutarch quotes, writes, that the city of Harma was built in the place, where the battle was fought between the Argians and Thebans, and where Amphiaraüs was ſwallowed up (26). This is a miſtake in point of Geography; but not near ſo ridiculous as the ſtory the ſame author tells us, that the day before the fight an eagle carried away the ſpear of Amphiaraüs, while the Generals were at dinner, flew up in the air with it, and that the ſpear falling down ſtuck in the ground, and became a tree, τὸ δὲ παγὲν ἐς γῆν δάφνη ἐγένετο (27). Here follow the words of the Scholiaſt of Statius, which have been cenſured: Civitas in illo loco poſt condita eſt, in quo hiatus terræ Amphiaraüm recepit, quæ Amphiarma vocatur, ut Homerus ait, quod illic currus, quem Græci ἅρμα vocant, deciderit, in quo etiam oraculum eſt, quod Græcè Amphiaraon vocatur. i. e. "A city was af- "terwards built in the place, where the opening of "the earth ſwallowed up Amphiaraüs, which is cal- "led Amphiarma, according to Homer, becauſe the "chariot, which in Greek is called ἅρμα, fell in "there, where there is alſo an Oracle called in Greek "Amphiaraon." Barthius pretends (28), that the Scholiaſt's quotation is no ways to the purpoſe, becauſe no ſuch thing is ſpoken of in that book of the Odiſſey, where mention is made of Amphiaraüs (29). He adds, that perhaps Homer's name was interpolated by a miſtake of the tranſcribers; and that, if this excuſe be not admitted, we muſt own that the Scholiaſt's memory failed him; a fault pretty familiar to him, as well as to many others. Vel alium ergo autorem nominavit, intruſo nunc Homeri titulo, Lutatius, vel errorem erravit, nec ipſi inſolitum, nec aliis paris momenti auctoribus infrequentem (30). This cenſure is not juſt, there are other miſtakes here that better deſerved to be cenſured; for firſt the town that was built in the place where Amphiaraüs periſhed, was called Harma, and not Amphiarma. Secondly, Homer only names it, without making any remarks on its etymology; Οἵ ῥ' ἀμφὶ ἅρμα νίμοντο (31); i. e. "And thoſe who lived about Harma." Thirdly, the Oracle of that Prophet was not at Harma.

I ſhall cloſe this remark with a paſſage out of Barthius, who acquaints us, that ſome have fancied the Pagans in this adventure alluded to the puniſhment inflicted upon Corah and Abiram. Placet non plane abſurdam conjecturam veteris adnotatoris proponere, per hunc caſum alludi à Paganis ſcriptoribus ad vindictam divinam in ſacerdotes Hebræi populi, Datamum nimirum & Abiramum, quos non rite rebus ſacris miniſtrantes Deus omnipotens coram omni illa gente vivos ad inferos per hiatum terræ ſubitum dejecerit. Ei rei reſpondere nonnihil etiam poſterius dicti vocabulum; facile enim ex Abiramo gentilium deliria Amphiaraüm feciſſe, quem, Iſraelita gente jam eo loco remota, quo loco iſta abſorptio acciderit, conſecraſſe poſtea, Satana inſtituente oraculum. Et inde cultum impii hominis aliorſum longe lateque propagatum (32). i. e. "I would propoſe a conjecture of "an old annotator, that is not very abſurd; name- "ly, that the Pagan writers allude in this opening "of the earth to the divine vengeance that fell up- "on the Prieſts of the Hebrews, Dathan and Abi- "ram, whom the Almighty ſent alive to hell thro' "a ſudden opening of the earth before all the peo- "ple, becauſe they did not perform the divine rites "in a proper manner. That the name of the latter has "ſome reſemblance; for it was eaſy for the dreams "of the Gentiles to make Amphiaraüs out of Abi- "ram, whom they afterwards worſhipped, when the "Iſraelites were removed far from the place where "the judgment fell upon him, the Devil at the "ſame time forming an Oracle. And hence the "worſhip of that wicked man has ſpread far and "near."

[C] This kind of death gave occaſion to ſome bad reflections.] It was thought derogatory to the order eſtabliſhed by nature, according to which the parts of a compound that is deſtroyed, ought to return each of them to their proper place; for inſtance, when a man dies, his ſoul ought to return to heaven, from whence it came; and his body to the earth, of which it was formed. Now Amphiaraüs did not enjoy this common benefit; for the earth, having ſwallowed up both his body and ſoul, was not ſatisfied with what came to her ſhare, but retained what no ways belonged to her, which Theodamas the Diviner in a certain manner reproaches her with.

Liceat, pretor, ordine belli
Pugnaces efflare animas, & reddere cælo.
Nec rape tam ſubitis ſpirantia corpora buſtis.
Ne propera: veniemus enim quo limite cuncti
Qua licet ire via (33).

" O give us leave to breathe our warlike ſouls,
" In ranks of war, and ſend them back to heav'n.
" O do not ſnatch our bodies yet alive,
" Nor make ſuch haſty graves, we ſoon ſhall come
" The uſual way.———

A Commentator ſays to this purpoſe, Iniquitas manifeſta Telluri hic exprobratur, qua animam Amphiarai cum corpore egerit deorſum (34). i. e. "The Earth is "here evidently reproached with injuſtice, in ſwal- "lowing up the ſoul of Amphiaraüs with his body." He had juſt before related ſome very noble ſentiments of Epicharmus. Man was made up of two parts united together; they ſeparate, and each of them returns to the place from whence it came, the earth to the earth, and the ſpirit to heaven: there is nothing here to be found fault with. Καλῶς οὖν ὁ Ἐπίχαρμος συνκρίθη, φησὶ, καὶ διεκρίθη, καὶ ἀπῆλθεν ὅθεν ἦλθε πάλιν, γᾶ μὲν εἰς γᾶν, πνεῦμα δὲ ἀνώτω, τῶν δὲ χαλεπὸν; οὐδὲν ἔν (35). We often meet with this thought in the Pagan writers (36), and even in Lucretius, as I obſerve elſewhere (37); which ſhews, that they had at leaſt ſome dim knowledge of truth. But ſuch as imagined that the ſoul of Amphiaraüs was not allowed to return to its firſt principle, were in a very groſs error. For had it not been immaterial, but only of the nature of the Stars, yet it might have found its way out. Such Poets, as fancied that he fell alive into hell, made the return of his ſoul to the celeſtial regions ſtill more difficult; it being far more eaſy to riſe high, when one is already above the level of the earth, than in ſtarting from the center. But ſuch poetical fancies deſerve no attention; and perhaps my readers may take it amiſs, that I have copied the following verſes:

Ecce

(23) Salmaſ. Exercit. Plin. in Solin. p. 167.

(24) Iſaac Voſſius in Pompon. Melam. p. 152.

(23) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 33. See in Pinedo's notes upon Stephanus Byzantinus, at the word Ὠρωπὸς, ſome paſſages which prove that this town belonged to the Athenians.

(26) Triſimachus, lib. 3. de Conditis urbibus, apud Plutarch. in Parallelis, p. 307.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Barthius in Stat. Theb. l. 8. ver. 207. tom. 2. p. 831.

(29) Odyſſ. Θ, ver. 245.

(30) Barthius in Statij Theb. lib. 8. tom. 2. pag. 831.

(31) Homer. Il. lib. 2. ver. 499.

(32) Barth. in 7. lib. Thebaïd, Statij ver. 784, p. 773. tom. 3.

(33) Statius Thebaid. lib. 8. ver. 323.

(34) Barthius in Statium. tom. 3. pag. 862.

(35) Plutarch. de Conſolat. p. 110.

(36) See Barthius, who cites many of them in his Comments on Statius, tom. 2. pag. 284.

(37) In the remark [E] of the article PRUDENTIUS.

The Pagans believed, that Amphiaraüs returned from hell [D], and even pointed out the place of his reſurrection (g). He was ranked among the Gods; temples were dedicated to him, and his Oracle [E] as well as the ſports that were inſtituted in honour of

(g) See the quotation 45.

Ecce alte præceps humus, ore profundo
Diſſilit, inque vicem timuerunt ſydera, & umbræ.
Illum ingens haurit ſpecus, & tranſire parantes
Mergit equos, non arma manu, non fræna remiſit:
Sicut erat, rectos defert in Tartara currus (38).

(38) Statius Thebaid. lib. 7. ver. 816.

" The gaping earth diſclos'd a hideous wound,
" Down ſinks the Prophet, and his horſes ſtill,
" In act to draw. His arm ſtill ſhakes the ſpear;
" Still holds the reins; all down together go
" To hell.———

He came alive before the fatal ſiſters, who did not break off the thread of his life, till his appearing in the infernal regions, with his chariot, put them in a terrible fright.

Quin cominus ipſa
Fatorum deprenſa colus: viſoque paventes
Augure, tum demum rumpebant ſtamina Parcæ (39).

(39) Id. ib. lib. 8. ver. 11.

" The diſtaff of the fates was then ſurpriz'd;
" Nor did the trembling ſiſters break the thread,
" Before the ſeer appear'd.———

It will not ſeem ſo ſtrange, that I ſhould obſerve how the Poet contradicts himſelf. He ſuppoſes, that Amphiaraüs, a little before he was ſwallowed up, returned to Phœbus all the prophetical enſigns, as things he could not carry along with him to the kingdom of Pluto:

Accipe commiſſum capiti decus, accipe laurus
Quas Erebo deferre nefas (40).

(40) Idem, ibid. lib. 7. ver. 784.

" Receive the honours of my head, the Bays,
" Which cannot lawfully to hell be carried.

In another place he introduces Phœbus owning, that his Prophet came down to hell attired with all the enſigns of his dignity:

Utinam indulgere precanti
Fata darent! en ipſe mei (pudet) irritus arma
Cultoris, frondeſque ſacras, ad inania vidi
Tartara, & in memet verſos deſcendere vultus (41).

(41) Idem, ibid. lib. 9. ver. 652.

" O would the Fates but hear my earneſt pray'r!
" I ſaw but ſaw in vain my Prophet's arms,
" And ſacred leaves, and eyes caſt up to me,
" To hell deſcend.———

Barthius, who detected this contradiction, obſerves that ſeveral ſuch like are to be met with in this Poet's Thebais. Hoc genus plurima connivet magnanimus hic vates, & duodecim tamen annorum limam referre vult ſuam Thebaidem (42). i. e. "There are many "ſuch ſlips as theſe in this lofty Poet, notwithſtanding the twelve years he ſpent in correcting of his "Thebais."

(42) Barth. in Statium, tom. 3. p. 773.

[D] The Pagans believed that Amphiaraüs returned from hell.] Some authors affect to ſay, that he diſappeared: Ἀμφιάραος δὲ χανούσης τῆς γῆς ἐμπεσὼν εἰς τὸ χάσμα μετὰ τοῦ ἁρμάτος, ἀφανὴς ἐγένετο (43). i. e. "Amphiaraüs, when the earth opened, fell into the "chaſm with his chariot, and was ſeen no more." Apollodorus gives the reaſon of his diſappearing, which was, that Jupiter rendered him immortal. Ὁ δὲ σὺν τῷ ἅρματι ... ἐκρύφθη καὶ Ζεὺς ἀθάνατον αὐτὸν ἐποίησεν (44). i. e. "He and his chariot were ſeen no "more; for Jupiter made him immortal." This perhaps is what made the Rabbiniſts ſay, that the Pagans alluded to the hiſtory of Enoch. Other authors do not ſcruple to ſpeak plainly, but openly own, that Amphiaraüs died, and really deſcended into the Kingdom of Pluto; but that he afterwards returned to the upper regions. They even pointed out the place of his aſcenſion; which was a fountain near the temple, which the inhabitants of Oropus (45) had built him. This fountain was worſhipped after a very particular manner; for no ſacrifices were offered there; people neither uſed it in purifications, nor for waſhing their hands; but only uſed to throw a piece of gold, or ſilver coined into it, after they had recovered their health by means of the Oracle. Ἔστι δὲ Ὠρωπίοις πηγὴ πλησίον τοῦ ναοῦ, ἣν Ἀμφιαράου καλοῦσιν, οὔτε θύοντες αὐτὴν ἐς αὐτὴν, οὐδ' ἐπικαθαρσίοις ἢ χερνίβι χρῆσθαι νομίζοντες. Νόσου δὲ ἀπαλλαγῆς ἀνδρὶ μαντεύματος γενομένου, καθίεσαν ἄργυρον ἀφιᾶσι καὶ χρυσὸν ἐπίσημον ἐς τὴν πηγήν. ταύτῃ γὰρ ἀνελθεῖν τὸν Ἀμφιάραον λέγουσιν ἐκ θεοῦ (46). i. e. "There is a fountain at Oropus, near "the temple, and is called by the name of Amphiaraüs, in which they neither ſacrifice, nor think it "lawful to uſe the water to purify or waſh the hands. "Thoſe only who have recovered of ſome diſeaſe "by the advice of an Oracle caſt a gold or ſilver "coin into the fountain; for it is ſaid that Amphiaraüs roſe here when he was made a God." It is to be obſerved, that the reſurrection of Amphiaraüs was not univerſally believed, and ſome were not afraid to deny it in the public theatre; as appears from the following verſe quoted by Tully:

(43) Diod. Siculus, lib. 4.

(44) Apollodorus lib. 3. p. 193.

(45) A city ſituate between Attica and Bœotia.

(46) Pauſan. l. 1. p. 33.

Audiſne hæc, Amphiarae, ſub terram abdite (47).

(47) Cicero Tuſcul. Quæſtion. lib. 2. ſub finem

" Do'ſt thou hear this, O Amphiaraüs, that art hid " under the earth."

[E] Temples were dedicated to him; his Oracle became very famous.] The inhabitants of Oropus were the firſt who ranked him among the Gods, building him a temple diſtant twenty furlongs from their city, in the place where he had been ſwallowed up with his chariot (48). We have obſerved already (49), that authors do not agree about the true ſituation of the place, where that happened. But let that be as it will, all Greece approved the proceeding of the Oropians in deifying the Prophet, and agreed that his Oracle was to be conſulted in the temple they had built him (50). What greatly recommended him to the eſteem of the people, was, as we are told by Pauſanias, a Collection of Oracles in hexameter verſe, in which the author of that Collection had inſerted the Prophet's anſwer relating to the war of Thebes. This gained him a great deal of credit; for men were anciently poſſeſſed with this opinion, viz. that ſuch only, as were inſpired by Apollo, anſwered viva voce, that is by way of Oracle, to thoſe who came to conſult with them. The whole Province of the other Diviners was to interpret dreams, and declare to the people what was prognoſticated by the birds and victims. But how great ſoever was the advantage our Amphiaraüs gained thereby over his brethren; yet people were not perſuaded that he was to be put upon a level with Apollo; for they came to conſult with him only in order to have an anſwer while they were aſleep; which proves, that in his life time he applied himſelf chiefly to the interpretation of dreams. This ſeems to me the ſubſtance of what Pauſanias relates (51); which, as I find, has not been well tranſlated by Romulus Amaſæus, to whom I prefer Vigenere, tho' I cannot ſay, that his tranſlation is very exact. I ſhall give it ſuch as it is. Jophon the Cnoſſian one of the Interpreters of the Oracles, publiſhed thoſe of Amphiaraüs in hexameter verſe; which gained him the people to ſuch a degree, that all on a ſudden they flocked to him from all parts; for not one of the Soothſayers, except ſuch as were inſpired by Apollo, anſwered as Oracles; their province being either to interpret dreams, or to judge of future events by the flying of the birds, or the bowels of the victims. By this it ſeems, that Amphiaraüs applied himſelf chiefly to foretel things by dreams. From whence we may infer, that, after his apotheoſis, he gave riſe to this manner of divining. And ſuch as conſult him ought in the firſt place to be duly purified, which purification, or cleanſing, conſiſts in offering a proper ſacrifice to this God, and performing the ceremonies that are required either by him, or the others, whoſe names are written there. After this, and the ſacrificing of a weather, they ſpread his ſkin on the ground, and ſleep on it, expecting

(48) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 33.

(49) In remark [B].

(50) Pauſanias, lib. 1. pag. 33.

(51) Idem, ibid.

of this new God (b), were very famous. He was believed to excel chiefly in divining by dreams [F]; but that was not all, for he was the first that divined by fire. He was so provoked against his wife, that he enjoined the children he had by her to put her to petting the answer of the God, which is given to them, while asleep (52). Philostratus will acquaint us with some other ceremonies that were practised there. The Gods, says he (53), used to give answers to such as are sober. For there was in Greece a Prophet, called Amphiaraüs. Here the King interrupted him, saying, perhaps you mean the son of Jocleus, who in returning from Thebes, was swallowed up by the earth: the very person, answered Apollonius; who to this day gives Oracles in the territory of Athens, and sends dreams to those who demand them, on what subjects they please. But the Priests of the country enjoin those, who go thither for advice, to abstain one whole day from all manner of victuals, and three from wine; to the end that, their thoughts being thus purified, they may better understand, and hearken to the reasons of what will be revealed to them in their sleep. Now were wine a soporiferous medicine, Amphiaraüs would, no doubt, have prescribed it to such as were to dream; and ordered that they should not go down into the most retired parts of the temple, where answers were given, till they had filled their bellies with as much victuals as they could hold, and drank wine so as to be as full of that liquor, as a bottle. Remember, that Philostratus assures us, that in Apollonius's time, the Oracle of Amphiaraüs maintained the same reputation it formerly had; tho' Plutarch owns, that all the Oracles of Bœotia (54), and this among the others, had ceased (55). Neither ought we to quibble upon Apollonius's placing this Oracle in Attica, and not in Bœotia, as Plutarch does; for they both speak of the same place; but as the territory of Oropus was the subject of a long dispute between the Athenians and Thebans; the former pretending it belonged to Bœotia, and the latter that it was a part of Attica (56).) Some authors might have placed the temple of Amphiaraüs in Bœotia, and others in Attica. Clemens Alexandrinus is another evidence against Philostratus's Hero, for in objecting to the Pagans the silence of their Oracles, he makes express mention of the Oracle of Amphiaraüs (57). It will not be amiss to observe here by the by, that he also mentions him in another place, which has been corrupted by his translator †, which is as follows: Ἡ τὸν Ἀμφιάρεων τὸν σὺν τοῖς ἑπτὰ τοῖς ἐπὶ Θήβας στρατεύσασι μιᾷ γενεᾷ τῆς Ἰλίου ἁλώσεως πρεσβύτερον φερόμενον (58). i. e. "Or Amphiaraüs, who with the seven persons "that went to the Theban war is reckoned one "generation older than the taking of Troy."

(b) See Benoit upon Pindar, Od. 7. Olymp. pag. 143.

(52) Vigenere upon Philostratus's Amphiaraüs, p. 400. of vol. 1.

(53) Philostratus's Life of Apollonius, lib. 2. cap. 11. p. 478. I make use of Vigenere's translation.

(54) Plutarch. de Oraculorum defectu, p. 411.

(55) He excepts that of Leadea.

(56) See Pausanias, lib. 1. p. 33; and Strabo, l. 9. pag. 275.

(57) Clemens Alexandrin. in Protrept. p. 9.

† He translates πρεσβύτερον posterior instead of prior.

(58) Idem, Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 334. c. Barthius on Statius, tom. 2. pag. 138, adopts the translator's mistake, and ascribes it to Clemens Alexandrinus.

We learn from Herodotus in what esteem this Oracle was had; for he tells us, that of all the Oracles, which Crœsus King of Lydia, commanded to be consulted, this, and that of Delphi, were the only ones that gave proper answers, and received presents of that Prince (59). It is somewhat strange he should add, that the presents sent by Crœsus to the Oracle of Amphiaraüs, were placed in the temple of Apollo Ismeniensis, in the city of Thebes (60). Why were they not consecrated in Amphiaraüs's own temple, or, at least, sent to any other city, rather than to Thebes, whose inhabitants were upon very dishonourable terms with that oracle? For they were not allowed to sleep in Amphiaraüs's temple, which was the only means of consulting with him about future events. The reason of this prohibition was, that Amphiaraüs having left the Thebans to choose, whether they would be served by him as their Diviner, or as their companion in war, they chose to have him in the latter capacity; all this we read in Herodotus (61), who makes so clear a distinction between the temples of Apollo Ismeniensis and Amphiaraüs, that it is amazing how Barthius could say, that they were one and the same temple (62). Herodotus relates what I have just now hinted at, in speaking of an European who was sent by Mardonius to consult the oracles of Greece. But by what dream Amphiaraüs notified to the King of Persia's General his bad destiny, is what Herodotus knew not. Plutarch, who was better informed, relates it (63). We are told by some authors, that Amphiaraüs used to appear to such as came to advise with him. Ἀμφιάραος μὲν γὰρ καὶ Τροφώνιος ἐν Βοιωτίᾳ καὶ Ἀμφίλοχος ἐν Αἰτωλίᾳ χρησμῳδοῦσί τε καὶ φαίνονται· ἄστροις δὲ παντάχοῦ τῆς γῆς διατάττουσιν ὥσπερ ἀστέρες περίπολοι (64). That is, "Amphiaraüs and "Trophonius in Bœotia and Amphilochus in Ætolia "give revelations, and appear, and rule over all the "earth, like travelling constellations." If I am not mistaken, they mean, that he was seen in dreams. But let that be as it will, it is certain, that no less veneration was paid to his Oracle, than to that of Delphi, of Dodona, or of Jupiter Hammon, as Valerius Maximus assures us. Eadem gens summo consensu ad Amphiaraüm decorandum incubuit, locum in quo humatus est, in formam conditionemque templi redigendo, atque inde oracula capi instituendo. Cujus cineres idem honoris possident quod Pythicæ Cortinæ, quod aheno Dodonæ, quod Hammonis fonti datur (65). That is, "The same people were earnest about "honouring Amphiaraus, by making a temple "where he sunk into the ground, and instituting "an Oracle in it. His ashes are in the same "repute with the Pythian tripod, the cauldron "of Dodona, or the fountain of Hammon." Tully says less, but however mentions it with commendation. Amphiaraüm sic honoravit fama Græciæ, Deus ut haberetur, atque ut ab ejus solo, in quo est humatus, oracula peterentur (66). "Greece paid "such honours to Amphiaraüs, that he was account-"ed a God, and the ground where he was buried was "thought oracular.

(61) Idem, l. 8. cap. 134.

(62) Barthius in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 137.

(63) Plutarch. de Oraculorum defectu, p. 412.

(64) Aristides, Orat. in Æsculapi. ad. apud Barthium in Statium, tom. 2. p. 138.

(65) Val. Max. lib. 8. sub fin.

(66) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 1. c. 40.

It is true, there was a temple of Amphiaraüs at Corinth (67), but both Pomponius Mela (68), and Solinus (69) are mistaken, in asserting that there was one at Rhamnus too, for it was not there, but near Oropus, as I have already observed, and can prove from Dicæarchus, Strabo, Pausanias, &c. See Isaac Vossius's Commentaries on Pomponius Mela, p. 151.

(67) Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 65.

(68) Pomponius Mela, lib. 2. c. 3.

(69) Solinus, cap. 7.

[F] He excelled chiefly in divining by dreams; but that was not all, for he was the first that divined by fire.] As to this invention, I can only quote the following words of Pliny. Aruspicium Delphus, (invenit) ignispicia Amphiaraüs, auspicia avium Tiresias Thebanus, interpretationem ostentorum & somniorum Amphyctyon (70). That is, "Delphus was the au-"thor of foretelling by the altars, Amphiaraüs by "fire, Tiresias of Thebes by birds, and Amphyctyon "by strange sights and dreams." This prerogative is no where mentioned by Statius, though he often takes occasion to commend Amphiaraüs for his skill in foretelling future events by divers ways.

(70) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 56.

Quis mihi fidereos lapsus, mentemque sinistri
Fulguris, aut cæsis saliat quod numen in extis,
Quando iter, unde moræ, quæ sævis utilis armis,
Qua pacem magis hora velit, quis jam omne futurum
Proferet, aut cum quo volucres mea fata loquentur (71)?

That is,

"Who shall inform me what the falling Stars
"Or left hand thunders bode; who shall declare
"From victims entrails when I should begin
"My journey, when desist; what time is best
"For war, and what for peace; who shall foretell
"My future destiny, to whom shall birds
"My fate reveal?

(71) Statius, Thebaid. lib. 8. ver. 177.

So he expresses the grief of the whole army, on occasion of Amphiaraüs's death. In another place he writes thus:

Quantum subito diversus ab illo
Qui tripodes, lauruſque sequi, qui doctus in omni
Nube salutato volucrem cognoscere Phœbo (72).

That is,

"How suddenly unlike
"The Prophet that on Phœbus' laurel'd shrine
"Attended and explain'd the boding song
"Of all the feather'd kind."

(72) Id. ib. lib. 7. ver. 706.

I forbear quoting other passages of the same nature, but to death as ſoon as their age could allow them (i). Great commendations have been beſtowed upon him, and this amongſt others, that he ſtudied not only to appear an honeſt man, but to be ſo [G]. A proper ſubject for reflections [H]. Apollodorus, I think is the only author who counts him among the Argonauts (k); for he is not ranked

(i) This was put in execution by his ſon Alcmeon; ſee his Article.

(k) Apollodorus, lib. 1. pag. 53.

but cannot help obſerving that Statius lays no ſtreſs on the chief prerogative of that diviner, which was to divine by dreams, as has been already ſaid (73). He was the firſt that abſtained from beans, as prejudicial to that ſcience (74). Πρῶτος δὲ ἀπέσχετο κυάμων Ἀμφιάραος διὰ τὴν δι' ὀνείρων μαντείαν (75). It will not be amiſs to acquaint the reader, how Amphiaraüs became a Prophet. He went into a certain houſe as great a ſtranger to future events as any other, but came out of it endowed with the ſpirit of prophecy. From that time the houſe was ſhut up, and called the Prophetic Houſe. For it had the ſame virtue as to Prophecies, that Mount Parnaſſus has, according to Poets, with regard to verſes;

(73) In remark [E].

(74) See remark [I] of the article PYTHAGORAS.

(75) Geoponicor. lib. 2. apud Barthium in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 137.

Nec in bicipiti ſomniaſſe Parnaſſo
Memini, ut ſic derepente Poëta prodirem (76).
That is,
" I don't remember that I ever ſlept
" On high Parnaſſus, that I ſhould become
" A Poet on a ſudden.

(76) Perſius in Prolog. ver. 2.

There a man became a Prophet in one night; ſo that one might ſay on that occaſion, good luck came to one ſleeping. You will find in the paſſage I ſhall now quote, that this change happened to Amphiaraüs at Phlia (77). Ὄπισθεν δὲ τῆς ἀγορᾶς, ἔστιν οἶκος ὀνομαζόμενος ὑπὸ Φλιασίων μαντικός. εἰς τοῦτον Ἀμφιάρεως ἐλθὼν, καὶ τὴν νύκτα ἐγκατακοιμηθεὶς, μαντεύεσθαι τότε πρῶτον, ὡς οἱ Φλιάσιοί φασιν, ἤρξατο. τέως δὲ ἦν Ἀμφιάραος τῷ ἐκείνων λόγῳ, ἰδιώτης τε καὶ οὐ μάντις. κλῆσαι δὲ τὸ οἴκημα ἀπὸ τούτου συγκλείσαι τὸν πάντα ἤδη χρόνον (78). That is, " Behind the market-place there is a houſe " called Prophetic by the Phiaſians. Amphiaraüs " coming hither, and ſleeping one night in it, be- " gan immediately to propheſy, as the Phiaſians re- " port, though before he was ignorant and unin- " ſpired. From that time the houſe has been ſhut " up."

(77) A city of Peloponneſus.

(78) Pauſanias, lib. 2. p. 56.

[G] Great commendations have been beſtowed upon him, and this amongſt others, that he ſtudied not only to appear an honeſt man, but to be ſo.] Adraſtus in his complaints on the death of Amphiaraüs, declares that he has loſt the eye of his army, a man equally fit for propheſying and fighting.

Ποθέω στρατιᾶς
Ὀφθαλμὸν ἐμᾶς, ἀμφότερον,
Μαντίν τ' ἀγαθὸν
Καὶ δορὶ μάρναται (79).

(79) Pindar. Od. 6. Olympior. ver. 26.

And indeed he was not one of thoſe Prophets that act only with the mind; his arm was formidable too, and he excelled in bodily exerciſe. He is ſaid to have made a horrible ſlaughter of his enemies the very day he died.

Ardet inexpleto ſævi Mavortis amore,
Et fruitur dextra, atque anima flagrante ſuperbit.
Hic hominum caſus lenire & demere fatis
Jura frequens, quantum ſubito diverſus ab illo, (80).
Innumeram ferro plebem ceu letifer annus,
Aut jubar adverſi grave ſideris, immolat umbris
Ipſe ſuis (81).

(80) What is wanting here has been quoted in the laſt remark, quotation (72).

(81) Statius, Theb. lib. 7. ver. 703.

" With love of war his ſoul is all on fire,
" He glories in his arm and daring mind:
" Tho' us'd unhappy mortals to relieve " From threatning death. How ſuddenly unlike.

" ——— As by a blaſt
" Of ſickly Autumn or the fatal ray
" Of ſome malignant Star, whole multitudes
" Before him fall, a grateful ſacrifice.

In one word, he was a Prophet of that bravery and valour which became one who was inveſted both with the royal and prophetical dignity. Statius ſtyles him the Prophetic King:

Jamque erit illa dies, quo te quoque conſcia fati
Templa colant, reddatque tuus reſponſa ſacerdos.
Talia fatidico peragunt ſolemnia Regi (82).

(82) Idem, ibid. lib. 8. ver. 206.

" In future times ſhall holy temples riſe
" And own thy fate: then ſhall thy Prieſt declare
" Thy Oracles, and the prophetic King
" With ſolemn rites adore. ———

As to his dexterity in thoſe exerciſes, wherein the Greeks thought it ſo glorious to carry the prize, I ſhall only ſay, that our Amphiaraüs won it both in the races, and the Play of the Diſcus, when the Nemean ſports were celebrated by the Heads of the army on their march againſt Thebes (83). The following words of Steſichorus deſerve notice:

Θρώσκων μὲν γὰρ Ἀμφιάραος
Ἄκοντι δ' νίκασεν Μελέαγρος (84).

(83) Apollodor. Bibliot. lib. 3. p. 189.

(84) Athen. lib. 4. c. 21. p. 172.

As to the noble accompliſhments of his ſoul, ſee the eighth book of the Thebais, and the Tragedy of Æſchylus entitled, Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβας, Septem contra Thebas, out of which I ſhall quote a paſſage in the remark [I], and three fine verſes in the next remark. See alſo the great commendations that are beſtowed on him in regard of modeſty in a fragment of the Emperor Julian (85).

(85) Pag. 303, of Julian's works Leipſick edition 1696.

[H] A proper ſubject for reflections.] We ſhall firſt relate the action: " Ariſtides (86) was never elated " by any honours he received, nor dejected by the " contempt or denials he met with, but always ſe- " rene and eaſy; it being his fixed opinion that a " man ought to be entirely at his country's com- " mand, and ready to ſerve it on all occaſions with- " out the leaſt proſpect of honour or profit. Thence " it came to paſs that the day a Play of Æſchylus, " entitled The ſeven Leaders againſt Thebes, was act- " ed, at the ſpeaking of theſe verſes made by the " Poet in praiſe of Amphiaraüs,

(86) Plutarch. in vita Ariſtidis, pag. 320. I uſe Amyot's tranſlation. See the ſame Plutarch in Apophtheg. pag. 186. & de audiendis Poetis, pag. 32. [We make uſe of the tranſlation printed at London in 1727.]

" He aims at real worth without the ſhow,
" Reaping the fruits that in a rich mind grow,
" Whence ſage advice and noble actions flow;

" The eyes of all the audience were turned upon " Ariſtides, as the perſon to whom this great enco- " mium was moſt applicable. For he had ſo ſtrong " an inclination to juſtice as not to be influenced " againſt it by favour or friendſhip; nor, which is " ſtill more difficult, by anger and malice." This is the higheſt commendation a man can deſerve. If Amphiaraüs deſerved it, he was worthy of admiration: Ariſtides, who was thought to deſerve it, was an incomparable man. Here follow the words of Æſchylus in praiſe of Amphiaraüs, in the Tragedy entitled Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβας, Septem contra Thebas, Verſ. 598.

Οὐ γὰρ δοκεῖν ἄριστος, ἀλλ' εἶναι θέλει.
Βαθείαν ἄλοκα δίκης φρενὸς καρπούμενος,
Ἐξ ἧς τὰ κεδνὰ βλαστάνει βουλεύματα.

We ſhall make a few reflections on a ſubject that affords a great many. And I, If the Pagans did not practiſe true virtue, they had at leaſt a right notion of it; for they have celebrated ſuch as, in their virtuous actions, had neither riches or praiſes in view, and deſpiſed thoſe who practiſed virtue in order to be eſteemed, commended, and applauded by the Public. Let a man be as void of ſelf-intereſt as he pleaſes, with regard to profit, riches, and employments; if he is not equally diſintereſted as to praiſes, he has made no great ſtep to virtue, but only avoided the moſt viſible ſnares that lye in his way; he is not yet cured of all ſelf-love, nor does he enjoy full liberty; his chains are only ſomewhat more looſe: in one word, he is in the number of thoſe, whom Mr. Eſprit deſcribes in his Treatiſe on the falſeneſs of human virtues. If we apply to all our virtues ed among them either by Apollonius, Hyginus, or Valerius Flaccus. He is counted among the wiſe men who have had the misfortune of being engaged in enterpriſes that were managed by perſons of no conduct [I]. A very deplorable, but too frequent a caſe. The the fine rule Seneca offers us, with regard to the virtue of liberality, they will prove true, and without it nothing but mere ſhadows of virtue. That great Philoſopher in anſwering this objection; "Muſt "not the perſon, upon whom I have beſtowed a be- "nefit, know from what hand it came," writes thus: Quid ergo? ille neſciet à quo acceperit? Primum neſciat, ſi hoc ipſum beneficii pars eſt. Deinde multa alia faciam, multa tribuam, per quæ intelligat & illius auctorem. Denique ille neſciat accepiſſe ſe; ego ſciam me dediſſe. Parum eſt, inquis. Parum ſi fœnerare cogitas; ſed ſi dare quo genere accipienti maxime profuturum erit, dabis: contentus eris te teſte. Alioquin non benefacere delectabat, ſed videri benefeciſſe. Volo, inquis, ſciat: debitorem quæris; volo utique ſciat: quid ſi illi utilius eſt neſcire? ſi honeſtius, ſi gratius? non in aliam partem abibis? volo ſciat: ita tu hominem non ſervabis in tenebris? non nego, quoties patitur res, percipiendum gaudium ex accipientis voluntate: ſin adjuvari illum & oportet, & pudet; ſi quod præſtamus, offendit, niſi abſconditur; beneficium in acta non mitto. Quidni? ego illi ſum indicaturus me dediſſe; cum inter prima præcepta ac maxime neceſſaria ſit, ne unquam exprobrem, imo ne admoneam quidem? Hæc enim beneficii inter duos lex eſt alter ſtatim obliviſci debet dati, alter accepti nunquam (87). That is, "Let him not know it, if "that be any part of the benefit; and then I will "do many things, and give much that he may not be "ignorant of the author of it. Laſtly he may not know, "that he has received it, but I may know that I "have beſtowed it. You will ſay this is nothing. "I grant it, if you intend to get by it; but if you "deſign to beſtow in ſuch a manner as ſhall be of "the greateſt benefit to the receiver, you will be "content with your own teſtimony. Otherwiſe "you do not delight in doing good, but in ſeem- "ing to do ſo. You would have him know it, you "ſay: why then you want a debtor. You would "have him know it: but what if it is more for "his advantage not to know it? what if it is more "honourable or more agreeable? will you not then "alter your mind? But you would have him know "it; therefore you would not ſave a man in the "dark. I do not deny but that as often as the thing "will bear, there is a ſatisfaction ariſing from the "pleaſure of the receiver: but if he muſt both be "aſſiſted and be out of countenance; if what we "do offends unleſs it be concealed, I would not "make my favour public. But ſhould I let him "know that I did it, when it is one of the firſt and "moſt neceſſary precepts, that I ſhould not reproach "him with it, nor ſo much as put him in mind of "it? For this is the mutual law of benefits between "two perſons, that one ſhould inſtantly forget that "he gave it, and that the other ſhould never forget "that he received it."

(87) Seneca, de Benefic. l. 2. cap. 10.

II, It ſeldom happens that glory is the only reward, which thoſe propoſe to themſelves, who are not ſatisfied with the bare teſtimony of their conſcience. If we look narrowly into the actions of ſuch as aſpire both to be, and appear, honeſt men, we ſhall find, that their ambition has ſomething elſe in view, beſides the joining of the reality of virtue with the appearance of it. Praiſes by themſelves are of ſmall or no ſubſtance, and therefore inſufficient to content their deſires: credit alone ſeems to them too ſpiritual a reward, unleſs it be helped, and, as it were, incorporated with the conveniencies of life. They therefore come ſoon to employ the approbation of the Public as a means to raiſe a favourable opinion of their virtue in the minds of thoſe, who diſpoſe of the employments, that they may thereby be put in a way to acquire riches, and content all their paſſions. So that the ſafeſt way to maintain a purity of mind, is to follow the foot-ſteps of Amphiaraüs and Ariſtides. Endeavour to be an honeſt man, without minding, whether or no you are look'd upon as ſuch. For the deſire of being reckoned a man of virtue is attended with more dangerous conſequences, than you imagine.

III, It is a ſaying, commonly aſcribed to Socrates, that the ſhorteſt way to virtue is, to ſtrive to be in ourſelves ſuch as we are willing others ſhould take us to be. Semper id egiſti, ut qualis haberi velles talis eſſes: quam viam ad gloriam proximam & quaſi compendiariam Socrates eſſe dicebat (88). i. e. "You "have always taken pains to be ſuch an one as you "have deſired to be accounted: which Socrates ſaid "was the moſt ready and compendious way to glo- "ry." I ſhall add the very words of Socrates: Σωτομωτάτη τε καὶ ἀσφαλεστάτη καὶ καλλίστη ὁδός, ὦ Κριτόβουλε, ὅτι ἂν βούλῃ δοκεῖν ἀγαθὸς εἶναι, τοῦτο καὶ γιγνέσθαι ἀγαθὸν πειρᾶσθαι (89). i. e. "It is the eaſieſt and "beſt way, my Critobulus, to be that good man you "would fain ſeem to be." This is a very wiſe and judicious piece of advice; for the deſire of having a fair outſide, and being publicly commended, is ſo ſtrong, and common even to thoſe, who are not very fond of being really virtuous, that we may depend upon our attaining to a high degree of virtue, if we ſtudy to make the real ſtate of our ſoul anſwer the opinion we deſire others ſhould entertain of us. However we muſt own that this way to virtue is not quite ſo free from all ſelf-intereſt, as that which was trod by Amphiaraüs. Appear to be an honeſt man, and be one: enjoy the reputation of a man of virtue, but take care to deſerve it; don't lay claim to praiſes you are unworthy of: This is what Socrates adviſes, who is not for depriving us of the praiſes that are due to virtue. But Amphiaraüs would have ſaid; Endeavour to be virtuous, without caring what opinion men may entertain of you, whether they commend you, or not.

(88) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato priore, circa finem.

(89) Xenophontis Memorab. lib. 2. pag 474. and Charpentier's Tranſlation, pag. 160. See alſo Plato, Epiſt. 4. p. 1274; Cicero's Offices book 2. ch. 12. pag. 227. what Poſtel has ſaid in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his Hiſtoires Orientales, upon this verſe of the 16th Epiſtle of the 1ſt book of Horace. Tu rectè vivis, ſi curas eſſe, quod audis.

IV, You may perhaps ſay, that the one is never found without the other, and that, if the reputation of an honeſt man is often gained by falſe virtues, that is, by diſguiſing a wicked mind under a fair out-ſide, it may be ſtill more ſafely obtained by real virtues; concluding from thence, that Amphiaraüs, and others of his character, piqued themſelves on deſpiſing what they well knew they ſhould certainly obtain. To this I anſwer, that it is frequently an eaſier matter to be an honeſt man, than to paſs for one; and that there is no manner of connexion between the one and the other. You may be an honeſt man by only withſtanding your own paſſions; but to have the character of one, you muſt ſtrive againſt, and triumph over, the paſſions of other men. You may happen to have ſome no leſs paſſionate than crafty enemies, who will diſperſe a thouſand ſlanderous reports highly prejudicial to your reputation: if thoſe who hear them be credulous, they likewiſe become diſperſers of calumnies; if incredulous, they raiſe difficulties againſt them, and thereby ſhew your enemies how they ought to give an appearance of truth to their falſe reports. In the mean time you know nothing of the matter; and tho' you did, could you go about making apologies from place to place? Being an honeſt man, as I ſuppoſe you are, how can you be acquainted with the cunning tricks of your adverſaries, and know in what fraudulent manner men of vulgar minds are to be dealt with? Would you not rather chooſe to leave them in their error, than to loſe your time in diſputing every inch of ground with your adverſaries. All the pains you could take would not be ſufficient to get the better of the bad impreſſions their malice had occaſioned in the minds of credulous men, ill inclined, and more apt to be prevailed upon by men of that character, than by all the eloquence and reaſon you could uſe.

We ſhall obſerve in the remark [L] of the article of CÆSAR, that Salluſt beſtowed upon Cato Uticenſis the ſame elogium Æſchylus gives to our Amphiaraüs.

[I] He is counted among the wiſe men who have had the misfortune to be engaged in enterprizes that were managed by perſons of no conduct.] It is no matter whether the words of the Commentary on this text be mine or not. I ſhall therefore take the liberty to uſe the obſolete expreſſions of one of Philoſtratus's

The manner in which he comforted a mother, who lamented the death of her ſon [K], requires a remark. I ſhould be glad to know the particulars of the action which the Partizans loſtratus's Commentators (90). We may obſerve here a clear inſtance of our poverty and miſery, viz. that men of great wiſdom and probity pay dear for the raſh undertakings of the fooliſh and perverſe: that ſuch a raſh, ill-humoured, and quarrelſom fellow as Tydeüs, a diſturber of the publick peace and quiet, bore, though a ſtranger ſuch a ſway, as to carry on a war, no ways neceſſary, and which occaſioned their univerſal ruin, againſt all the remonſtrances, predictions, and warnings of one, who not only was the wiſeſt man of Greece, but even looked upon as a Prophet. And that thoſe alſo who oppoſed ſuch an undertaking with probable and very juſt reaſons, had a great ſhare in the dangers they had been brought into by the raſhneſs of others. So true it is, that bad councils are generally preferred to good ones. Hence Æſchylus in his Tragedy de Septem ad Thebas, where he introduces Etheocles bewailing the wiſe and good Amphiaraüs, had reaſon to exclaim thus:

(90) Vigenere upon Philoſtratus's Amphiaraüs, pag. 403, 404, of the 1ſt vol. edition in 4to.

Φεῦ τοῦ ξυναλλάσσοντος ὀρνίθοις βροτοὺς
Δίκαιον ἄνδρα τοῖσι δυσσεβεστάτοις.
Ἐν παντὶ πράγει δ' ἔσθ' ὁμιλίας κακῆς
Κάκιον, οὐδὲν καρπὸς ἐκ κομιστέος: &c.

" O what a misfortune is it, ſays he, that an honeſt " man ſhould have any thing to do with wicked and " deteſtable mortals! Nothing in the world is worſe " than bad company, from which no advantage can " be reaped..... This Prophet (I mean the ſon of " Oicleus) a man of prudence, juſtice, ſincerity, and " probity, a great foreteller of things to come, be- " cauſe he has to do with wicked and preſumptuous " men, deprived of all good ſenſe amd underſtanding, " who prepare to come againſt us with a great equi- " page, ſhall be drawn with them (this being Jupi- " ter's pleaſure) into ruin and deſtruction." This is what Vigenere writes. We muſt not imagine that Amphiaraüs hoped the juſtice of the cauſe (91) would make amends for the bad conduct of the leaders, for he was too wiſe a man to entertain any ſuch thoughts, knowing that all human helps are as neceſſary to carry on, with ſucceſs, a juſt, as an unjuſt war (92); and that thoſe who defend a juſt cauſe, are generally got the better of, if they are not as well provided with them, as thoſe who ſtand up for a bad one. He is therefore, with great reaſon, propoſed as an example of the ſacrifice a man muſt make, on ſome occaſions, of his own prudence or life to other conſiderations. Read the following words of Tully: Valuit apud me plus pudor meus, quam timor. Veritus ſum deeſſe Pompeij ſaluti, cum ille aliquando non defuiſſet meæ. Itaque vel officio, vel fama bonorum, vel pudore victus, ut in fabulis Amphiaraus, ſic ego prudens & ſciens, ad peſtem ante oculos poſitam ſum profectus (93). But to return to our ſubject; we may with reaſon reproach our Prophet with the diſproportion of his lights, and turn them into ridicule. He foreſaw that he ſhould be killed, if he went to the war; but he did not foreſee that he ſhould go, and that, in ſpite of all his precautions, he ſhould be forced to engage in that enterpriſe (94).

(91) In this war the Thebans were in the wrong; and nevertheleſs, they had the battle prove advantageous to them.

(92) See remark [C] in the article BRUTUS (MARCUS).

(93) Cicero Ep. 6. lib. 6. ad Familiar.

[K] The manner in which he comforted a mother, who lamented the death of her ſon, requires a remark.] Plutarch, after ſuggeſting the reaſons that are proper to be uſed to comfort ſuch as are grieved for the untimely death of their children adds (95), " And therefore methinks that Amphiaraüs in a cer- " tain Tragedy of a Poet did not impertinently and " without good purpoſe, comfort the mother of " Archimorus, who took it to the heart and grieved " exceſſively that her ſon a young infant died before " the ordinary time: for thus he ſaith unto her;

" Il ne fut one homme de mere né
" Qui n'ait eſté en ſes jours fortuné
" Diverſement; il met ores ſur terre
" De ſes enfans, ores il en enterre,
" Lui-meſme apres en fin s'en va mourant;
" Et toutes fois les hommes vont plorant
" Ceux qui dedans la biere en terre ils portent;
" Combien qu'ainſi comme les eſpies ſortent
" D'elle, qui ſont puis apres moiſſonnez:
" Auſſi faut-il que les uns nouveaux nez
" Viennent en eſtre, & les autres en iſſent,
" Qu' eſt il beſoin que les hommes gemiſſent
" Pour tout cela, qui doit ſelon le cours
" De la nature ainſi paſſer tous jours?
" Il n'y a rien grief a ſoufrir, ou faire,
" De ce qui eſt a l'homme neceſſaire.

That is,

" No man there is of woman's body born,
" But in his days much travel he doth bear.
" Children ſome die the parents long beforn,
" And are by them enterred: then they reare
" And get young babes, for thoſe that buried were.
" Laſtly, themſelves into the graves do fall,
" This is the courſe, this is the end of all:
" Yet men do for them weep and ſorrow make
" Whoſe bodies they on biere to earth do ſend,
" Although in truth a way direct they take,
" As ears of corn full ripe, which downward bend;
" As ſome begin ſo others make an end.
" Why ſhould men ſigh and grieve at nature's lore,
" What muſt, ſhall be, think it not hard therefore.

In ſhort, every man ought both in meditation within himſelf, and in earneſt diſcourſe alſo with others, to hold this for certain, that the longeſt life is not beſt. Plutarch, methinks, has not quoted theſe verſes in their proper place; for they contain nothing that relates more to the death of young people, than of others: nay, the compariſon of the ears of corn is quite impertinent, in order to appeaſe the ſorrow that is occaſioned by the untimely death of the perſon deceaſed; for, generally ſpeaking, the corn is never cut before it is ripe. It would be far more proper to lay before one on the like occaſions what happens to the fruits of trees; for if we count, for inſtance, the apples, when they are in bud, and turn to count them every week, we ſhall find that their number grows daily leſs and leſs, and that ſeldom the half of them comes to maturity. However Amphiaraüs's reaſons are pretty good; but they contain nothing extraordinary: he even concludes with maxim, that is more proper to exaſperate than to cure the evil (96). We ſhall ſee by and by how his reaſons were criticiſed by the Philoſopher Carneades.

(96) See the art. FOULQUES, remark [E].

Amyot has not tranſlated well the following Greek word of Plutarch, ὁ παρὰ τῷ ποιητῇ Ἀμφιάρεως, by Amphiaraüs in a Poem. This tranſlation plainly inſinuates, that Amphiaraüs wrote a Poem, whereas the meaning of Plutarch is, that Amphiaraüs is introduced by a Poet, uſing the abovementioned reaſons. This Poet is Euripides. Dicuntur nonnulli in mœrore, cum de hac communi omnium conditione audiviſſent, ea lege nos eſſe natos, ut nemo in perpetuum eſſe poſſe expers mali, gravius etiam tuliſſe. Quocirca Carneades, ut video noſtrum ſcribere Antiochum, reprehendere Chryſippum ſolebat laudantem Euripideum carmen illud:

Nemo mortalis eſt, quem non attingat dolor,
Morbuſque: multi ſunt humandi liberi;
Rurſus creandi. Morſque eſt finita omnibus.
Quæ generi humano angorem nequicquam afferunt:
Reddenda eſt terræ terra (97). Tum vita omnibus
Metenda ut fruges: ſic jubet neceſſitas.

(97) The Greek verſe related by Plutarch de Conſolatione, p. 110, and which anſwers this, is the following, Εἰς γῆν φέροντες τὴν δι' ἀναγκαίως ἴχυι. Barthius in Statium, tom. 3. pag. 275, conjectures, that we ought to read, Εἰς γῆν φέροντες γῆν κ' ἀναγκαίως ἴχυι.

(94) See the Commentary upon the Life of Apollonius, tranſlated into French by Vigenere, lib. 2. cap. 11. p. 488.

(95) Plutarch. de Conſolatione ad Apollonium, pag. 110, 111. I uſe Amiot's tranſlation, tom. 1. p. 786.

[We make uſe of the old Engliſh Tranſlation of Dr. Holland.]

Negabat genus hoc orationis quicquam omnino ad levandam ægritudinem pertinere. Id enim ipſum dolendum eſſe dicebat, quod in tam crudelem neceſſitatem incidiſſemus. Nam illam quidem orationem ex commemoratione alienorum malorum ad malevolos conſolandos eſſe accommodatam (98), i. e. " Some are ſaid to " have been afflicted in their grief, when they heard " of this condition which is common to all, that we " are born on theſe terms, that no man ſhould be " always free from evil. Whereupon Carneades, ac- " cording to our Antiochus, uſed to reprove Chry- " ſippus for commending thoſe verſes of Euripides. " There is no mortal exempt from pain and diſeaſes: " many children are to be buried, and more to be begot- " ten: Death is the end of all. This afflicts mankind " in

(98) Cicero Tuſculan. Quæſtion. lib. 3. cap. 25.

(l) In the article MELAMPUS, note [F]. * Now Tivoli.

Partizans brought againſt his Prieſts [L]. I have ſhewn elſewhere (l) the inſufficiency of an argument produced to prove the truth of his prophecies. He left a great many children [M], and one of them founded the city of Tibur * in Italy. Pliny obſerves this in relating ſome curious particulars concerning the long life of trees.

" in vain. Earth is to be reſtored to earth. Life is " to be reaped like corn: for ſo it is commanded " by fate. He denied that this kind of diſcourſe " brought any relief to ſorrow. For he ſaid even " that was to be lamented, that we lay under ſuch a " cruel neceſſity. For that this way of talking was " ſuited to comfort the envious, by commemorating " the misfortunes of others." We ſhall now relate the anſwer to this cenſure of Carneades. Mihi vero longe videtur ſecus. Nam & neceſſitas ferendæ conditionis humanæ, quaſi cum deo pugnare cohibet, admonetque eſſe hominem, quæ cogitatio magnopere luctum levat: & enumeratio exemplorum, non ut animum malevolum oblectet, affertur, ſed ut ille qui mœret, ferendum ſibi id cenſeat, quod videat multos moderate & tranquille tuliſſe (99). i. e. " But it ſeems quite " otherwiſe to me. For both the neceſſity of bearing " the conditions of human life, reſtrains us from " ſtriving as it were with God, and admoniſhes us " that we are men, the thought of which greatly " eaſes our grief; and the enumeration of examples " alſo is produced, not to delight an envious mind, " but that he who grieves ſhould think that he " ought to bear what he ſees others have born with " moderation and tranquillity.

(99) Idem, ibid.

[L] The Partizans entered an action againſt his Prieſts.] I may be allowed to ſtyle thoſe ſo, who were appointed by the Republic of Rome to gather the taxes in the Provinces. The lands conſecrated to the immortal Gods were by the law tax-free; upon this the Prieſts of Amphiaraüs pretended, that the lands belonging to their God were not liable to taxes. The text of the law, ſaid they, without doubt, is clear, and plainly in our favour. To this the Partiſans anſwered, that the law was not to be underſtood of ſuch lands, becauſe they were conſecrated to a perſon that was dead, who of courſe could by no means be look'd upon as one of the immortal Gods. Tho' this argument was ſuggeſted by avarice, and not zeal for religion (which tax-gatherers never mind in points of intereſt) yet it was of ſuch force, that they ought to have carried the cauſe. However I believe they were caſt. It is a great pity all the writings belonging to that law-ſuit have not been preſerved. This alone has reached us. An Amphiaraüs Deus erit, & Trophonius? noſtri quidem publicani, cum eſſent agri in Bœotia Deorum immortalium excepti lege cenſoria, negabant immortales eſſe ullos, qui aliquando homines fuiſſent (100). i. e. " Shall Amphiaraus be a God, and Tro- " phonius? Our Publicans, when ſome lands in " Bœotia were exempted from the tax as belong- " ing to the immortal Gods, denied that any were " immortal who had been men." Had they been allowed to go on, they would have laid a tax on moſt of the Gods, and made no manner of diſtinction between many lands that were conſecrated to them, and thoſe that were held by ſoccage. For what title of divinity or immortality could have held good againſt their exceptions? What favours might they not have expected in the court of a Commiſſioner, who had received orders to ſupport them in their pretenſions? They need only have ſet on foot an inquiſition into falſe worſhip, to be able ſoon to ſee a conſiderable reduction of them. But how could they be ſecure of ſuch Partizans? We ſhall ſee in another place (101) how ſolid the following argument ſeemed to ſeveral Heathens: He is dead: and therefore ought not to be adored as a God.

(100) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. c. 19.

(101) In the article TROPHONIUS, remark [A].

[M] He left a great many children.] I have made an article upon his two ſons, Alcmeon and Amphilochus. I do not find that any of the Greek Poets, now extant, mention Tiburtus who was likewiſe one of his ſons; tho' they ſpeak of Eurydice, Demonaſſa, and Alcmene, all three daughters to Amphiaraus and Eryphile (102). Let us hear what Pliny writes of Tiburtus. Tiburtes originem multo ante urbem Romam habent. Apud eos extant ilices tres, etiam Tiburto conditore eorum vetuſtiores, apud quas inauguratus traditur. Faiſſe autem eum tradunt filium Amphiarai, qui apud Thebas obierit una ætate ante Iliacum bellum (103). i. e. " The Tiburtes had " their beginning long before Rome, they have a- " mongſt them three ever-green oaks, older even " than their founder Tiburtus, who was ſaid to have " had his inauguration under them. They pretend " that he was the ſon of Amphiaraus, who died at " Thebes one generation before the Trojan war." I believe Pliny tells us a falſity; for how could the three oaks, under which Tiburtus, Founder of Tibur, and ſon of Amphiaraus, is ſuppoſed to have been inaugurated, ſtand to the reign of Veſpaſian? It is to be obſerved, that Tiburtus, according to Solinus, was not the ſon, but the grand-ſon of Amphiaraus. I ſhall quote his words in the article TIBUR.

(102) Pauſanias, lib. 5. p. 165.

(103) Plinius, lib. 16. cap. 44.

AMPHILOCHUS, ſon of Amphiaraüs and Eriphyle (a) was a celebrated diviner, and accompanied his brother Alcmeon in the ſecond war of Thebes (b), and helped him, as ſome ſay, to make away with Eriphyle (c); but moſt authors are of a contrary opinion. The altar that was conſecrated to him in Athens (d) did not contribute ſo much to the glory of his name, as the Oracle he had at Mallus in Cilicia [A], which city was founded by him, and Mopſus, after the Trojan war (e). Afterwards they fell out, and killed each other in a duel, as I obſerve elſewhere (f). We are told by ſome writers, that

(a) Pauſanias, lib. 5. pag. 165. (b) Apollodorus, lib. 3. pag. 195. (c) Apollodor. lib. 3. p. 197. (d) Pauſanias, lib. 1. pag. 33.

(e) Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 464. See alſo Cicero de Divinat. lib. 1. cap. 40.

(f) In the article MOPSUS.

[A] The Oracle he had at Mallus in Silicia.] Pauſanias aſſures us, that this was the trueſt Oracle that was extant in his time. From whence we may infer, that all the Oracles were not ſilenced by the eſtabliſhing of the Chriſtian Religion. Τῷ δὲ Ἀμφιλόχῳ καὶ παρ' Ἀθηναίοις ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ πόλει βωμὸς, καὶ Κιλικίας ἐν Μαλλῷ μαντεῖον ἀψευδέσταλον τῶν ἐπ' ἐμοῦ (1). i. e. " Amphilochus has an altar amongſt the Athenians, " in their very city, and in Mallos a city of Cilicia " an Oracle which is the moſt infallible of any in my " time." The anſwers of this Oracle were given by dreams, Ἐστὶν ἐν Μαλλῷ πόλει τῆς Κιλικίας Ἀμφιλόχου χρηστήριον, καὶ χρᾷ δι' ὀνειράτων (2). " There is at Mallos " a city of Cilicia, an Oracle of Amphilochus, which " gives anſwers by dreams." Such as came to adviſe with the Oracle uſed to paſs a night in the temple, and that night's dream was the anſwer they came for. Dion Caſſius mentions a picture done by order of Sextus Condianus, and repreſenting the anſwer he received of the Oracle in the reign of the Emperor Commodus (3). The following paſſage out of Lucian will convince us, that in his time Amphilochus was look'd upon as a great Prophet. Ὅποτε γὰρ ἐξ Αἰγύπτου ἐπανήειν οἴκαδε, ἀκούων τὸ ἐν Μαλλῷ τοῦτο μαντεῖον, ἐπιφανέστατον τι, καὶ ἀληθέστατον εἶναι, καὶ χρᾶν ἐναργῶς πρὸς ἕπος ἀποκρινόμενον, οἷς ἂν ἐγγράψας τὶς εἰς τὸ γραμματεῖον παραδῷ τῷ προφήτῃ, καλῶς ἂν ἔχειν ἡγησάμην ἐν παράπλῳ πειραθῆναι τοῦ χρηστηρίου, καὶ τὰ περὶ μελλόντων συμβουλεύσασθαι τῷ Θεῷ (4). i. e. " When I " returned home from Egypt, hearing that the Ora- " cle at Mallos was very perſpicuous and very true, " and that it was ſo punctual, that it anſwered to a " word whatſoever was delivered to the Prophet in " writing; I thought it would be right for me to " try the Oracle, as I ſailed by it, and conſult the " God in ſomething relating to futurity." Obſerve the circumſtance related by Lucian; viz. that the queſtions were propoſed to the Oracle of Amphilochus in writing. It would be to no purpoſe to ſay, that Lucian himſelf forged the account he gives in that work; for ſuch an objection no ways enervates the force of my proof, it being plain Lucian would never

(1) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 33.

(2) Xiphilin. in Epitome Dionis, p. 285, 286.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Lucianus in Philopſeude, pag. 500. tom. 2.

that Amphilochus was killed by Apollo (g). He was both a King and a Prophet (b), for he reigned at Argos. It is true, he could not maintain himſelf in that Kingdom, but went out of it diſcontented, and built a city in the Bay of Ambracia [B]. Livy is guilty of a miſtake in a paſſage I ſhall quote [C]. There are ſome things in Moreri which deſerve to be cenſured [D]. We muſt not confound our Amphilochus with the other,

(g) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 465.
(b) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 1. c. 40.

ver have ſaid, that the Oracle of Amphilochus was very famous, had no one come to conſult it for a hundred years before that time. This is Mr. Van Dale's anſwer to this objection (5). He quotes alſo another paſſage from the Hiſtory of the falſe Diviner Alexander, in which Lucian atteſts, that the Oracle of Mallus was very famous. He might have produced a third paſſage, which I think is ſo clearly in favour of this remark, that I ſhall ſet it down at length. Τὸν Τροφώνιον, ὦ Ζεῦ, καὶ ὁ μάλιστά μοι ἀποπνίγεις τὸν Ἀμφίλοχον. ὃς ἐναγοῦς ἀνθρώπου καὶ μητραλοίου υἱὸς ὢν, θεσπιῳδεῖ ὁ γενναῖος ἐν Κιλικίᾳ, ψευδόμενος τὰ πολλὰ, καὶ γοητεύων τοῖν ὀβολοῖν ἕνεκα (6). i. e. "I am grievouſly "concerned, O Jupiter, about Trophonius, but "chiefly about Amphilochus: who tho' he was "the ſon of an impious man and a murderer of "his mother, yet he is become a famous Prophet in "Cilicia, uttering many lies, and juggling for two "oboli." We ſhall examine below upon what grounds Lucian tells us, that Amphilochus was not the ſon, but the grand-ſon of Amphiaraüs. But in the mean time we may obſerve, that the Oracle of Amphilochus was in repute in Plutarch's time. Ἔτι δ' ἥκμαζεν ἐμοῦ παρόντος καὶ τὸ Μόψου καὶ τὸ Ἀμφιλόχου μαντεῖον (7). i. e. "Whilſt I was there, the Oracle of "Mopſus and Amphilochus were ſtill flouriſhing."

(5) Van Dale, de Oraculis, pag. 98.

(6) Lucian. in Deorum Concilio, pag. 957. tom. 2.

(7) Plut. de Oracular. defectu, p. 434. C.

[B] He went out of Argos diſcontented, and built a city in the bay of Ambracia] We are told ſo by an Hiſtorian of great note. Ἄργος τὸ Ἀμφιλοχικὸν καὶ Ἀμφιλοχίαν τὴν ἄλλην ἔκτισε μετὰ τὰ Τροϊκὰ εἰκαδεὺς ἀναχωρήσας, καὶ οὐκ ἀρεσκόμενος τῇ ἐν Ἄργει καταστάσει Ἀμφίλοχος ὁ Ἀμφιάρεω, ἐν τῷ Ἀμβρακικῷ κόλπῳ, ὁμώνυμον τῇ ἑαυτοῦ πατρίδι Ἄργος ὀνομάσας. καὶ ἦν ἡ πόλις αὕτη μεγίστη τῆς Ἀμφιλοχίας, καὶ τοὺς δυνατωτάτους εἶχεν οἰκήτορας (8). i. e. "Amphilochus the ſon of Amphia- "raüs returning home after the Trojan war, and "not being pleaſed with the ſtate of affairs at Ar- "gos, founded Argos Amphilochium and the reſt "of Amphilochia in the bay of Ambracia calling "the city Argos after the name of his own country. "And this city was the biggeſt of all Amphilochia, "and has the moſt powerful inhabitants."

(8) Thucydides, lib. 2.

This paſſage of Thucydides is quoted by Strabo, who adds ſomething to it, viz. that Amphilochus being diſſatisfied with the Government eſtabliſhed at Argos retired into Acarnania, where he inherited his brother's eſtate (9). Thucydides ſays no ſuch thing, and conſequently Strabo is in the wrong to make him ſay it. Thoſe who ſuppoſe that he eſpouſes the opinion of Thucydides are miſtaken (10); for he prefers to him the Hiſtorian Ephorus, who wrote, that the city of Argos Amphilochium was built by Alcmeon, who called it after the name of his brother: Μετὰ δὲ τὴν Ἀμβρακίαν τὸ Ἄργος ἐστὶ τὸ Ἀμφιλοχικὸν κτίσμα Ἀλκμαίωνος καὶ τῶν παίδων (11). i. e. "After Ambracia follows Argos Amphilochium, which "was founded by Alcmæon and his children." It is wrong to ſay, that Apollodorus follows neither Thucydides, or any other author, in aſſerting that Amphilochus was the ſon of Alcmæon (12); for he ſays nothing, but what is atteſted by Euripides (13). It is to be obſerved, he ſays that Amphilochus was adviſed by Apollo to go and live at Argos Amphilochium.

(9) Strabo, l. 7. p. 225.

(10) Berkelius in Steph. Byzant. p. 124.

(11) Ephorus, apud Strabonem, lib. 7. p. 225.

(12) Berkelius however ſays ſo in his notes upon Steph. Byzantinus, p. 124.
(13) Apollodor. lib. 3. p. 201.

It will not be amiſs to obſerve how Thucydides and Strabo diſagree in their accounts. The one tells us, that Amphilochus, on his return to Argos from the ſiege of Troy, having found affairs in a condition he did not like, retired towards the Bay of Ambracia, where he founded a city (14). The other aſſerts that Amphilochus, having built the city of Mallus in Cilicia, after the ſiege of Troy, returned to Argos; but not liking the poſture of affairs there, returned to Cilicia, where he was killed, and buried (15). Here follow new difficulties. Euripides writes, that Alcmæon became mad, abuſed Manto, the daughter of Tireſias, and had a ſon and daughter by her; the ſon was called Amphilochus, and the daughter Tiſiphone (16). This Amphilochus, by the direction of an Oracle, went to ſettle at Argos Amphilochium. We have already obſerved (17), that Lucian ſuppoſes the Amphilochus, whoſe Oracle was ſo famous at Mallus, to have been the ſon of Alcmæon. Others maintain that he was ſon to Amphiaraüs. In ſo perplexed a matter we have but two ways to take; the one is, to ſay, that there was only one Amphilochus, whoſe hiſtory has been related by halves, that is, by authors who have omitted part of his adventures. The other is, to ſuppoſe, that there have been two Amphilochus's, the one ſon to Amphiaraüs, and the other to Alcmæon, and that the authors have aſcribed ſome things to one which belonged to the other. I am apt to believe, that Amphilochus, who had an Oracle in Cilicia, was ſon to Amphiaraüs, and that the other, who ſettled in Acarnania, was ſon to Alcmæon. The city of Argos in Cilicia was built by Alcmæon and his ſons. Τὸ Ἄργος τὸ Ἀμφιλοχικὸν κτίσμα Ἀλκμαίωνος καὶ τῶν παίδων (18). This is my firſt proof. Amphilochus, ſon to Alcmæon, was adviſed by the Oracle to go and ſettle in this Argos (19). Here is my ſecond proof; Pauſanias obſerves, that the poſterity of Melampus reigned in Argos, till ſuch time as Amphilochus retired, after the ſiege of Troy, to that country, which was called from him Amphilochia (20). This is Argos Amphilochium and the neighbouring country. Now there are ſix generations between Melampus and this Amphilochus. Ἀπὸ δὲ Μελάμποδος γενεαί τε ἓξ καὶ ἄνδρες ἓξ εἰσὶ μέχρις Ἀμφιλόχου τοῦ Ἀμφιαράου (21). This therefore cannot have been the ſon of Amphiaraüs, as Pauſanias aſſerts, but of Alcmæon. And indeed Melampus was the father of Antiphates, the father of Oïcleus, the father of Amphiaraüs, the father of Alcmæon, the father of Amphilochus. If you end with Amphilochus, Amphiaraüs's ſecond ſon, you will not find the ſix generations mentioned by Pauſanias; and this is my third proof.

(17) In the foregoing remark, quotation (6).

(18) Strabo, lib. 7. p. 225.

(19) Apollodorus, lib. 3. pag. 201.

(20) Pauſanias, lib. 2. p. 60.

(21) Idem, ibid.

[C] Livy is guilty of a miſtake in a paſſage I ſhall quote.] He miſtook the ſon for the father in the following words of his 14th book. Inde Oropum Atticæ ventum eſt, ubi pro Deo vates Amphilochus colitur, templumque vetuſtum eſt fontibus riviſque circa amœnum (22). i. e. "From thence he came to Oropus, "a city of Attica, where Amphilochus is worſhipped "for a God, and has an ancient temple delightful on "account of the ſprings and rivulets about it." Pauſanias, who made ſuch matters his particular ſtudy, and had a great talent that way, deſerves more credit than Livy. Now he not only aſſures us, that the inhabitants of Oropus built a temple to Amphiaraüs; but moreover ſeems to inſinuate, that Amphilochus had no ſhare in the altar, which was divided into ſix parts, each part being conſecrated to ſome Hero, or God (23). We find, that the ſons of Amphilochus, but not Amphilochus himſelf, are named in this diviſion. I own, that the coherency of the diſcourſe may make us believe that Pauſanias did not leave him out: I ſhould willingly correct the Greek text of that author, and inſtead of καὶ τῶν παίδων Ἀμφιλόχου, read, καὶ τοῦ παιδὸς Ἀμφιλόχου, ſee the margin (24). But after all, this would not make Amphilochus the God of the temple in Oropus.

(22) Titus Livius lib. 45. cap. 27. It is certain that the principal Deity mentioned by that Hiſtorian was Amphiaraus; he ſhould therefore have ſaid, ubi pro Deo vates Amphiaraüs, and not Amphilochus colitur; i. e. "where the Pro- "phet Amphia- "raus, and not "Amphilochus "is worſhipped "as a God."
(23) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 33.
(24) Perhaps the words of Pauſanias ought to be tranſlated thus; ex filiis (Amphiarai) Amphilocho.

[D] There are ſome things in Moreri which deſerve to be cenſured.] I, Amphilochus is not a certain Greek Captain mentioned by Homer in his Odyſſey, for all that Homer ſays is, that Alcmæon and Amphilochus were ſons to Amphiaraüs (25). II, Homer having ſaid ſo, Moreri ought not to have expreſſed himſelf thus; they ſay, he was the ſon of Amphiaraüs and Eryphile. He ought to have paid a greater reſpect to Homer's authority; for no writer, how little ſoever converſant with the ancients, would have uſed here the expreſſion, They ſay. III, Plutarch's Amphilochus and Homer's are one and the ſame perſon, and therefore Moreri ought not to have made them two. To him belonged the Oracle of Mallus in Cilicia. IV, He ought not to have ſaid, that he other, whom a gooſe fell in love with [E]. I ſhall inſert below in a note what Pliny and other authors have wrote upon this ſubject.

(25) Homer. Odyſſ. lib. 15. ver. 248.

brought an anſwer of the Oracle to one Theſpeſius of Solos (26); for this is transforming a God into a Meſſenger. V, He omits a circumſtance, which by all means was to be taken notice of; viz. that Theſpeſius led a good life after his reſurrection. See Plutarch (27).

(26) This fault has been corrected in the Holland editions.

(27) Plutarch. de Sera numinis vindicta, p. 563, & ſeq.

[E] We muſt not confound him with that Amphilochus, whom a gooſe fell in love with.] Here follows what Pliny writes upon this ſubject. Quin & fama amoris (anſeri) Ægii dilecta forma pueri Olenii (28). This is according to Father Hardouin's emendation of the text; for in the other editions we read: Argis dilecta forma pueri nomine Olenii. Two faults then had crept into the text; one relating to the place, where the gooſe was in love; the other relating to the youth ſhe was in love with. This happened not at Argos, but in the city of Ægium (29); and the perſon, whom the gooſe was in love with, was called Amphilochus, and not Olenus; tho' he was ſurnamed Olenus, as being a native of Olene. Theſe emendations were ſuggeſted by the following paſſage of Ælian. Ἐν Αἰγίῳ τῆς Ἀχαΐας παιδὸς Ὠλενίου χάνος, ὄνομα Ἀμφιλόχου ἠράσθη χήν. Θεόφραστος λέγει τοῦτο (30). That is, "In Ægeum a city of Achaia, "a gooſe was in love with an Athenian boy, "whoſe name was Amphilochus, and who was "an Athenian by birth. Theophraſtus relates this." The ſame ſtory is related by Athenæus, who quotes Clearchus and Theophraſtus, but there is one fault which has crept into his text; for inſtead of ἐν Ἀργείῳ, you muſt read ἐν Αἰγίῳ. Without this emendation, we ſhould have reaſon to think that Father Hardouin went too far, when he ſaid, Neque enim Argis, ſed Ægii prope Sicyonem res geſta narratur (31). Do we not find in the tranſlation of Athenæus, apud Argivos puerum amavit anſer, and in the Greek text, ἐν Ἀργείῳ δὲ παιδὸς ἠράσθη χήν (32)?

(28) Plinius, lib. 10. cap. 22.

(29) In Achaia near Sicyon. See Pauſanias, l. 7. pag. 230.

(30) Ælianus, Hiſt. Animal. lib. 5. cap. 29. See Father Hardouin's Emendat. 21. in lib. 10. Plinii p. 474.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Athen. lib. 13. cap. 8. pag. 606.

AMPHITRYON, ſon of Alcæus [A], ſon of Perſeus, is leſs known by his own exploits, than by his wife Alcmena's adventure, which has afforded a ſubject to the Comic Poets [B]. Alcmena was daughter to Electryon, King of Mycenæ. The ſons of Pterelaus made an irruption into the territories of this Prince, which proved fatal to them, for they all loſt their lives in that expedition (a), but they had likewiſe deſtroyed all the ſons of Electryon (b). Electryon in making the due preparations for the revenging of their death, truſted Amphitryon with his Kingdom, and his daughter Alcmena, obliging him to take his oath that he would not enjoy her. Thoſe who accompanied the ſons of Pterelaus, had drove along with them all Electryon's flocks into the country of Elis. The flocks were redeemed by Amphitryon, who, in delivering them to their lawful owner, was unfortunately the cauſe of that unhappy Prince's death [C]. As this occaſion was greedily laid hold on to drive him out of the country of the Argians, he fled with Alcmena to Creon King of Thebes, and received of him the ceremonies of expiation. Afterwards he prepared for a war againſt the Teleboes [D], with a deſign to revenge the death of Alcmena's brothers, ſhe being determined not to marry upon any other terms [E]. In order to engage Creon in this expedition, he was forced to deliver him from a fox, which occaſioned a great deal of miſchief. He compaſſed this enterprize by means of Cephalus, who lent him the dog that Procris had brought from the Iſland of Crete. Amphitryon, aſſiſted by divers other nations, entered the territories of Pterelaus, and laid them waſte; but he was chiefly indebted for the good ſucceſs

(a) Except one who remained behind to guard the ſhips, Apollodorus, lib. 2. pag. 97.

(b) Except Licymnius his natural ſon. Apollodorus, ibid. pag. 99.

[A] Son of Alcæus.] Apollodorus writes, that Hipponome, the daughter of Menœceus was Amphitryon's mother (1). Others make him the ſon of Lyſidice, daughter to Pelops; and ſome will have him to be born of Laonome, daughter of Guneüs (2). It is to be obſerved, that he was his wife's uncle; for his ſiſter Anaxo was Alcmena's mother (3).

(1) Apollodor. lib. 2. p. 97.

(2) Pauſan. lib. 8. p. 248.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[B] He is leſs known by his own exploits than by his wife's adventure, which has afforded a ſubject to the comic Poets.] Plautus's Comedy, entitled Amphytrion, is one of the beſt he wrote, if we will ſtand to the judgment of Madam le Fevre, who tranſlated it into French, with excellent notes. See the laſt remark of the article TELEBOES. One of Moliere's Comedies bears the ſame title, and is reckoned one of his beſt pieces. He has borrowed a great many hints from Plautus, but gives them a new turn; and if by theſe two pieces alone we were to decide the diſpute, that has been on foot ſome time ſince, between the ancients and moderns, I am of opinion, that Mr. Perrault would carry his cauſe. There are ſome delicacies and fine turns in Moliere's Amphitryon, which far exceed the jeſts of the Latin Amphitryon. How many things was he obliged to ſtrike out of Plautus's Play, which would not have been liked on the French ſtage? With how many new graces and touches was he obliged to ſet it off, in order to make it pleaſe, as it did? If we only compare the two Prologues, we ſhall find, that the modern author is far ſuperior to the other. Lucian furniſhed Moliere with the ſubject of his Prologue, but not with the thoughts; and no good judge will ſay here,

That is,

"Who by tranſlating well and diſpoſing ill,
"Out of a good Greek Play has made a bad Latin
"one."

(4) Terent. Prol. Eunuch. ver. 7. Qui bene vertendo, & eas deſcribendo male, ex Græcis bonis Latinas fecit non bonas (4).

I beg this may not be taken wrong: for I not only own, that the Amphitryon of Plautus is one of his beſt pieces, but that it is abſolutely, in ſome reſpects, a moſt excellent performance. It was acted, as it ſeems, even in Arnobius's time. Ponit animos Jupiter, ſi Amphitryo fuerit actus pronunciatuſque Plautinus (5). I wiſh the Amphitryon of Euripides, and the two Amphitryons of Archippus had reached us.

(5) Arnob. lib. 7. pag. 238.

[C] In delivering Electryon's flocks to him he was unfortunately the cauſe of that unhappy Prince's death.] In the following manner: Cum bos una aufugeret in ipſam, Amphitryo tum quam manibus forte clavam geſtabat immiſit, quæ de bovis cornibus repulſa in Electryonis caput reſiliens ipſum vita privavit (6). i. e. "Amphitryon ſtruck one of his "cows which had run away with a club, which re-"bounding from her horns to Electryon's head, "was the occaſion of his death." In the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, we read a ſtone inſtead of a club.

(6) Apollod. lib. 2. p. 99.

[D] Afterwards he prepared for a war againſt the Teleboes.] We obſerve in another place (7), who the Teleboes were, and in what Apollodorus, whom we have followed, differs from the Scholiaſt of Apollonius.

(7) In the article TELEBOES.

[E] Alcmena being determined not to marry upon any other terms.] In the article, to which I have referred the reader in my laſt remark, we ſhall find, that Alcmena chiefly inſiſted upon the revenging of her father's death.

ceſs that attended him in this war to the treachery of Comethe, Pterelaus's own daughter, who, falling in love with Amphitryon, through complaiſance to him, plucked out of her father's head the golden hair, on which his life depended. The unfortunate Prince expired on the ſpot, and Amphitryon poſſeſſed himſelf of all his dominions, put Comethe to death, and returned to Thebes loaded with ſpoils. The firſt news he heard there was, that himſelf had paſſed the night before in Alcmena's company, which he well knew was falſe, and at laſt it was found out, that Jupiter had played that trick in the ſhape of Amphitryon. However Amphitryon went boldly to her, and made her become an example of Superfœtation, which has been a thouſand times quoted. She had already conceived Hercules, and by Amphitryon ſhe conceived another ſon. Amphitryon, in order to know which of the two was his ſon, and which Jupiter's, threw two ſerpents on the bed. At this Hercules ſhewed not the leaſt concern, whereas the other betook himſelf to flight; and this was a convincing proof that Hercules was not Amphitryon's ſon. It is ſuppoſed that Alcmena wore an ornament on her head, as a token that Jupiter had trebled the length of the night to prolong his careſſes [F]. It is falſe that Amphitryon was the firſt who taught men to put water into their wine [G]. Alcmena ſurvived her huſband (d). The ruins of their houſe were ſtill to be ſeen at Thebes in Pauſanias's time (e). We muſt not forget that Amphitryon was born at Argos (f). Some authors ſtile him King of Thebes (g).

(d) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 39.
(e) Idem, lib. 9. p. 290.
(f) Plaut. Amph. Prol.
(g) Servius in Æneid. lib. 8. ver. 103.

[F] She wore an ornament on her head, as a token that Jupiter had trebled the length of the night to prolong his careſſes (8). This is ſomewhat ſtrange: Were not the battlements, with which ſhe loaded her husband's head, the horn-works and half-moons ſhe fortified it with, ſo as to make him ſurpaſs the Goddeſs Cybele with all her towers, ſufficient to content her?

(8) Apollodorus, lib. 2. p. 97, &c.

Qualis Berecynthia mater
Invehitur curru Phrygias turrita per urbes (9).

(9) Virgil. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 785.

" When in pomp ſhe makes the Phrygian round,
" With golden turrets on her temples crown'd."
Dryden.

What need was there that ſhe ſhould wear on her forehead three Moons?

Parvoque Alcmena ſuperbit
Hercule, tergemina crinem circumdata luna (10).

(10) Stat. Thebaidos, lib. 6. ver. 288.

" With little Hercules Alcmena ſwells:
" Her head encompaſs'd with a triple Moon."

Some interpreters tell us, that ſhe wore theſe three moons in memory of the three nights Jupiter paſſed in her company. A glorious monument, I muſt own, for poor Amphitryon! Did ſhe deſign, that all thoſe, who ſaw her head-dreſs, ſhould be put in mind of her powerful charms, which had prevailed with Jupiter ſo far, as to make him treble the night he enjoyed them? Such a dreſs could not, methinks, be much to her husband's ſatisfaction. I refer to Moliere, who makes him acquieſce in a reflection of his ſervant. Amphitryon's friends hearing that Jupiter promiſed great things in reparation of the injury he had done him, began to congratulate him upon his good fortune, but were interrupted by Soſia:

Meſſieurs, voulez-vous bien ſuivre mon ſentiment?
Ne vous embarquez nullement
Dans ces douceurs congratulantes:
C'eſt un mauvais embarquement,
Et d'une, & d'autre part, pour un tel compliment,
Les phraſes ſont embaraſſantes.
Le grand dieu Jupiter nous fait beaucoup d'honneur,
Et ſa bonté ſans doute eſt pour nous ſans ſeconde.
Il nous promet l'infallibile bonheur
D'un fortune en mille biens feconde,
Et chez nous il doit naitre un fils d'un tres-grand cœur;
Tout cela va la mieux du monde:
Mais enfin coupons aux diſcours,
Et que chacun chez ſoi doucement ſe retire;
Sur telles affaires toûjours;
Le meilleur eſt de ne rien dire.
That is,
" If you'll be guided now by my opinion,
" Make not a ſtir about this happineſs.
" On ſuch occaſions compliments are vain,
" And troubleſome. Great Jove has done us ho" nour;
" And his munificence cannot be equall'd.
" He promiſes a thouſand glorious things,
" And a brave boy, that ſhall the world aſtoniſh.
" All this is well, but let us talk not of it.
" In ſuch affairs the beſt is to ſay nothing.

This ſeemed to Amphitryon ſo judicious an advice, that by his ſilence he entirely agreed to it.

[G] It is falſe, he was the firſt that taught men to put water into their wine.] Athenæus aſcribes this invention to another (11), whoſe name being Amphictyon, a very learned Critic has miſtaken him for Alcmena's husband; and I do not doubt in the leaſt, but that the diſagreement, we often find among authors, is owing to ſuch miſtakes. Read Athenæus, and you will ſay, that Amphictyon, King of Athens, found out the mixing of wine with water. Read Caſaubon, and you will aſcribe this diſcovery to Amphitryon King of Thebes, which will be enough for ſome compilers to form two different opinions. Some, they will ſay, aſcribe this invention to Amphictyon, and others to Amphitryon. Caſaubon's words are: Quod mox ab Amphitrionis (I leave the ſpelling as I find it) invento temperandi vinum ſequitur quo pertineat ſubobſcurum eſt. Spectat autem eo, ne quis miretur quod poſtea dicit, Homerum varia temperamenta vini habuiſſe nota. Cur enim hoc miremur cum τῆς τοῦ οἴνου κράσεως inventor ſit Amphitryo, quem ante Iliaca tempora Thebis regnaſſe nemo dubitat (12).

(11) Athen. lib. 4. cap. 27. pag. 179.
(12) Caſaub. in Athen. p. 323, 324.

☞AMULO, or AMULUS, or AMOLUS, or AMULARIUS (a), or HAMULUS (b), was born in France, according to Dr. Cave (c), and was at firſt Deacon of the church of Lyons under Agobard, upon whoſe death he was raiſed to the Archbiſhoprick of that See the 14th of January 841. In the year 844 he wrote a letter to Theobold or Theobald Biſhop of Langres, who had ſent to conſult him concerning the abuſes which were committed in the church of St. Benignus at Dijon on account of the relicks which were expoſed there [A]. The occaſion was as follows. Two Monks

(a) Cave Hiſt. Lit. p. 450. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.
(b) Trithem. de Script. Eccleſ. c. 273.
(c) Cave, ubi ſupra.

[A] Wrote a Letter to Theobald . . . . on account of the relicks, which were expoſed there.] He adviſes the Biſhop of Langres to remove theſe bones from the Church, and to bury them in ſome proper place near it in the preſence of a few perſons. For, ſays he, ſince they will have them to be the bones of Saints, we ſhould not neglect all manner of regard for them; but on the other hand we muſt not ſuffer them

Monks had brought thither the bones of a pretended Martyr, which they had met with at Rome, and ſome other place in Italy. But what was moſt extraordinary in this proceeding was, that they had the aſſurance to own, that they had forgotten the name of the Saint; as if, ſays Amulo, it was at all credible, that they ſhould not know the name of a Saint, who was ſo celebrated in the place where they had procured theſe relicks, or that they ſhould forget the name of him, whom they conſidered as their patron, and ought continually to pray to. The Biſhop of Langres acted upon this occaſion with great prudence, and followed the conduct of St. Martin in a circumſtance of the ſame nature. He thought that it was not proper to receive theſe relicks, which were not introduced with any authority, though he would not immediately reject them. He determined therefore to oblige thoſe who had brought them to produce authentic proofs of their being genuine from the place where they had received them. Upon this, one of them departed under pretence of going to procure theſe proofs, but he never returned, and the other died ſoon after at Dijon. However notwithſtanding this the relicks were placed in the church near the body of the Martyr, and it was pretended that miracles were worked by them. But theſe miracles were not cures of the ſick, for on the other hand the women fell down on the ground, and beat themſelves in a dreadful manner, which ſtrange effect drew a vaſt number of people thither. Amulo obſerves, that a great many perſons had been ſeized with this diſeaſe, and were obliged to continue in the church, or to return to it as ſoon as they had left it; and this calamity had extended itſelf to other places, particularly the village of San-lieu in the dioceſe of Autun, where the bodies of the martyrs Andochius, Thyrſus, and Felix were repoſited (d). Amulo's letter upon this ſubject ſhews, that he was a man of eminent ſincerity, knowledge, prudence, zeal and eloquence. He wrote likewiſe a letter againſt Goteſchalcus [B], with ſome other pieces upon Grace, and Predeſtination, and Free-Will [C] them to give occaſion to the people to fall into error and ſuperſtition. And we ought not, continues he, to be apprehenſive of giving ſcandal by this care; for God commands us to be ſincere and prudent in thoſe things, which relate to his ſervice. He mentions upon this occaſion the example of St. Martin and the decree of Pope Gelaſius. He ſays, that if any miraculous cures have been performed in the church of St. Benignus, they are to be aſcribed to the power of God and the merits of his Saints, without approving of the other miracles, which have been done in that church or elſewhere. That it is probable, that the falling down of the men and women, and their beating themſelves, are only the effects of deſign in them, in order to get money, by exciting the compaſſion of the ſpectators. That he had never heard of ſuch miracles as theſe before, which inflict diſeaſes upon thoſe, who were in health, and ſeparate daughters from their parents, and wives from their husbands, by obliging them to continue in the church, and preventing them from returning to their own houſes. That theſe things could not poſſibly be any thing elſe but the effect of the wickedneſs of men, or the illuſion of the Devils. He mentions upon that occaſion two inſtances of the ſame kind, which happened under his predeceſſor Agobard, the impoſture of which had been detected. He adviſes the Biſhop of Langres to baniſh this ſuperſtition from his Dioceſe, and to exhort the people in the ſtrongeſt manner poſſible to diſcontinue their aſſemblies in that place, ſince they were attended with ſuch bad effects; but to ſtay in their own pariſhes, and to be preſent at the offices of the Church, where they had received their Baptiſm, as well as the Body and Blood of Chriſt; where they were uſed to hear the ſolemn offices of Religion; and to have recourſe to the Prieſt, in order to receive penance, to be aſſiſted in their ſickneſs, and to be buried after their death; where they paid tythes, and preſented their offerings, and heard uſeful inſtructions propoſed to them. That it was in theſe churches they ought to aſſemble, in order to offer their vows and prayers to God, to deſire the ſuffrages of the Saints, and to give alms to the poor, and widows, and orphans. That this is the juſt and regular diſcipline of the Church, and the ancient cuſtom of the true Believers. That if it happened, that any Chriſtian ſhould be ſeized with any infirmity or diſeaſe, he ought to follow the precept of St. James, by ſending for the Prieſt to pray over him, and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord. He does not in the leaſt doubt, that if this was practiſed, all theſe pretended miracles would ceaſe; and he adviſes Theobald likewiſe, that if there ſhould be any of theſe wretches, who continue obſtinate, he ſhould order them to be ſcourged till they confeſs the truth. He adds, that tho' theſe diſeaſes happened by the illuſion of the Devils, yet it would be better for the perſons afflicted to implore the aſſiſtance of God in their own churches, than to continue thus in a diſtant church; and that one Saint will not be offended becauſe another Saint has been honoured, ſince all of them are united together in the bonds of charity. If people are willing to viſit the churches of Martyrs, they ſhould do it at thoſe times, which are eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe by the Church, in Rogation-week, Lent, and on the Feſtivals of the Martyrs. However he does not condemn thoſe, who do this at other times out of devotion, if it be without oſtentation or tumult; but he is very much diſpleaſed, that they neglect it upon the ſolemn days appointed by the Church, and that they chooſe to do it improperly at other times, and out of mere vanity and oſtentation. In ſhort, tho' there were ſome perſons really poſſeſſed (1), yet they ought to be taken care of by the Prieſts of the place, or in the chapels of the Martyrs, which were near, in a private manner, without any tumult or noiſe; and not to be expoſed to the croud of people in general (2).

(d) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 7. p. 151. edit. Paris 1696.

(e) Idem, p. 150.

(1) Energumeni.

(2) See Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 7. p. 151, 152, edit. Paris 1696.

[B] He wrote likewiſe a Letter againſt Goteſchalcus.] In the beginning of his Letter he ſtyles him his deareſt brother, (tho' he knew ſufficiently, he ſays, that he is an enemy to brotherly love,) becauſe Chriſtian charity ought not to be extinguiſhed or leſſen'd even towards thoſe, who are enemies to us. He declares, that he loves him very ſincerely, and wiſhes him the ſame happineſs as himſelf; but he ſays, that having read and examined the writings which he had ſent him by a brother, he was a long while in doubt, whether he ſhould anſwer him or not, becauſe he had been long before accuſed of attempts againſt the peace of the Church, and of important errors, which he had maintained after having been condemned on account of his obſtinacy by the authority of a Council. That on the one hand he was apprehenſive, that it would be conſider'd as an imprudent thing in him to keep a correſpondence by Letters with a man, who had been condemned by his brethren; but on the other hand it ſeemed to him a point of Chriſtian charity not to leave his requeſt unanſwered. That at laſt being touched with the advice, which our Saviour propoſes to us in the parable of the good Samaritan, that we ſhould aſſiſt our wounded brethren, and being aſſured of the ſincere charity of his brethren, which unites them together, and obliges them to communicate to each other what relates to their miniſtry; after

Will [C]. He was greatly eſteemed on account of his diſtinguiſhed abilities, and had a very conſiderable ſhare in the favour of Charles the Bald. He preſided in the Council of Lyons in the year 845 (e). Dr. Cave is of opinion, that he was ſtill alive in 852, and ſuppoſes that he wrote againſt Goteſchalcus the ſame year. He wrote likewiſe a piece intitled, Contra Judæos Liber 1. ad Carolum Regem Lotharii Imperatoris fratrem; that is, "One book againſt the Jews addreſſed to "King Charles the brother of the Emperor Lotharius." This was publiſhed by Father after having deſired of God grace to be enabled to give him uſeful inſtructions, and to prepare his mind to receive them with meekneſs and humility, he thought himſelf obliged to write him an anſwer. He exhorts him at firſt to poſſeſs himſelf with a peaceable and ſubmiſſive temper. He declares to him, that it was with the utmoſt concern that he had heard of his ſpreading his novel opinions in Germany, and raiſing of unneceſſary diſputes. That ſince that time he had ſeen one of his writings, in which he explained his ſentiments in a very ample manner, and endeavoured to confirm them by teſtimonies from Scripture and the Fathers; and that he had juſt received from him a piece addreſſed to the Biſhops, or rather written againſt the Biſhops, who had a ſhare in his condemnation. That he had diſcovered by his writings how dangerous his opinions were; and therefore he thought he could not do any thing more uſeful, than to give a ſhort account of thoſe propoſitions, which appeared to him contrary to the doctrine of the Church, and to oppoſe to them what the Scripture and the Church teach us upon that ſubject. That he ought to adhere to this doctrine, if he would be of the number of the living members of Chriſt. That he does not addreſs this work directly to him, becauſe he is excommunicated; but to his Metropolitan, that he being touched with compaſſion for him might permit him to enter again into the unity of the Church upon the renouncing of his errors. After this Preface he tells him in the firſt place, that this propoſition which Goteſchalcus had advanced, That none of thoſe, who have been redeemed by the Blood Chriſt, can poſſibly periſh, appears very erroneous to him; becauſe it follows from thence, either that none of theſe, who have been baptized, are damned, or that thoſe, who were baptized and regenerated by Baptiſm, and periſhed afterwards, were not truly baptized and redeemed by the Blood of Chriſt. Now one of thoſe inferences is falſe, and contrary to the Scripture and the Faith of the Church. In the ſecond place he is diſpleaſed, that Goteſchalcus ſhould aſſert, that the true Sacraments of the Church, Exorciſm, Baptiſm, Chriſm, the Euchariſt, and Impoſition of hands, are given in vain to thoſe, who are of the number of the reprobate, becauſe they are not redeemed by the Blood of Chriſt; without which the Sacraments are nothing but vain and inſignificant amuſements. Amulo affirms, that they operate efficaciouſly even in thoſe, who do not perſevere. In the third place, he cannot approve, that Goteſchalcus ſhould aſſert, that infants and adult perſons, who are baptized, and are not of the number of the Elect, are not incorporated in the Church of Chriſt. In the fourth place, he objects, that in ſpeaking of predeſtination he ſhould aſſert, that the Devils and the reprobate are predeſtinated to damnation in ſuch a manner that none of them could poſſibly be ſaved. He obſerves, that this is an horrible blaſphemy againſt God, and an impiety, which infers a neceſſity of ſinning. That God foreſaw the ſins of the Devils and of wicked men, without rendering them at all neceſſary by that means; and that he did not deſtine them to eternal puniſhment, till after he had foreſeen the crimes, which they would voluntarily and freely commit. In the fifth place he is extremely ſhocked at the propoſition advanced by Goteſchalcus, that thoſe, who are damn'd, were predeſtinated to damnation as infallibly and irrecoverably, as God himſelf is infallible and immutable; and he ridicules what follows, that Biſhops ought to exhort the reprobate to pray, that ſince they cannot avoid damnation, at leaſt their pains may be render'd leſs ſevere. In the ſixth place he cannot bear, that he ſhould ſay, that God and his Saints rejoice at the eternal damnation of the reprobate. He aſſerts that God will rejoice in their loſs, but not at their loſs; that he will not rejoice at their wickedneſs, but in his own juſtice. In the laſt place he condemns the manner in which Goteſchalcus treats the Biſhops, by abuſing them with the moſt ſhocking imputations, ſhewing the utmoſt contempt towards them, and calling thoſe, who are not of his opinion, Heretics and Rabbinics. He complains, that he is inſenſible of the ſeparation, which he had ſuffered for ſo long time; that he had fallen upon the Biſhops his Fathers; that he does not ſubmit to the authority of any perſon; that he does not deſire any explanation in a proper and humble manner; and that he thinks himſelf the only man, who is illuminated and inſpired by God for the eſtabliſhment of truth. He exhorts and conjures him to recollect himſelf, to caſt off his errors, to reunite himſelf to the Church, and to ſubmit to the Biſhops; and he gives him with all the tenderneſs of a father ſuch counſel, as was expedient for him to follow. Some authors have pretended that the writing of Goteſchalcus, which Amulo confutes in this Letter, had been forged by Hincmar, whom they accuſe of this fraud; but they have no proof for this, and only alledge two weak conjectures, upon which it would be raſh to attempt to condemn ſo eminent a perſon for a crime, which is the moſt infamous, that can be imagined, and which he was never accuſed of by any of the Partizans of Goteſchalcus. It is much more reaſonable to ſay, that Goteſchalcus had ſecretly written this piece, and ſent it to Amulo Archbiſhop of Lyons; imagining that his Church might be favourable to him, becauſe it had been engaged in the ſentiments of St. Auguſtin concerning Predeſtination and Grace. But as he carried theſe opinions to a ſhocking exceſs, and drew conſequences from them, which were extremely harſh, it is no wonder that Amulo ſhould write this anſwer to him, which is drawn up with all the addreſs imaginable, in order to pacify Hincmar, and to oblige this Monk to give him ſome ſatisfaction (3). This Letter was firſt publiſhed by Father Sirmond, and after him by ſeveral others, and particularly by Manguinus (4), who divided it into ſections, and illuſtrated it with notes.

(e) Idem, ibid. p. 150.

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 18, 19.

(4) Collect. Script. 9. Sæc. tom. 2. ſee Cave, ubi ſupra.

[C] Some other pieces upon Grace and Predeſtination, and Free-Will.] Mr. Du Pin obſerves (5), that there is another Tract, which follows Amulo's Letter to Goteſchalcus in an old manuſcript, which is ſuppoſed to be a fragment of a Letter, which he wrote at the ſame time to Hincmar, in which he treats of Grace and Predeſtination. He tells us there, that we muſt believe, that there is a certain grace, by which men are ſaved, which is not given to them according to their merits, but by the mere gratuitous mercy of God, who leads them into goodneſs, not by conſtraint or neceſſity, but by an agreeable determination of the will, and by love. That this grace is given in Baptiſm to infants, to adult perſons, and to all believers, in all their actions, thoughts and words, which are good; becauſe there is nothing good, which is not the gift of God. That the divine preſcience is certain, and that it foreſees all things in the manner, in which they are to happen; and therefore the number of the elect and the reprobate is known to him, and cannot poſſibly be changed. That the predeſtination of the righteous is free and gratuitous, and not from the view of merit in them; but that God has juſtified and ſanctified thoſe in time, who were predeſtinated from all eternity thro' his mere mercy, that they might be Saints and righteous men. That perſeverance is the gift of God, and free-will has been ſo weakened by ſin, that it cannot raiſe itſelf to the love of virtue and goodneſs, unleſs it be excited and ſtrengthened by the Grace of God, which reſtores it to its original power. He adds that this doctrine ought not to caſt us into deſpair, but to give us confidence in the mercy of God, and to humble us under his al-ther Chifflet at Divion in 1656 under the name of Rabanus Maurus; but Trithemius (f) expreſly aſcribes it to our author, and it is found under his name in a manuſcript in the Library of Monſieur Colbert (g). Mr. Baluze publiſhed all the works of Amulo, except the laſt againſt the Jews, with Notes, at the end of his edition of Agobard (h); from whence they were transferred into the Bibliotheca Patrum (i). Trimethius (k) ſays, that Amulo was a man extremely well ſkilled in the Scriptures and antient writers, very converſant in ſecular learning, famous for his knowledge of the Hebrew as well as the Latin tongue, and of a quick and lively genius.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

(f) De Script. Eccleſ. cap. 273.
(g) See Cave and Du Pin, ubi ſupra, and Olearius, Biblioth. Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 44. edit. Jenæ 1711.
(h) Tom. 2. p. 135. Paris 1666, in 8vo.
(i) Tom. 14. p. 329.
(k) Ubi ſupra.

mighty hand. That what is found in St. Auguſtin and ſome other of the Fathers to this purpoſe, that God has predeſtinated the wicked to damnation and eternal death, muſt not be underſtood in ſuch a manner as if God conſtrained them by his power and predeſtination to be wicked, and in conſequence of it to be damned; but in this ſenſe, that he has ordained by his righteous judgment eternal puniſhment for thoſe, whom he knew would continue in the maſs of perdition, occaſioned by Adam's ſin, or who would render themſelves obnoxious to damnation by their own particular vices. Dr. Cave gives us the following titles of the three pieces of our author upon this ſubject: I, Reſponſio ad interrogationem cujuſdam de præſcientiâ, vel prædeſtinatione divinâ, & de libero arbitrio; i. e. "An Anſwer to the que- "ſtion of a certain perſon concerning preſcience or "divine predeſtination, and free-will." II, De gratiâ & præſcientiâ Dei, deque prædeſtinatione, & libero arbitrio, de ſpe item ac fiducia ſalutis, & de ſententiâ S. Auguſtini; i. e. "Concerning grace and "the preſcience of God, and predeſtination and free- "will; and likewiſe concerning the hope and confi- "dence of ſalvation, and the opinion of St. Augu- "ſtin." III, Sententiæ B. Auguſtini ex libris ejus de præfatis rebus ſumptæ, & in unam ſeriem diſtinctis capitulis ordinatæ; i. e. "Sentences extracted "from St. Auſtin's writings concerning the points "abovementioned, and diſpoſed into one ſeries under "diſtinct heads." Theſe three tracts were found without the name of the author in a manuſcript at Triers, from which Father Sirmond tranſcribed them, and were ſubjoined to Amulo's Epiſtle to Goteſchalcus, ſo that it was uncertain whether they were to be aſcribed to him. Maguinus (6) is of opinion, that the ſecond piece, De gratia & præſcientia Dei, of which we have given an extract above, is a fragment of Amulo's Epiſtle to Hincmar, ſent together with that to Goteſchalcus. The third piece is aſcribed to our author from conjecture only by Father Sirmond.

(6) Diſſertat. cap. 22. p. 169.

T.

☞AMURAT I, the fourth Emperor of the Turks, ſucceeded Solyman in the year 1360, and of the Hegira 761 (a). He fixed the ſeat of his Empire at Adrianople; he ſuppreſſed ſeveral inſurrections in Aſia in the very birth of them, and by his valour ſupported the good fortune of the Ottomans (b). He was the author of ſeveral excellent inſtitutions in that government [A]. Having reſolved to continue the conqueſts of his predeceſſor in Greeee, he ſent over in a little bark, which belonged to ſome fiſhermen, ſeveral Turks in the habit of Merchants, who learned the language and ſtate of that country, and diſcovered what means were moſt proper to reduce it. Sixty thouſand of his ſoldiers were afterwards tranſported into Greece hy means of two Caravels of Genoa, the one named Interiana, and the other Squarciafica, and he paid a ducat for the paſſage of every one of his ſoldiers (c). Thus avarice had more effect upon the Genoeſe, than the intereſt of

(a) Abregé nouveau de l'Hiſtoire Generale des Turcs, par Mr. Vanel, tom. 1. pag. 433. edit. 1697.
(b) Hiſtoire de l'Empire Ottoman; traduite de l'Italien de Sagredo par Mr. Laurent. tom. 1. p. 50. edit. Paris, 1724.
(c) Idem, ibid. p. 50, 51.

[A] He was the author of ſeveral excellent inſtitutions in that Government.] He was the firſt, who appointed the Spahis, who ſerve on horſeback, and dived the provinces into Timars, which are portions of land aſſigned to every horſeman for his ſupport, by which he is obliged to be always ready to mount on horſeback, whenever the Sultan ſhall have occaſion for his ſervice, and to range himſelf under his proper ſtandard. In proportion as the Turks have extended their conqueſts, the number of Timars, and conſequently of Spahis or Timariots have been enlarged. Whenever the Turks have ſubdued a province, they have not only ſeized the government of it, but likewiſe the greateſt part of the beſt lands, which belong to it; they have cruelly deſtroyed the Nobility, and the other proprietors of thoſe lands, and diſtributed their eſtates among their ſoldiers by way of pay. So that the number of their Spahis has perpetually been encreaſing, and there have been reckoned among their troops an hundred and forty or fifty thouſand horſe, eighty thouſand of which were diſtributed in the garriſons of Europe, and the reſt in thoſe of Aſia. It is neceſſary for the Chriſtians therefore to uſe their utmoſt efforts to prevent them from gaining any new acquiſitions, becauſe they are perpetually augmenting their forces; and their conqueſts over the Chriſtians render them afterwards invincible. The inſtitution of theſe Timariots is the reſult of the moſt compleat policy imaginable; for the Turks maintain their troops without any manner of charge to themſelves, and it is the territories of the Chriſtians, which ſupport them. Beſides they find another very conſiderable advantage in this reſpect, that the ſoldiers defend their own property, at the ſame time that they fight for their Prince; and his intereſt by this means being connected with theirs, the arms, which are employed for the common cauſe, always prove victorious (1). Amurat appointed likewiſe a Judge of the army, whom he ſtyled Cadilesker, which ſignifies the Head of all the Cadis, who are thoſe that profeſs the Law, and govern the Cities with the ſame authority, as thoſe, whom the Venetians call Ratras. To this Judge he gave the power of determining all differences among his troops, as well in peace as in war. And that he might not recede from the ſteps of his anceſtors, but purſue every method as they had done for the promotion of his Religion, he aſſigned to this Cadilesker the fifth part of the ſpoils, which were taken from the enemy; which amounted to a very conſiderable value on account of the frequent incurſions of the Turks into the countries of the Chriſtians, and the victories, which they gained (2). He inſtituted alſo the office of Vizir in favour of Timurtas Baſſa, who had gained him ſeveral victories, particularly over Aladin-Beg, Sultan of Caramania, the moſt reſolute and formidable enemy of the Ottomans, and over Cracovitz, Lord of Bulgaria (3). The Vizir is the prime Miniſter, Favourite, and Lieutenant General of the Sultan, and Governor of the Empire. This important poſt is conferred without any other formality, than that of ſending the ſeal. The Vizir always carries it about his neck, for his own ſecurity; for if he ſhould chance to loſe it, thoſe, who find it, might poſſibly make an ill uſe of it, and take the advantage of ſo great a ſanction of authority; which muſt inevitably endanger the life of the Vizir. Every body endeavours to procure the favour of this Officer by every method in their power. It is ſufficient for him to be covetous to be as rich as he thinks proper. His authority is more or leſs conſiderable, in proportion as the Sultans repoſe more or leſs confidence in him, in order to diſengage themſelves from the care of their affairs. Policy was the occaſion of appointing this office, with this view, that whenever there ſhould happen any unfortunate turn of affairs, the public hatred

(1) Sagredo, pag. 51, 52, 53. and Vanel, p. 435, 436.
(2) Sagredo, pag. 53, 54. and Vanel, p. 435, 436.
(3) Sagredo, pag. 54; and Vanel, p. 437.

of their religion, and the publick advantage of Europe. Amurat having by this means landed in Bulgaria, he took Gallipoli by ſtorm, defeated Alexander King of the Bulgarians, who endeavoured to throw ſupplies into that city, and obliged all the adjacent parts upon the Helleſpont to ſubmit to him (d). He learned likewiſe of the Genoeſe the method of building Saicks (e), by which means he brought over from Aſia, whenever he thought proper, a prodigious number of ſoldiers, which proved fatal to the ſeveral provinces of Europe (f). While he was in Bulgaria, he ſaw the picture of the daughter of Uroſc King of Servia, and was extremely charmed with it. But as he knew that he ſhould not eaſily obtain her of her father, he reſolved to oblige him to it by force, and therefore entered into his Kingdom, where he committed a thouſand acts of violence. Uroſc's army was defeated upon the banks of the Danube; upon which he ſent to deſire peace, which was granted on condition that he would give his daughter in marriage. This war being concluded agreeably to his wiſhes, he reſolved to continue that in Bulgaria; but an inſurrection happening in Aſia, obliged him to paſs over thither, where his preſence immediately reduced the rebels to a ſubmiſſion (g). Upon this he returned to Europe, and entered Thrace, where he took Sagara, after he had laid a bridge over the Heber, in order to render the communication more eaſy. John the Emperor of Conſtantinople to divert him from theſe attempts, procured Uroſc King of Servia to paſs over to Bithynia with an army of Servians, Valachians, Hungarians, and Boſnians; but Amurat immediately defeated them. After this victory he entered Miſnia, a little province in Europe near the Danube, which he eaſily ſubdued; and having made himſelf maſter of a caſtle upon Mount Rhodope, which ſecured the entrance of the States of Bogdan, he obliged that Prince to become tributary to him (h). In the next campaign in the year 1366 he took Apollonia, Serez, and Niſſa, and ravaged Albania and Boſnia (i). He was the firſt who appointed the circumciſion of infants to be performed with the utmoſt ſolemnity and pomp (k). In the year 1367 his eldeſt ſon Saulex revolted againſt him, but the attempt proved fatal to him [B]. Amurat married his ſon Bajazet in 1369 to Chatun, daughter of Germean-Ogli, who brought him for her dowry the cities of Cotyaz in Phrygia, and Siman in Bithynia. All the Mahometan Princes, and among the reſt the Sultan of Egypt, were invited to this marriage, which was ſolemnized with the utmoſt magnificence (l). Lazarus, Deſpot of Servia, reſolving to ſtop the courſe of Amurat's conqueſts, made a league with Siſman or Mark King of Bulgaria, and marched an army againſt the Sultan; but they were ſo terrified at the ſight of his camels, that they were thrown into the utmoſt diſorder, and defeated. Lazarus was killed in the battle, as ſome writers inform us (m), or taken priſoner, according to others (n); and ſtrangled by order of the Sultan (o); and Mark ſaved himſelf by flight. While Amurat was engaged againſt the Chriſtians, his Empire was attacked by Aladin-Beg, Sultan of Caramania [C]; but this war being happily concluded, he married a daughter of the Emperor John, and cauſed his two ſons

(d) Vanel and Sagredo, ubi ſupra.

(e) Light veſſels uſed in the Levant.

(f) Vanel, pag. 434.

(g) Idem, pag. 434, 435.

(h) Idem, pag. 436, 437.

(i) Id. p. 437; and Sagredo, pag. 54.

(k) Sagredo, ib.

(l) Vanel, pag. 441.

(m) Sagredo, p. 59.

(n) Vanel, pag. 442.

(o) Vertot, Hiſt. de l'Ordre de Malthe, Liv. 6. tom. 2. p. 315. edit. Paris 1726.

hatred might fall upon him, who was in that high ſtation, and that all the glory of a happy management might be aſcribed to the Emperor, who had nothing elſe to do but to ſacrifice his Vizir to the reſentments of the people, in order to appeaſe the moſt dangerous tumults and inſurrections. Amurat had this likewiſe in view, that an account of the adminiſtration is much eaſier given to a ſingle perſon than to ſeveral. The Vizir has the direction of all affairs; Embaſſadors addreſs themſelves to him; he beſtows all employments; he determines all cauſes; he receives all petitions; and in ſhort he is the Arbiter of peace and war. However he cannot put the Baſſas to death without the Feſta or expreſs order in writing from the Grand Signior; nor can he puniſh the ſoldiers without the leave of their Aga's or Commanders. It is the Vizir, who generally engages the Sultan in war, becauſe he then becomes more neceſſary than before; whereas in peace he is moſt obnoxious to the envy and attempts of his enemies. His poſt is the higheſt of all others, but at the ſame time it is the moſt difficult to be managed; he always ſtands upon a precipice; in ſhort, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, he approaches the neareſt to his Jupiter, but then he is moſt expoſed to his thunder (4).

(4) Sagredo, p. 55, 56, 57; and Vanel, p. 437, 438, 439.

[B] Revolted againſt him; but the attempt proved fatal to him.] John, Emperor of Conſtantinople, reſolving upon a war againſt the King of the Bulgarians, made a league with Amurat; and having united their forces, they enter'd Bulgaria. Andronicus, the eldeſt ſon of the Emperor of Conſtantinople, and Saulex, the ſon of Amurat, took this opportunity of invading the thrones of their fathers, and formed an alliance together, and raiſed troops in conjunction to ſupport their deſigns. The Sultan and the Emperor haſten'd immediately to ſtop their attempts, and found that they had already ſeized a caſtle named Aprendon. The place was prodigiouſly ſtrong, and it could not poſſibly be taken for a long time by the ordinary methods of attack. But Amurat went near the ramparts, and call'd all the Officers by their names, and reproached them with their treachery in ſuch ſtrong terms, that they agreed to reſign the fort to him; however they would not deliver up the two Princes, who eſcaped to Didymotica (5), with thoſe, who continued faithful to Andronicus. Amurat purſued them, and laying ſiege to them, obliged them to ſurrender. Sagredo tells us (6), that when Amurat heard of the revolt of his ſon, he purſued him, and overtook him near Conſtantinople. The young Prince's party immediately abandoned him, being ſhock'd at the terror of his father's preſence. Saulex, finding himſelf left alone, fled to the city of Demotica, and ſhut up himſelf there; where he was beſieged, and taken priſoner. Amurat ordered his ſon's eyes to be put out, to prevent him from the like attempt again. The Emperor likewiſe, for fear of diſobliging him, conſented to puniſh his ſon in the ſame manner. However as nothing elſe but boiling vinegar was made uſe of to deſtroy Andronicus's ſight, he afterwards found means to recover it ſo far as to be able to have a little glimpſe of the objects before him. The Greek ſoldiers, who had followed the party of Andronicus, were thrown into the river which runs by Didymotica; and the young Turks, who had joined with Saulex, were ſtrangled by their own fathers, the Sultan having required of them this ſevere mark of their obedience (7).

(5) Vanel, pag. 440. Sagredo calls it Demotica.

(6) Pag. 57.

(7) Vanel, pag. 439, 440; and Sagredo, pag. 57, 58.

[C] His Empire was attacked by Aladin-Beg, Sultan of Caramania.] He had made an irruption into his dominions, notwithſtanding the peace which had been before concluded between them. Amurat left in Europe as commander in his abſence Aly Baſſa, the ſons to marry two other Greek Princeſſes [D]. The death of Lazarus, Deſpot of Servia, touched Milo, one of his ſervants, in ſo ſenſible a manner. that he reſolved to revenge it upon the Sultan; and accordingly going up to him under pretence of preſenting a petition, he ſtabb'd (p) him in the midſt of his troops, and killed him upon the ſpot in 1383, after he had reigned twenty three years (q). He was buried at Burſa, and left two ſons, Giacup or Giacap, and Bajazet. His conſtitution was very infirm in his youth, but he had recovered it to a great degree of vigour by the exerciſe of hunting, which he was ſo paſſionately fond of, that he kept four thouſand dogs. Age occaſioned an alteration in his temper as well as in his conſtitution. In the beginning of his reign he had ſhewn himſelf inviolably attached to his word, but afterwards he grew very negligent of it, whenever he found that the breach of it was for his advantage (r). It is ſaid that he had gained thirty ſix battles (s).

(p) Sagredo, p. 60, ſays, that he run him through with his lance.

(q) Vanel, pag. 450. Sagredo, p. 59, 60.

(r) Vanel, pag. 450.

(s) Vertot, ubi ſupra, tom. 2. p. 264.

the ſon of Timurtas his Grand Vizir; and having paſſed through the Streights of Gallipoli, came to Burſa, where he received an Embaſſador from the Sultan of Egypt, who came to renew the alliance between the two nations, and was ſent back with preſents. He ſpent the winter at Burſa, and took the field in the ſpring following. Aladin-Beg on the other hand raiſed an army, which conſiſted of Tartars, Turcomans, and Armenians, with which he marched againſt Amurat. When he came within a day's journey of the camp of the latter, he ſent an Embaſſador to him to deſire peace, but he could not obtain it. Amurat went to encamp at Maurocaſtro, and having viewed the enemy's army, placed his own in battle-array. His ſon Bajazet had the command of the left wing, which conſiſted of the troops, which Coza-Beg had brought from Caſtromone, and of the Servians, which Lazarus, the Deſpot of that country, was obliged to furniſh him with. Iſmael his youngeſt ſon had the care of the right wing; and he reſerved to himſelf the body of the army, where the Mogols were to fight under the command of Cara-Timur. Aladin ranged his army almoſt in the ſame order. He placed himſelf in the body of it, the Tartars with their General on the left hand, and the Turcomans on the right. Both armies fought with prodigious reſolution, and the victory ſeemed to incline to Aladin, when Bajazet, with a ſmall party of his men, forced himſelf into the midſt of the enemy, like a furious lion, and obliged them to fly. This action gained him the name of Gulderun, which in the Turkiſh language ſignifies a thunder-bolt. Aladin fled to Iconium, where Amurat beſieged him, and reduced him to ſuch an extremity, that not being able any longer to defend himſelf, he ſued for peace; but that being refuſed him, he ſent his wife, who was daughter to the Sultan. This Princeſs addreſſed her father in ſo moving and pathetical a manner, that he could not reſiſt her tears and entreaties Amurat promiſed to pardon her husband, and received him with great kindneſs, when he came to him. After this interview, Amurat decamped, and returned to Burſa (8).

(8) Vanel. pag. 442, 444, 445.

[D] Married a daughter of the Emperor, and cauſed his two ſons to marry two other Greek Princeſſes.] Theſe marriages were ſolemnized at Apres with vaſt pomp and magnificence, and a great number of the Mahometan Princes were preſent to honour the occaſion. But this joy was interrupted by the arrival of the King of Boſnia in the year 1375, who marched at the head of an army of thirty thouſand men within a day's journey of Apres. The Princes, who were come to the nuptials, immediately took horſe, and having collected as many troops as they poſſibly could, marched againſt the enemy with more reſolution than ſucceſs; for the King of Boſnia's army being much ſuperior in number to the other, the Turks were almoſt entirely cut to pieces. Amurat hearing of this defeat, ordered Aly Baſſa to raiſe troops from all parts, and ſent to his allies and tributaries to come to his aſſiſtance with their whole force. However, as he did not think himſelf ſufficiently ſecure at Burſa, he retired from thence, and paſſed through the Streights, and went to Adrianople. The Ottoman army being formed, Amurat took the field in 1377, and having defeated the Boſnians, Bulgarians, Valachians and Moldavians, who had formed a league againſt him, he ſent Aly Baſſa with the character of Seraskier into Bulgaria, who beſieged Nicopolis, a place of great importance, which ſurrendered to him upon conditions (9).

(9) Id. p. 445, T. 446, 447.

☞AMURAT II, the tenth Emperor of the Turks, and one of the greateſt Princes of that nation, was the eldeſt ſon of Mahomet I, and ſucceeded his father in the year 1421, and of the Hegira 824 (a). Muſtapha his uncle, the youngeſt of the ſons of Bajazet, diſputed the crown with him at firſt. The Emperor of Conſtantinople John Paleologus, the ſon of Manuel, who had no other method of defending himſelf but by fomenting the diviſion of the Princes of the Ottoman blood, had releaſed Muſtapha out of the priſon in which he had detained him at Lemnos. Amurat endeavoured to draw this Emperor to his intereſt by working upon his avarice and ambition. But he rejected his propoſitions [A]. Muſtapha with their aſſiſtance made himſelf maſter of Gallipoli, and was crowned at Adrianople, where he cauſed Bajazet Baſſa, who commanded there for the Sultan his nephew, to be ſtrangled (b). Amurat marched thither immediately, and laid ſiege to that city, and obliged Muſtapha to retire into the mountains, where he was taken and ſacrificed as a victim to the intereſt of the State. The Sultan, in order to revenge himſelf upon the Emperor of the Greeks, marched to beſiege Conſtantinople, contrary to the expreſs commands of his father, who had conjured him never to diſturb the Greeks, out of gratitude for the aſſiſtance which they had given him

(a) Sagredo, Hiſt. de l'Empire Ottoman, traduite de l'Italien par Mr. Laurent. l. 1. tom. 1. pag. 97, 98. edit. Paris, 1724; and Vanel, Abregé nouveau de l'Hiſt. Generale des Turcs, tom. 2. p. 21. edit. 1697.

(b) Sagredo, pag. 98, 99, 100. Vanel, pag. 21, 22, 23.

[A] He rejected his propoſitions.] Amurat had offered him two hundred thouſand crowns, with all the country, which lies round about Gallipoli, if he would deliver up his rival to him. But this temptation could not prevail upon the Emperor to contribute to the reſtoration of a Monarchy, which he foreſaw evidently would prove the ruin of his own. The Greeks were no longer that valiant Nation, which had given Law to the whole Eaſt; they had abandoned the exerciſe of war for the ſofter pleaſures of a Court, and for traffic. Their country was become the ſeat of learning, which has a tendency in it to render men averſe to arms. And it was for this reaſon, that the Turks from the very beginning of their Empire not only neglected the Sciences, but even all kinds of arts, and applied themſelves wholly to war (1). At the firſt riſe of their grandeur they knew not how to write or read; but when they had any treaty to ratify, they uſed to dip their hand in ink, and then make an impreſſion of it upon the paper. There are ſome inſtances of this done by their firſt Emperors, Ottoman and Orcan, which the Turks preſerve with as much veneration, as if they were ſo many relicks, and the moſt ſacred memorials imaginable (2).

(1) Vanel, pag. 21, 22. Sagredo, p. 98, 99.

(2) Sagredo, pag. 99.

him in his wars againſt his brothers. But he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and to hearken to propoſitions of peace. However, his treachery afterwards obliged the Emperor of the Greeks and the Prince of Caramania to purſue other meaſures to ſtop the courſe of his violence, by raiſing up his ſon Muſtapha againſt him [B]. At laſt he agreed to a peace with them, but it was upon very ſevere conditions [C]. In the year 1424 he reſtored the diſcipline of the Janizaries, and reformed the abuſes of the Spahis [D]. In 1426 the Emperor Sigiſmond being ſoilicited by Pope Martin, made a league with Ladiſlaus II King of Poland againſt the Turks; but they could not retard the courſe of Amurat's conqueſts (c), who entered Albania, where John Caſtriot, to whom that Kingdom belonged, was at laſt obliged to treat with him, and deliver up his capital, with his three ſons as hoſtages, among whom was George, who is ſo celebrated in Hiſtory under the name of Scander-Beg. Amurat being exaſperated againſt the King of Hungary, on account of the ſuccours which he had ſent to Bulgaria, laid ſiege to Belgrade, but was forced to raiſe it by John Hunniades Governor of Tranſilvania, who defeated him likewiſe in a ſecond irruption which he made into that Kingdom in 1442 (d). This obliged Amurat to make peace with the King of Hungary (e). However in 1443 he marched into Boſſinia, where he forced the Prince to pay him a yearly tribute of two thouſand five hundred ducats, and into the Morea [E]. To ſtop the courſe

(c) Vanel, pag. 28.

(d) Sagredo, p. 108, 109, 110.

(e) Idem, p. 111.

[B] By raiſing up his ſon Muſtapha againſt him.] Vanel (3) ſays, that he was Amurat's brother. This Muſtapha was then but thirteen years of age. He had taken offence at his father's conduct towards him; and he was offered a refuge at Conſtantinople, from whence he might paſs over into Aſia with the troops, which he could raiſe to his aſſiſtance. But while he was giving at Nice the neceſſary orders for beginning the war, Amurat bribed his Governor, who gave him an exact account of all the ſteps, which Muſtapha took; by which means he ſurprized him, and cauſed him to be ſtrangled in his own preſence (4). Vanel tells us (5), that Muſtapha's Governor being corrupted by the Sultan ſeized him, and ſtrangled him with his own hand.

(3) Pag. 24.

(4) Sagredo, pag. 161.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

[C] Upon very ſevere conditions.] The chief of them was, that the Greeks ſhould demoliſh the great wall, which ſecured the Iſthmus of Corinth, and which was ſix miles long, tho' it had been built with the conſent of Sultan Mahomet his father. Beſides the Princes of Greece were obliged either to deliver up their children as hoſtages to him, or to pay him tribute. The Prince of Sinope and the Deſpote of Bulgaria, in order to preſerve their dominions, gave him their ſons as pledges of their fidelity. But the latter was informed that notwithſtanding this Amurat had a deſign to ſeize Sperendonia (6), the Capital of his Principality. This breach of faith obliged him to ſend privately to the King of Hungary to deſire his aſſiſtance, and he left his eldeſt ſon George in that place to defend it. Amurat having advice of this, prevented his receiving of a ſupply, and laid ſiege to the city. George being terrified at the number of the beſiegers, made a treaty with the Sultan upon conditions, which were never executed. For Amurat ordered the eyes of that Prince and his brother to be put out by means of red-hot baſons applied to them; and commanded their ſiſter, who was a Lady of ſurprizing beauty, to be carried to his ſeraglio, as a ſacrifice to his unbounded luſt. Sagredo has a reflection upon this incident, which ſeems too full of point and falſe wit, and inconſiſtent with the gravity of an Hiſtorian, eſpecially upon ſo melancholy an occaſion. It is as follows (7): "We may juſtly ſay that theſe unhappy Princes "became like moles in the earth, becauſe they were "ſo puſillanimous as to reſign to the Turks their "own dominions. They had in a manner loſt their "ſight, even before they loſt their eyes, ſince they "confided in the deluſive promiſes of this Infidel, "and had not reſolution enough to defend themſelves to the laſt drop of their blood." This is very far from that noble ſimplicity, which is the true character of an Hiſtorian, and which the tranſlator recommends in our author (8).

(6) Vanel, pag. 26, calls it Sperandovia.

(7) Pag. 104.

(8) See Mr. Laurent's Preface to his tranſlation.

[D] Reſtored the diſcipline of the Janizaries, and reformed the abuſes of the Spahis.] He ordered, that the body of Janizaries ſhould conſiſt only of the children of Chriſtians, ſo that afterwards when thoſe of natural Turks were introduced into it, it was an abuſe directly contrary to the original inſtitution. He ſaw that by admitting the latter, the choice would not be made with ſufficient exactneſs, but that favour and partiality would have too great a ſhare in it; and that the ſoldiers finding themſelves protected by their Fathers, would be the more ready to raiſe commotions. To prevent theſe diſorders, he ordered, that the children of Chriſtians ſhould be taken away from their parents while they were very young, that they might more eaſily forget the Religion, in which they were born, and know nothing of any father beſides the Sultan himſelf. For this reaſon they call him in the Turkiſh language Palenſababa, which ſignifies our Father, becauſe it is he, who brings them up, cloaths them, and places them in the Seraglio in order to learn the uſe of arms. This is the ground of their ſtrong attachment to him. And the reciprocal intereſt, which is between them, contributes more than any thing to their victories. The word Janizary is derived from Janua, which ſignifies a Gate; and this name is given them at the Grand Seignior's Court, becauſe they are appointed to guard it. They were not above twelve thouſand at their firſt inſtitution. This ſmall number executed the moſt difficult enterprizes imaginable; and tho' it has been enlarged ſince, yet their valour is not augmented in proportion. On the contrary it has been the occaſion of the relaxation of diſcipline, and conſequently has leſſened their bravery. When the Commiſſaries go to collect this tribute of children among the Chriſtians, the choice of them is made in the preſence of the Podeſtat or Conſul of the Nation, the Secretary, and the Aga of the Janizaries. The fathers of them are obliged to bring out all their children under twelve years of age, and not one is exempt except an only ſon; and they take one of a family. This commiſſion is given to the moſt diſintereſted Turks, who can be found, becauſe the Chriſtians offer all that they are worth to ſave their children. The Janizaries by a particular favour are pardoned the firſt offence; but they are puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, whenever they offend again. They are divided under their Officers into ſeveral bands, which are called chambers. They have it in their power to be raiſed to the higheſt poſts, and are only diſtinguiſhed by their merit, ſince the difference of birth among them is unknown and diſregarded. Tho' they are ſometimes apt to mutiny, yet the ſeverity of the Turkiſh juſtice immediately puts a ſtop to theſe commotions by the puniſhments of their Leaders. Amurat likewiſe regulated the Spahis, and reſtored their diſcipline, by depriving thoſe of their Timars, who did not come with a proper equipage, and range themſelves under their ſtandards; or who, inſtead of appearing themſelves in perſon, ſent their ſervants. In this manner he reformed the abuſes, which had crept into his army; and by that means render'd his troops invincible, and executed whatever he deſigned (9).

(9) Sagredo, p. 105, &c. Vanel, p. 26, &c.

[E] He marched . . . . . into the Morea.] He attack'd it with the utmoſt fury, and carried all before him. The Deſpotes Demetrius and Thomas, who were brothers of Conſtantine Paleologus, Emperor of Conſtantinople, poſſeſſed a great part of that Province. They had ſeveral conteſts with their ſub-courſe of his conqueſts the Chriſtians formed a general league, but this deſign was rendered abortive [F]. Amurat upon this attacked the Prince of Caramania, who proved very unfortunate in his reſiſtance [G], which occaſioned the Chriſtians to renew their league. The King of Hungary, who had juſt before made peace with Amurat, took arms again at the ſollicitation of Pope Eugenius and other Chriſtian Princes [H], appointed Hunniades General of his army, and encamped near the city of Varna. The Chriſtians likewiſe made prodigious preparations againſt the Turks, and fitted out a fleet, of which Lewis Loredano was Admiral (f). This alarmed the Sultan, who paſſed over into Europe at the head of a hundred thouſand Aſiatic Turks, and was joined jects, and this diviſion at laſt broke out between themſelves. Demetrius, agreeably to the pernicious policy of the Chriſtians, made a league with the Turk in the year 1443; but in a ſhort time the confederate and the enemy were treated juſt in the ſame manner, and loſt both their territories and liberty. Thomas did not make any long reſiſtance, but fled to Rome, whither he carried with him the head of St. Andrew the Apoſtle, which the Pope went to receive in a ſolemn proceſſion (10).

(f) Idem, p. 116, 117, 118. Vanel, p. 43, 44, 45.

(10) Sagredo, p. 112.

[F] Formed a general league, but this was render'd abortive.] Poland, Hungary, Tranſilvania, Servia, and Bulgaria united together, and raiſed an army, which was proportionable to the grandeur of their deſign. And to render it more effectual, they reſolved not to be anticipated, but to attack the common enemy even in his own territories, in order to reſcue thoſe of the confederates, who were oppreſſed. It was therefore judged proper to carry the war into the heart of the Ottoman Empire, becauſe they were ſecure of finding proviſions there in plenty, and of meeting with a great number of Chriſtians, who would be glad to break off their chains, and join with them in their attempts. This noble ſcheme was not only neglected, but entirely ruined by the treachery of George Deſpote of Bulgaria. He divided from the reſt, and made a treaty with Amurat. This effectually diſappointed all the deſigns of the league. The other confederates immediately endeavoured to ſecure themſelves every one of them by diſtinct treaties, that they might not continue expoſed to the reſentments of the victorious Sultan. Ladiſlaus King of Hungary ſubmitted at laſt to the neceſſity of affairs, tho' not without great reluctance (11).

(11) Id. p. 112, 113, 114.

[G] Who proved very unfortunate in his reſiſtance.] He had reſolved to take the opportunity of the general invaſion, which the Chriſtians had deſigned againſt the Turks, and had raiſed a numerous army to ſupport their attempts, and to reſcue himſelf from the ſervitude of the Ottomans. But the league being deſtroyed, he was left alone to oppoſe ſo formidable an enemy, and not being capable of reſiſting him by his own ſingle force, was obliged to give way to the torrent. Amurat prepared therefore to reduce the Prince of Caramania, whoſe ruin would inevitably involve others, who were leſs powerful than him. He defeated him in ſeveral attacks; but he was not contented to employ force againſt this unhappy Prince, but had recourſe to treachery to haſten his deſtruction. He diſperſed money among his Officers, and bribed them to his intereſt; he made himſelf Maſter of his Capital, and ſeized one of his daughters, a Lady of admirable beauty, whom he ſacrificed to the debauches of his Seraglio. She endeavoured to appeaſe the rage of the Conqueror; ſhe conjured him to ſtop the courſe of his victories, and to receive one of her brothers as a pledge for her father's fidelity. But the tendereſt careſſes of this Princeſs were incapable of calming the Sultan's reſentments; who notwithſtanding the inclination, which he had for pleaſure, had a much ſtronger ſtill for war. But the Chriſtian Princes at laſt obliged him to leave the country of Caramania in order to go and ſecure his own. They ſaw evidently the error, which they had committed in breaking the league, and that they had every one of them promoted their own deſtruction by making ſeparate treaties with the common enemy. They found, that the loſs of Caramania would be ſoon followed by that of Hungary and Poland (12).

(12) Id. p. 114, 115, 116.

[H] At the ſollicitation of Pope Eugenius and other Chriſtian Princes.] Ladiſlaus being elated with the ſucceſs, which he had gain'd in the year 1443 by the prudent advice of Cardinal Julian Ceſarini, Legate of the See of Rome in Hungary, and the aſſiſtance of Hunniades, was warmly ſollicited to proſecute an enterprize, which had been ſo fortunately begun. Pope Eugenius, the Venetians, the Genoeſe, and Philip of Burgundy, offered to fit out a conſiderable fleet to prevent the Turks from paſſing over into Europe; and John Paleologus Emperor of the Greeks, tho' extremely reduced, promiſed to oppoſe their progreſs in Thrace. The Prince of Caramania engaged to carry the war into Aſia, while Amurat ſhould be attacked in Europe, where Scanderbeg would find him ſufficient employment. In ſhort the war was univerſally reſolved upon. A fleet of ſeventy gallies was fitted out, under the command of Cardinal Condelmer the Pope's nephew, who ſailed to the Helleſpont in order to ſeize the ports, and hinder the paſſage of the Convoys. Amurat aſtoniſhed at ſo prodigious a preparation againſt him, and finding himſelf not ſtrong enough to reſiſt ſo many Princes who were in league againſt him, reſolved ſeriouſly upon peace, which he had been ſo much averſe to before. He promiſed ſecretly to George Deſpote of Servia, his father-in-law, whom he had deprived of his dominions and his children, that if he could procure him peace, he would immediately reſtore them both. The Deſpote being prevailed upon by theſe promiſes, communicated the affair to Hunniades, who very eaſily agreed to it, upon the offer of 40000, or 50000 crowns of gold, with ſeveral places, which he held in Hungary, the right of which would be diſputed with him. And he induced the King of Poland to conſent, who was not very much inclined to continue the war. Thus to the great diſſatisfaction of Cardinal Julian a truce of ten years was concluded upon theſe conditions; that Amurat ſhould poſſeſs Bulgaria; that he ſhould reſtore all that he had taken in that country to thoſe, to whom it belonged before the war; that the priſoners ſhould be releaſed on both ſides, and particularly the ſons of George Deſpote of Servia. The Turks demanded that Ladiſlaus ſhould ſwear upon the holy Euchariſt to obſerve the truce; but he was hindered by a perſon named Gregory, who was afterwards Biſhop of Leopold. The King therefore ſwore upon the Goſpels, and Amurat upon the Koran. After this Cardinal Condelmer, who commanded the fleet in the Helleſpont, ſent a meſſage, that there was now the moſt favourable opportunity imaginable to recover all that the Turks poſſeſſed in Europe, Amurat having paſs'd over his troops again into Aſia againſt the Prince of Caramania. He told Ladiſlaus likewiſe, that he ought to remember the promiſe, which he had made to the Chriſtian Princes, and that he ſhould haſten with his army, the reſt having already ſent their forces. Letters alſo were received from the Emperor John Paleologus, who urged them to continue the war, alledging that he had already begun to attack the Turks; that no confidence was to be placed in the truce, which Amurat's Embaſſador had ſigned; that upon the firſt opportunity the Turks would take arms again without any regard to their oath; and that he ſhould be extremely ſorry, that ſo proſperous a beginning ſhould prove ineffectual by a diſhonourable and criminal negligence. All theſe remonſtrances made ſuch an impreſſion upon the Princes, who had ſigned the truce, that they repented of it, thinking that they had expoſed themſelves to a general ridicule and contempt, after the ſolemn promiſe, which they had given to Pope Eugenius, the Emperor John Paleologus, and to all the Greeks and Latins, who had already prepared the ſupplies, which they had engaged for. They imagined likewiſe, that it would be an act of great perfidiouſneſs to leave them expoſed to the danger, which they had drawn them joined there by the European troops, which were much braver and better equipped. With this army he marched to the Plains of Varna, where was fought that famous battle which proved ſo fatal to the Chriſtians [I]. But in the midſt of theſe great ſucceſſes he met with a prodigious obſtacle to his deſigns from the incomparable valour and conduct of Scanderbeg. We ſhall give a particular article concerning the actions and character of that great man, and ſhall therefore ſuſpend the entering minutely into his them into; and beſides that there was ſome reaſon to break this truce with the Turks, ſince they had not executed all the articles of it, and had failed in reſtoring the priſoners and places, which they had ſeized, at the time appointed. Their minds being thus irreſolute between the obſervation of the truce, and the continuance of the war, Cardinal Julian the Legate took the advantage of this ſuſpence, and repreſented in ſtrong terms to the Generals of the Chriſtian army to what misfortunes their precipitate conduct had reduced them, by making a peace with a Nation of Infidels, at the ſame time that they had violated for an inconſiderable intereſt the faith and ſacred alliance, which they had ſworn to the Pope and the Chriſtian Princes, ſince they would gain nothing by it but the recovery of Myſia, which was already entirely ruined, and might eaſily be retaken in a ſhort time; that this ſecond agreement with the Turk being prejudicial to their honour, and much more ſo to the intereſt of the Church, they ought to break it without any ſcruple, in order to adhere to the former contract, which they had made with Eugenius, John Paleologus, the Greeks and Italians. "Without this, continues the Legate, what anſwer "can you give to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, "who agreeably to his promiſe has already taken "field, and waits for your army? What can you "anſwer to the Pope, the Venetians and Genoeſe, "whoſe fleets are now ready; to the Burgundians, "who thro' a warmth of zeal, which is animated "by faith alone, have embarked long ago, and hav-"ing paſſed thro' all the dangers of the ocean, are "now ready in the Helleſpont to attack the Infi-"dels?" He added, that indeed he had been preſent at the impious truce, which was juſt before made with the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion, but that he had abſolutely condemn'd and oppoſed it with all his force; and that if he had not carried his oppoſition further, it was becauſe he had ſuffered himſelf to be prevailed upon by the wiſdom and authority of Hunniades. Beſides that the ſituation of George Deſpote of Servia had touched him with compaſſion. In ſhort that he had not yielded without the utmoſt reluctance, and then only that he might not ſeem to oppoſe the advantage of the Hungarians and the adjacent people, tho' he was well enough convinced otherwiſe of the injury, which the Chriſtian Religion would ſuffer from it. In ſhort, he exhorted them to break this alliance before the report of their perfidiouſneſs ſhould extend further. And becauſe the reproach of having violated an alliance attended by a ſolemn oath, would raiſe ſome ſcruples in the minds of Chriſtians, the Legate added, "that it was ſometimes allowed a per-"ſon for the public good not to keep his promiſe, "when it was contrary to it; and that it was lawful "upon theſe occaſions to break their faith with In-"fidels. It is true an oath, which is juſt and found-"ed upon equity, ought to be kept; but that, which "tends to the deſtruction of a private perſon or the "public in general, ought to be conſidered as null "and void. A promiſe, which is unreaſonable and "given to an Infidel, is diſpleaſing to God. Beſides "it was more criminal to violate the ſacredneſs of "a league, which had been made with the Pope "and the Chriſtian Princes; and God would not "leave ſuch a flagrant inſtance of treachery unpu-"niſhed. He aſſured them likewiſe, that it would "be more agreeable to the Deity, and more ho-"nourable for the Princes to reſcue ſo many pro-"vinces, which the Turks had uſurped the poſſeſſion "of, from the cruel ſlavery, which they languiſhed un-"der, than to obſerve a treaty made with them to "the ruin of Religion; and therefore they ought "not to omit ſo favourable an opportunity, which "might never offer itſelf again. And to remove "all ſcruples, which the King of Poland and the "Princes might entertain concerning the violation "of the treaty, he abſolved them from the obliga-"tion of it by the authority of the Pope, whoſe "Legate he was." Æneas Sylvius (13) tells us, that Pope Eugenius, who intereſted himſelf very much in this affair, being informed of the truce made with Amurat, wrote to Cardinal Julian, that ſince it had been made without his knowledge, it was void; that he required King Ladiſlaus to break it, and that he would abſolve him from his oath. He exhorted likewiſe the Cardinal to uſe all his efforts both by entreaties or menaces, that the war might be renewed; and not to ſuffer ſo many ſchemes to continue without effect. The ſpeech of the Cardinal Legate made ſuch an impreſſion upon the whole Aſſembly, that nothing was heard but the cries of thoſe who inſiſted upon war, tho' the ſucceſs of it ſeemed doubtful. They all ſaid, that it was better to die fighting for Religion, than to be wanting to thoſe, who were ſo zealous for the preſervation of it, and thereby draw upon themſelves everlaſting ſhame and confuſion. The Deſpote of Servia and Hunniades did not ſeem to oppoſe this; the former flattering himſelf with an eaſy victory, and the recovery of his dominions; and the latter being induced by the promiſe, which was given him of fixing him in the Kingdom of Bulgaria. A meſſenger therefore was ſent to inform the Emperor John Paleologus, and the Cardinal of Venice the Pope's nephew, who commanded the fleet, of their breaking the truce with the Turk. And then the war was renewed againſt Amurat with the utmoſt vigour and reſolution (14).

(13) Europ. c. 5. apud Fleury, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 109. tom. 22. p. 430. edit. Bruxelles 1726.

(14) Fleury, p. 430, &c.

[I] Which proved ſo fatal to the Chriſtians.] Varna, where Amurat met the Chriſtian army, is a city of lower Mœſia upon the Euxin Sea. Ladiſlaus had a ſtrong inclination to engage the enemy, though he had an impoſthumation in his left leg, which was very uneaſy to him; and though Cardinal Julian was of opinion that the army ſhould retreat to the ſide of the mountain in order to view the enemy's forces the better, and to wait till they had a more certain account of the fleet and of the Greeks. A great many others were of the ſame opinion, but Hunniades and George the Deſpote replied, that they knew the forces of the Turks; that their army was always repreſented to be much more numerous than it really was; and that though all the Turkiſh Empire was collected together, yet the Hungarians, whoſe valour was ſufficiently known, would have nothing to fear from them. Thus upon their raſh advice it was reſolved to engage them the day following. But when the two armies were drawn out, Hunniades was ſo aſtoniſhed at the prodigious number of ſoldiers whom they were to contend with, that he adviſed Ladiſlaus to retire, and not hazard a battle. That King replied, that his counſel was now too late; that it was much better to riſque a battle with courage, than to betake themſelves to a diſhonourable flight; and reproaching him in a very warm manner with the boaſting expreſſions, which he had made uſe of the day before, he gave orders for every one to be ready in arms. Hunniades marſhalled the army in battle, which conſiſted only of eighteen or twenty thouſand men; whereas the Turks had above ſixty thouſand, or, as ſome authors tell us, a hundred thouſand ſoldiers. The battle was fought the tenth of November, on the Eve of St. Martin. Both ſides exerted themſelves with the utmoſt bravery for a long time. The front of the Chriſtian army having routed that of the Turks, Amurat was ſo confounded, that he reſolved immediately to betake himſelf to flight, which he would certainly have done, if his officers had not prevented him, by ſeizing his horſe's bridle, and threatning to kill him, if he did not ſhew more reſolution. The battle therefore was renewed, and the victory appeared doubtful for a long time, till at laſt it declared for the Turks. The Chriſtians overwhelmed his Hiſtory, though it is connected with that of Amurat. He recovered by ſtratagem Albania, which the Sultan had ſeized upon the death of his father John Caſtriot (g). He choſe out of the Albanians only eight thouſand foot and ſeven thouſand horſe; and with this little body of men, with the advantage of the mountains and narrow paſſes which that country is full of, he defeated four prodigious armies which Amurat ſent againſt him. The firſt was commanded by Ali, and this defeat would have been of vaſt advantage to the Chriſtians if they had made uſe of it [K]. The ſecond army was commanded by Feriſbeg, and the two others by Muſtapha Baſſa. Amurat aſcribing this ill ſucceſs to the want of courage or conduct in his Generals, reſolved to march againſt him in perſon with a formidable army. He took ſeveral places, but this coſt him more ſoldiers than the loſs of a battle. He was attended in this expedition by his ſon Mahomet, whoſe valour as well as his birth had engaged him to give him a ſhare in the Empire. In the ſecond campaign the two Sultans prepared to beſiege Croye, the capital of Albania; but that they might not be interrupted in their deſigns, they made a treaty with the Venetians, in which it was expreſly ſtipulated, that they ſhould not have any correſpondence with Scanderbeg; and with the ſame view he renewed the treaty with John de Laſtic the Grand Maſter of Rhodes (b). But this ſiege was by no means fortunate for the Turks; for Amurat having ſeen part of his army deſtroyed by the unexpected attacks of Scanderbeg, was obliged at laſt to retire. The Prince of Albania purſued him, and cut to pieces the greateſt part of the rear of his army. Amurat chagrin'd with this ill ſucceſs, and diſabled with the infirmities of old age, fell ſick, (g) Sagredo, p. 131.

(b) Vertot, Hiſt. de l'Ordre de Malthe, lib. 6. tom. 2. p. 462. edit. Paris, 1726.

whelmed with the prodigious number of the enemy fought as they retreated, when Ladiſlaus, hurried on by the fire of youth, threw himſelf into the thickeſt part of the battle, notwithſtanding the efforts of Hunniades to ſtop him, and fought his way through till he came to the body of the Janizaries upon a hill, where Amurat was encamped. His horſe was killed under him; and this young Prince being abandoned and trodden under foot, loſt his life, being then but twenty years of age. The enemy, who till then had deſpaired of the victory, reſumed their courage, and routed thoſe who had made them fly. Bonfinius relates (15), that Amurat in the beginning of the battle ſeeing his ſoldiers put to flight, took out of his boſom the treaty which he made with the Chriſtians, and opening it, and liſting up his eyes to heaven, cried out, Behold, O Jeſus Chriſt, the league which the Chriſtians have made with me, and have ſworn to by thy ſacred name; if thou art a God, revenge the wrong done to thy name and me. No ſooner had he ſaid this, as that author tells us, but the Chriſtian army began to give way. It is certain, that if Hunniades had imitated the valour of Ladiſlaus, Amurat would have loſt his life and the Empire of Greece that very day; but the Hiſtorians inform us, that as ſoon as he ſaw the Enſigns of the Chriſtians retire, he retreated from the battle with 6000 men, as well Hungarians as Valachians, and fled without acquainting the King, before the victory had abſolutely declared itſelf in favour of the Turks. Perhaps from his great experience, which he had gained by the variety of actions, in which he had been engaged, he foreſaw, that there was no longer any hope, and choſe to ſave part of the army rather than loſe the whole. King Ladiſlaus having been killed, Amurat ordered him to be interred with a great deal of honour in the place where the battle had been fought, and erected a kind of pillar at the foot of his tomb, upon which was inſcribed an account of all the actions of this brave young Prince, whoſe merits deſerved a much longer life. The Deſpote of Servia was one of the firſt who fled, when he found that his ſoldiers met with a warm oppoſition. Hunniades flying towards Hungary was taken priſoner in Valachia, but was ſoon after ſet at liberty, and received ſeveral preſents; upon which he continued his journey to Hungary, in order to prevent any tumult, which might be occaſioned by Ladiſlaus's death. Cardinal Julian was likewiſe killed in this battle; but there are different accounts of his death; and it is uncertain, whether he loſt his life in the field, or as he fled, or whether he was drowned in paſſing the Danube by the weight of the gold, which he had about him. Some writers tell us, that as he fled after the loſs of the battle, he fell into the hands of ſome Hungarian robbers, who diſcovering him as he was watering his horſe in a pond, and imagining that he had gold about him, made him alight, and killed and ſtripp'd him, leaving his body naked, and expoſed to the beaſts and birds (16). Authors have blamed him extremely, as the cauſe of all theſe misfortunes; and it is certain, that he was the occaſion of the rupture of the league, which had been ſworn to in a ſolemn manner, and conſequently of the loſs of almoſt all the army. This is Mr. Fleury's account of this important battle; but Sagredo differs a little from it in ſome reſpects. He writes in a manner much more favourable to the character of Hunniades; and tells us, that this General marſhall'd the Chriſtian army to the greateſt advantage, and that he charged Caraz Beglierbeg of Aſia with prodigious vigour and killed him. His death occaſioned ſuch a diſorder in the left wing, that the Aſiatics fled; and this threw Amurat into ſuch deſpair, that he was reſolved to follow them; when the Biſhops of Strigonia and Varadin with the principal Lords of Hungary and Poland, being jealous of the glory of Hunniades, were unwilling that he alone ſhould have the honour of that victory, and choſe rather to periſh, than to conquer under the command of that General. They urged the young King to attack the right wing, where Amurat fought in perſon with his Janizaries; and his death ruined the ſucceſs, which would have otherwiſe attended the Chriſtians. Hunniades endeavoured very reſolutely to recover the King's body, but in vain; and therefore retired ſword in hand in good order with the troops, which remained (17). Sagredo tells us likewiſe, that Amurat went over the field of battle, and ſurveyed the dead bodies with the utmoſt pleaſure; and turning to Aſab Beg obſerved to him, that among the prodigious number who were killed, there were very few, who were advanced in years. Aſab replied, that if there had been many perſons, who were not young among them, they would not have left their trenches, and expoſed themſelves to the loſs of a battle, when they had the victory in their hands. Amurat ordered Ladiſlaus's head to be fixed upon a pole, and then to be ſent to Burſa, where it was carried about in triumph (18). The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves, that the loſs of this battle was greatly occaſioned by the treachery of the Deſpote of Servia, and the diſunion between the Hungarians and Polanders (19).

(15) Hiſt. Hungar. Decad. 6. apud Fleury, p. 434. See Knoll's Turkiſh Hiſtory, p. 297, 298.

(16) Gobelin. Perſ. Comment. lib. 12. Æneas Sylv. Ep. 8. Chalcondyl. l. 7.

(17) Sagredo, p. 119, 120, &c.

(18) Id. p. 124, 125.

(19) Id. p. 126, 127.

[K] Of vaſt advantage to the Chriſtians, if they had made uſe of it.] After Scanderbeg's firſt victory he entered the enemy's country, and laid it waſte, and deſtroyed all who ventured to oppoſe him. At the ſame time Ladiſlaus King of Hungary having reſolved to make war upon Amurat, invited this Prince to aſſiſt him. He haſtened thither immediately at the head of ten thouſand Albanians, who were choice ſoldiers; but he found that Saccovichio Deſpote of Servia had ſecured all the paſſages, ſo that it was impoſſible for him to join the Chriſtian army. In the mean while advice was brought to Adrianople of the defeat of Ali, which exaſperated the Sultan extremely ſick, and was carried to Adrianople, where having languiſhed five or ſix months, he died [L] the 11th of February 1451, being ſeventy five years of age, according to ſome authors, and eighty five, according to others, and in the thirty firſt year of his reign. The Greeks commend him for his juſtice; and it is obſerved to his honour, that he always kept the treaties which he made with the utmoſt fidelity (i).

(i) Fleury, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 110. t. 22. p. 551. edit. Bruxelles, 1726.

againſt Scanderbeg. If the Chriſtians had exerted themſelves upon this occaſion, and given proper aſſiſtance to this General, they might have reſcued themſelves from the oppreſſion which they laboured under. But there were only the Republick of Venice, Alphonſo King of Arragon, and ſome other neighbouring Princes, whoſe forces were inconſiderable, who aſſiſted Scanderbeg, and all the reſt neglected to ſupport him, though by their aid, a man of his incomparable valour and conduct, would have defeated all oppoſition from the Turks (20).

(20) Idem, p. 136.

[L] He died.] When he found after a general aſſault that he was incapable of taking Croye, he aſſembled all his chief officers in his tent, and complained of their want of courage, and of fortune, which had engaged him at that age to put his glory in competition with a little Prince, and to loſe the forces of the Ottoman Empire under the walls of a place, which was conſiderable for nothing but the reputation which it had gained by ſo unfortunate an occaſion. That he had ſpent in vain five months ſince he had entered Albania; and that after having obliged Greece to ſubmit to him, and triumphed over Hungaria, he ſaw himſelf at the cloſe of his life become the object of contempt to a Prince of the Epirots. He ſpoke this with prodigious vehemence and warmth, and he was poſſeſſed with ſuch a violent fit of rage and indignation, that he was ſeized with a fever that very moment. It attacked this conqueror in the midſt of his army; but though it weakened his body, yet it had no effect upon his mind; for even when he was juſt ready to expire, he was concerting ſchemes for new conqueſts. He told the Mufti's ſon, who aſſiſted him in his laſt moments, that his great age, and the uneaſineſs which he laboured under, were the cauſe that he was tired of living, but not of conquering; and that he had leſs pain in diſengaging himſelf from the world, than from victory (21); or, as Vanel repreſents it (22), that on account of the inconveniences of old age, he was well pleaſed to find himſelf near his end; and that he ſhould have left this world without any regret, if he could have ſeen Croye in his poſſeſſion before he died. T.

(21) Id. p. 146, 147.
(22) Pag. 57.

☞AMURAT III, the ſixteenth Emperor of the Turks, and the moſt formidable enemy of the Chriſtians, was the eldeſt ſon of Selim II, and ſucceeded his father in the year 1575, and of the Hegira 983 (a). He was a man of a low ſtature, but of a prodigious warmth of temper, which frequently urged him to commit acts of the greateſt cruelty. He had a peculiar veneration for his mother, and was extremely fond of his wife, who was a Venetian Lady of the houſe of Baffo (b). The firſt thing he did was to ſtrangle five of his brothers [A]. He then declared his reſolution of governing himſelf [B], and determined upon a war againſt Perſia, being induced to it by a pretended viſion [C]. Upon this he ſent Muſtapha Baſſa at the head of a hundred and fifty thouſand men againſt that nation, who defeated the Perſians, and took Tifflis, and fortified Chaos. At the ſame time the Tartars made an irruption into Perſia,

(a) Vanel, Abregé nouveau de l'Hiſtoire Generale des Turcs, tom 3. p. 98, 99. edit. 1698; and Sagredo, Hiſt. de l'Empire Ottoman, l. 8. tom. 4. p. 238. edit. Paris 1724.

(b) See the Article ACHMET, note [C].

[A] To ſtrangle five of his brothers.] He ordered this to be executed the very day that he was crowned. Sagredo has a thought upon this occaſion, which is an inſtance of that falſe wit, which too many of the Italian Writers affect even in the moſt ſerious ſubjects. "Theſe unhappy victims, ſays he (1), may "juſtly be ſtyled Princes of the Blood, becauſe they "are deſtined to ſhed their blood in order to ſecure "the Prince upon the throne." It is a piece of good fortune to be born the eldeſt ſon at Conſtantinople, and it is a crime to be a younger brother. The former is born to live and reign, and all the reſt to periſh by the bow-ſtring. The Turks apologize for this act of cruelty by alledging, that this is a ſure method to prevent a civil war. This policy is extremely ſhocking, tho' at the ſame time it is of great advantage under their form of government. The eldeſt of Amurat's five brothers was not eight years of age. Amurat, who made pretence to a prodigious regard for Religion, would not give orders for deſtroying the Imperial Family, till he had asked the opinion of the Mufti; who anſwered, that this act was not only allowable, but even neceſſary, and that he ought to permit it out of reſpect to the intereſt of the Empire and the tranquillity of the government. Theſe five unfortunate Princes were buried the next day with their father Selim in the moſque of St. Sophia (2).

(1) Pag. 243.

(2) Idem, pag. 243, 244; and Vanel, p. 102, 103.

[B] Declared his reſolution of governing himſelf.] He let them know, that he had very little inclination to the exerciſes of his body; that he was not fond of hunting, or diverſion with his mutes, and that he had no other pleaſure but in the converſation with his women in the ſeraglio, or, as Vanel tells us (3) contrary to Sagredo's account, in the ſeeing the odd humours of his buffoons. He ſhewed the deſire which he had to adminiſter juſtice to his ſubjects, and ordered that they ſhould not be hinder'd from bringing their complaints to him. And that he might know what paſſed in the city, he commanded that the gate of his Seraglio ſhould be open to thoſe, who had a commiſſion to bring intelligence to him. He kept ſpies in the dominions of the Chriſtian Princes, for which purpoſe he employed Jews particularly, and among the reſt a Spaniard, whoſe name was Lopez, who diſcovered to him the ſecrets and deſigns of Pope Sixtus V, and the other Princes of Italy. He declared, that he would not depend upon his Miniſters, and ſaid, that he conſider'd them as the ſpectacles of Sovereigns, which were indeed of ſervice to thoſe, who were ſhort-ſighted, but were entirely uſeleſs to a Prince, whoſe eyes were good enough to manage his own affairs. The Grand Vizir and the other Baſſas, who were uneaſy to ſee their Princes exerciſe their authority in ſo independent a manner, and wanted to be the ſole inſtruments of government, diverted him from theſe generous reſolutions, and prevented him from appearing often out of the Seraglio, for fear that ſome memorial or other ſhould be preſented againſt themſelves; and would not ſuffer any perſon to enter the Seraglio, except thoſe, who were abſolutely devoted to their intereſt (4).

(3) Pag. 104.

(4) Id. p. 246, 247; Vanel, p. 104.

[C] Determined upon war againſt Perſia, being induced to it by a pretended Viſion.] A Preacher, whoſe name was Sciac, who was very zealous againſt the ſect of Ali or the Perſians, and uſed to come frequently to the Seraglio, told Amurat one Day, that the night before he had dreamt, that his Highneſs had triumph'd in Perſia, and that he had ſeen theſe words written in large characters upon the gate of the Divan, Feta Agen, that is, the Conqueror of Perſia. This viſion was a motive ſufficient to engage the Sultan in a war with the Sophi (5). This expedition was reſolv'd upon and publiſh'd without calling a Council; the horſe-tail was expoſed according to the uſual cuſtom; and a very powerful army raiſed; a vaſt quantity of proviſions was prepared, and every thing provided proportionable to the difficulty of the enterprize (6). But it will not be improper to conſider here the

(5) Vanel, pag. 106; and Sagredo, p. 249.

(6) Sagredo, ibid.

 ſtate

Persia, and the Sophi marched in person to oppose the progress of the Turks (c). This happened in the year 1579; and the same year Mahomet the Grand Vizir was assassinated at Constantinople [D]. Amurat then sent Sinan Bassa to succeed Mustapha in the command of the army in Persia, who died of regret for not being made Grand Vizir [E]. In 1580 the Grand Vizir Sinan was desirous of a peace with Persia, that he might have an opportunity of returning to Constantinople, where he treated all the Christian Embassadors with a great deal of contempt and severity (d). In the year 1581 Amurat received an Embassador from the King of Poland to sollicit the liberty of a Nobleman of that nation; and another from Don Antonio of Portugal, to desire his assistance against King Philip II of Spain (e). Two other Embassies were likewise sent to him the same year, one from the King of Fez, to sollicit his aid, lest Portugal should fall into the hands of the Spaniards (f); and the other from Persia to negotiate a peace, but without success (g). In 1582 he made a magnificent feast on account of the (c) Sagredo, pag. 261.

(d) Idem, pag. 276, 277.

(e) Idem, pag. 278, 279.

(f) Id. p. 288, 289.

(g) Idem, pag. 289, 290.

state of Persia at that time, which will give a light to the affairs between the Turks and that country. That Kingdom had continued peaceable during the reign of Tachmas, who avoided all occasions of breaking with the Turks, and even consented to the demolition of the castle of Chars in order to avoid a war. His eldest son Ismael, who was of a different opinion, entered the Ottoman Dominions in 1566 with twelve thousand horse, without the knowledge of his father, took the city of Veta, and cut in pieces several troops, who endeavoured to oppose him. Tachmas was so exasperated at this, that in order to give satisfaction to the Sultan, he shut up his son in a castle, where he detained him several years, and even declared Kaidar or Chaidar his third son successor to his Crown. After the death of Tachmas the face of affairs was changed; Ismael, who was beloved by the troops was set at liberty, and raised a strong army, with which he marched to the Capital to take possession of the Crown. Kaidar opposed him, but being killed in battle, Ismael was proclaimed King at the age of forty two years. He had a natural aversion to the Turks, and his imprisonment had enraged him the more against them, because they had contributed very much to it. He invited all the Christian Princes to enter into a league with him, and desired them to supply him with canons and canoniers; but he could not obtain them. However it would have been very easy to have assisted him by means of the Portugueze, who were Masters of a great many Provinces in the East Indies, or by the way of Muscovy; and by thus continuing the war with Persia, the Turks might have been prevented from attacking the Christians. But none of the Princes concerned ever reflected upon this. Ismael sent no Embassador to the port to acquaint the Sultan with his accession to the Crown, pretending that it was Amurat's business to send to congratulate him upon that occasion. Nay he gave orders to all his Governors of the Frontiers to oppose vigorously the incursions of the Turks. Amurat was offended at this conduct of his, and confirmed in his resolution of making war upon that country. Ismael's reign was very short; the Grandees of his Court being displeased that he should follow the Sect of Omar, resolved to remove him; and procured him to be poisoned by his Sister Periancono (7), or Alsuana, as Sagredo calls her, who was very zealous for the Sect of Ali. After his death Mahomet Codabanda was placed upon the Throne. The Emirs of Persia soon repented of this election, because he had none of the virtues of his brother Ismael. He had the hairs of his eyebrows so long, that they covered his eyes, and for that reason he was called Codabanda, which in the Persian language signifies blind (8). This new King was no sooner upon the Throne, but he resolved to remove Periancono his sister, who had endeavoured to seize all the royal authority, and to leave him nothing but the shadow of power. He sent therefore to Miriza Salmas, the most considerable of the Emirs, that he should bring him his sister's head. Miriza obey'd this order, and having stabb'd the Princess, went to the King with the chief men of his Faction. Sahamal and Lentiogli, Princes of Georgia, who had been the principal confidents of Periancono, being informed of her death, retired to the mountains of Armenia, for fear lest the new King should put them to death. Amurat hearing of these changes in Persia, thought that it was a proper opportunity to conquer that Kingdom, and therefore gave orders for the necessary preparations (9), tho' he depended less upon the strength of his own forces, than the weakness of the Sophi (10).

(7) Vanel, p. 108.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, pag. 289.

(10) Sagredo, p. 256.

[D] Mahomet the Grand Vizir was assassinated at Constantinople.] This Minister, who was very zealous for the interest of his Master, had resolved to disband some of the troops, which he judged unnecessary upon the frontiers of Europe since the peace, which had been concluded with the Christian Princes. One of the Spahis exasperated at being deprived of his Timar, formed a resolution to kill him, but met with great difficulties to execute his design. It was dangerous to attempt this in the Seraglio, and very difficult to do it in his own palace, the gates of which were constantly kept by Porters, who would not suffer him to enter. This served only to aggravate his resentment, to gratify which he disguised himself like a Dervis. The doors of great men's houses are always open to persons of that character, who are never hindered from going into them to ask alms. The Porter suffered the Spahi to enter, but he could not obtain leave to go into the Grand Vizir's apartment, where there were several persons of figure. Upon this he complained in so loud a manner, that Mahomet heard him, and ordered that he should be brought in. The pretended Dervis came near him, and presented a petition; and while the Vizir was reading it, he struck a knife into his belly. The Vizir drew out his dagger, to revenge the wound, which he had received, but his strength fail'd him, and he fell down dead upon the spot (11). He was well advanced in age, but of so vigorous and healthy a constitution, that if it had not been for this accident he might have lived for many years longer. Amurat ordered the assassin to be quartered alive. The Grand Vizir's death was extremely regretted, he having served several Sultans; and the Seals were given to Achmet Bassa (12).

(11) Vanel, p. 112, 113; and Sagredo, pag. 261, 262.

(12) Sagredo, p. 263.

[E] Did for the regret of not being made Grand Vizir.] After the death of Achmet, Mustapha executed that office by commission, but could never obtain the Seals for himself. Sinan Bassa, who commanded the army in Persia, aspired to that post, and the Sultan declared in his favour. This touch'd Mustapha so sensibly, that being found dead one night, it was reported that he had poisoned himself. His domestics said, that his death was occasioned by his having eaten too liberally, which occasioned an apoplexy in the night. In short it was observed, that he was guilty of eating to excess not only the night in which he died, but at all other times. His Chancellor was put to the question, who declared that his Master had two millions of ready money, and directed to the place where it was hid. This was part of the spoils, which he had brought from the Isle of Cyprus (13). Sagredo says, that his sudden death was a punishment from God, and that he could expect nothing less after the cruelty, which he had been guilty of in causing Bragadin and other Christians to be flea'd alive, and ordering the heads of those who were dead to be cut off. However he excused the barbarities, which he had been guilty of in that Kingdom, by alledging the secret orders, which Selim had sent him in writing. All this treasure of his was carried to the Hasna (14); and as the Sultan was seeing it pass along thro' a window, he was seized with an epileptic fit, and fell down, and hurt his face. Sagredo observes upon this occasion (15), that Crowns do not secure those, who wear them, from dizziness of the head.

(13) Vanel, p. 114; Sagredo, p. 265, 266.

(14) Vanel, p. 115; Sagredo, p. 266, calls it the Casna.

(15) P. 267.

the ceremony of the circumciſion of his eldeſt ſon Mahomet [F]. In 1583 Queen Elizabeth of England ſent an Embaſſy to him [G]; and the ſame year the war between the Turks and Venetians was very near being renewed on account of a Turkiſh galley which had been taken by Gabriel Emo; but this was prevented by puniſhing that Officer, and reſtoring the prize. Oſman the Turkiſh General being defeated by the Sophi of Perſia's ſon, Amurat reſolved to ſend the Grand Vizir Sinan again to command his armies there, but the latter making uſe of all the pretences imaginable to continue at Conſtantinople, and urging the Sultan himſelf to go in perſon, was diveſted of his poſt of Vizir [H], and the ſeals given to Sciaus Baſſa (b). But Amurat's inconſtant humour was very prejudicial to his affairs (i); and he ſhewed an inſtance of uncommon cruelty by ordering an Embaſſador from Poland to be cut to pieces with all his (b) Idem, pag. 310, 311, 312, 313.

(i) Idem, pag. 313, 314.

[F] The ceremony of the Circumciſion of his eldeſt ſon Mahomet.] He took a million and an half of gold out of his Haſna to be employed in the expences of it, that it might be performed with all the magnificence imaginable. This is one of the chief ceremonies of the Turkiſh Religion, which is derived from that of the Jews. They pretend that it has the ſame virtue as Baptiſm among Chriſtians, and that without this there is no poſſibility of ſalvation. He acquainted the Baſſas with his intention, who were of opinion, that in order to render this ceremony more auguſt, and worthy of the grandeur of their Sovereign, he ſhould inform the Chriſtian Princes of it, that they might ſent Embaſſadors extraordinary in honour of this ſolemnity. They acquainted the Emperor, the Kings of France and Poland, and the Republic of Venice. All theſe powers ſent perſons of the higheſt rank thither. The Senate of Venice choſe Giacomo Soranzo Procurator of St. Mark; who at the audience which he had of Sinan the Grand Vizir, received great complaints of the incurſions, which the Knights of Malta made upon the Turkiſh Dominions. The Feaſts on account of the Circumciſion began the ſecond of June, and were not concluded till the twenty firſt. The Hippodrome, where the horſe-races uſed to be kept, was appointed for the place of this ceremony. The twelfth of that month Mahomet came out of the Seraglio with a prodigious concourſe of people, and was circumciſed by Mahomet Baſſa, the Surgeon in chief. This Prince was not then above ſeventeen years of age, and tho' his father did not allow him much liberty, yet he ſhewed notwithſtanding his youth, that he had very violent paſſions. He fell in love with a ſlave belonging to his mother, and attempted to enter by force in the night into the women's apartment. An eunuch endeavoured to reſiſt him, but this coſt him his life, for Mahomet killed him with a dagger. His mother in order to extinguiſh this paſſion of his for that ſlave, commanded her to be thrown into the ſea, tho' ſhe was then big with child by him. But he reſented this ſo highly, that he was imprudent enough to ſay, that he would kill his mother out of revenge for that injury; ſo that Amurat was obliged to reprimand him in a very ſevere manner (16). His father and the Baſſas made him very noble preſents after his circumciſion (17).

(16) Sagredo, p. 291--299. Vanel, p. 124, 125, 126.

(17) Sagredo, p. 299.

[G] Queen Elizabeth of England ſent an Embaſſy.] This was the firſt Embaſſy, which that Kingdom ever ſent to the Turks. This Queen, who, as Sagredo obſerves (18), in the Government of her Kingdoms ſurpaſſed the greateſt Men, and raiſed herſelf above her ſex, ſent ſhips into the Eaſt; and as the wars, which the Venetians carried on againſt the Port, had prevented them from continuing their voyages ſo frequently as they deſired, the Engliſh enter'd into the Mediterranean, ſailed to the Levant, and went to Zant and Cephalonia to load raiſins, which the Venetians imported before into their country, where a great quantity was conſumed. Queen Elizabeth, who knew the profit, which her ſubjects might reap from this trade, reſolved to eſtabliſh it, tho' her Kingdom was at a vaſt diſtance from Conſtantinople. This Embaſſy was by no means agreeable to the Miniſters of France and Venice. The former remonſtrated in the ſtrongeſt terms to the Grand Vizir what an injury would be done to his Maſter, if they received the Engliſh, and urged the privileges, which France had always enjoyed, and the ancient correſpondence, which had been between that Crown and the Port. The Grand Vizir replied, that the Port was called ſo only, becauſe it was open equally to the whole world; that it was not juſt to exclude the Engliſh without any manner of reaſon. That the Turks had made it a law to themſelves to live amicably with thoſe, who ſought their friendſhip, and in bad terms with thoſe, who render'd themſelves unworthy of it; and that tho' they made war againſt their enemies, they knew how to treat their friends well. The Embaſſador of France not being able to obtain the diſmiſſion of the Engliſh Embaſſador, as he deſired, inſiſted, that at leaſt the Engliſh ſhips, which came to Conſtantinople, ſhould bear the colours of France. The Engliſh Embaſſador oppoſed this with great vigour, and ſaid, that his Queen was ſo powerful, that ſhe would not depend upon any perſon; that ſhe would rather renounce all correſpondence with the Port, than do any thing, which might be prejudicial to her dignity. That ſhe demanded, that the ſea ſhould be free to her ſhips, and that they might ſail under her colours without being under any obligation or dependence. This Miniſter underſtood how to manage his negotiation in ſuch a manner, and repreſented to the Turks the advantages which they would gain by the trade, which he wanted to eſtabliſh, that they immediately agreed to his propoſals (19). Sagredo ſays (20), that theſe Infidels are like hounds; they diſcover the ſmell of money at a diſtance; ſo that the preſents of the Engliſh, and the profit, which they expected from that nation, made them prefer this new alliance to their ancient ones. This trade encreaſed afterwards every day. This artful Queen, ſays the ſame Hiſtorian, took part of the trade of the North from the Hanſe-towns, which they had before carried on alone. She formed trading companies, to which ſhe gave peculiar exemptions and privileges. She prohibited the exportation of wool out of her Kingdom, and eſtabliſhed woollen manufactures, which was a great loſs to the Venetians. She applied herſelf to the trade of Africa, and formed Companies for that of the Canaries, Guinea, and the Indies. The wars having prevented the Venetians from ſending Conſuls to the Ports of the Levant, the Engliſh fixed themſelves there, and particularly at Conſtantinople, Smyrna, Aleppo, and Alexandria, whither they carry lead, tin, ſteel, and iron, from whence they make a particular advantage (21).

(18) Pag. 301.

(19) Sagredo, p. 301, 302, 303; Vanel, p. 126, 127.

(20) P. 303.

(21) Sagredo, p. 303, 304; Vanel, p. 127.

[H] Diveſted of the poſt of Vizir.] He had told Amurat, that it appeared from many paſt inſtances, that the Turks had never made any conſiderable progreſs in Perſia, unleſs their Sultans went themſelves thither in perſon. That he ought to leave the Seraglio, ſince victories were not to be found there, but only in the open field; and that if he deſired to follow the examples of his anceſtors he ſhould abandon his miſtreſſes, and purſue ſuch methods, as would raiſe his character. The Sultan was ſurprized at this bold remonſtrance, which perſons of his rank can very ſeldom hear with patience. But what exaſperated him ſtill more againſt Sinan, was the apprehenſion, which the favourite Ladies of the Seraglio inſpired Amurat with, when they inſinuated to him, that this Miniſter in order to court the favour of the people and the army, who were by no means fond of the Sultan, becauſe he was not of that warlike diſpoſition as his predeceſſors, had a deſign to draw him from Conſtantinople, to place his ſon Mahomet upon the throne. Amurat was ſo ſenſibly affected with this, that he deprived Sinan of his dignities, and reduced him to the ſtate of a Maſul or man without employment, and would even have put him to death, if his wife had not interceded with the Ladies of the Seraglio. His eldeſt ſon likewiſe was removed from a Government, which had been conferred upon him (22).

(22) Sagredo, p. 311, 312; Vanel, p. 131.

his retinue [I]. Upon Oſman's return from Perſia in 1584, he was received with prodigious honour by Amurat, whom he adviſed to make peace with the Sophi, and was made Grand Vizir (k). The ſame year the Turks were defeated by the Perſians. In 1585 Oſman routed the Tartars, and reſtored Iſlan to the throne of Tartary, and then marched into Perſia, where he took Tauris, and built a caſtle there, and was killed in a battle with the Perſians, in which the Turks were defeated (l). Amurat was confounded at this loſs, though to amuſe the people he pretended that the victory was on their ſide, and raiſed another army, which he ſent to Perſia under the command of Ferat Baſſa (m). The Turks threw ſupplies into Tauris, which was beſieged by the Perſians (n), but attempting it the ſecond time in 1588 were defeated by the latter (o). However the Sophi was deſirous of a truce, in order to oppoſe Uſbec King of the Aſiatic Tartars, who had made an irruption into his dominions, and for that purpoſe ſent a Prince of the royal blood with four conſiderable Lords of his Kingdom to Conſtantinople, who procured a truce (p). In 1589 there was a peace made between the Turks and Perſians, which was very diſadvantageous to the latter [K]. About the ſame time Amurat invented new methods of increaſing his revenues [L]. Sinan the Grand Vizir propoſed ſeveral ſchemes of new conqueſts to him, but his avarice prevented him from regarding them (q) [M]. In 1590 Rodolphus the Emperor of Germany, who had more vigour and reſolution than his predeceſſor Maximilian, recalled the Embaſſadors, who were carrying to Amurat the tribute of Hungary; upon which the Grand Vizir ordered the Emperor's Embaſſadors to be ſeiz'd (r). The ſame year Aſſan Baſſa, notwithſtanding the truce between the Emperor and the Turks, had made incurſions into Croatia, and beſieg'd Siſech, which occaſioned a battle between him and the Chriſtians [N], in which he was ſlain with Mahomet Amurat's nephew, and ten thouſand Turks (s).

(k) Idem, pag. 322, 323, 324.

(l) Idem, p. 329, 330, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337.

(m) Idem, pag. 338, 339.

(n) Idem, pag. 343.

(o) Idem, pag. 346.

(p) Idem, pag. 347, 348, 349, 350.

(q) Id. p. 374.

(r) Idem, pag. 379, 380.

[I] Ordering an Embaſſador from Poland to be cut to pieces with all his retinue.] This ſhocking act of barbarity expoſed him to the deteſtation of all Europe. This Embaſſador had a paſsport from the Sultan in the proper form. The Turks pretended, that they had no hand in it, and caſt the blame of it upon the Tartars, or other Aſſaſſins of that kind. But as ſuch actions cannot continue long concealed, it was diſcovered at laſt, that it was done by Amurat's order. The whole world diſapproved of this maſſacre of an innocent perſon, and the imputation of it fell entirely upon the Sultan. People endeavoured to penetrate into the cauſes of it, and ſaid, that the Embaſſador having had leave granted him to carry ſome Turkiſh horſes into Poland, refuſed to pay the uſual demands, and had a conteſt with the Collectors of the cuſtoms; but this was only a pretence. The true reaſon was, that the Sultan being provoked by the incurſions of the Coſſacks into his Dominions, and not able to oppoſe them becauſe of the war with Perſia, revenged himſelf upon the perſon of this Miniſter (23).

(23) Sagredo, p. 314, 315; Vanel, p. 133.

[K] Peace was made between the Turks and Perſians, which was very diſadvantageous to the latter.] The Sophi had conquered Usbec, Cham of Tartary, which made him very conſiderable, and inclined the Turk to a peace with him; for the latter had met with ſuch ill ſucceſs in the war with them, that peace was abſolutely neceſſary for them. The war had continued twelve years. They had loſt above a hundred and fifty thouſand men, and immenſe treaſure. The articles of peace were, that the Sophi ſhould leave his grandſon in the hands of Amurat as an hoſtage. The Turks kept him very private, and prevented any perſon from coming near him, upon the advice which they had, that the Sophi's Embaſſador had orders to poiſon him, leſt the Turks ſhould make uſe of him ſome time or other, in order to raiſe a civil war in Perſia. By this treaty the Sophi reſigned to the Sultan Tauris, and all the conqueſts which the Turks had gained. The Perſians loſt very conſiderably by this treaty, ſince beſides Chars, Tifflis, Lon, and ſeveral other adjacent places of Georgia, they loſt in Lower Armenia three hundred miles of the country of the ſide of Tauris, and ſeveral places in the Kingdoms of Servan and Revan (24).

(24) Vanel, p. 157, 158; Sagredo, p. 360, 361.

[L] About the ſame time Amurat invented new methods of encreaſing his revenues.] Of all his vices, his inſatiable avarice was moſt remarkable. This prompted him to ſeek out new ſchemes for oppreſſing the people. He laid new taxes upon them, which were collected in gold coin, that were reckoned at the old value; and as that was much higher than before, theſe taxes were almoſt doubled upon them. Beſides, no officer was ſecure of continuing long in his office, and therefore the Baſſas being uncertain how long they ſhould enjoy their poſts, acted with the moſt unbounded licence imaginable, and committed more diſorders in one month, than they would otherwiſe have done in the courſe of ſeveral years. This oppreſſion occaſioned a prodigious clamour among the people; and Ferat the Grand Vizir was privately accuſed of having ſecreted three millions of gold during the time, that he commanded in Perſia. As he was in converſation one day with the Sultan, he offered him a large ſum in ſequins, equal to that, which he was charged with having applied to his own uſe, on condition that he ſhould have the liberty of continuing at Conſtantinople, and living there as a Baſſa of the loweſt order. Sciaus or Schiaoux, as Vanel calls him (25), ſucceeded him as Vizir; but he was very uncertain of enjoying that poſt long; for Sinan endeavoured to raiſe himſelf to it the third time, and offered three hundred thouſand crowns to the Sultan for that purpoſe. However the new Vizir made uſe of every method to ſupport himſelf in it, and to gratify the avarice of Amurat. Every thing was obtained of him by money, and he ſold juſtice in the moſt public manner imaginable (26).

(25) Pag. 162.

(26) Sagredo, pa 370, 371; Vanel, p. 162, 163.

[M] His avarice prevented him from regarding them.] Sinan in order to induce him to undertake ſome expedition at ſea, placed before him the examples of his anceſtors, and repreſented to him, that he had gained conqueſts ſufficient at land in Perſia, and that he ought to ſhew the world, that he could equally triumph at ſea. Amurat ſent for Cicala Captain Baſſa to know his opinion, who was of the ſame ſentiments with Sinan. But when they came to examine into the expences, which were neceſſary to fit out a naval armament, the Sultan told them, that expeditions at ſea were too expenſive, and that he ought to confine himſelf entirely to the land. The Vizir was inexpreſſibly chagrin'd at Amurat's oppoſing his opinion. He left the Sultan's apartment with all the indignation imaginable in his countenance, and was heard to ſay, God bleſs the ſoul of Selim his father, who by expeditions at ſea had added the beautiful Iſle of Cyprus to the Ottoman Empire; but that his ſon would never follow ſo glorious an example. He ſaid likewiſe, that he thought himſelf unhappy, that he was not born under the reign of thoſe Sultans, who loved war; for after he had conquered Perſia, and reduced Tunis and Gouletta, he would then paſs over to Rome, and force the Pope from his See (27).

(27) Sagredo, p. 374, 375; Vanel, p. 165.

[N] A battle between him and the Chriſtians.] The victory continued a long time doubtful. The Chriſtians at laſt began to give way, when their General's exhortations revived their courage in ſuch a manner, that they defeated their enemies rather by their Turks (s). This cauſed a rupture between the Turks and the Emperor; and Sinan marched into Hungary in 1592 with the Emperor's Embaſſador in chains (t). In 1593 the Venetians built the caſtle of Palma, in order to ſecure Friuli (u). The ſame year the Hungarians attempted to ſurprize Belgrade, but in vain, and were attacked by the Turks, who were defeated (w). Upon this Diuffembac the General of the Imperial army took Filec, and the Arch-Duke Matthias and Novigrad, who likewiſe attacked Gran, but was obliged to raiſe the ſiege (x), and in 1594 was routed by the Turks, who took Javarin (y). Rodolphus having made a league with Sigiſmund Battori Prince of Tranſilvania, defeated the Tartars, and afterwards the Turks (z), which occaſioned Sinan the Grand Vizir to perſuade Amurat to put himſelf at the head of his armies, or at leaſt to ſend his ſon; but the Sultan refuſed both (aa). The ſame year Amurat married one of his daughters to Ali Baſſa with prodigious pomp, but died himſelf ſoon after, in the year 1594 (bb). We ſhall give his character in the note [O].

(s) Idem, p. 381, 382.
(t) Idem, pag. 384, 385, 386.
(u) Idem, p. 387, &c.
(w) Idem, pag. 394, 395, 396.
(x) Idem, pag. 396, 397.
(y) Idem, pag. 399.
(z) Idem, pag. 403, 406.
(aa) Id. p. 408.
(bb) Ib. p. 415.

their valour, than the ſuperiority of their numbers. The Turks fled with the utmoſt diſorder; and neither the entreaties nor menaces of Aſſan could ſtop them; and that General finding himſelf abandoned was obliged to follow the reſt. But when they came to the river Save or Sarre, as Vanel calls it (28), they were ſo preſſed by the Chriſtians, that the bridge was too narrow for them to paſs over, ſo that they were forced to throw themſelves into the river. Aſſan was drowned there with Mahomet Baſſa of Hercegovina, a young man, who was ſon to Amurat's ſiſter. He deſired quarter in vain, for a German ſtruck him upon the head with a carabine, which ſunk him immediately. The Sultan in order to appeaſe the people at Conſtantinople commanded an head to be carried in triumph, as if it had been that of the Imperial General. By this means he attempted to conceal his defeat, but it was known that this was only the head of a common ſoldier. If the proper advantage had been made of this victory, the terror was ſo generally ſpread amongſt the Turks, that there was no place in all the country round, which would not have reſigned to the Conqueror. The Generals had orders only to ſtop the courſe of the Infidels, but not to attack any fortified place, that they might not break the peace. The Turks did not obſerve theſe meaſures, and made a better uſe of their opportunities. So that the Germans by being too ſtrict in keeping the terms of the peace, loſt all that they might have gained in the war (29).

(28) P. 168.

(29) Sagredo, p. 383, 384. Vanel, p. 168, 169.

[O] We ſhall give his character in the note.] His debaucheries exhauſted him, and were the cauſe of his death. He was extremely avaricious; and left in the inner Haſna, which was under the chamber, where he generally lodged, a great quantity of gold in copper veſſels, and ſtone coffers, ſealed with his ſeal by Capi Aga. Solyman II was the firſt, who founded this Haſna. Selim his ſon enriched it extremely, and Amurat notwithſtanding the prodigious expence of the Perſian war, and the urgent neceſſities, which obliged him ſometimes to take conſiderable ſums out of it; not only reſtored what he had taken from it, but added a prodigious deal, which he had raiſed by extraordinary methods upon the people. He augmented the taxes upon merchandizes, and raiſed the value of a ſequin from ſixty to eighty aſpers, ſo that he doubled his revenue, and formed a fund for the occaſions of war without touching the leaſt part of his treaſure (30). The Sultans have ſo many methods of enriching themſelves, that it is impoſſible for them to want money, unleſs it be upon extraordinary emergencies. They diſpoſe abſolutely of their own eſtates, and thoſe of their ſubjects; and upon preſſing occaſions they are Maſters of the prodigious revenues belonging to the moſques. None of Amurat's ſucceſſors were able to continue this œconomy, becauſe of the diſorder among their troops, which conſumed the greateſt part of this treaſure (31). Amurat was very continent in his youth, but when he grew up, he abandoned himſelf entirely to debauchery. He had fifty children of both ſexes. One of his favourite Sultaneſſes told him one day, that it was to no purpoſe that he took ſo much pains in his gallantries, ſince he did not beget children to live, but only to people the grave. He lived fifty ſix years, and reigned twenty. He died of an apoplexy. He was the great enemy of the Perſians, and the ſcourge of Hungary. He loved war, but never engaged in it in perſon. He degenerated extremely from the valour of his anceſtors. He was of a reſtleſs, fearful, diſtruſtful, irreſolute temper, but obſtinate whenever he undertook any thing. He obſerved the law ſo very ſtrictly, that he never drank wine. He was ſo covetous, that he ſold even the flowers out of his garden. He had no manner of regard for learning. He was cruel and avaricious, two vices, which are very common to the Princes of the Ottoman family. He returned nothing but ingratitude to thoſe, who had done him the greateſt ſervices. In ſhort he had ſo many vices, that there is no room to ſay any thing of his virtues (32).

(30) Sagredo, p. 413, 414. Vanel, p. 183.

(31) Sagredo, p. 414.

(32) Sagredo, p. 414, 415, 416. T. Vanel, p. 183, 184.

AMYOT (JAMES) Biſhop of Auxerre, and great Almoner of France, was one of the moſt celebrated Men of Learning that flouriſhed in the ſixteenth Century. He was born at Melun the 30th of October 1514. His parents, who were indeed perſons of great probity, but of a very mean condition [A], employed all their induſtry to maintain him at Paris, where he ſtudied Humanity and Philoſophy in the college of Cardinal

[A] His parents were of a very mean condition.] We are told by ſome writers, that Amyot's father was a Currier in Melun (1); by others, that he ſold purſes, and tagged points (2); by ſome, that he was a butcher. I have three good vouchers for this laſt opinion, Thuanus (3), Papyrius Maſſo (4), and Brantome. The reader will, no doubt, be pleaſed to have here the words of the laſt at length; for they contain another particularity, which would be worth knowing, even tho' it ſhould be allowed to be falſe. Brantome, after relating that Charles IX in making his ſpeech to the Parliament, ſaid with a brave and menacing boldneſs, "It is your duty to obey my orders, without "diſputing or conteſting about them; for I know, "better than you, what is proper and expedient for "the good of my Kingdom," adds: "Having as yet "no beard, he ſpoke in that manner before men of "great age and wiſdom, who were all amazed to hear "ſuch a reſolute and grave ſpeech, which was rather "owing to the greatneſs of his ſoul, than to the in"ſtructions of Amyot his Preceptor, who never"theleſs had careſully inſtructed him, and whom he "was very fond of, having conferred upon him good "and rich livings, and raiſed him to the Biſhopric "of Lizieux (5); he called him always his Maſter, "and uſed ſometimes in jeſting with him to reproach "him with his covetouſneſs; telling him, that he "fed only on neats tongues: and indeed he was a "Butcher's ſon of Melun, and could not but eat of "victuals he had ſeen dreſſed by his father. Except"ing his covetouſneſs he was a man of great parts, "and very skilful in Greek and Latin: witneſs his "fine and elegant tranſlation of Plutarch; tho' ſome "envious perſons have reported, that it was not done "by him, but by a great Man well verſed in Greek, "who luckily for him, happened to be in the priſon "of the palace of Paris, and in great want; he hav"ing heard of his being there, ſet him at liberty, "and

(1) St. Real, Of the Uſe of Hiſtory pag. 74.
(2) Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 605.
(3) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. c. ad ann. 1591. pag. 405.
(4) Lanij filius erat, Meloduno oppido ortus vir excellenti ingenio. Latine & Græce doctiſſimus. Carolus magiſtrum eum appellabat, inter jocos avaritiam objiciens & ſordes, quod linguis bubulis uteretur. Papyr. Maſſo, in Hiſt. vita Caroli IX.

(5) He is miſtaken, he ought to have ſaid of Auxerre, and not Liſieux.

Cardinal le Moine. He was naturally dull and heavy; but his diligence and application made amends for these natural defects. Having taken his degree of Master of Arts at the age of nineteen, he pursued his studies under the Royal Professors established by Francis I, viz. James Tusen, who explained the Greek Poets, Peter Donés, Professor of Rhetoric, and Oronce Finé, Professor of Mathematics. He left Paris at the age of twenty three, and went to Bourges, with the Sieur Colin (a), who was possessed of the Abby of St. Ambrose in that city [B]. At the recommendation of this Abbot a Secretary of State (b) took Amyot into his house to be Preceptor to his children. The great improvements they made under the direction of such a Preceptor, moved their father to recommend him earnestly to the Princess Margaret Dutchess of Berry, only sister of Francis I. By vertue of this recommendation Amyot was made publick Professor of Greek and Latin in the University of Bourges. He read two Lectures a day for ten years, a Latin Lecture in the morning, and a Greek one in the afternoon. It was during that time he translated into French The Amours of Theagenes and Chariclea (c), which Francis I was so pleased with, that he soon provided the translator with a living, conferring upon him the Abby of Bellosane, vacant by the death of Francis Vatable [C]. The death of that Prince, which happened soon after, made Amyot believe that it would be better for him to try his fortune in Italy, than to expect any preferment from the court of France. He therefore accompanied Morvillier to Venice, on his Embassy from Henry II to that Republick. Morvillier employed him, and sent him to Trent with the King's letters to the Council in 1551 [D]. When he was recalled from his Embassy, Amyot refused to repass the Alpes with him, choosing rather to go to Rome, where he was kindly received by the Bishop of Mirepoix, in whose house he lived about two years. It was then that looking over with great eagerness, the manuscripts of the Vatican (whither he was allowed a free access by Romulus Amaseüs Keeper of that famous Library) he found that Heliodorus, Bishop of Tricca, was the author of The Amours of Theagenes. He happened upon a manuscript of this work, both

(a) He had been Reader to Francis I.

(b) William Boschetel Lord of Saffy.

(c) Commonly called Historia Æthiopica Heliodori.

" and took him into his service: they two privately " wrote those books, and he publish'd them in his " own name; but this was look'd upon as a false sto- " ry, forged by envious men; and such as knew " him, and discoursed with him, can well witness, " that he was the sole author of that work. To " conclude, he took great care of the education of " that brave Prince, and brought him up a good Ca- " tholic." Were I to call in question the three mean professions ascribed to the father of Amyot, I should not lay great stress on his son's not specifying any of them in the manuscript of his life, where he only insinuates, that his parents were more commendable for their probity, than for their riches, parentibus honestis magis quam copiosis (6). This reason is of no weight with me; great Men of a mean extraction are, generally speaking, apt to touch very gently upon the obscurity of their birth; and do not care to descend to particulars on such a subject. They will own, in general terms, that they are not descended of a noble family; but, at the same time, take care not to tell us in their Memoirs, that their father was a Butcher, a Cobler, a Seller of tagged points, or matches; that they begged in their childhood &c. Those, who acknowledge things of this nature, and look upon them as commendable, are so few, that tho' it were true Amyot had begged for some time in the streets of Paris, I should not at all wonder, that he takes no notice of it in his Memoirs. So that I do not refute by his silence what some have wrote of his begging, of his being a foot-boy, and living for some time in the Hospital of Orleans (7). 'Tis true I cannot well reconcile with his silence that part of his will, by which he bequeaths twelve hundred crowns to that Hospital, as an acknowledgment of the charity he met with there (8). It has been observed, that in his works he never describes himself by his country, and that he had very little correspondence with it, after he was raised to honours (9). He had, no doubt, the weakness to look upon that city as a mortification to him, and to imagine that his correspondence with Melun would make people talk of the meanness of his birth. However I have read, that he raised some of his relations to preferments. He died invested with great employments, and worth above two hundred thousand crowns, besides the many other means he had to advance his relations, some of which felt the effects of his liberality (10).

(6) Roulliard, History of the Antiquities of Melun, p. 605.

(7) St. Real, Of the Use of History, p. 76.

(8) Ibid. p. 75.

(9) Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 605.

(10) This is what Popeliniere writes, p. 259 of his Idée de l'Histoire.

[B] He left Paris and went to Bourges with the Sieur Colin who was possessed of the Abby of St. Ambrose in that City.] Bullart, who follows all along the Antiquities of Melun, departs from them here, to acquaint us with a thing that is very little known, viz. that Amyot embraced a religious life in the Abby of St. Ambrose at Bourges; but that the Abbot, judging him worthy to make a figure in a more conspicuous place than a Cloyster, brought him acquainted with the Sieur du Sacy Bouchetel (11). 'Tis a pity he quotes no author who has left in writing a particular so little known.

(11) Bullart, Academie des Scienc. tom. I, N 166.

[C] Francis I conferred upon him the Abby of Bellosane vacant by the death of Francis Vatable.] This is quite inconsistent with Mr. St. Real's account; for, according to him, in the reign of Henry II, Amyot was still in an obscure condition, being Tutor in the house of a Gentleman, who was a friend of his; and Mr. de l'Hopital, who did not know him, only recommended him on account of a Greek Epigram, that was presented to the King (12). This must needs be false, if what we read in the Manuscript of Amyot's life, be true, viz. that he had been for several years Professor at Bourges before the death of Francis I; and that his works, having been presented to that Prince, were rewarded with a good Abby. Is it likely, that Mr. de l'Hopital knew nothing of a Frenchman, who had published in 1549 at the furthest (13), a translation of Heliodorus's Æthiopic History? What author tells us, that the journey of Henry II to Bourges happened before the first edition of the Amours of Theagenes? We may add, that Amyot, if we give credit to the manuscript copy of his life, travelled into Italy not long after the death of Francis I. Reconcile this, if you can, with what the Abbot of St. Real writes, viz that he was a Tutor at Bourges, when Henry II went to that City.

(12) St. Real, Of the Use of History, p. 80.

(13) I express my self thus, because du Verdier van Privas mentions an edition in 1549; which does not prove that it was the first.

[D] Morvillier sent him to Trent with the King's Letters to that Council, in 1551.] I must rectify here the Author, who furnishes me with this article (14), tho' he assures us, that what he advances, is attested by a Life of Amyot, begun by himself, and finished by his Secretary. We have a Letter of Amyot containing an account of his journey to Trent. A few days after that journey he wrote to Mr. de Morvillier, Master of Requests. Now he is so far from saying, that Mr. de Morvillier, the French Embassador at Venice, sent him with the King's Letters to the Council, that he tells us, in plain terms, that he was chosen for that commission by Cardinal Tournon, and by the Embassador de Selve. This is a convincing proof that Mr. de Morvillier was not at that time Embassa-both more correct and complete than that which he had tranſlated, and took care to enable himſelf thereby to give a better edition of that work. Theſe learned labours did not take him up ſo as to divert him from puſhing his fortune. He courted very dexterouſly Cardinal de Tournon, and inſinuated himſelf into his favour ſo far, that the Cardinal named him to the King, when that Prince, after calling him home, deſired he would find him a proper Preceptor for his two younger ſons (d). This happened about the year 1558. Thus Amyot was made Preceptor to Henry IId's two ſons. In that employment he ended his tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives, and dedicated it to the King (e). Afterwards he undertook the tranſlation of Plutarch's Morals, which he ended in the reign of Charles IX, and dedicated to that Prince. Charles proved very favourable to him, conferred upon him the Abby of St. Cornelius de Compiegne, and made him Great Almoner of France, and Biſhop of Auxerre [E]; and becauſe the place of Great Almoner, and that of Curator of the Univerſity of Paris happened to be vacant at the ſame time, he was inveſted in both theſe employments, which Thuanus greatly complains of (f). Henry III perhaps would have yielded to the preſſing demands of the Biſhop of St. Flour, who had attended him on his journey into Poland, and made great intereſt for the poſt of Great Almoner; but the Dutcheſs of Savoy, the King's aunt, recommended Amyot ſo earneſtly to him, when he paſſed through Turin on his return from Poland, that he was not only continued in his employment; but a new luſtre was added to it for his ſake; for when Henry III named Amyot Commander of the Order of the Holy Ghoſt (g), he decreed at the ſame time, that in regard to him, all the Great Almoners of France ſhould from that time be of courſe Commanders of that Order [F]. Amyot did not neglect his ſtudies in the midſt of his honours, but reviſed all his tranſlations with great care, collated them with the Greek text, (d) They reigned ſucceſſively under the names of Charles IX and Henry III.

(14) Sebastian Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun.

(e) He began it under Francis I, to whom he preſented ſome of theſe lives copied by Adam Charles a writing maſter of Paris. Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 605.

(f) Thuan. in vita ſua, lib 5. p. 1222.

(g) Upon the firſt inſtitution of this Order, the 31ſt of December 1578.

dor at Venice, which appears ſtill more plain from a Letter of Amyot directed to Mr. de Morvillier at Court. The following words of Amyot deſerve particular notice, Cardinal de Tournon, and Mr. Ambaſſador de Selve, were pleaſed to appoint me for that commiſſion, when I did not think on it in the leaſt, nor on any ſuch thing (15). It is to be obſerved, that not only I was not named, directly or indirectly, in that Letter (16); but, what is ſtill worſe, they had not ſo much as ſent a copy of it, to acquaint us with the contents of the Letter. So that I never ſaw a buſineſs ſo ill managed (17). He was not therefore ſent by the King to proteſt in his name againſt the Council; but pitched upon by Cardinal de Tournon, and the French Embaſſador at Venice, to carry the King's Letter, and to read his Majeſty's proteſtation word for word before the Aſſembly: and of this commiſſion he acquitted himſelf with great reputation. Now here is what I intend. The Abbot de St. Real takes for granted, that Amyot was Preceptor to the Children of France, before the abovementioned negotiation; and ſuppoſes, that Henry II charged him with it, becauſe he had found by experience, that he anſwered the character which Mr. de l'Hopital had given him, when he told the King, that Amyot deſerved to be Preceptor to the children of France. All this is unanſwerably refuted by Amyot's Letter to Morvillier. The following falſhood, advanced by du Sauſſai ought likewiſe to be corrected. Cæterum Amyotus, adhuc Abbas, ad Concilium Tridentinum ab Henrico II miſſus fuit, negotiorum magni momenti cauſa (18). Henry II had no hand in it.

(15) Inſtructions and letters of the moſt Chriſtian Kings, and other pieces relating to the Council of Trent, p. 14. edit. of 1608.

(16) The letter that the King wrote to the fathers of the Council of Trent.

(17) Inſtructions, Letters, &c. pag. 23.

(18) Andr. Sauſſaius de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. num. 52.

[E] Charles IX made him great Almoner of France, and Biſhop of Auxerre.] The firſt of theſe two dignities was conferred upon Amyot the 6th of December 1560, by Charles IX, at Orleans. Du-Peyrat, who had read the regiſters of the great Almoners of France, relates this date extracted from the regiſter of Amyot (19). It is then matter of fact; and, of courſe, above one half of the ſtory, which the Abbot de St. Real relates concerning the riſe of that Prelate, deſerves no credit. He tells us, that Amyot, during the reigns of Francis II, and Charles IX his diſciples, was only poſſeſſed of the Abby of Belloſane, with the glory of having read the judicious and bold proteſtation of Henry II in full Council; and that his fortune would have probably ſtopped there, had he not been raiſed higher than he ever expected, by an accident, which ſerves to give us a true notion of the Court. This was, that one day at the King's table, Charles V was greatly extolled for his many glorious actions, but eſpecially for having raiſed his Preceptor to be Pope. . . . That made ſuch a deep impreſſion in the mind of Charles IX, that he ſaid, if occaſion ſhould offer, he would do as much for his Preceptor. And not long after the place of great Almoner of France being vacant, he conferred it upon Amyot. The Regiſters belonging to the employment of great Almoner evidently convince us of the falſity of his whole account; for we find there, that Amyot was inveſted with that office the ſecond day of the reign of Charles IX. Beſides, Francis II had not been diſciple to Amyot, but to Peter Danes. But to proceed; Mr. de St. Real pretends, that the Queen mother having heard, what Charles IX had done in behalf of his Preceptor, commanded the latter to be ſent for, and calling him into her cloſet, received him with theſe threatning words. "I have made the Guiſes, and the "Chatillons, the Conſtables, and Chancellors, the "Kings of Navarre, and the Princes of Condé ſub"mit; now have at you, you little ſorry Prieſt." Notwithſtanding Amyot's proteſting that he had refuſed that dignity; the concluſion was, that if he had the office, he ſhould not live 24 hours. The Abbot adds, that Amyot abſconded, and that Charles imagining what might be the occaſion of it . . . was provoked to ſuch a degree, . . . that the Queen, who had much difficulty to govern him, and feared him as much as ſhe loved him, had nothing ſo much at heart as to find out Amyot. He ſuppoſes, that Charles IX had reigned a long time before he raiſed his Preceptor to that employment, which is entirely falſe; for he conferred it upon him the very next day after his acceſſion to the Crown, before Catherine de Medicis had taſted the ſweets of the regency, and made many perſons ſubmit. Every one knows ſhe had no great power under Francis II. However I muſt own, that Mr. de St. Real's reflections on theſe tranſactions are in themſelves very proper and ſolid. As to the Biſhopric of Auxerre, it was not conferred upon Amyot in 1568, as Du-Peyrat affirms (20), but in 1570 (21) after the death of Cardinal Philibert Babou, his predeceſſor.

(19) William du Peyrat, Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Court, or the Antiquities and Inquiries about the Chapel and Oratory of the King of France, p. 102.

[F] Henry III decreed, that in regard to him all the great Almoners of France ſhould from that time be of courſe Commanders of that Order.] Here follows what I find in another author relating to this ſubject. Henry III in 1578, when he founded the Order of the Holy Ghoſt, decreed * in favour of Amyot, that his great Almoner, and thoſe who ſhould ſucceed him in that employment, ſhould be admitted into the Order, with the title of Commander: who nevertheleſs, ſays he, ſhall not be obliged to prove their Nobility; this he added out of complaiſance to the ſaid Amyot, who was not of a noble extraction, but had entered the temple of glory through that of virtue (22). See in Sauſſai (23) Henry III's Anſwer to the Courtiers, who complained of his promoting a man of ſuch a mean birth. The ſame Author aſſures us, that Amyot compoſed the Statutes and the Litanies (or rather the Office) of the Order. Hujus ſtatuta & horarias preces ſcite & ſcienter compoſuit.

(20) Eccleſ. Hiſt. of the Court, &c. p. 481.

(21) There is therefore a miſtake in the Index of the tranſlation of Father Paul, where it is ſaid, that Amyot went Ambaſſador to Rome under the name of Biſhop of Auxerre, in 1562. The Biſhop of Auxerre mentioned by Father Paul was not James Amyot.

* The ordinance is to be found in the xviiith book of Henry's Code tit. XI, of the Holy Ghoſt.

(22) William du Peyrat, Hiſtory of the Court, &c. p. 385.

(23) De Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. num. 52.

text, and altered a great many paſſages: He deſigned to give a more complete edition of them with the various readings of divers manuſcripts, but died before he had finiſhed that work. The civil wars and rebellious ſpirit of the people of his dioceſs occaſioned him a great deal of uneaſineſs [G]; he was robbed on his return from the States of Blois in 1589. He died the ſixth of February 1593, in the ſeventy ninth year of his age [H]. He preached now and then on great feſtivals, and wrote his ſermons in Latin, though he delivered them in French; in preaching he uſed to turn the door of the pulpit towards the auditory, placing himſelf in the middle of it on a great chair. He engaged alſo in poetry, but with no good ſucceſs [I]. This is what I have extracted from a life of Amyot, begun by himſelf, and continued by his Secretary (b). His tranſlations are preferable to his other works [K], though they have not been unanimouſly approved of by all the Critics [L]; nay, ſome have even taxed him as a plagiary [M]. Others

(b) It is in Latin, and has never been printed; but Sebaſtian Roulliard, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, who read it, publiſhed an Abſtract of it in the Antiquities of Melun, pag. 605, &c. From that extract I have taken this article.

[G] The rebellious ſpirit of the people of his dioceſs occaſioned him a great deal of uneaſineſs.] Thuanus makes a remark, that is highly diſhonourable to the memory of our Amyot, charging him with ingratitude towards the two Princes who had been his diſciples, notwithſtanding the many favours they had heaped upon him, and with too much condeſcenſion to the ſeditious fury of the Leaguers of Auxerre. His age and inclination to ſtudy having induced him to reſide, he had not courage enough to ſtem the torrent of the rebellion (24). Sebaſtian Roulliard ſpeaks of him in a quite different manner; and inſinuates, that he was ill uſed on account of his loyalty. His troubles began, ſays he (25), at the breaking up of the States of Blois in 1589, becauſe through the fury of parties which began then to rage more than ever, he was robbed and ſtripped half way to Auxerre, and having got thither, he was haraſſed by the inhabitants, and even by his Clergy. But at laſt matters were appeaſed by degrees; ſo that he did not ſtir from that place; but however daily complained, that the loſs he had ſuffered, and the want of the conveniences he formerly enjoyed, deprived him of the pleaſure of ſtudy. St. Marthe owns, that ſome bad reports were rumoured about, but does not believe them (26).

(24) Thuanus de vitâ ſuâ, lib. 5. p. 1222.

(25) Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 605.

(26) Sammarth. in Elegiis, p. 96.

[H] He died in 1593, in the ſeventy ninth year of his age.] Thuanus muſt have applied himſelf to ſuch as knew very little of Amyot, ſince they could neither acquaint him when he died, nor at what age. He only ſays, in general terms, that Amyot (whoſe death he places in the month of July 1591) was above ſixty. St. Marthe places it in 1592. Triennio poſt Henricum tertium deteſtabili parricidarum coitione ſublatum e vivis exceſſit (27). i. e. "He died three "years after the deteſtable taking off of Henry III "by parricides.

(27) Ibid.

[I] He engaged alſo in poetry, but with no good ſucceſs.] Sebaſtian Roulliard his countryman, would, no doubt, have been favourable to him on this head, had it been poſſible. He writes thus. As to the Latin Poem he made upon the coronation of Charles IX, it ſhews he was converſant with Horace, but had no poetical genius (28). The tranaſlation of Greek verſes into French meter, which Amyot confined himſelf to, in his verſion of Plutarch, is wretched. Charles IX thought that tranſlation very rugged, and many others are of his opinion (29). Roulliard produces a poor excuſe, It is, ſays he, a collection made up of divers authors and of a different ſtyle. We ſhall add the judgment he paſſes upon Amyot's proſe compoſitions. As to my opinion, ſays he, he was attended with better ſucceſs in tranſlating, than in compoſing, either in French or in Latin; for what I have ſeen of his ſeems to me ſtrangely heavy and low.

(28) Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 614.

(29) Ibid.

(30) Thus the Poemenica 'Longi of Thuanus ought to be tranſlated; and not les Poemeniques de Longus, as du Ryer tranſlates that title.

(31) This is what Bullart relates in his Academy of Sciences, p. 168.

(32) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Proſopograph, tom. 3. p. 2572.

[K] His tranſlations are preferable to his other works.] His firſt tranſlation was that of the Amours of Theagenes and Chariclea; but that of Plutarch was the moſt eſteemed. He alſo tranſlated the Paſtorals of Longus (30), ſeveral books of Diodorus Siculus, and ſome Greek Tragedies. The Dutcheſs of Savoy not finding in Plutarch the life of Epaminondas, nor that of Scipio, deſired him to write them, which he did accordingly, but never publiſhed them. The preface was done, and Peter Matthieu ſaw it (31); from whence we may conclude that Amyot had finiſhed that work. It is ſaid, that he was afraid to venture upon the tranſlation of Philoſtratus (32), though Henry III often deſired him to undertake it: He declined it all along, ſaying, it is impoſſible; and when that Prince, after ſeeing the tranſlation of Viogenere, ſaid to Amyot; Well, you thought it impoſſible to tranſlate Philoſtratus, he anſwered, that he had thought ſo till then.

[L] They have not been unanimouſly approved of by all the Critics.] Mr. Baillet has been at the pains to collect all the praiſes that have been beſtowed upon Amyot's Plutarch (33), which are much to the Tranſlator's reputation. I ſhall add to them what I heard Mr. Conrart ſay in 1675, when he was told, that moſt part of the copies of Plutarch tranſlated by the Abbot Tallemant, had been burnt in a Bookſeller's ware-houſe. No great loſs, ſaid he, ſo long as we have Amyot's tranſlation, which contains all the fine turns of our language, and the beſt harmony of our periods. Mr. Baillet has been no leſs careful in collecting the opinions of ſuch as are not favourable to our Amyot; nor has he forgot, that Thuanus admired more the politeneſs of his ſtyle, than the exactneſs of his tranſlation: Diodoro ac præcipue Plutarcho licet majore plerumque elegantia quam fide Gallicè redditis (34). He has nevertheleſs omitted another paſſage of Thuanus quoted by Mr. Girac. I ſhall relate the words of the latter by way of a Supplement to Mr. Baillet's fine Collection. "As to "Epitimius, ſays he (35), who is killed in Amyot's "tranſlation; whereas in the Greek text it is but his "horſe, I am apt to think he uſed copies that were "different from ours, rather than to agree with "Thuanus, that his tranſlations were more elegant "than true, and that he did not ſo much aim at "truth, as he affected to flatter the ear *. I know "he has been taxed by a learned and wiſe Civilian † "for miſunderſtanding a point of antiquity relating "to a law of Solon; for inſtead of ſaying, that the Legiſlator had boaſted ſome where in his Poems, that "he had freed the Athenians from all the debts they "had contracted, and taken away the billets that "were ſet up in many places as marks of the lands "being mortgaged, he tranſlated, to have taken away "the bounds that formerly ſeparated the inheritances "of the whole territory of Attica. I could add a "great many remarks upon divers paſſages, which "our Amyot miſunderſtood; but however I cannot "agree with Mr. de Meziriac, who §, in his Diſ"courſe upon tranſlations, after having commended "the judgment, labour, and ſtyle of this eloquent "Tranſlator in his verſion of Plutarch, undertakes to "prove him guilty of no fewer than two thouſand "palpable miſtakes."

(33) Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, tom. 4. p. 521. See alſo Pope-Blount, Cenſur. celebr. auctor. p. 521.

(34) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. C. pag. 405.

(35) Girac, Reply to Ceſſar, Sect. 51. p. 438. Holland edition.

* Amiotus hic Poemenica Longi, Heliodori Æthiopica, Diodori Siculi Hiſtorica, ac poſtremo Plutarchum in linguam noſtram gallicam de Græcis vertet, ſed hunc majore elegantia, quam fide, dum auribus noſtris placere, quam de ſenſus veritate laborare, potius exiſtimat. Thuanus de vitâ ſuâ, lib. 5.

† L'Oiſeau, de l'Action hypothèq. l. 3. Ὅτι τὶς τὰ προσπεπτωμένα γῆς ἕρας ἀτίμητα πολλαχῆ συκοφάντας.

§ Peliſſon Hiſtory of the Academy, p. 232.

[M] Some have even taxed him as a Plagiary.] We have already heard Brantome (36) on this ſubject; let us now hear others. I have heard Mr. Patin ſay, writes Mr. Colomies (37), that he was informed by Lawrence Bochel (who cauſed the Decrees of the Gallican Church &c. to be printed) that Amyot tranſlated Plutarch's Lives from an old Italian tranſlation lodged in the King's Library; which was the occaſion of all his miſtakes. This perhaps is the tranſlation, which was done from the Latin in 1428 by Baptiſt Alexander Jaconel of Rieti, and is likewiſe to be found in the King's Library. La Popeliniere finds fault with Amyot for not paying Turnebus the honour that was due to him; for he makes no where the leaſt mention of the helps he received from him towards the right underſtanding of the hard paſſages (38). La Popeliniere pretends, that Turnebus ſent Amyot whole paſſages tranſlated into French, which he could not underſtand of himſelf; and that many others helped him with their good advice (39).

(36) Note [A].

(37) Colomies Opuſcul. p. 124. Utrecht edition.

(38) La Popelin. Idea of a Complete Hiſtory, l. 3. p. 259.

(39) La Popelin. Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, p. 389.

Others have charged him with avarice [N]. The Abbot de St. Real knew a great many curious particulars, which have not been inſerted in his life (i), but are to be found in Moreri's Dictionary; and this is the reaſon why I ſhould not meddle with them, even though I looked upon them as undoubtedly true. The ſupplements and new hints that may occur to me, ſhall be inſerted in the notes.

What Mr. Varillas relates concerning Amyot is a heap of untruths [O]. We ſhall examine them, which will ſerve to clear up that chaos.

(i) See his Treatiſe of The Uſe of Hiſtory. Mr. Teiſſier has copied from them (but quotes the Author) whatever relates to Amyot, and has added it to his Additions to the Elogies of Thuanus, tom. 2. p. 152.

[N] Some have charged him with covetouſneſs.] I have quoted a long paſſage out of Brantome in the remark [A], wherein Charles IX makes merry with his Preceptor's covetouſneſs. Another Author informs me, that Amyot having one day begged of that Prince a living that yielded a very great income, the King anſwered, How, Maſter, you ſaid if you had a thouſand crowns a year, you would be ſatisfied: now I believe you have that and more. Sire, anſwered Amyot, appetite encreaſes by eating; and yet he obtained what he deſired (40). You may, if you pleaſe, look upon the two hundred thouſand crowns he heaped up as a doubtful proof of his covetouſneſs (41).

(40) Proſograph. of du Verdier, tom. 3. p. 2573.
(41) See Note [A] prope finem.

[O] What Mr. Varillas relates concerning Amyot, is a heap of untruths.] He ſays, that the Court of Francis I having ſtopped for a few hours at the caſtle of a Gentleman of Berri, Amyot, who was Preceptor in the Gentleman's houſe, took that occaſion to preſent the King with a Greek Epigram of four verſes, which he had juſt then compoſed. The Epigram was ſo well received by the learned men of the King's retinue, that they thought it a pity the author ſhould remain in a province ſo far from Paris. The King took him into his ſervice, and allowed him a conſiderable penſion (42). Circumſtances are ſtrangely miſplaced in this account; for the advantage, which Amyot reaped from his Greek verſes, when they were preſented to Henry II, was owing to Michael de l'Hopital, as we have already obſerved (43). Mr Varillas tells us elſewhere (44), that Amyot, Profeſſor of Greek at Bourges, made himſelf firſt known at Court by his politeneſs of ſtyle in writing French, and that afterwards he was invited to Paris by Bouchetel, and Morvillier Secretary of State, who, after having brought him back to the communion of the Catholic Church, recommended him to Cardinal de Tournon; and he procured him the Abby of Belloſane, and the commiſſion of Secretary to the Embaſſador at Venice, from whence he ſet out to execute the King's orders at Trent in 1551. Thus this Hiſtorian contradicts in one work what he avers in another. He adds, that Amyot made a ſpeech before the Fathers of the Council, of which he even gives us the ſubſtance, and quotes the Speech of Amyot. But this Speech is a mere chimera; for Amyot only read the King's proteſtation. Is it not a great piece of impudence to quote manuſcripts that never were in being? The ſame Mr. Varillas affirms, that Amyot, when ten years old, was found lying ſick by a ditch on the road to Paris, and that a Gentleman going by ... put him upon his horſe, and ſupporting him carried him to a neighbouring houſe, where he recovered, and received ſixteen ſols wherewithal to purſue his journey, which he returned with uſury, leaving to the heirs of his benefactor ſixteen hundred crowns a year (45). We read in Amyot's Life, that he bequeathed twelve hundred crowns to the Hoſpital of Orleans (46); for thither he was carried by the Gentleman; there he was cured, and received the ſixteen ſols; and to that Hoſpital he left, if we give credit to Mr. de St. Real, a legacy of twelve hundred crowns (47). What makes Mr. Varillas thus alter the circumſtances, and exaggerate Mr. Amyot's gratitude? Why does he, with his exaggerations, change a legacy of three thouſand ſix hundred florins into an annual revenue of ſix thouſand two hundred livres (48)? He informs us, that "Amyot, during his ſtudies, changed his religion, and was a means to ſeduce his companions, till ſuch time as he was diſcovered, and obliged to fly to Bourges; where the ſame Volmar, who had inſtructed Calvin and Beza, recommended him to the Abbot of St. Ambroſe, whoſe nephews were committed to his charge; and afterwards named him for his ſucceſſor in the Profeſſorſhip of Greek. But Amyot grew ſoon weary of that public employment." This can by no means be reconciled with the Memoirs of Amyot's Life, publiſh'd by Sebaſtian Rouillard. For we find there, that he was twenty three when he went to Bourges, with the Abbot of St. Ambroſe, who perſuaded him to undertake that journey (49). He went thither then in 1537; whereas Volmar had left Bourges in 1535 (50), and conſequently did not bring him acquainted with that Abbot. The ſame Memoirs inform us, that Amyot was public Profeſſor for the ſpace of ten years, that he was often heard to ſay among his friends, that he had a handſome ſalary, that he never paſſed his time more agreeably, and that he was mightily pleaſed with his employment, becauſe it allowed him to live a quiet life (51). It is not therefore true, that he grew ſoon weary of that public employment. Mr. Varillas obſerves, that Bouchetel and Morvillier laid before him, that his hereſy was a bar both to his ſalvation and preferment, and that he made good uſe of their advice. Bouchetel then knew he was a Calviniſt; but if ſo, is it likely he would have truſted him, as he did, with the education of his children (52)?

(42) Varillas, Hiſtory of Hereſies, lib. 10. pag. 310. Holland edition.
(43) In Remark [C].
(44) Varillas, Hiſtory of Henry II. l. 2. p. 204.

(45) Idem, pag. 203.
(46) See Remark [A].
(47) St. Real of the Uſe of Hiſtory, p. 75.
(48) Varillas, Hiſtory of Henry II. l. 2. p. 204.
(49) Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 607.
(50) Melch. Adam in vitis Philoſophor. pag. 233.
(51) Roulliard, Antiquities of Melun, p. 607.
(52) Ibid.

AMYRAUT (MOSES) Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Saumur, was one of the moſt eminent Divines that flouriſhed in France in the eighteenth Century. He was of a good and ancient family, originally from Orleans [A], and was born at Bourgueil, a ſmall town of Touraine, in September 1596. Having ended his courſe of Philoſophy, he was ſent to Poitiers to ſtudy the Law, and is ſaid to have ſpent fourteen hours a day in that ſtudy. At the year's end (a) he took his degree of Licentiate, but went no further. Mr. Bouchereau, his countryman, and Miniſter of Saumur, adviſed him to ſtudy Divinity; and the reading of Calvin's inſtitutions inclined him to follow his advice;

(a) In 1616.

[A] He was of a good and ancient family, originally from Orleans.] Stephen l'Amyraut, his great grandfather, was Sheriff of Orleans in 1509, when the common law was reformed in that city, as the verbal Proceſs of the common law witneſſes. One l'Amyraut, whoſe tomb is of the year 1370, was to be ſeen in the Church of St. Peter en Pont, is ſuppoſed to have been the Head of this family. He came from Hagenaw, a town of Alſatia, and was Captain of a company of Reiſters, as we are informed by his Epitaph. The Convent and Church of the Minimes of Orleans owe much to this family; and hence their coat of arms is painted on the great glaſs-windows of the church. I ſhall obſerve, ſince it falls in my way, that an Engliſhman of the Church of Rome has been guilty of a great miſtake in latinizing the name of Amyraut; for inſtead of Amyraldus he writes Amurath; which miſtake would ſcarce deſerve notice, had he not, by a poor and mean alluſion, accompanied it with a ridiculous doubt. Moſes quidem Amurath, ſays he (1), Miniſter Salmurienſis, homo ſaltem nomine (neſcio an & progenie) Judæo-Turca; that is, "Moſes Amurath, "a Miniſter of Saumur, a man in name at leaſt, if "not by deſcent a Jewiſh Turk." In the next following page he calls him Amyrath.

The following words of Father Bartolocci ſeem very ſurprizing: Moses Amyraldus, ſays he (2), videtur Judæus converſus ad fidem, ſcripſitque eruditiſſimam & catholicam diſſertationem de Myſterio Trinitatis, deque vocibus ac phraſibus, quibus tam in ſcriptura,

(1) In his Notes upon ſome Extracts of the ſpeeches of Sir Edward Dering. It was printed at London 1659, with a piece entitled, Nuncius a Mortuis, which is a dialogue between the ſoul of Henry VIII. and that of Charles I.
(2) Bartolocci Bibliotheca Rabbin. Part 4. pag. 68.

vice; insomuch, that he acquainted his father, who had something in view in designing him for the bar [B], that he earnestly desired to be a Minister, and obtained, not without much difficulty, his approbation. He went to Saumur to study under Camero, who had a particular kindness and value for him, and remained there a long while in the quality of Student in Divinity. When he was admitted Minister, he was allotted to the church of St. Aignan in the country of Maine; and from thence, after a year and a half, invited to Saumur, where he succeeded Mr. Daillé, who was made Minister of Charenton (b). At the same time that the church of Saumur desired to have him for a Minister, the Academic Council pitched upon him for Professor of Divinity. This occasioned the disappointment of the churches of Rouën and Tours, which at the same time had asked him of the Synod; it having been decreed by the national Synods, that the Academies should be served preferably to the Churches. His admittance to the Professorship in 1633, the previous examination, and the inaugural thesis de Sacerdotio Christi, redounded much to his reputation. Two other eminent Professors were admitted with him, Lewis Cappel, and Joshua de la Place, so that the Academy of Saumur was at one and the same time provided with three members, who were all extremely well qualified to make it flourish; for besides their being all three men of great learning, their humours suited so well together, as to produce that edifying and happy concord, which is no less commendable, than rare in Academies. Mr. Amyraut was sent, with the character of Deputy, to the national council of Charenton in 1631, and by that assembly appointed to address the King, and lay before his Majesty, their complaints concerning the infraction of the edicts. He was particularly charged to order matters so, as not to make his speech kneeling, as the Deputies of the former national Synod had done [C]; and managed that business with such dexterity and resolution, that he was introduced to the King according to the ancient custom, and the desire of the assembly (c). This commission brought him acquainted with Cardinal Richelieu, who was amazed to find so many good qualities in him, which are not usual in a man of study. Not long after he published a piece, wherein he explained the mystery of predestination and grace, according to the hypothesis of Camero [D]. This occasioned a kind of civil war among the Protestant Divines of France [E]. Such as did not approve of that hypothesis, were alarmed at it as a novelty, especially when they saw the great

(b) From the Life of Mr. Daillé we gather that he was called to Paris in 1626.

(c) His speech to the King is inserted in Mercure François of 1631.

ra, quam apud patres, explicatur. Pars IV, quæ est de primordiis revelationis mysterii Trinitatis in veteri Testamento, habetur in libro Wagenseilii inscripto, Tela ignea Satanæ, pag. 140. i. e. "Moses Amyraut seems to be a converted Jew, and has written "a most learned and Catholic Dissertation on the mystery of the Trinity, and on the words and phrases, "by which it is explained in Scripture and the Fathers. Part IV. which is of the original of the "revelation of the mystery of the Trinity in the "old Testament, is in Wagenseillius's book intitled "The fiery darts of Satan." Thus the famous Men are sometimes strangers to one another. Father Bartolocci, having known Mr. Amyraut only by an adopted piece of Mr. Wagenseil, took him really to have been a Jew.

[B] His father had some thing in view when he designed him for the bar.] He designed him to be Seneschal, which Magistracy was held by his uncle, who had no children.

[C] He was particularly charged to order matters so as not to make his speech kneeling.] Mr. Amyraut was the person who laid the state of this question before the Synod, and at the same time promised to use his utmost endeavours, providing the Assembly gave him proper instructions thereupon. He had therefore in charge to procure the restoring of the Ministers to the privilege they formerly enjoyed of speaking to the King, standing, as the other Ecclesiastics of the Kingdom were allowed to do. He set out, accompanied by two Elders, for Monceaux, where the Court then resided; and having applied himself to Mr. de la Vrilliere, Secretary of State, he was acquainted by him, that the King expected the Deputies of the Synod should make their Speech to him in the same manner as those of the former Synod had done. As a Commissary appointed by the King always assisted at our Synods; the Commissary who was present at the national Synod of Charenton, had given notice to the King of the instructions the Deputies had received from the Assembly: whereupon the Court, not judging proper to yield them their demands, enjoined Mr. de la Vrilliere to acquaint them immediately with it. Mr. Amyraut represented to him the reasons of the Assembly with no less dexterity than respect; and a whole fortnight was spent without either of them remitting any part of their pretensions. Notice being given to Cardinal Richelieu of the Deputy's steadiness and resolution, he desired a conference with him, and did all that lay in his power to make him comply with the Court. Amyraut answered all the plausible reasons the Cardinal could produce, and at last was introduced to the King on the footing he desired. After that the Cardinal had several conferences with him about the complaints of the Synod, and was extremely pleased both with his talents and deportment.

[D] He published a piece wherein he explained the mystery of predestination and grace, according to the hypothesis of Camero.] A Roman Catholic of quality gave occasion to the writing of this piece. He had dined with Mr. Amyraut in the house of the Bishop of Chartres, Amyraut's intimate acquaintance (3), at Bourgueil. After dinner he made the conversation fall upon a point of controversy, and taxed the Protestants with teaching very hard tenets relating to predestination. Mr. Amyraut began upon this subject, which occasioned a civil kind of dispute between him and the Bishop, upon this difficult question. They parted in the evening, and the next morning Mr. Amyraut returning to Saumur took to the Nobleman's house in his way, as he had promised (4), and found him greatly inclined to the Protestant Religion, but not without divers doubts relating to the mystery of predestination as explained by Calvin. He resolved his doubts in the best manner he could, and being entreated by the Nobleman to write a Treatise, in which that subject might be examined more thoroughly than it could possibly be canvassed by way of conversation, he composed and published the book I have mentioned (5). Thus far my manuscript Memoirs furnish me. Mr. Amyraut does not relate this occasion of his work, but a very different one (6).

(3) He was of the family d'Estampes Valencai, and afterwards made Archbishop of Reims.

(4) At Plessis-Rideau.

(5) In 1634.

(6) Præfat. Specimin. Animadvers. de gratia universali.

[E] This occasioned a kind of civil war among the Protestant Divines of France.] This dispute has made such a noise, that it well deserves to be related at length in the Ecclesiastical Annals of the Protestants. The Author of the History of our Synods of France written in English, which is a very curious piece (7), will inform us of the differences occasioned by the doctrine of universal grace. I do not question, but that great Moulin take the field, and fall upon Amyraut, as acting contrary to the Synod of Dort, and favouring Arminianism. The authority of that famous Divine, to whom the people paid a great respect and veneration in regard of the many books of controversy he had published, made so deep an impression in the minds of a great many Ministers, that though Amyraut published a book (d), in which he maintained that Calvin had held universal grace; yet many Deputies appeared at the national Synod of Alençon (e) with instructions against him, and some were even for deposing him [F]. The Deputies of the Provinces on the other side the Loire were the most violent of all. However the Synod, after having heard, in divers Sessions, Mr. Amyraut explain his opinion, and answer what was objected against it, sent him back with honour, and imposed silence with regard to questions of that nature. This silence was not duly observed; for complaints were represented to the national Synod of Charenton against Mr. Amyraut (f), as if he had acted contrary to the regulations concerning that silence; and he on the other hand complained of some infractions of the same regulations. The Assembly that it would be a most outragious and injurious reflection upon those who first started that question, to say, that they would have moved it, even tho' they had foreseen all the bad consequences it was attended with: for what advantage accrues from controversies of that nature? where is the cui bono in such disputes? do all the difficulties vanish in adhering to Camero's hypothesis? or rather, was ever any remedy more palliative? Our reason is not so easily satisfied; and if you go no farther, you had as well not to have stirred from your place: keep your particular opinions to your self. Tho' I should allow that the opinion of the Universalists had some advantage in that dispute, and that some objections were more fully answered by it; would this be capable of weighing down the many spiritual crimes that attend factions, and parties, so many bad impressions, malicious constructions, false imputations, the many aversions, injuries, libels, and other disorders, which are inseparable from such theological conflicts? If you are persuaded, that the opinions of the Particularists are damnable, you are much in the right to refute them, tho' it should cost dear; and such as look upon the opinions of the Universalists as mortal heresies, are equally in the right to oppose them. But if neither party apprehends the opinions they reject, to be pernicious; why should they carry on the disputes farther than is consistent with the peace and tranquillity of the public; and not rather desist, as soon as they perceive that they foment divisions in families, or give rise to parties? will not their obstinacy rouse a thousand mischievous passions, that ought to be chained up like so many wild beasts; and wo to the man that makes them get loose. The civil war of the universal grace, and some others, do not, thank God, deserve that the verses, which I have heard quoted on occasion of schismatical disputes, should be applied to them. The preparations and auxiliary forces of the two Chiefs were compared to the following decoration of a stage.

(7) John Quick Minister at London; his book entitled, Synodicon in Gallia reformata was printed in 1692, folio. REFLECTIONS ON THE EVILS OCCASIONED BY THE DISPUTES OF DIVINES.

(d) Entitled, A Specimen of the Doctrine of Calvin.

(e) In 1637.

(f) Blondel, Authentic Acts, p. 36.

Aigles, vautours, serpens, grifons,
Hippocentaures, & Typhons,
Des Toureaux furieux, dont la gueule beante
Eût transi de frayeur le grand cheval d'Atlante,
Un char que des dragons etincelans d'éclairs
Promenoient en sifflant par la vuide des airs,
Demogorgon encor a la triste figure,
Et l'horreur, & la mort, s'y voyoient en peinture (8).

(8) See the Life of Æschylus by Mr. Le Fevre.

That is, "Eagles, vulturs, serpents, griffins, hippo-" centaurs, and Typhons, furious bulls, whose wide " throats would have chilled with fear the great horse " of Atlas, a chariot, which dragons sparkling with " lightning, with hisses drew tho' the open air, a " demigorgon also with a dismal aspect. Horror and " death were to be seen painted there."

(9) He reconciled in the Castle of Thoüars the 16th of October 1649, Mr. Amyraut with Mr. Champvernou Minister of Taillebourg, and with Mr. Vincent Minister of Rochelle. See the Authentic Acts of David Blondel, p. 88. That M. Champvernou's name was William Rivet; he was brother to Andrew Rivet, Professor of Divinity at Leyden.

Mr. Amyraut had the satisfaction of being reconciled with the most violent of his adversaries, without the great Men of the world having any hand in that reconciliation. The Prince of Tarento went about in 1649; but I question whether the differences, that fell under the cognizance of the Marshals of France, be so troublesome to them, as the contending parties were to him. But however that may be, he composed his business, and perhaps a Synod would not have been so successful (9). As to his reconciliation with Mr. du Moulin, it was owing to Mr. de Langle, Minister of Rouën, who was no sooner proposed to Amyraut, but he willingly came into it, and even offered to make the first steps. Accordingly he wrote to Mr. du Moulin, who returned him a very obliging answer. Both Letters were published for the edification of the Church, and are dated 1655. Mr. Daillé inserted Mr. du Moulin's Answer in one of his books (10). Both reason and charity prompt us to believe, that those, who made such a noise, and raised so great disturbances on account of an opinion, which they themselves acknowledged at last to be no ways dangerous, owning at the same time the author of it to be a godly man, did not die without being covered with confusion, at least in the sight of God, for having been guilty of that mortifying prepossession, which made them look upon an hypothesis, that contained no venom, as a most horrid doctrine. See what follows.

(10) Vindiciæ Apologiæ &c. pag. 418.

[F] Some of the Deputies at the Synod of Alençon were even for deposing him.] If these men had lived thirty or forty years longer, I do not comprehend, how they could shew their faces; for the doctrine, which in their opinion deserved the most thundering anathema's, was at last embraced by the greatest men that served the reformed Churches of France. It was held by Mr. Mestrezat, Mr. la Foucheur, Mr. Blondel, Mr. Daillé, Mr. Claude, and Mr. du Bosc. The Particularists were forced to acknowledge as their Brethren and faithful Ministers of Jesus Christ, those who stood up for the universal grace: neither were the Ministers, who sheltered themselves in Holland, and signed a Formulary at the Synod of Rotterdam in 1686, obliged to make any declaration, that seemed to strike at the system of Mr. Amyraut (11). What therefore could occasion the great noise that was made at first against this system? How came it about that the same tenet should be look'd upon at first as monstrous, and afterwards as quite inoffensive. Is not this to be counted amongst the bad effects of original sin, and ascribed to the influence of a thousand blind passions, which must produce in the elect a salutary and mortifying humiliation? The worst is, that we reap no benefit from what is passed, and each generation is subject to the same symptoms, more or less dangerous; for we have often reason to say when we see processes, informations, apologies, and theses appear, with books flying after one another from place to place,

(11) See Remark [M] of the article DAILLE.

Jamque faces & saxa volant (12);

(12) Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 150.

" Stones and brands in ratt'ling vollies fly."
Dryden.

But let them alone: the heat will be soon over, and the storm easily quelled;

Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta
Pulveris exigui jactu compressa quiescent (13).

(13) Virg. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 86.

" Yet all those dreadful deeds, this deadly fray.
" A cast of scatter'd dust will soon allay;
" And undecided leave the fortune of the day.
Dryden.

However it does not always happen so. Sometimes matters are pushed to extremities; res in nervum erumpit.

Assembly buried, by an holy amnesty, all these mutual complaints, renewed the regulations concerning silence, sent back Mr. Amyraut to his employment, and gave him leave to act against the foreigners, who should attack him, as the Synod of Anjou should think fit. That Synod allowed him to publish an answer to the three volumes of Mr. Spanhemius upon universal grace [G]; which occasioned the writing of many others (g). While the national Synod of the year 1645 was sitting, Mr. Amyraut was entreated by the Assembly to confer with Mr. de la Milletiere in order to reclaim him. This conference lasted several days, but they could no more agree in their disputes by word of mouth, than in the books they had published against one another. The doctrine of Mr. de la Place touching original sin was attacked in this Synod, which Mr. Amyraut having notice of appeared before the Assembly to plead the cause of his Collegue, and made it plainly appear in a long discourse, that the opinion complained of was no ways dangerous. This action was not only commended on account of the excellent defence he made of Mr. de la Place's opinion; but also because he could have nothing else in view but the interest of his Collegue, his opinion, as to that point, being different from that of Mr. de la Place. If we add, that Mr. Cappel departed from the common sentiment of the Protestants concerning the antiquity of the Hebrew points, we shall have touched upon all the complaints that were made against the Academy of Saumur. But notwithstanding these complaints, Students in Divinity resorted thither in great numbers, which sensibly diminished upon the death of these three eminent Professors (b). Mr. Amyraut outlived his two Collegues, and had time to write a great many books [H]. His pen was as ready as his tongue, which is saying very much, for he was endowed with an extraordinary fluency of speech, as well in Latin as in French, for Lectures of Divinity, and for Sermons. He was acquainted with the world, and could entertain the company with a thousand things that were foreign to his profession. And this, no doubt, was what contributed as much (if not more) than the fame of his learning, to the happiness he always enjoyed of being esteemed and honoured by the men of quality of the opposite religion. I have already mentioned the esteem Cardinal Richelieu had for him; it would be therefore useless to add, that he imparted to him the great design he had formed of reuniting the two churches [I]; for as he founded

(g) Ibid. p. 40, 41.

(b) They are the Authors of the Theses Salmurienses, a work very much esteemed.

[G] The Synod of Anjou allowed him to publish an Answer to the three volumes of Mr. Spanheim upon universal grace.] The book is entitled, Specimen animadversionum in exercitationes de gratia universali; and was printed at Saumur in 1648, 4to. It is falsly related in the Mêlange Critique (or Critical Miscellany) Tom. I, pag. 129, that Mr. Amyraut entered the list the first, and that his volume was levelled against the theses of Mr. Spanheim; for it was written against the three volumes of Mr. Spanheim, who was the aggressor. See Sarravius's Letters, p. 83, 95, 108, of the Utrecht edition, in 1697.

[H] He wrote a great many books.] He published in 1631 his Treatise of Religions, and five years after, six Sermons upon the nature, extent &c. of the Gospel, and several others at different times. His book of the exaltation of faith, and abasement of reason appeared in 1641; and the same year was published in Latin the Defence of Calvin with regard to the doctrine of absolute reprobation, which in 1644 appeared in French. He began his Paraphrase on the Scripture in 1644: the Epistle to the Romans was paraphrased the first; then the other Epistles; and lastly the Gospel: but he imitated the prudence of Calvin in not meddling with the Revelations. He did not prefix his name to his Paraphrase, lest it should deter the Roman Catholics from perusing them. He published in 1647 an Apology for the Protestants, a Treatise of free will, and another De Secessione ab Ecclesia Romana, deque pace inter Evangelicos in negotio Religionis constituenda. But he treated this subject of the reunion of the Calvinists and Lutherans more at length in his Irenicon published in 1662. His book of the Vocation of Pastors came forth in 1649. He had preached on this subject before the Prince of Tarento, at the meetings of a provincial Synod, whereof he was Moderator. The Prince desired the Sermon might be printed, and the subject treated more at length, it being then the common topick of all Missionaries. Upon this Mr. Amyraut not only printed his Sermon, but besides published a complete Treatise upon that important controversy, and dedicated them both to the said Prince. His Christian Morals in six vol. 8vo, the first of which was printed in 1652, were owing to the frequent conferences he had with Mr. de Villornoul, a Gentleman of an extraordinary merit, and one of the most learned men of Europe, who was heir in this respect also to Mr. du Plessis Mornai his grandfather by the Mother's side. There are few subjects Mr. Amyraut has not wrote upon. He published a Treatise of dreams, two volumes upon the Millenium, wherein he refutes an Advocate of Paris, called Mr. de Launoi, who was a stanch Millenarian (14); the Life of the brave la Noue, surnamed Iron-arm; and divers other works, which I either omit, or shall mention in the remaining part of this article. He even ascended mount Parnassus, and wrote a Poem, entitled, The Apology of St. Stephen to his Judges. This piece was attacked by those, from whom the least danger was apprehended; for it was not the Poets but the Missionaries who found fault with it. They pretended the Author had spoke most irreverently of the Sacrament of the Altar; but he published a piece in his own defence, of which I can say nothing more to the purpose than what I read in Mr. Daillé. "As to St. Stephen's Apology to his "Judges, says he (15), which you afterwards pro- "duce to convince us that he has abused your host, "if you, and such as have taken offence at it, had "been at the pains to read the letter, which the Au- "thor caused to be printed in his defence, neither "you, nor they would entertain such a bad opinion "of him; nay perhaps you would be amazed at the "chimerical fancy, the prejudice of your passion has "raised in your mind, by making you apply to your- "self and your transubstantiation what by the author "was levelled at the follies of the Pagan idola- "try (16)."

(14) See Mr. Ancillon, pag. 129, 130, of the first volume of his Melange Critique de Litterature.

(15) He addresses himself to father Adam.

(16) Daillé, Reply to the two books of Adam and de Cottiby, Part 2. cap. 17. p. 108.

[I] Cardinal Richelieu imparted to him the great design he had formed of reuniting the two Churches.] The Jesuit, who conferred with him upon this subject, was Father Audebert. Mr. de Villeneuve, then Lord Lieutenant of Saumur, having invited them both to dinner, (and that with such an obliging carriage to the Minister, that he placed him above the Jesuit, and caused grace to be omitted,) took care they should confer in private after dinner. 'Tis true, Mr. Amyraut protested that he could not forbear imparting to his collegues all that should pass between them. The Jesuit began by owning that he was sent by the King and his Eminence to propose an agreement in point of Religion: and afterwards, entering upon the matter in hand, he declared that the Roman Catholics were ready to sacrifice to the public tranquillity the invocation of Saints, purgatory, and the merit of good works; that they would set bounds to the Pope's power, ſounded ſeveral other Miniſters far inferior to him upon the ſame ſubject, that would be no proof of any particular value he had for him. The Marſhals de Brezé [K] and de la Meilleraie [L] are to be counted among the perſons of diſtinction, who had a ſpecial regard for our Amyraut. Mr. le Goux de la Berchere [M] firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Burgundy, and the Intendants of the Province of Anjou [N] are in the ſame number; and to them we may add even Biſhops and Archbiſhops [O], but above all Cardinal Mazarin [P], who was exceedingly kind to Mr. Amyraut. What gained him the favour of that Cardinal was, in all probability, his openly declaring in favour of the obedience that is due to Sovereigns; which proved very advantageous to the court of France, during the troubles of the league againſt Mazarin, called de la Fronde, wherein power, and that, in caſe they ſhould meet with oppoſition, as to that, from the court of Rome, they would lay hold on that occaſion to create a Patriarch: that the Laity ſhould be allowed the communion in both kinds; and that they would give up ſeveral other points, provided they found in the Proteſtants a ſincere deſire of peace and union. But, when Mr. Amyraut touched upon the doctrines of the Euchariſt, he proteſted, that, as to that tenet, no alteration would be admitted of: whereupon the other anſwered, that if ſo, they could come to no agreement. Their conference laſted about four hours. The Jeſuit required ſecrecy; but Mr. Amyraut proteſted, according to the declaration he had made at firſt to Mr. de Villeneuve, that he would communicate the whole matter to his collegues, but that he would be anſwerable for their prudence and diſcretion. The ſame evening he gave them account of the conference, and made no conſcience of ſpeaking of it, as occaſion offered, after the Cardinal, and Father Audebert were both dead.

[K] The Marſhal de Brezé had a ſpecial regard for him.] He was Governor of Saumur, and never went thither without ſending Mr. Amyraut word, that he deſired to ſee him. He even invited him very often to his Caſtle de Milly, where he moſtly reſided; and when he received news of the death of the Duke de Fronſac his ſon, Admiral of France, he could not be one moment without Mr. Amyraut's company. He frequently admitted him during his laſt ſickneſs, recommended himſelf to his prayers, and deſired to be prayed for in the Proteſtant Church of Saumur. He died at the Caſtle of Milly, in 1650.

[L] The Marſhal de la Meilleraie.] He had been Mr. Amyraut's ſchool-fellow at Saumur, while he was of the Proteſtant communion, and never forgot that ancient acquaintance. The very next day after he came to Saumur, while the Court was there in 1652, he ſent one to compliment him in his name: and Mr. Amyraut went immediately to wait upon him, and was received in a moſt obliging manner. The Marſhal no ſooner heard of his laſt ſickneſs, but he ſent a Gentleman to enquire of his health, aſſuring him that he would have waited upon him himſelf, had he been able to endure, (as he was then taken with a fit of the gout) the motion of the coach. He was then at his Caſtle de Montreuil-Bellai, four leagues diſtant from Saumur.

[M] Mr. le Goux de la Berchere.] He was baniſhed to Saumur in 1637, and remained there till 1644. As he was a man of extraordinary merit and learning, he had a great value for the learned Men of all Religions. And therefore on his firſt arrival at Saumur he deſired to be acquainted with Mr. Amyraut, whom he found ſo worthy of his friendſhip, that he contracted an intimate correſpondence with him. They generally viſited one another twice a week; ſo that it is not at all ſtrange that Mr. Amyraut ſhould have furniſhed memoirs for the life of the Preſident. 'Tis needleſs to mention here, that Mr. de la Berchere died in the employment of firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Grenoble; and that he was ſucceeded in that office by his brother; but it will not be amiſs to record, that the latter had recourſe to Mr. Amyraut for the minutes of what had paſſed privately between them. Upon this Mr. Amyraut ſent him, among other memoirs, an account of his conference with Father Audebert; for it was no ſooner rumoured abroad that he had conferred in private with that Jeſuit, but Mr. de la Berchere deſired Amyraut to acquaint him with what had paſſed; and he accordingly imparted the chief heads of that conference to him, deſiring him to be ſecret. This paſſage of his Memoirs has not been inſerted in the printed Life of Mr. de la Berchere. Mr. Amyraut dedicated in 1648 his book of the Rights of Marriage to this illuſtrious Magiſtrate, who was then firſt Preſident of Grenoble.

[N] The Intendants of the Province of Anjou.] He never failed to wait upon them; nor they to return him the viſit, and ſhew him a great deal of reſpect. When he went, in 1658, to drink the waters of Bourbon, he received a thouſand civilities at Bourges by Mr. Mandat, Intendant of that Province, who invited him to lodge in his houſe, which he refuſed, but dined with him in company of the Archdeacon of that City, and ſome other Eccleſiaſtics.

[O] Biſhops and Archbiſhops.] See what has been ſaid above concerning the Biſhop of Chartres (17). I ſhall add here that, in 1662, Hardouin de Perefixe, Archbiſhop of Paris, being gone to Saumur on account of a vow the Queen mother had made to our Lady of Ardilliers (18), ſent word to Mr. Amyraut, that he would be glad to ſee him. Mr. Amyraut was very willing to wait upon him, but firſt he let him know, that he would not give him the title of Lord; which the Archbiſhop readily complying with, Mr. Amyraut waited upon him twice, was received very civilly, and kept at both viſits near two hours. They talked, among other ſubjects, of the books of Mr. Daillé, which the Prelate greatly commended with regard to the learning they contained.

(17) In Remark [D].

(18) In the church of the fathers of the Oratory at the end of one of the ſuburbs of Saumur.

[P] But above all Cardinal Mazarin.] He arrived at Saumur, in 1652, ſome days after the arrival of the King and the Queen mother: and having heard, that there had been great talk, at the Queen's table, of a Sermon preached by Mr. Amyraut, he deſired the Count de Comminges to let him know, that he ſhould be glad to be acquainted with him. The Count was Governor of Saumur, and had always ſhewed a great deal of friendſhip to Mr. Amyraut: he had even promiſed him that the Proteſtants ſhould be allowed to meet on Sundays, as uſual, notwithſtanding the King reſided in the city; but, at the ſame time, acquainted him, that they were not to aſſemble for the three firſt days after his Majeſty's arrival. What he promiſed was faithfully obſerved. Mr. Amyraut preached the Sunday, on theſe words, Fear God, honour the King, and many of the Court, who heard the Sermon, being extremely well pleaſed with it, not only ſpoke mightily in commendation of it to the King, as ſoon as church was over; but alſo in the evening at the Queen's table. It was then that Cardinal Mazarin heard of this Sermon, and was at the ſame time informed by Mr. de Comminges of the zeal Mr. Amyraut and all the Proteſtants of that country had ſhewn for the King's ſervice, during the late troubles. This inſpired the Cardinal with ſuch an eager deſire of being acquainted with him, that the very next morning he notified it to him by the Judge of the Provoſt-Marſhal's Court: inſomuch that Mr. de Comminges ſeeing another had got the ſtart of him in bringing that news, ſaid to him ſmiling; Sir, We ſhall be ſoon obliged, as I perceive, to recur to your interceſſion with his Eminence; which will convince you of the advantages accruing from the invocation of Saints. The firſt viſit was very ſhort; but Mr. Amyraut was deſired to return the next morning by eight a clock. The Cardinal expreſſed a great deal of kindneſs for him, made him ſit down by the fire, talked to him of State affairs, gave him a minute account of the endeavours that ſome were uſing in Xaintonge to bring over the Proteſtants to the party of the Princes, and begged he would do all that lay in his power to make their deſigns miſcarry. Mr. Amyraut aſſured him, that nothing was to be apprehended from the Proteſtants of France, and that he would wherein the Cardinal's fortune was ſo much agitated; and on divers other occaſions, he made plainly appear that this was his favourite principle [Q], and even had a conteſt with a Miniſter of Rochelle (i), who maintained the contrary opinion. But notwithſtanding his attachment to the doctrine of obedience, he was not for obeying in matters of conſcience [R]. It is needleſs to ſay, that he was highly eſteemed by the great Lords of the Proteſtant party, that being plain of itſelf. He had a quarrel with Mr. Huiſſeau, Miniſter of Saumur, and had not the ſatisfaction he expected at the national Synod of Loudun (k); which made many believe, that the great reputation he had gained, proved diſadvantageous to him on that occaſion, as if he had been an overgrown tree, that ſhaded the others, and was to be pulled down. Beſides, the relations of ſuch as had declared themſelves heads of the party that oppoſed the doctrine of univerſal grace, favoured his adverſary to the utmoſt of their power. It is probable he would have been Preſident of the Table in that Synod [S], at which he aſſiſted as Repreſentative

(i) Philip Vincent.

(k) In 1653.

would write to ſeveral Miniſters of Xaintonge, in order to perſuade the Synod, which was to meet very ſoon, to give an authentic proof of their loyalty, which was done accordingly. Two days after this audience, the Cardinal pretending to go and ſee the College of thoſe of the reformed Religion, and the Library of Mr. du Pleſſis Mornai, had another private converſation with Mr. Amyraut in his ſtudy. The ſubject of this was the edict of Nantes; Mr. Amyraut being asked, whether Henry IV was under any obligation of granting it, anſwered, that he was; adding that even allowing it to have been a favour at firſt, yet the obſerving of it was then become neceſſary; to which the Cardinal replied, that he was much in the right, quoting that maxim of law, quod initio fuit voluntatis, ex poſt facto fit neceſſitatis. The reader will, perhaps, be glad to hear what Mr. de Guitaut (19) told Madame de la Trimouille before the Queen. His Eminence is at the Miniſter Amyraut's houſe; they are both Clergymen; but however I am confident they are not talking of Religion; for his Eminence would not find his account in that. During the five weeks the King remained at Saumur, Mr. Amyraut went frequently to wait upon the Cardinal, and always met with a very kind reception: when he went to take his leave of him, his Eminence deſired he would write directly to him, whenever he had occaſion to ask any favour either for the Proteſtants in general, or himſelf in particular. He made uſe of this kind offer only once, and that was after his journey to Paris about the latter end of the year 1658. He viſited the Cardinal three or four times, who always ſhewed him a great deal of civility. He ſpoke to him about the national Synod, which the Proteſtants had begged in vain for a great many years. The Cardinal anſwered, that the reaſons, for which the Synod had not been allowed to meet, were ſtill in force; but however deſired he would write to him concerning that ſubject, which he did twice, and received anſwers by the Cardinal's own hand. 'Tis true that in his other letters to Mr. Amyraut he employed his Secretary; but nevertheleſs he always ſigned them proprio pugno.

(19) He was Captain of the Queen's guards, and Mr. Comminges's uncle.

[Q] In divers occaſions he made plainly appear that the obedience of ſubjects was his favourite principle.] In the Apology he publiſhed in 1647 in behalf of the Proteſtants, he excuſes, as well as he can, the civil wars of France, but declares at the ſame time, that by no means he intends to juſtify the taking up of arms againſt one's lawful Sovereign, upon any pretence whatſoever .... and that he always looked upon it as more agreeable to the nature of the Goſpel, and the practice of the primitive Church to uſe no other arms, but patience, tears, and prayers .... (20). And whenever I reflect, ſays he (21), on the Hiſtory of our Anceſtors, I cannot help being heartily grieved that they have not crowned ſo many other noble virtues, which they have propoſed to our example, with the imitation of the primitive Chriſtians, in the invincible patience, with which they bore the perſecutions of the Emperors. A Latin piece (22) he publiſhed two years after ſhews how heartily he maintained this cauſe againſt a Miniſter of Rochelle, who had better not have owned himſelf aimed at in that work, than have taken offence at it. The book of the Sovereignty of Kings publiſhed in 1650, on occaſion of the tragical death of Charles I, King of England, affords us a ſtill more convincing proof of Mr. Amyraut's ſentiments, with regard to the ſubjects riſing in arms againſt their Sovereigns. It was not poſſible to be ſilent in thoſe circumſtances; for that Tragedy was laid to the charge of the Presbyterian party, and a thouſand odious conſequences inferred from thence, reflecting on the French Proteſtants, which Mr. Amyraut thought himſelf obliged to confute. During the troubles of the laſt minority, the main aim of all his Sermons was to inſpire the people with an entire ſubmiſſion to the will of their Prince; and to ſuch as adviſed with him, relating to what courſe they ſhould take, he uſed to anſwer, that the only reſolution they could take was to ſtick to the trunk of the tree. Such as adviſed with him were probably in earneſt; nor did they apprehend the artifice that generally prevails on ſuch occaſions. Rebels commonly give out that all they intend, is to redreſs abuſes, and reſcue the Prince from the wicked Counſellors that ſurround him. One muſt be very weak to fall into ſuch ſnares, or need on like occaſions the direction and advice of a ghoſtly father; for not even the diſtinction, which ſome have found out between the Pope and the holy See, is a more palpable piece of ſophiſtry. Laſtly Mr. Amyraut declared his thoughts at length in the Epiſtle dedicatory to his Latin Paraphraſe on the Pſalms. In that piece he maintains, that, according to the principles of the Chriſtian Religion, ſubjects ought never to riſe in arms againſt their Sovereigns, and openly declares himſelf for paſſive obedience. This work he dedicated to Charles II, King of England, ſoon after his reſtoration. As he had been acquainted with that Prince's Chaplain at Paris, in 1658, he congratulated him, two years after, upon his Maſter's reſtoration, and his own promotion to the Biſhopric of Durham; for which thanks were returned him in the King's name. This encouraged Mr. Amyraut to dedicate his Paraphraſe on the Pſalms to that Monarch, after he had been aſſured by the Biſhop of Durham that it would be acceptable to him.

(20) Apology for thoſe of the reformed Religion, P. 75.

(21) Pag. 76.

(22) Intitled, Adverſus Epiſtolæ Hiſtoricæ Criminationes Moſis Amyraldi defenſio.

[R] He was not for obeying in matters of conſcience.] He made this plainly appear when the Seneſchal of Saumur imparted to him an order from the Council of State, enjoining all thoſe of the reformed Religion to hang the outſide of their houſes on Corpus-Chriſti-day. The Seneſchal notified this order to him the eve of that holy-day, entreating him at the ſame time to perſuade the Proteſtants to comply with it, leſt their diſobedience ſhould excite the mob againſt them. To this Mr. Amyraut anſwered, that on the contrary he would go directly and exhort his pariſhioners not to comply with it, as he himſelf was reſolved not to obey any ſuch orders; that in all his Sermons he had endeavoured to inſpire his hearers with obedience and ſubmiſſion to ſuperior powers, but not when their conſciences were concerned. Having thus acquainted the Seneſchal with his reſolution, he went from houſe to houſe laying before his pariſhioners the reaſons why they ought not to obey the order of the Council. The Seneſchal however cauſed it to be proclaimed by ſound of trumpet. Upon this the Aſſembly met, thanked Mr. Amyraut for what he had done, and enjoined the Elders to take care no one ſhould comply with the order. The King's Lieutenant did not think fit to ſupport the Seneſchal, but ſuppreſſed the tumult which had already begun. This order was revoked not long after.

[S] In the Synod of Loudun he would have been one of the Table.] This remark would be uſeleſs, were this Repreſentative of his Province, had he not been thought to be perſonally concerned in the diſpute between Mr. d'Huiſſeau and the church of Saumur. He died piouſly the 8th of January 1664 (l), and was interred with the uſual ceremonies of the Academy. As he had, during his laſt infirmity the entire uſe of his ſenſes, he made ſeveral very edifying ſpeeches, and gave clear proofs of his belief, in the preſence of divers perſons of different religions. The compaſſion he ſhewed to the poor, deſerves to be mentioned among his other virtues, having beſtowed his entire ſalary on them the laſt ten years of his life; and that without any diſtinction of Catholic or Proteſtant. He extended his charity even to the Mendicant Friars, who never returned empty from his houſe. He recommended the Recollects of Saumur to Mr. Hervart (m), when they had recourſe to the Exchequer for the rebuilding of their Cloiſter, which had been conſumed by fire, and was ſoon thanked by them for the good effects his recommendation produced. He left but one ſon, who was one of the ableſt Advocates of the Parliament of Paris, and fled to the Hague, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He had one daughter, who died in 1645, a year and a half after ſhe had been married (n). The affliction his wife felt on that occaſion, prompted him to write a treatiſe (which was publiſhed the enſuing year) concerning the State of the Faithful after death. The reader will be glad to find here the diſtich, which Mr. du Boſc writ with his own hand under Mr. Amyraut's print.

(l) Konig, in his Bibliotheca, and Witte in his Diarium miſplace his death in 1665.

(m) He was Comptroller of the Finances.

(n) To Bernard de Haumont, afterwards the King's Advocate at Saumur.

A Moſe ad Moſem par Moſi non fuit ullus:
More, ore, & calamo, mirus uterque fuit (o).

(o) It alludes to what the Jews have ſaid in commendation of Moſes Maïmonides, a celebrated Rabbi.

His ſon cauſed his portrait to be engraved ſome years after his death.

A great many particulars relating to Mr. Amyraut are to be met with in a work entitled; A Melange Critique de Literature recueilli des Converſations de feu Mr. Ancillon (q): We find there, among other things, that a paſſage in one of Balzac's letters (r), where the author of an Apology is highly commended, ought to be applied to Mr. Amyraut. The ſame work informs us, that Patin had a great value for him; hence we may infer, that the diſobliging expreſſions we read in Patin's letters were not levelled againſt our Amyraut. But in the notes we ſhall take notice of this, and ſome other ſmall miſtakes [T].

(p) Taken from the Memoirs communicated by his ſon; from which we have taken whatever we advance in this article without quoting other authorities.

(q) Printed at Baſil 1698.

(r) The firſt to Mr. Conrart.

this book to be peruſed only by the French Proteſtants; but may be of ſome uſe to other readers. What in our French Synods we called the Table was made up of four perſons, viz. the Preſident of the Aſſembly (called alſo the Moderator,) his Aſſiſtant, the Secretary, and one that collected the Acts.

[T] We ſhall take notice of this and ſome other ſmall miſtakes.] Patin in his 113th Letter of the firſt edition writes (23), that "in 1663 a Phyſician of "Nyort, called Luſſand, deſigned to print an Apology "in favour of the Phyſicians, againſt ſuch as accuſe "them of paying too much deference to nature: he "ſays, that this Phyſician aimed chiefly at Mr. "Amyraut Miniſter of Saumur, who thus caſt this "blemiſh on the Phyſicians, in the laſt volume "of his Chriſtian Morals ..... he ſeems not "to have been pleaſed (24) with Mr. Amyraut "on this occaſion; for he adds: If Mr. Amy- "raut would take the pains to anſwer that book, "he would offer things, which Luſſand is a quite "ſtranger to, and are not to be met with in his "book. I have given him ſome hints, ſays he, and "furniſhed him with ſome proper paſſages, and good "authorities; but he did not value them. That "perhaps diſpleaſed him; for afterwards he writes "thus: "but truly he is in a province not far from "the country of Adieu Sias *, where, generally "ſpeaking, there is more vanity than learning &c." I ſhall not copy the whole paſſage, which Mr. Ancillon relates, and which is highly diſobliging; but I muſt acquaint my readers, that the perſon, whom Patin abuſes, was a Phyſician of Nyort, and not the Divine who is the ſubject of this article. I muſt likewiſe inform them, that Mr. Amyraut's Treatiſe of Religions againſt ſuch as look upon them as indifferent, is not the only book among his works that has undergone the ſecond edition (25); for I am certain that his apology in favour of the Proteſtants has been printed more than once; that his Treatiſe of Predeſtination, printed in 1634, was reprinted at Saumur in 1658, together with the ſpecimen of Calvin's doctrine, and the reply to Mr. de la Milletiere, upon his propoſal of a friendly conference in order to examine his means of reconciliation; that the two latter Treatiſes were publiſhed in 1638; and that the Bookſeller, who reprinted them in 1658, together with the Treatiſe of Predeſtination, declares (26), that he preſents again the Public with theſe three books, becauſe they were out of print. I am alſo confident that eleven of Amyraut's Sermons on divers paſſages of the Scripture were reprinted in 1653; that the life of la Noue, was reprinted at Leyden; his theſes, and thoſe of his collegues at Geneva, and that his Treatiſe of the ſtate of the faithful after death was printed in Engliſh at London, and at Utrecht in Dutch.

(23) Melange Critique da Literature, tom. 1. pag. 133, 134.

(24) Patin Letter 114; firſt edition.

* Gaſcony [REM. CRIT.]

(25) As is aſſerted in the Melange Critique, p. 132. The firſt is of 1631, and the ſecond edition of 1652.

(26) In the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Students in Divinity.

AMYRUTZES (a) a Peripatetic Philoſopher, and native of Trebizond, was at firſt in great eſteem at the court of the Emperor David his maſter, and ſignalized himſelf by writing in favour of the Greeks againſt the deciſions of the Council of Florence (b); but at laſt forfeited by his apoſtacy, all the reputation he had gained. He was one of thoſe who accompanied the Emperor David to Conſtantinople, whither that Prince was carried by order of Mahomet II after the reduction of Trebizond, in 1461. This Philoſopher, ſeduced by the promiſes of the Sultan, renounced the Chriſtian religion, and embraced Mahometiſm, together with his children, one of which, under the name of Mehemet-Beg, tranſlated many books of the Chriſtians into Arabic, by the order of Mahomet II. That Prince honoured Amyrutzes with conſiderable employments in the Seraglio, and uſed ſome times to diſcourſe with him, or Mehemet-Beg, about points of learning and religion (c). By the manner Allatius expreſſes himſelf one would take this Philoſopher to have born the employment of Protoveſtiarius in (a) In the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary he is called, by miſtake, Amyruta.

(b) Leo Allatius, de Perpetua Conſenſione, lib. 3. cap. 3. p. 935, and 1379.

(c) Guillet, Hiſtory of Mahomet II. tom. 1. pag. 441, and tom. 2. p. 136.

in the court of the Emperor of Trebizond [A]. We muſt not forget that the Emperor of Trebizond was not the firſt Prince that ſhewed a particular value for Amyrutzes, for he had been greatly eſteemed at the court of Conſtantinople, long before he had the honour to pleaſe that Prince. He was one of the learned men, with whom the Emperor John Paleologus adviſed about his journey into Italy (d); and he attended him (e) in that journey, as he himſelf witneſſes (f) in the account he gives of the Council of Florence, which he dedicated to Demetrius Governor of Napoli di Romania. In the ſame work, he affirms that the Patriarch of Conſtantinople was ſtrangled in the time of the Council, and that the Phyſicians atteſted that fact (g).

(d) The Hiſtoire Polit. de Conſtant. names him before Beſſarion and Gemiſt. See Allat. de Perpetuo Conſenſ. P. 883.

(e) That Emperor arrived at Venice the 8th of Feb. 1438.

(f) Apud Allat. de Perp. Conſ. p. 886.

(g) Idem, ibid. P. 908.

[A] By the manner Allatius expreſſes himſelf one would think this Philoſopher had born the employment of Protoveſtiarius in the court of the Emperor of Trebizond.] Allatius in his Perpetuus Conſenſus, p. 936, ſpoke only by conjecture of the book, which Amyrutzes wrote againſt the council of Florence; but in his additions, he tells us, that the book itſelf had been ſent him from the iſland of Scio; and adds, that Dorotheus, Archbiſhop of Monembaſe acquaints us * with his condition, cujusnam conditionis vir ille fuerit. He quotes, both in Greek and Latin, a paſſage out of Dorotheus. The Greek text informs us that Mahomet commanded the Emperor David, and ſome others, namely, τὸν Φιλόσοφον Ἀμυρούτζην τὸν Πρωτοβεστιάριον, i. e. Philoſophum Amyrutzium Protoveſtiarium, to be ſent to Conſtantinople by ſea. As the paſſage is thus tranſlated, and by Allatius, we can have no manner of doubt, but that he took Amyrutzes and the Protoveſtiarius to be one and the ſame perſon, and applied to him the remaining part of the paſſage, wherein it is ſaid, that he was couſin-german to Mahomet Baſſa; that he betrayed the Emperor David, and was greatly honoured by his couſin and the Sultan Mahomet, after the taking of Trebizond. In the ſame paſſage we read, that he was cunning, tall, well-ſhaped, a good bow-man, and fit for every thing. His mother and Mahomet's were ſiſters, being both daughters of Jagarus. I do not give much credit to this account, being told by Mr. Guillet, where he mentions the Turco-græcia of Cruſius, that the Protoveſtiarius of the Emperor of Trebizond was named George; that he was of a good aſpect, and ſo skilful a bow-man, that none of the Greeks or Turks could match him; that his mother was the daughter of a Chriſtian Prince called Jagrus, who married his other daughter to one in Servia, where ſhe was brought to bed of a ſon, who renounced the Chriſtian religion, and was called Machmut (1). I ſhould willingly diſtinguiſh the Philoſopher from the Protoveſtiarius, by placing a comma after Ἀμυρούτζην, in the above quoted paſſage, to make two perſons of the Philoſopher and Protoveſtiarius, whom Allatius confounded together.

* In Synopſi Hiſtoriarum.

(1) Guillet, Hiſtory of Mahomet II. tom. 1. pag. 439.

ANABAPTISTS, a ſect which ſprung up ſoon after Lutheraniſm. Nicholas Storch, Mark Stubner, and Thomas Munzer, gave it birth in 1521, by miſinterpreting a doctrine they had read in the book de Libertate Chriſtiana, publiſhed by Luther in 1520. The propoſition they found there was this, A Chriſtian is Lord of all things, and ſubject to no body, which, though uſed by Luther in a very good ſenſe [A], ſeemed to them very proper for gaining the populace; for this was what they all three aimed at, each of them according to his abilities. Storch, who had no learning, pretended to revelations. Stubner, who was a man of parts and learning, found out crafty and deceitful explanations of the Scripture. Munzer, daring and paſſionate, excelled in boldneſs, and indulged a full liberty to ſuch paſſions, as would occaſion moſt diſturbance. They were not ſatisfied to inveigh againſt the Eccleſiaſtical tyranny of the court of Rome, and cry down the authority of the Conſiſtories; but moreover taught, that the power of Princes was a meer uſurpation, and that under the Evangelical Law men ought to enjoy a full liberty. They rebaptized their diſciples, and, in order to credit this practice, taught, that baptiſm conferred upon infants was of no validity. As to other points, they profeſſed rigid morals, recommended mortification, faſting, plain dreſs, &c. and by that ſeduced vaſt numbers. This emboldened Munzer to ſuch a degree, that he began openly to exhort the people to ſhake off all ſubjection to Magiſtrates, and to oblige the Sovereigns to reſign their authority. This new Goſpel was heard ſo favourably by the German Peaſants, who thought the yoke of their landlords a little too heavy, that in many places they roſe up in arms, and committed a thouſand diſorders. But they were beat without much ado by the troops that were levied againſt them, and many of them put to death. Munzer, who had ſeduced them, and bragged ſo much of his inſpirations (a), was taken and beheaded in 1525 (b). The diſciples he had left in Switzerland, made ſo many proſelytes, and raiſed ſuch diſturbances, that (a) See his Article.

(b) Moreri is in the wrong to ſay that, this Hereſiarch bragged about the year 1542, that the Holy Ghoſt revealed to him, &c.

[A] They miſinterpreted a doctrine ... uſed by Luther in a very good ſenſe.] This is what he made appear, by the explanation of his thought, as ſoon as he heard how the Anabaptiſts had miſinterpreted his expreſſion. Quæ verba ſano ſenſu à Luthero ..... ſcripta & prolixa ἐξηγήσει declarata, oppoſitoque aphoriſmo, eundem omnium ſervum eſſe, & omnibus ſubjectum expoſita, detorta fuere in ſenſum ſequiorem ab hominibus ſuæ pariter & alienæ quietis impatientibus (1). i. e. "Which words being written and interpreted by Luther in a good ſenſe, and explained by the oppoſite poſition, that he is the ſervant of all and ſubject to all, were ſtrained to a bad ſenſe by men that cannot bear to be quiet themſelves, or to let others be ſo." His moſt bitter enemies unanimouſly own, that he diſapproved of the ſeditious conduct, which had been accidentally occaſioned by his tenets. We are told by Father Maimbourg, that the rebels ſent their manifeſto to Martin Luther, but were diſappointed in the hopes they had conceived of making him approve of it (2); for Luther, adds he, ſeeing, that many charged him with having given occaſion to that revolt, by the books he had written in the vulgar tongue in favour of the liberty of the Goſpel, againſt the tyranny of thoſe who loaded it with human traditions, publiſhed a long anſwer, wherein he ſhewed them, that, ſtanding to the Scripture, they were obliged to ſubmit to Princes and Magiſtrates, even when they abuſed the authority and power they were inveſted with; that they ought in the mean time to recur to the Lord, and ſuffer with patience their afflictions, till ſuch time as he ſhould be pleaſed to relieve them in what manner he thought fit; and that their taking up of arms, if they continued in them, would be the occaſion of their damnation. We ſhall ſee in the article MUNZER, that Luther immediately rejected that Fanatic's propoſals.

(1) Frider. Spanhemius, de Origine, progreſſu, ſectis, & nominibus Anabaptiſtarum, p. 169. I uſe the edition inſerted in the Gangræna Theologiæ Anabaptiſticæ of Cloppenbourg.

(2) Maimbourg, Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm, lib. 1, p. 114. Holland edition.

that it was there thought neceſſary to ſtop the courſe of that ſect by moſt ſevere penal laws, which was likewiſe practiſed in ſeveral cities of Germany, and elſewhere. The Clergy, to do them juſtice, took a great deal of pains to refute theſe ſectaries; but as that did not produce the deſired effect, the Magiſtrates ſupplied, with their authority, what was wanting [B]. The Anabaptiſts gained a great many to their ſect in Moravia, and would have gained more, notwithſtanding the ſevere oppoſitions they met with from [B] The Clergy took a great deal of pains to refute theſe Sectaries, but ... the Magiſtrates ſupplied with their authority what was wanting.] The ſchiſm which Munzer and his followers ſet on foot, was better calculated for the ſtifling of Lutheraniſm in its birth, than any thing Luther's greateſt enemies could ever have deviſed. For they preached a doctrine, which tended to the total deſtruction of human ſociety, and practiſed it with ſuch devaſtations as can hardly be imagined. As they had had ſome correſpondence with Luther, and agreed with him, that the Chriſtian Religion ought to be reformed according to the bare word of God (3); all the odium that was conceived againſt them, came to fall upon him, and others of his character; and when people ſaw the bad conſequences, which the reformation was attended with in its very beginning, they began to doubt whether it was the work of God; which put a great ſtop to it. No wonder then that the Miniſters called this ſect a contrivance of the Devil, who had deviſed this deſign to maintain his Empire againſt the new Apoſtles, whom God had raiſed (4). Such language is a natural conſequence of theological hypotheſes. The Roman Catholic Controverſiſts laid greedily hold of this opportunity, and improved it very dexterouſly, to cry down the reformation, and animate all the Powers againſt it. But neither were the Reformers leſs careful in defending themſelves againſt the ignominy, in which their adverſaries endeavoured to involve them. They exclaimed againſt the Anabaptiſts with all their might, publiſhed books to confute their tenets, and engaged them in diſputes wherever they met them. Ut laȯem iſtam ſibi æque ac doctrinæ Evangelicæ adſperſam abſterſum irent Heroes illi, qui in templo Dei remetiendo fidem ac integritatem ſuam & Dei cauſam publicis ſcriptis ſibi agendam cenſuere. Quod inter alios alacriter præſtitere, Lutherus, Melanchton, Zwinglius, Bullingerus, Menius, Regius, alii, & in ſeditiones & ſeditioſos graviter invecti, ſubditos perduelles, de ſuo erga poteſtates ſuperiores officio, ex Dei verbo monendo, tribunicios illos concionatores perſtringendo, & omnes ad quietam & debitam Principibus ſuis reverentiam hortando, nihil reliqui fecere, ut impetum hominum ad ſcelera & cruces furibundis animis ruentium ſufflaminarent. Lutherus vel imprimis concitatior non παραινετικὰ tantum ſcripta contra ſeditioſos, verum etiam συλλογιστικὰς emiſit, & peculiari libello Contra Latrones & homicidas Ruſticos vulgato ipſe claſſicum in illos cecinit, Principes hortatus, ut vi & armis latrociniorum iſtorum impetum ſiſterent, & eos ad quietem cogerent, qui perſuaderi nollent (5). i. e. "That thoſe Heroes, "who have thought it incumbent on them to write "publickly in defence of the cauſe of God, and "their honeſty and integrity in reſtoring the temple of God, might wipe off that ſtain upon themſelves, as well as the doctrine of the Goſpel. "Which was done by Luther, Melanchthon, Zwinglius, Bullinger, Menius, Regius and others, with great "alacrity, who being zealous both againſt ſeditions and "the movers of them, admoniſhed thoſe turbulent "Preachers, exhorted all to due quietneſs and reverence "to their Princes, and left no ſtone unturned to check "the rage of men that were running headlong into ſin "and death. Luther was the moſt zealous, and "not only publiſhed Exhortations, but alſo Invectives againſt the ſeditious, and in his book entitled, "Contra Latrones & homicidas Ruſticos, founded a "charge againſt them, exhorting the Princes to ſtop "the rage of thoſe villains by force of arms, and "compel them to be quiet, who would not be perſuaded to it." The Miniſter, who furniſhes me with this Latin paſſage, names ſome cities, where theſe Sectaries were confounded in public diſputes; but he always concludes that the Magiſtrates performed their duty. He tells us, that the Chiefs of the Anabaptiſts of Zurich having diſputed, at three different times, with Zwinglius, and been always confounded (6), were at laſt ſilenced by a ſolemn Edict. Senatus Tigurinus ſolenni edicto Pædobaptiſmum ſancit, & Anabaptiſmi Doctoribus ſilentium & quietem imperat (7). Baltazar Hubmeyer, one of their leaders, promiſed to make a public recantation, but inſtead thereof preached his errors; upon this he was condemned to abjure, and then turned out of the city (8). And becauſe this Sect daily gained ground in ſpite of all oppoſitions, recourſe was had at laſt to more violent remedies. The Senate enacted a Decree condemning all the Teachers of the ſect to death, and ſuch as ſhould ſhelter them, to heavy fines. Capitis pœna in Anabaptiſtarum Doctores decreta, & gravibus in eorum receptatores mulctis (9). This Decree was enacted in 1530. Oecolampadius diſputed with them at Baſil in 1525, 1527, and 1529, maintained his cauſe exceeding well; but for all that could not get the better of their obſtinacy. Wherefore they were ſo curbed by the Magiſtrates, that the Church was at length reſtored to its former tranquillity. Cauſæ quidem abunde ſatisfecit, actoribus vero pervicacibus non item, ita in prudentiſſimi Senatus, & ſtrenui gloriæ divinæ vindicis, in Anabaptiſtarum ſectariis coërcendis authoritate, Eccleſiæ Baſilienſis tranquillitati ſimul & puritati conſulendum ibidem fuerit (10). i. e. "He gained the cauſe, but "did not convince the obſtinate abettors of it, ſo "that the moſt prudent Senate was obliged to interpoſe, and vindicate the divine glory, by reſtraining "the Anabaptiſt Sectaries, and reſtoring the tranquillity and purity of the Church of Baſil." They were confuted at Bern in a public diſpute in 1527: but nevertheleſs they whiſpered about, that their arguments had not been fully anſwered, and that they ſtill held good. Upon this, that the triumph of truth might be more ſolemn, another diſpute was appointed to be in 1532; which laſted nine days. The acts of this diſpute were publiſhed, which produced a very good effect, tho' far inferior to that which was occaſioned by the Decrees of the Senate of Bern (11). Theſe diſturbers of the public peace would have made the town of St. Gall their aſylum, had they not been turned out by the Magiſtrates (12). Here it was that Thomas Schucker cut off his brother's head in 1527. Having convened a numerous aſſembly, he declared that he felt himſelf inſpired with the divine Spirit, commanded his brother to kneel down, and took a ſword in his hand. Upon this, his father, and mother, with ſome others, asked what he intended to do. Don't trouble yourſelves, (anſwered he) I ſhall do nothing but what our heavenly Father inſpires me with. The Aſſembly was impatient to ſee what this would come to at laſt; when all on a ſudden drawing the ſword, he ſtruck off his brother's head. He was puniſhed by the Magiſtrates according to the quality of his crime, but never ſhewed any ſign of repentance, declaring even on the ſcaffold, that he had but executed what God had commanded. You may imagine that upon ſuch a notorious piece of fanaticiſm the ſeverity of the decrees baniſhing the Anabaptiſts was redoubled (13). Diſputes were held, and ſevere laws enacted at Straſburg againſt this Sect (14); Melchior Hofman a leading man among them, was taken up, and died in priſon (15). The Sect ſpread itſelf in Moravia, Bohemia, Poland, Hungary, Auſtria, Sileſia. Some of the Heads were executed. Balthazar Hubmeyer was carried to Vienna, where he was burnt. This execution made him be look'd upon by the whole Sect as a Martyr, and warmed the zeal of his brethren (16).

To this we may add, that Queen Elizabeth, on their firſt arriving in England, in 1560, enacted a Decree commanding them forthwith to retire (17). The Elector Palatine baniſhed them his Dominions, in 1594. Moſt cruel and ſanguinary Edicts were publiſhed

(3) See Spanhem. de Origine Anabaptiſtarum, p. 198.

(4) See the Remark [KK] in the article MAHOMET.

(5) Spanhem. de Origine Anabaptiſtarum, p. 198.

(6) In January, March and November 1525.

(7) Spanhem. de Origine Anabaptiſtarum, pag. 202.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid. p. 203.

(11) Spanhem. de Orig. Anabaptiſt. p. 203, 204.

(12) Turbones urbe ejecti fuere. Id. ib. p. 204.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid. p. 205.

(15) Id. ibid. p. 212.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Hoornbeek, Summa Controverſ. p. 381.

from the Magiſtrates, had they not been divided among themſelves into two factions (c). No city was more plagued with them than Munſter [C]. Every one knows that they poſſeſſed themſelves of that city, and that John of Leyden, the firſt King of this new Jeruſalem, defended it to the utmoſt of his power, but at laſt, the town being taken, he was put to death in 1536. The Anabaptiſts of Frieſland and Holland diſapproved, in many reſpects, of the conduct of their brethren in Munſter; but at the ſame time occaſioned themſelves a great diſturbance in the State (d). One of the leading men among them was called Mennon. The moſt effectual means that could be thought on were employed againſt this ſect, but proved inſufficient to the rooting of it out (e); for it maintains itſelf to this day in the United Provinces. It is true they have cured themſelves by degrees of their chief follies [D]; they do not pretend now to revelations; neither do they refuſe to comply with the orders of lawful Magiſtrates, or preach an entire exemption from all manner of ſubjection, the community of goods, and ſuch like doctrines. This ſect has been ſubdivided into innumerable branches [E], which muſt happen to all ſects that reject the principle of authority. They boaſt a vaſt number of Martyrs [F], for their Martyrology is a large folio. No writer

(c) Viz. the Hutterians and Gabrieliſts.

(d) See the article PICARDS Remark [B].

(e) From the diſſertation of Frideric Spanheim the father, de Origine, Progreſſu, Sectis, & Nominibus Anabaptiſtarum, printed at Leyden in 1643. John Cloppenbourg has inſerted it in his Gangræna Theologiæ Anabaptiſticæ, printed at Franeker in 1656, 4to.

liſhed againſt them by the Diets of Spires, in 1529, 1544, and of Augsburg in 1551 (18). Philip II enjoined the Governeſs of the Netherlands to puniſh the Anabaptiſts without delay or mercy (19). Read the Annals of this Sect by John Henry Ottius, where you will find a long catalogue of the Decrees that were publiſhed againſt it in the ſeveral parts of Europe. We may apply to the penal Laws what is commonly ſaid of the Artillery, viz. that it is the laſt reaſon of Kings, ratio ultima Regum; ſo the penal Laws are the laſt reaſon of Divines, their ſtrongeſt argument, their Achilles, &c.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Id. ibid. citans Stradæ Hiſt. Belg. l. 4.

[C] But no City was more plagued with them than Munſter.] What paſſed in this city from the time the Anabaptiſts got footing in it, to the execution of John of Leyden, may be counted among the moſt remarkable events of the 16th Century. It is to be met with in a great many books (a); but chiefly in the Letter which was written to Eraſmus by Conrad Heresbachius (20) in 1536, and publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1537, cum Hyppomnematis ac Notis Theologicis, Hiſtoricis, ac Politicis, Theodori Strackii, Paſtoris Budericenſis; and in the works of Lambert Hortenſius De Tumultibus Anabaptiſtarum, of John Wigandus, De Anabaptiſmo publicato, and in the Relation of Henry Dorpius, a Citizen of Munſter, publiſhed in 1536.

(20) He was tutor to the Duke of Cleves's ſon, and afterward counſellor to the Duke, and was at the ſiege of Munſter.

§ (a) Mr. Bayle has omitted, as it ſeems, involuntarily, the Latin heroic Poem, which was written in two books by Hermannus Kerſſembroeck, rehearſed by the Author in a full aſſembly of the Univerſity of Cologn, and printed at Cologn in 1545 8vo. This piece is dedicated to Francis, Count of Waldeck, and Biſhop of Munſter and Oſnabrug, and bears this title. Belli Monaſterienſis contra Anabaptiſtica Monſtra geſti, brevis atque ſuccincta deſcriptio. REM. CRIT.

[D] They have cured themſelves by degrees of their chief follies.] And this is the reaſon that the Anabaptiſts of our days complain of thoſe, who refute them, with the arguments, that were employed againſt their Anceſtors. This is what a celebrated Divine of the Dutch Academy is charged with in a Letter publiſhed in Dutch by an Anabaptiſt; but he anſwers, that he does not pretend to impute all the errors he mentions to all the Anabaptiſts. Has (Sectas) ut minime confundimus in controverſiis ſingulis, ita nec notatos errores omnes omnibus imputamus . . . . minus voluimus imputatos illis, qui intra Waterlandorum dictas confeſſiones, bona fide, procul fallaciis Mennoniticis, hærere ſeſe profitentur. Abſit ut cuiquam invito, & deprecanti hæreſim impingamus! Sed nec iſti aliorum Apologiam ſuſcipiant, aut alios eſſe, ac fuiſſe negent, quos hic Elenchus, ſub generali Enthuſiaſtarum & Anabaptiſtarum nomine, ne neſciat juventus noſtra, coarguit. Factum tamen noviſſime, ut diximus modo, à Rypenſi ſcriptore Epiſtolæ in modum Belgico ſermone mihi opponendæ. Qui errores hic complures notatos dum à ſuis Waterlandis amolitur, ſi modo vere & ſincere, hoc ipſo non ſe aut ſuos in talibus controverſiis peti, ſed familias alias ex dicto grege, intellexiſſe debuit. Fruſtra ergo eſt omnis ipſius expoſtulatio, quaſi ignorem quid Rypenſes Anabaptiſtæ ſentiant, aut quaſi lectoribus meis imponam (21). i. e. "As we do not confound theſe Sects in "particular controverſies, ſo we do not impute all "their errors to the whole. . . . We do not impute "them to thoſe who profeſs to keep within the li- "mits of the Waterland confeſſions, far from the "fallacies of the Mennonites. Far be it from us "to fall upon any one that is unwilling and avoids "hereſy. But let not thoſe undertake the defence "of the reſt, or deny that there are and were others, "whom this Diſcourſe reproves under the general "name of Enthuſiaſts and Anabaptiſts, that our "youth may not be ignorant of the fact. Neverthe- "leſs I was very lately oppoſed in an Epiſtle written "in Dutch. But whilſt the Author of it endeavours "to clear his Waterlanders of many errors there "taken notice of, he ſhould have underſtood that "neither he nor his friends were meant, but other "families of the ſame ſect. All his expoſtulation "therefore is to no purpoſe, as if I did not know "the ſentiments of the Anabaptiſts, or impoſed up- "on the readers." Hoornbeeck has had the equity not to impute the errors of private men to the whole ſect. Hic quidem imprimis à communibus illorum, & ſingularibus cœtuum dogmatis ſecernenda ſunt propria aliqua Doctorum ipſorum (22). i. e. "Here in- "deed in the firſt place we muſt ſeparate the parti- "cular doctrines of ſome of their Teachers from the "general and particular doctrines of their Aſſem- "blies." He mentions the errors of two in particular, viz. of James Outreman, and Weke Walles. Outreman held three eſſences in the divine nature, and taught the eſſence of God the Father did not extend itſelf beyond the bounds of Heaven. The other maintained that Judas was an honeſt man and was ſaved; that neither he was guilty of any crime in betraying our Saviour, nor the Scribes and Prieſts in perſecuting him ſo as to be the occaſion of his death; and that both the Thieves were ſaved. Outreman taught his tenets at Haerlem in 1605, and Walles his in the territory of Groningen in 1637, with ſo much zeal, that he excommunicated, without mercy, all thoſe who did not receive his doctrine. He was baniſhed that Province, and retired to Frieſland, from whence the Proteſtant Synod, that was held at Franeker in 1644, cauſed him to be driven away (23).

(21) Fridericus Spanhemius Filius in Elencho Controverſiarum p. 87. edition 1694.

(22) Hoornbeek Summa Controverſ. p. 189.

(23) Id. ibid. P. 389, 390.

[E] It has been ſubdivided into innumerable branches.] The enumerating of the various Sects of Anabaptiſts would wear out the patience of my readers; I ſhall therefore only direct them to a book, where ſuch as deſire to ſee the catalogue of them, will find wherewithal to ſatisfy their curioſity. See the Preface of the Annals of the Anabaptiſts by John Henry Ottius.

[F] They boaſt a vaſt number of Martyrs.] Could they only produce thoſe, who were put to death for attempts againſt the Government, their vaſt Martyrology would do them no great credit; but it is unqueſtionable, that many Anabaptiſts, who ſuffered with great conſtancy, never entertained any thoughts of revolting. I ſhall alledge the authority of one, who by no means can be ſuſpected, viz. of a writer, who with all his might refuted the tenets of this Sect (24). He aſcribes the great progreſs this Sect made, to three cauſes. The firſt is, that they confounded, with a vaſt number of paſſages out of the Scripture, thoſe who hearkened to them: the ſecond, that they affected a great deal of holineſs, in outward appearance: the third, that they ſuffered and died with writer has ſpoke ſo favourably of them, as George Caſſander [G]. The Proteſtant Divines oppoſed the Anabaptiſts with great zeal in the United Provinces, and cauſed, at different with great conſtancy. He proves that none of theſe three is a proof of orthodoxy. His words are: *The third proof, by which the Anabaptiſts ſeduce the ſimple and inconſtant people, is their conſtancy in ſuffering and dying. But that indeed is too ſimple and weak to prove that their Antichriſtian doctrine is good and ſound: as St. Cyprian ſays. Not what a man ſuffers, but the cauſe for which he ſuffers, makes him a Martyr. Thoſe are, according to the Scripture †, true Martyrs, and bleſſed, who ſuffer for the ſake of juſtice, of truth, and for the name of Chriſt. Now the Anabaptiſts ſuffer not for the ſake of truth, wherein they are to be pitied, but for Antichriſtian tenets. And ſurely Princes and Kings do not take right meaſures to root out this Sect, while they put to death the poor ignorant people, that have been, for the moſt part, ſeduced. They ought rather to imitate the good Kings Ezechias and Joſias , who baniſhed all kind of idolatrous worſhip out of their Dominions, and at the ſame time reformed that true Religion. In the ſame manner ought they to take care that the true Apoſtolic doctrine be publicly preached; which if they did, I am ſatisfied there would be no occaſion for employing fire againſt thoſe poor, ignorant, and ſeduced wretches (25). After this he proves by ſeveral inſtances, that many have ſhewn a great deal of courage and reſolution, tho' they did not ſuffer for the ſake of juſtice; ſuch were the bad thief, the Eſſenes, the Circumcellions, the Popiſh Martyrs, the Arians, the Mahometans, the Philoſophers Zeno and Socrates. But he ſays nothing which ſeems to inſinuate, that the Anabaptiſt Martyrs were put to death for taking up arms againſt their Sovereigns, or raiſing rebellions. He deſcribes their Martyrs as a ſet of ſimple people. See what I ſhall cite here below from George Caſſander.

(24) Guy de Bres's epiſtle dedicatory Of the Origin and Grounds of the Anabaptiſts. This book was printed in 1565.

† Matth. v. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 20; 1 John iv. 3.

* 2 Chron. xxx, xxxv.

(25) Origin and Grounds of the Anabaptiſts, p. 9.

Obſerve here by the way, that the Author, whoſe words I have quoted, refutes his adverſaries in the ſame manner that the Roman Catholics confuted the Proteſtants, The firſt mark, ſays he (26), by which they deceive, and ſeduce a great many, is when without ſenſe, judgment, or reaſon, they quote a vaſt number of paſſages out of the holy Scripture, at random; as tho' they had the whole Bible at their fingers ends, whereas it often happens, that they know not A from B. However the ſimple and ignorant people, being amazed to hear ſo many texts of the Scripture, know not what to ſay, and believe they have great Doctors among them. But I beg ſuch ſimple people would reflect, that no hereſy has been hitherto broached, which did not endeavour to maintain its blaſphemies by miſinterpreting, and wreſting the ſenſe of the Scripture; tho' the holy Scripture gives no occaſion to errors and hereſies, which on the contrary proceed, as our Saviour tells us, from not knowing the Scripture †, You err knowing not the Scriptures.

(26) The Riſe, Origin, &c. of the Anabaptiſts, p. 5.

† Mark xii. 24.

As to the ſecond mark, by which the Anabaptiſts ſeduced and miſled the ſimple people, viz. a falſe appearance of holineſs, he proves by ſeveral inſtances, that it is often the character of falſe Teachers. 'Tis certain the Roman Catholics had theſe three difficulties to anſwer: 1, That the Proteſtants had nothing in their mouths but the Bible, and were continually quoting it; 2, that they inveighed againſt balls, pompous habits, debauches, &c. 3, that many of them died with great conſtancy for their Religion. Now the Roman Catholics anſwered theſe objections in the ſame manner as they were anſwered by the Proteſtant, whom I have quoted. Which ſtill more ſhews how prejudicial this Sect proved to the Proteſtants; ſince they were obliged to confute with reaſons, which the Papiſts retorted againſt them.

But to return to their Martyrs: In the Martyrology of Geneva we find ſome Anabaptiſts. It is to be obſerved, that the Anabaptiſts publiſhed two Martyrologies, the one at Haerlem in 1615; the other at Horn in 1617. Theſe two works made known to the world the diviſions that reigned among the Anabaptiſts. For thoſe of Horn cenſured the Martyrology of thoſe of Haerlem (27), as if they had not dealt fairly in the compiling of that work. This accuſation was returned (28) by thoſe of Haerlem, who taxed the compilers of the Martyrology of Horn with giving room in it to ſome, who had ſubſcribed the confeſſion of the Reformed with regard to our Saviour's incarnation (29). The chief compiler of the Martyrology of Horn was one James Outreman. The Preface of that work is no leſs injurious to Lutherans and Calviniſts, than to the Papiſts; for they are all indifferently taxed with tyranny (30).

(27) In the Preface to the edition of 1626.

(28) The anſwer was publiſhed in Dutch at Haerlem in 1630, and written by Hans Alenſon.

(29) Ottius, Annal. Anabapt. ad annum 1625, num. 6. p. 233.

(30) Id. ibid. ad an. 1626, num. 2. p. 251.

[G] No writer has ſpoke ſo favourably of the Anabaptiſts as George Caſſander.] He ſays, that the Mennonites meant well, but were miſled by a falſe zeal, and not by malice; that they diſapproved the frenzy of thoſe of Munſter, and taught that the Kingdom of Jeſus ought to be founded on the Croſs; and therefore, adds he, they deſerve rather to be pitied and inſtructed, than perſecuted: he applies to them a fine paſſage out of St. Auſtin. *Hujus quem dixi Mennonis, cui nunc hic Theodoricus ſucceſſit, ſectatores fere ſunt omnes, qui per hæc Belgicæ & Germaniæ inferioris loca huic Anabaptiſticæ hæreſi affines deprehenduntur, in quibus magna ex parte pij cujuſdam animi argumenta cernas, qui imperito quodam Zelo incitati, errore potius quam animi malitia, a vero divinarum literarum ſenſu, & concordi totius Eccleſiæ conſenſu deſciverunt, quod ex eo perſpici poteſt, quod Monaſterienſibus, & hinc conſecutis Batenburgicis furoribus, novam quandam reſtitutionem regni Chriſti, quod in deletione impiorum per vim externam poſitum ſit, meditantibus, acerrime ſemper reſtiterunt, & in ſola cruce regni Chriſti inſtaurationem & propagationem conſiſtere docuerunt: quo fit, ut qui hujuſmodi ſunt, commiſeratione potius & emendatione, quam inſectatione & perditione digni videantur. His enim multo magis convenire videtur quod de Manichæis diſputans inquit Auguſtinus . Quanquam dominus per ſervos ſuos regna ſubvertat erroris, ipſos tamen homines, in quantum homines ſunt, emendandos eſſe potius quam perdendos jubet..... Atque utinam qui atrociore in hoſce miſeros ſunt animo, manſuetudinem, & prudentiam hujus ſancti viri imitentur, qui in diſputatione adverſus Manichæos.... his verbis eſt uſus †. Illi, inquit, in vos ſæviant, qui neſciunt cum quo labore verum inveniatur, & quam difficile caveantur errores. Illi in vos ſæviant, qui neſciunt cum quanta difficultate ſanetur oculus interioris hominis, ut poſſit intueri ſolem ſuum. Illi in vos ſæviant, qui neſciunt, quibus ſuſpiriis & gemitibus fiat ut ex quantulacunque parte poſſit intelligi Deus (31). i. e. "Of this Mennon, who "is now ſucceeded here by Theodoric, almoſt all "thoſe are followers, who border upon this Anabaptiſtical hereſy in theſe parts of Holland and the "Lower Germany, in moſt of whom you may diſcover the marks of a pious mind, for being moved by a blind zeal, and by miſtake rather than "malice, have revolted from the true ſenſe of the "Divine books, and unanimous agreement of the "whole church, which may appear from this, that "when thoſe of Munſter and Batenburg were meditating a new kind of reſtitution of the Kingdom "of Chriſt, conſiſting in the deſtruction of the impious by outward force, they ſharply withſtood "them, and taught that the reſtoration and propagation of the reign of Chriſt conſiſted only in the "croſs; wherefore ſuch of theſe ſeem more worthy "of pity and inſtruction, than of perſecution and "deſtruction. For what St. Auguſtin ſays in his "diſpute with the Manicheans ſeems to agree much "better with theſe. Though the Lord ſubverts the "Kingdoms of error by his ſervants, yet he commands men, ſo far as they are men, to be rather "amended than deſtroyed..... And I wiſh thoſe "who have ſevere thoughts againſt theſe poor creatures, would imitate the moderation and prudence "of this holy man, who in his diſpute againſt the "Manicheans..... uſes theſe words. Let thoſe "rage againſt you, ſays he, who know not the labour of finding out the truth of the difficulty of "avoiding errors. Let thoſe rage againſt you, who "know not how difficult it is to heal the eye of the "inner man, that he may behold his ſun. Let thoſe "rage againſt you, who know not with how many "ſighs and groans we arrive at the leaſt part of the "knowledge different times, ſome edicts to be publiſhed againſt them [H]; but nevertheleſs they now enjoy their liberty of conſcience. Mr. van Beuning is ſaid to have diſcourſed one day with Mr. de Turenne upon this ſubject, very ſolidly, and much to the purpoſe [I]. The books that have been publiſhed againſt this ſect, and its tenets, are without number [K]. I muſt not forget to acquaint my readers, that the Swiſs have not been able to

* Contra Epiſtolam Fundamenti.

† Ibid.

(31) Georgius Caſſander, Præfat. Tractatus de Baptiſmo Infantium.

" knowledge of God." Thus he ſpeaks to the Duke of Cleves, to whom he dedicates a book, in which he ſhews, that the baptiſm of children was never contradicted in the primitive church. The unanimous conſent of all Chriſtians, for ſo many Centuries, ſeems to him ſo convincing a proof of a tenet's being handed down to us from the Apoſtles, that he thinks no argument can be produced againſt the Anabaptiſts more home. He knew by experience the force of this argument; for he atteſts, that one of the Anabaptiſt teachers, at that time priſoner in the Caſtle of Cleves, was converted with ſome others of his ſect, as ſoon as he ſaw the immenſe collection of authorities proving the antiquity of this tradition. And this was what induced Caſſander to publiſh his work. He had two conferences with the Anabaptiſts; the firſt at Cologn with one Matthias in 1556; the other with John Kremer, priſoner in the county of Mark in 1558. I have changed the order of the author I quote; for his iterum implies contradiction.

(32) Hoornbeek, Summa Controverſ. p. 394. Georgius Caſſander, ſays he (32), bis cum illis coram diſputavit, de quo inter ejus opera fol. 1227; ſemel cum Johanne Kremer, a. CIↃ IↃ LVIII, captivo in Comitatu Marchiæ; iterum a. CIↃ IↃ LVI, cum Matthia aliquo, Coloniæ.

[H] The Proteſtant Divines oppoſed the Anabaptiſts with great zeal in the United Provinces, and cauſed at different times ſome edicts to be publiſhed againſt them.] They challenged the Anabaptiſts ſeveral times to diſpute with them. The Synod, held at Horn, paſſed an act relating to this matter, and even had recourſe to the authority of the Governor. Eccleſiæ noſtræ ſemper bonum ac utile cenſuerunt, adverſarios ad diſputationem & colloquia provocare. Synodus Hornana a. CIↃ IↃ LXXX, & a. CIↃ IↃ LXXVI, implorata cum in finem Gubernatoris Theod. Sonnoyi auctoritate . . . . decernit provocandum, &c. (33). i. e. " Our churches have always thought it meet to " challenge the adverſaries to diſputes and conferences. The Synod of Horn in 1580 and 1576, " having implored the authority of Theodore Sonnoy " the Governor, ... determined to challenge, &c." which acts were paſſed in three or four other Synods before the end of the ſixteenth Century (34). In 1599 the churches thought fit, a work ſhould be compoſed containing the chief heads of the controſies with the Anabaptiſts. Arminius, Miniſter of Amſterdam, took the writing of it upon himſelf, and ſet about it; but gave it over, while he was Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, and laid before the Synod of Alcmaer in 1605, the reaſons why he could not apply himſelf to that work. The Synod of Enchuyſen in 1624, appointed two Miniſters to examine the tenets of the Mennonites, and diſcuſs the points in controverſy. One of them being left alone in 1626, deſired a new ſecond, and obtained Doreſlaar of the Synod that was held at Amſterdam in 1628. Theſe two ſet about the work in good earneſt, and publiſhed in Dutch an excellent piece in 1637, being a collection of the Anabaptiſtical controverſies, wherein are marked very carefully the many alterations that have been made in that ſect (35). The author, who relates all this, obſerves, that the churches, jointly with the ſecular power, keep a watchful eye over the Anabaptiſts in order to prevent them from increaſing their number, or becoming powerful; they ſtand upon their guard, ſays he, to curb this ſect, in caſe it ſhould ſhoot out in new branches, or extend itſelf beyond its bounds. Pro coercendis aut noviter pullulantibus, aut ſua pomœria extendentibus juxta cum Politicis etiam eccleſiæ vigilant (36). He adds, that the Synods of Frieſland preſs the States of the Province to put in execution, and to renew the edict which was enacted againſt the Anabaptiſts in 1598; and that chiefly in regard of the new aſſemblies, and new places of worſhip, that this ſect has had the boldneſs to ſet up. He ſubjoins, that ſince it plainly appears from the Synod of the Anabaptiſts, held at Haerlem in the month of July 1649, that they had formed new congregations, it is a duty incumbent upon the orthodox Paſtors to find out the proper means to obviate and reſtrain ſuch innovations; the more, becauſe they are impowered thereto by an edict of the year 1651, in which their High Mightineſſes command the ſects to be brought to reaſon, and forbid their ſpreading themſelves. Sectas cohibendas, atque in ordine redigendas, neque permittendum ut in plura loca quam hodie ſint diffundantur (37). i. e. " The ſects are to be reſtrained and " duced to order, and not to be ſuffered to ſpread " into more places than at preſent." In the ſame manner in France ſuch places of worſhip were ſhut up, as the Proteſtants could not make appear they had enjoyed when the edicts were publiſhed. See Voetius's Politica Eccleſiaſtica (38), where he examines, whether this ſect ought to be ſuffered; and though he uſes ſome diſtinctions, yet, generally ſpeaking, inclines to the negative.

(33) Idem, ibid. He tranſpoſes the times, and places the Synod of 1576 after that of 1580.

(34) Idem, ibid.

(35) Id. ibid. p. 395, 396.

(36) Id. ibid. p. 391.

(37) Id. ibid. P. 392.

(38) The 4th book, Part 1. p. 538, & ſeq.

[I] Mr. Van Beuning diſcourſed one day with Mr. de Turenne upon the toleration granted this ſect in Holland.] Mr. de Turenne, being one day with this Ambaſſador in his coach, told him, that he could not approve of the toleration the States General granted to all religions. It is foreign to my purpoſe to relate here Mr. van Beuning's anſwer with regard to the other ſects; therefore I ſhall only make mention of what concerns the Mennonites. " Why ought " they not to be ſuffered? ſaid he; they are the " beſt and the leaſt troubleſome ſet of people in the " world: they aſpire to no employments, nor does " an ambitious man meet with them on his way to " preferment, or is kept back by their competition " and intrigues. It were to be wiſhed, that one half " of mankind made a conſcience merely to think of " promotion; for in that caſe the other half would be " preferred without taking ſo much trouble, or em- " ploying ſuch crafty, baſe, and unlawful means as " they generally uſe. We are not afraid they ſhould " revolt, for one of the articles of their belief is, " that they ought never to bear arms. How eaſy " muſt a Prince be in his mind, while he reflects, " that ſuch a tenet will prevent his ſubjects from " revolting, let the taxes and impoſitions be ever " ſo heavy? The Mennonites pay their quota of all " charges of the State, and that is ſufficient; for it " enables us to raiſe troops, which do us better ſer- " vice than they could do, though they bore arms. " We are edified at the ſimplicity of their manners. " They are both artificers and traders, neither do " they ſquander their eſtates or gains in luxury and " riotous living. It does not happen ſo to thoſe of " other Sects, whoſe debauched lives joined to the " expences they are put to by their vanity, occaſion " perpetual ſcandals, and weaken conſiderably the " State. But they take no oaths: a matter of great " moment indeed. What prejudice do the Tribunals " receive from that, ſince they hold themſelves to be " as ſtraitly bound by their promiſe, to ſpeak the " truth, as if they had taken an oath? The whole " virtue of an oath conſiſts in this, viz. that a Man, " who acts againſt it, fears a more ſevere puniſhment " from God, expoſes himſelf to infamy, and is liable " to be puniſhed by the Magiſtrates. Now the Men- " nonites fear the ſame dangers, in caſe they ſhould " lie after they have promiſed to tell the truth, and, " of courſe, are under the ſame ties as other men."

[K] The books which have been publiſhed againſt this Sect, and its tenets are without number.] I have mentioned ſome of them in the remark [C]. Here follow ſome others. Hermannus Modeus wrote a book De Initiis Sectæ Anabaptiſticæ. Andreas Meſhovius publiſhed in Latin the Hiſtory of the Anabaptiſts. An anonymous writer compoſed in Dutch, the Anabaptiſtical Succeſſion, which was printed at Cologn in 1603. Another work in Dutch was publiſhed in 1605, De origine & progreſſu Sectarum inter Anabaptiſtas. Mr. Ottius, Profeſſor at Zurich, wrote in Latin the Annals of this Sect down to the year 1671.

All

to root them out, though they have frequently proceeded againſt them with ſeverity (f). I ſhall alledge ſome of the reaſons that are produced to juſtify their ſeverity [L]. As the chief tenets of the modern Anabaptiſts are ſet down in the Dutch edition of Moreri's Dictionary, I ſhall not touch upon them here. It is certain, the character

(f) See Stoupp, Relig. des Holland, Letter IV. p. 100, & ſeq. But rather the Annales Anabap. by John Henry Ottius, printed at Baſil 1672.

Moreri

All theſe books are mentioned either by Hoornbeek (39), by Micrælius (40), or by Spanheim (41). I do not find they ſpeak of a book, which Caſſander deſcribes in the following words. De origine vero hujus Anabaptiſticæ Sectæ, ejuſque progreſſu, & quæ ex hoc capite monſtra, quam varia & abſurda, atque inter ſe pugnantia, prodierunt, luculente, copioſe, ſummaque cum fide ſcripſit Nicolaus Bleſdick, qui quod aliquando hujuſmodi errore per imperitiam ætatis deceptus fuerit, eo nunc inſtructior & vehementior eſt in iis erroribus refellendis, id quod illi cum B. Auguſtino commune eſt (42). i. e. "The origin of this ſect "of Anabaptiſts, and its progreſs, and the various "and abſurd monſters that have riſen from this head, "which are contrary to each other, have been clearly "copiouſly and faithfully delivered by Nicolaus Bleſ- "dick, who having formerly thro' the unskilfulneſs "of youth been led into thoſe errors, is now the "more qualified and zealous againſt them, as happened "to St. Auguſtin." Hoornbeek ſpeaks only of an Hiſtory of David George, written by Nicholas Bleſdick, ſon-in-law to this David, and publiſhed by Revius (43). One Hiſtory of the Anabaptiſts was publiſhed in French at Amſterdam in 1695, and another more copious in 1700. Thoſe, who have written againſt them, are Zuinglius, Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, Oecolampadius, Urbanus Regius, Juſtus Menius, Bullingerus, John Laſcus, Guy de Bres, Taffin, Hunnius, Oſiander, Cloppenbourg, Spanheim, and many others, whom it would be too long to enumerate (44). However I muſt not omit the book entitled Babel, publiſhed in 1621 by Hermannus Faukelius, Miniſter of Middlebourg, and one of the Fathers of the Synod of Dort. In this work he ſhews the monſtrous variety of opinions that reigns among the Anabaptiſts; who anſwered it by publiſhing their Confeſſion of faith at Amſterdam 1624, and retorting his arguments in a book entitled The Babel of Pedobaptiſts (45). The Author of this piece was one Anthony Jacob (46). At firſt the Anabaptiſts wrote very few books; but afterwards had ſeveral Authors, and have publiſhed a great many books, partly didactic or hiſtorical, and partly polemical. They publiſhed at Horn, in 1624, a Confeſſion of faith, which they confirmed with ſeveral paſſages of the Scripture, and other authorities. Twelve years after they publiſhed another (47), ſhewing how well they agreed in their tenets. They have publiſhed Apologies of their confeſſion of Faith, Catechiſms, and Manuals. In 1644 they anſwered the Manifeſto of Zurich. The ſame year Abraham David, one of their communion (48), publiſhed a book againſt a Miniſter of Haerlem, called Bontemps, under this title, Smegma Hollandicum contra maculas quas P. Bontemps Mennonitis aſperſit. Several other pieces were publiſhed againſt the ſame Miniſter, viz. Abſterſio accuſationum gravium Petri Bontemps, facta per P. V. K. 1643: Confutatio argumentorum quibus Petrus Bontemps probare conatur Anabaptiſtas injurios eſſe in Deum & homines, 1643: Spongia ad abluendas maculas Petri Bontemps contra certam Anabaptiſtarum ſectam: Jadoci Henrici Lixivium contra ejuſdem maculas: Probatio Lixivii D. Bontemps ubi per G. V. V. fidei potiſſimum authoris & methodus agendi ſollicitatur (49).

(39) In ſumma Controverſiarum.
(40) In Syntagmate Hiſtor. Eccleſ.
(41) In Elencho Controverſiar.
(42) Georg. Caſſander, Epiſt. Dedicator. Tractatus de Baptiſmo Infantium.
(43) Hoornbeek, Summa Controverſiarum, pag. 373.
(44) Idem, ibid. p. 394, and John Vaget, in the theſis he defended at Wittemburg in 1688, de Secta Mennonitarum.
(45) That is of thoſe who baptiſe infants.
(46) A Miniſter among the Anabaptiſts, and Phyſician at Amſterdam.
(47) At Dort.
(48) He uſed, inſtead of his name, theſe three letters G. V. V. that is, Gerard Vryburg. Hottingeri Biblioth. Theolog. lib. 3. cap. 5. p. 420, 421.
(49) Idem, ibid.

[L] I ſhall alledge ſome of the reaſons that are produced to juſtify their ſeverity.] I ſhall inſert here the contents of a Letter, from Mr. Breitinger, Dean of the Church of Zurich, to Mr. Hotton Miniſter of the Walloon Church at Amſterdam, dated the 21ſt of Auguſt 1642. A war breaking out in moſt parts of Europe in 1622, the Magiſtrates of Zurich, commanded, as it had been ever practiſed on like occaſions, the inhabitants of that Canton, to accuſtom themſelves to the military exerciſe, by frequent muſters. The Anabaptiſts refuſed to comply with this order, and laid before thoſe, who were ready to obey, that war was to be looked upon as a puniſhment from heaven, and that States were to be defended by a good life, and not by arms. They inſinuated, that they were ready to abandon their country, wives, children, and whatever they had in the world, rather than to repulſe the common enemy with arms. This provoked the loyal ſubjects of the Republic to ſuch a degree, that they were for exterminating that Sect. But the Magiſtrates found out a more mild expedient. They charged the moſt prudent and wiſe men of the Senate to confer with the Divines of moſt moderation, in order to ſettle with them the meaſures that were proper on that juncture. This Committee, after imploring the prayers of the whole Church, came to this reſolution; that they ſhould leave no means untried to cure the Anabaptiſts of their ill-grounded ſcruples; that they ſhould put none of them to death, or condemn them to the galleys, or take any other courſe with them, that ſavoured of cruelty, precipitation, or paſſion. After this it was thought proper to confer with them; and accordingly three places were appointed for them to aſſemble in, and hear the propoſals of the Committee. They came according to the appointment; and the chief articles of the Chriſtian belief being propoſed to them both viva voce and in writing, they admitted them all, except that touching the power of Magiſtrates. The Senate being informed of what paſſed in theſe Aſſemblies, commanded ſome of their Heads to be ſent for, who appeared, and produced their reaſons, which were anſwered with great ſedateneſs; and tho' this could not in the leaſt prevail upon them, yet they were diſmiſſed very graciouſly. In retiring they ſeemed to be afraid of ſome trick, which they owned the next day, when they were asked, why they had behaved themſelves ſo as to make believe they diſtruſted the ſafe conduct the Government had ſent them. Many were highly offended at this mild proceeding of the Magiſtrates; but however it was reſolved to try anew whether they could be prevailed upon by fair means. The leading men among the Anabaptiſts were therefore convened, and aſſured, that they ſhould not be forced to take any oath after the uſual manner, but only to anſwer yes or no; that they ſhould be exempted from bearing of arms, provided they would concur with their prayers, and other religious means, to promote the good of the public; and that by obliging them to attend the Sermons of the Miniſters, it was no ways intended they ſhould not be at full liberty to diſapprove what they thought not to be agreeable to the word of God, provided they would firſt adviſe with ſome of their Paſtors, or any other Eccleſiaſtic. The Speech was cloſed with promiſes of protection and pathetical exhortations. But as all this made no impreſſion upon their minds, they were deſired to retire elſewhere, allowed to carry along with them what was neceſſary for their maintenance, and aſſured they ſhould be reſtored to the full poſſeſſion of their eſtates, when, cured of their errors, they ſhould be willing to return home. At the ſame time their wives and children were given to underſtand, that ſuch of them, as were inclined rather to renounce their errors than abandon their country, ſhould enjoy a reaſonable allowance out of their fathers and husbands eſtates. The Anabaptiſts anſwered, that the earth belonged to God, and not to the Magiſtrates, and rejected theſe conditions. Upon this the Magiſtrates had recourſe to taxes and fines, and at laſt, becauſe the Anabaptiſts refuſed to pay them, exclaiming againſt ſuch proceedings as tyrannical, their whole eſtates were confiſcated. They complained then more loudly than ever, and uſed to aſſemble in the night time to implore from heaven the plague, famine, and other public calamities againſt their perſecutors. This obliged the Magiſtrates to recur to a more violent remedy, and impriſon great numbers of them; but moſt part of them eſcaped (50) by a breach they made in the wall, and continued to raiſe the ſame diſturbances as formerly. They were again put in priſon, and frequently exhorted either to renounce their errors, or retire out of the country of their own accord; but to no purpoſe, for they could not be brought to any terms, and merely inſiſted on their being ſet at liberty. 'Tis true they

(50) On Eaſte Monday 1636.

Moreri gives of them, was not a true one at the time he wrote, and perhaps they never held the two tenets he lays to their charge [M], viz. that a woman is obliged to indulge, when desired, the passion of every man that lusts after her; and that they disapprove the marriages of all those who are not of their persuasion. Some Authors tell us, that several Roman Catholicks, by turning Anabaptists, acquired such a knowledge, that they could read, and discourse on matters of religion; and that upon their returning to Popery, they found themselves as illiterate as they had been when they left it (g). But this must be counted among the fables.

(g) Zindanus Dial. 3. Dubitandi, & Thyræus, lib. de Demoniacis, cap. 21. apud Theophil. Raynaudum, Theologiæ Natur. Dist. IV. num. 330. P. 404.

offered to give an account of their doctrine before the people; but that was refused, and instead of it, a dispute proposed in writing, and even the points marked upon which they were to dispute. But they answered, that they could not defend their cause while they were under confinement. 'Tis to be observed, that such of the Anabaptists as made their escape made every where most bitter complaints, as tho' their prisoners had been treated most inhumanly (51).

(51) From a letter of John James Breitinger dated the 21st of August 1642, and inserted in the Annales Anabaptistici of John Henry Ottius, p. 288, & seq.

This Apology runs upon the long patience which preceded the severity that was afterwards used. But here follow some more particular reasons taken from the nature of the government of that country. The Swiss keep no auxiliary forces in pay, but, when occasion requires, bear arms themselves; and besides, their allowing foreign Princes to levy troops in their country, is one of the chief branches of their revenue. It is therefore a matter of great consequence to their Sovereigns, that they should all be fit to bear arms, and like that profession. And this is the reason that the tenets of the Anabaptists do not square with their form of government; for the Anabaptists are averse from wounding or killing, and terrify, as far as lays in their power, even the most warlike, by raising scruples upon the shedding of human blood, and such passions as inseparably attend a military life.

[M] It is certain, that the character Moreri gives of this Sect was not a true one at the time he wrote in.] Moreri had read in Prateolus, that, according to the Anabaptists, every woman is obliged to indulge the inclinations of a man, and every man the inclinations of a woman, whenever required. Dicunt postremo quamlibet mulierem obligatam esse ad coeundum cum quolibet viro eam petente; & contra eodem vinculo adstringunt omnem virum ad tantundem reddendum cuilibet mulieri hoc ab illo petenti (52). According to this there ought to be a natural marriage between all men and women, that is, every man would be bound in duty, and under pain of committing a crime, to satisfy every woman, and every woman to comply with the desire of every man, whenever required. The obligations exposed by St. Paul (53), viz. that the husband has not the power of his own body, but ought to look upon it as made over to his spouse; and, in the same manner, that she ought to count the power of her body as lodged in her husband: these obligations, I say, which are very just and reasonable in a marriage between one man and one woman, would extend to each man with regard to all the women in the world, and to each woman with respect to all the men: which is such an absurd, base, and detestable a tenet, that one can scarcely be persuaded that any sect of the Anabaptists ever held such an opinion. In this case it would be a much harder matter to observe the laws of nature, than those of the Gospel; and we might renew, with great reason, the ancient complaint: It is a yoke, which neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear. In one word, this can be no law of nature, which cannot lay upon us any obligation we cannot comply with (54). Beauty and tenderness of conscience, joined together under such a law, would be a burden sufficient to oppress, in very short time, the most vigorous and robust. Such persons, as were the most beautiful and conscientious, would have most occasion to complain. It may be observed, that the community of wives is not, by many degrees, so abominable, for it allows one the liberty of refusing, and does not oblige him in conscience to indulge every one.

(52) Prateolus in Elencho Hæreseon, lib. 1. pag. 27.

(53) 1 Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. vii. ver. 4.

(54) Impossibilia nemo tenetur.

Perhaps it would not be an ill-grounded conjecture, to say that those, who compiled the Catalogues of Heresies, and Prateolus's Originals, forged this story by putting a bad construction, thro' malice or ignorance, on one of the consequences that were inferred from the doctrine relating to the equality of conditions. For it is certain that the Anabaptists held at first this equality; from whence it naturally followed, that a young woman of a good family could not refuse to marry the son of a peasant, nor a Gentleman the daughter of a peasant, if she desired to have him for her husband. If our Compilers of Catalogues have raised upon such a foundation the absurd doctrine they impute to the Anabaptists, are they not to be as much exploded as the doctrine itself?

Neither am I persuaded, that these Sectaries looked upon the marriages of other Christians as unlawful, and made no distinction between illegitimate children, and those that were born in wedlock; for instance, that Calvin's birth was defiled with the same impurity as that of Erasmus. But Moreri look'd not so narrowly into matters, and provided he could but defame the heretics, nothing came amiss to him.

☞ANACHARSIS, a famous Philosopher, was born in Scythia. He was brother to Cadovides King of Scythia, and the son of Gnurus by a Greek woman, which gave him the opportunity of learning both languages to perfection (a). Soficrates, according to Laertius affirmed, that he came to Athens in the forty seventh Olympiad under Eucrates the Archon. And Hermippus (b) tells us, that as soon as he arrived there, he went to Solon's house, and knocked at his door, and bid the servant, who opened it, go and tell his master, that Anacharsis was there, and was come on purpose to see him, and continue with him for some time. Solon returned him an answer, that it was better to contract friendship at home. Anacharsis went in upon this, and said to Solon, that since he was then in his own country and in his own house, it was his duty to entertain him as his guest, and therefore he desired him to enter into an intimate friendship with him. Solon, surprized at the vivacity of his repartee, immediately engaged in a friendship with him, which lasted as long as they lived. Solon instructed him in the best disciplines, recommended him to the favour of the noblest persons, and sought all means of giving him respect and honour. Anacharsis was kindly received by every one for his sake, and, as Theoxenus attests, was the only stranger, whom they incorporated into their city. We have a great many beautiful apothegms and expressions related of this Philosopher [A]. He was a man of a very quick and lively genius, and

(a) Diogenes Laertius in Vitâ Anacharsis.

(b) Apud eumd. ibid.

[A] We have a great many beautiful apothegms and expressions related of this Philosopher.] Diogenes Laertius has given us a collection of them in his Life of Anacharsis, to which we shall add several from other writers. He used commonly to say, that the vine produced three sorts of grapes, the first of pleasure and of a ſtrong and maſterly eloquence, and was reſolute in whatever he undertook. He conſtantly wore a coarſe double garment. He was very temperate (c), and his diet was nothing but milk and cheeſe (d). His ſpeeches were delivered in a conciſe and pathetic ſtyle, and as he was inflexible in the purſuit of his point, he never failed to gain it; ſo that his reſolute and eloquent manner of ſpeaking paſſed into a proverb; and thoſe who imitated him were ſaid to ſpeak in the Scythian phraſe (e). He was extremely fond of poetry, and wrote the laws of the Scythians, and of thoſe things which he had obſerved among the Greeks, with regard to frugal of life, and a Poem of 900 verſes upon war (f). Crœſus having heard of his reputation, ſent to offer him money, and to deſire him to come to ſee him at Sardis; but the Philoſopher anſwered, that he was come to Greece in order to learn the language, manners and laws of that country; that he had no occaſion for gold or ſilver, but that it would be ſufficient for him to return to Scythia a better man and more intelligent than when he came from thence. He told the King however, that he would take an opportunity of ſeeing him, ſince he had a ſtrong deſire of being ranked in the number of his friends (g). After he had continued a long while in Greece, he prepared to return home. In paſſing through Cyricum, he found the people of that city celebrating in a very ſolemn manner the feaſt of the Mother of the Gods. Upon this he made a vow to that Goddeſs, that he would perform the ſame ſacrifices, and eſtabliſh the ſame feaſt in honour of her in his own country, if he ſhould return thither in ſafety. Upon his arrival in Scythia he attempted to change the ancient cuſtoms of that country, and to eſtabliſh thoſe of Greece. But this prov'd extremely diſpleaſing to the Scythians, and fatal to himſelf. As he had one day entered into a thick wood called Hylæa, in order to accompliſh his vow to Cybele in the moſt ſecret manner poſſible, and was performing the whole ceremony with a drum in his hand before an image of that Goddeſs, he was diſcovered by a Scythian, who went and informed King Saulius of it. The King came immediately, and ſurpriſed Anacharſis in the midſt of the ſolemnity, and ſhot him dead with an arrow (b). Laertius tells us (i), that he was killed by his brother with an (d) Abregè des Vies des Anciens Philoſophes, par M. De Fenelon, Archevêque de Cambray, (as it is ſaid in the preface) Paris 8vo, 1726. p. 133, 134.

(c) Plutarch, in Convivio ſeptem Sapientum.

(e) Diogen. Laert. ubi ſupra.

(f) Idem, ibid. The author of the Abregè des Vies, &c. ſays, that he wrote the piece concerning the laws of the Scythians in verſe, which I do not find aſſerted by Laertius.

(g) Laert. ubi ſupra.

(b) Herodot. lib. 14.

(i) Ubi ſupra, pleaſure, the ſecond of drunkenneſs, and the third of repentance. He expreſſed his ſurprize, that in all the public Aſſemblies at Athens, wiſe men ſhould propound buſineſs, and fools determine it. He could not comprehend the reaſon why thoſe were puniſhed, who abuſed others with their tongue, and yet great rewards were given to the wreſtlers, who treated one another with the utmoſt fury and barbarity. He was no leſs aſtoniſhed that the Greeks at the beginning of their banquets ſhould make uſe of glaſſes, which were of a moderate ſize, and yet ſhould call for very large ones at the cloſe of the feaſt, when they had drunk ſufficiently. He could by no means approve of the liberties which every perſon thought were allowable in banquets. Being ask'd one day what method was to be taken in order to prevent one from ever drinking wine, he replied, There is no better means than to view a drunken man with all his extravagance of behaviour, and to reflect upon this at one's leiſure. Some perſon having enquired whether there were any inſtruments of muſic in Scythia, he anſwered, that there were not even vines there (1). He called the oil, which the wreſtlers made uſe of to anoint their limbs, the preparation of the moſt extravagant madneſs. As he was one day conſidering the thickneſs of the planks of a ſhip, he cried out, Alas! thoſe, who go to ſea, are but four inches diſtant from death. Being asked what was the moſt ſecure ſhip, he replied, That, which is arrived in the port. He very often repeated it, that every man ſhould take a particular care to make himſelf Maſter of his tongue and his belly. He had always when he ſlept his right hand upon his mouth, to ſhew that there is nothing, which we ought to be ſo cautious of as the tongue. An Athenian reproaching him one day with being a Scythian, he replied, My country is a diſgrace to me; but you are a diſgrace to your country. Being asked what was the beſt and what the worſt part of a man, he anſwered, The tongue. It is much better, ſaid he, to have but one friend, if he be but faithful to us, than a great number, who are always ready to follow the change of fortune. When he was asked, whether there were more perſons living than dead, he anſwered, In which number do ye rank thoſe, who are at ſea? He uſed to ſay, that the Forum was a place, which men had eſtabliſhed in order to impoſe upon each other. As he was one day paſſing thro' a ſtreet, an impertinent young fellow offered ſome inſult to him; Anacharſis look'd upon him, and ſaid to him in a cool manner; Young man, if you cannot bear wine in your youth, you will not be able to bear water, when you are old. He uſed to compare laws to ſpider-webs; and to ridicule Solon, who pretended to reſtrain the paſſions of mankind by pieces of writing. Going one day to conſult the Prieſteſs of Apollo, whether there was any man wiſer than himſelf, the Oracle replied, that there was one Miſo of Chenes. Anacharſis was prodigiouſly ſurprized, that he had never heard any mention of him; and went to him in the village, whither he was retired. He found him mending his waggon, and ſaid to him, Miſo, there is no time now for you to till the earth. Yes, ſays Miſo, it is time to mend one's waggon, when any thing is broken in it. This Miſo was rank'd among the wiſe Men by Plato; he had retired from the world into a ſolitude, where he ſpent the reſt of his life without any converſation with mankind, having a natural averſion to them in general. He had one day hid himſelf in a corner, where he laughed as loud as he could poſſibly; but ſome body coming up to him, and asking him the reaſon of his laughter, ſince there was no body with him; he replied, that this was the very reaſon of his mirth (2). Anacharſis being demanded by Ardalus, whether there were Gods among the Scythians, he replied, Yes, and that they underſtood all languages (3). He affirmed, that the moſt remarkable thing he had ſeen among the Grecians, was this, that they left the ſmoak upon the mountains, and carried the wood into their cities. Being demanded what in man is both good and bad, he anſwered the tongue. He affirm'd, that it is better to have one friend worth much, than many worth nothing. He ſaid the Greeks made no other uſe of money but to account with it (4). He obſerved, that the Prince, who is wiſe, is happy (5); and that that city is beſt, wherein, all things elſe being equal, virtue hath the better condition, vice the worſe. To one, who, as they were drinking, ſaid, looking upon his wife, Anacharſis, you have married one, who is not handſome; I am, anſwered he, of that opinion too; but I put leſs water in my wine, that I may make her handſome (6). Giving an account of the qualities of the vine to the King of Scythia, and ſhewing him ſome ſlips of it, he added, And by this time it would have reached into Scythia, if the Greeks did not every year cut off its branches (7). At a feaſt ſuch being ſent for as might procure mirth, he alone ſmiled not. Afterwards an ape being brought in, he laughed, ſaying, that this beaſt is ridiculous by nature, man by art and ſtudy (8). He ſaid, that to him all Grecians were Scythians.

(1) See Plutarch. in Convivio ſeptem Sapientum; and Strabo, lib. 15.

(2) Abregè des Vies des Anciens Philoſophes, pag. 139, 140.

(3) Plutarch. Conviv. ſept. Sapient.

(4) Plutarch. de Profect. Virtut. Sent.

(5) Idem, Conviv. ſept. Sap.

(6) Stob. Serm. 16.

(7) Athen. Deipnoſ. l. 10.

(8) Idem, ibid.

an arrow as he was hunting, and that he expired with theſe words; "I lived in "peace and ſafety in Greece, whither I went to inform my ſelf of the language "and manners of the country; and envy has here deſtroyed me in my own native "country." A great many ſtatues were erected to him after his death. Herodotus mentions ſome particulars relating to him [B]. He is ſaid to have invented Tinder (k), the Anchor, and the Potters Wheel (l). But this latter is clearly evinced by Strabo (m) to be falſe, becauſe it is mentioned by Homer, who lived long before him, Anacharſis flouriſhing in the time of Crœſus. We have an Epigram of Diogenes Laertius upon him [C].

(k) Strabo, l. 7. (l) Laert. ubi ſupra. (m) Ubi ſupra.

[B] Herodotus mentions ſome particulars relating to him.] He tells us (9), that the Scythians denied that they knew any thing of him; which might be occaſioned by his travels into Greece, and his following of foreign cuſtoms. But the Hiſtorian tells us, that he had heard of Symnes, the Tutor of Spargapithes, that he was uncle to Indathyrſus King of Scythia, the ſon of Gnurus, grandſon of Lycus, and great-grandſon of Spargapithes. So that if Anacharſis was of this family, it is certain that he was killed by his brother; for Indathyrſus was the ſon of Saulius, who killed him. Herodotus likewiſe informs us (10), that he had heard the Peloponneſians ſay, that Anacharſis was ſent by the King of Scythia, into foreign countries, and became a diſciple of the Greeks, and that upon his return, he told the King, who ſent him, that all the Greeks were converſant in all kinds of knowledge, except the Lacedæmonians, who ſtudied nothing but the method of giving and receiving with prudence. But the Hiſtorian obſerves, that the latter part of this account was an invention of the Greeks.

(9) Lib. 4.

(10) Ibid.

[C] An Epigram of Laertius upon him.]

Ἐς Σκυθίην Ἀνάχαρσις ὅτ' ἦλυθε πολλὰ μογήσας
Πάντας ἔπειθε βιοῦν ἤθεσιν Ἑλλαδίκοις.
Τόνδ' ἔτι μῦθον ἄκραντον ἐπὶ τοξεύτῃσιν ἔχονται,
Πλησὶς ἐς ἀθανάτους ἧρπασεν ὠκα δόναξ.

That is,

"From travel Anacharſis came at laſt,
"And Scythia in a Grecian mould would caſt:
"Whilſt he was teaching how, by the ſurprize
"Of a wing'd arrow carried to the ſkies."

Stanley.

T.

ANACREON, a Greek Poet, born at Teos, a city of Ionia (A), flouriſhed during the reign of Polycrates at Samos [B], and whilſt Hipparchus enjoyed at Athens the authority, which his father Piſiſtratus had uſurped. This is what cannot be called in queſtion, if we recur to the works of Plato and Herodotus; in which we read, that Hipparchus called Anacreon to Athens (a) [C], and that Anacreon was in Polycrates's room, while he gave audience to an Envoy of Oretes Governor of Sardes

(a) Plato in Hipparcho. Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 2.

[A] Born at Teos, a city of Ionia.] In the article TEOS I refute thoſe who affirm that Anacreon was a native of Teium on the Euxin ſea.

[B] He flouriſhed during the reign of Polycrates at Samos.] I have not marked the Olympiad, becauſe in ſpeaking of a man, who lived to the age of eighty five years, we ought not, methinks, to confine ourſelves within ſo narrow bounds, and thoſe, who have done ſo, differ widely from one another. Euſebius choſe the 62d Olympiad (1); but nevertheleſs Suidas preferred the 52d, and Mr. le Fevre of Saumur the 72d (2). But as to Suidas, he is by no means to be depended upon, it being plain, that the text is altered; and thoſe who tranſlated his works are not to be pardoned for having let paſs uncorrected a moſt notorious miſtake we find in them, viz. that Anacreon lived in the time of Polycrates, Tyrant of Samos, in the 52d Olympiad; or, according to others, in the time of Cyrus and Cambyſes, in the 25th Olympiad. Polycrates and Cambyſes died about the ſame time, as appears from Herodotus (3). Euſebius ſuppoſes, and with a great deal of reaſon, that they both lived at the ſame time, and in the 63d Olympiad; it is not therefore neceſſary to put twenty ſeven Olympiads between them, nor to tranſfer Cyrus from the 55th Olympiad, which is generally taken to be the epoch of the Perſian Monarchy, to the 25th. Voſſius makes Suidas ſay, that Anacreon flouriſhed in the 61ſt or 62d Olympiad (4); but in the printed Suidas we find no ſuch thing. As to Mr. le Fevre, who places Anacreon in the 72d Olympiad; it is an eaſier task to ſhew the inſufficiency of his proofs, than to make appear, that Anacreon did not really live in that time. Mr. le Fevre reaſons thus: Anacreon came to Athens in the time of Hipparchus: Hipparchus had a brother named Hippias, who put Darius, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, on the expedition he undertook againſt Athens. If ſo, ſays he, it is plain, that this happened in the year 489 before the birth of Chriſt, and in the 72d Olympiad. I own, that the expedition of the Perſians againſt Athens, which is mentioned here, but was not carried on by Darius in perſon, as Mr. le Fevre ſeems to inſinuate, happen'd in the 72d Olympiad, and four hundred eighty nine years before the birth of Chriſt (5); but it is to be obſerved, that Darius went to Athens twenty years after Hippias had been driven out of that city (6), and that he was baniſhed the fourth year after the death of Hipparchus, and the eighteenth after that of Piſiſtratus, from whence we may conclude, that Hipparchus reigned fourteen or fifteen years. It is therefore very likely, I, that Hipparchus invited Anacreon to Athens thirty years before Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, hearkened to the ſuggeſtions of Hippias againſt the Athenians; II, that Anacreon died ſome years before the 72d Olympiad, and the year 489 before the Chriſtian Æra, which Mr. le Fevre ſuppoſes to be the preciſe time in which Anacreon flouriſhed. Here follows another obſervation. Le Fevre wrote the Lives of the Greek Poets in 1659 (7). Now in Anacreon's Life, printed in 1660, he tells us, that this Poet flouriſhed five hundred fifty five years before the birth of Chriſt, or thereabout, and grants, that he might have lived in the 52d Olympiad, as is aſſerted by Suidas; for he was, ſays he, an intimate friend of Polycrates, who flouriſhed at the time that Amaſis reigned in Egypt. Mr. le Fevre then has been a little too wavering in his opinion about the time of Anacreon. No body can ſay, without being miſtaken, that one, who might have lived in the 52d Olympiad, flouriſhed preciſely in the 72d. Beſides, from one's being a friend of Polycrates contemporary to Amaſis, we cannot well infer, that he might have lived in the 52d Olympiad; for Amaſis died in the end of the 64th Olympiad, and Polycrates two years after (8).

(1) Calviſius makes him ſay, that Anacreon flouriſhed in the 25th Olympiad, which I don't find in Scaliger's Euſebius.

(2) In the Lives of the Greek Poets.

(3) Herod. l. 3. c 120, & ſeq.

(4) Voſſius, de Poetis Græcis, p. 22. Hofman has copied it from him; but Moreri, who has done the ſame, puts 60 inſtead of 61.

(5) See Calviſius.

(6) Petavii Rationarium Temporum, Part 1. l. 3. cap. 2, & Part 2. l. 3. cap. 9.

(7) See the end of his Preface.

(8) See Calviſius.

[C] Hipparchus called Anacreon to Athens.] I do not intend to cenſure Mr. le Fevre for ſaying, that Hipparchus, ſon to Piſiſtratus (9), ſent a veſſel with fifty oars to Teos, entreating Anacreon with a very obliging letter to paſs the Egean ſea and come to Athens; and aſſuring him that he would find there many admirers, who were capable of diſcerning the beauties of a fine compoſition, and the merit of great men: I do not intend, I ſay, to cenſure that, neither becauſe I find nothing in Plato, but what follows, Ἐπ' Ἀνακρέοντα τὸν Τήϊον πενηκοντόρου στεῖλας ἀκόμισεν εἰς τὴν πόλιν (10). i. e. "He ſent a veſſel with fifty oars to bring "Anacreon, a native of Teos, to our city:" nor becauſe Ælian ſpeaks in the ſame general terms (11): for Mr. le Fevre might have found ſuch particulars in

(9) Moreri and Hofman ſay Piſiſtratus.

(10) Plato in Hipparcho.

(11) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 2.

Sardes (b) [D]. Cambyſes was then King of Perſia; which I take notice of, in order to inform my readers about what time Anacreon flouriſhed. This Poet had a delicate wit, as we may judge from the inexpreſſible beauties and graces that ſhine in his works; but he was too fond of pleaſures, and of ſuch an amorous temper, that he wanted both boys and girls [E]; and beſides was given to drink. This laſt fault muſt have made him very remarkable at Athens, ſince his ſtatue there repreſented him as one that was drunk and ſinging (c). If all his Poems were extant, we ſhould find in them a vaſt many ſtrokes of his voluptuous humour [F], which however appears pretty plain in the few that have reached us, as well as his violent paſſion for Bathyllus [G]. If he is not worthy of that abhorrence which a Chriſtian Poet would well deſerve in the like caſe, becauſe that kind of love was not then branded with infamy, as it is in Chriſtian countries, the wickedneſs of the age he lived in muſt ſuffer for him. I mean, that every reader ought to wreak upon thoſe times the indignation he does not vent on each particular man. Anacreon, notwithſtanding his debaucheries, lived to the age of eighty five, if we give credit to Lucian, who places him among the long-lived. We are told, that in his old age he lived upon dry grapes, and that he was choaked by a grape ſtone which ſtuck in his throat. Valerius Maximus aſcribes ſuch an eaſy death to a particular favour of the Gods [H]. No one, to my knowledge, has recorded the place, or time of his death [I], in books, which I am not acquainted with; and beſides, it is probable, that Hipparchus either wrote himſelf, or commanded ſome one elſe to write an obliging letter to Anacreon; ſo that we may admit what Mr. le Fevre is pleaſed to ſuppoſe; the more, becauſe, generally ſpeaking, an account becomes too empty and diſagreeable, when the tranſlator confines himſelf to a verbal tranſlation of the original. But what I cannot help cenſuring is, that Mr. le Fevre ſhould quote Plato.

(b) Herod. l. 3. cap. 121. See alſo Pauſanias, lib. 1. pag. 2.

(c) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 23.

[D] Anacreon was in Polycrates's room, while he gave audience to an Envoy of Sardes.] This is all we read in Herodotus: however I am confident that Mr. le Fevre had ſufficient grounds to ſay, that Polycrates, Tyrant of Samos, kept Anacreon always near his perſon, and that he ſhared with him both his buſineſs and pleaſures; for it being on one hand certain that Anacreon was in great favour with Polycrates (13); and on the other, that the main buſineſs of that Tyrant was to take all the diverſions he could, we run no great risk in believing what Mr. le Fevre tells us. You well know it, adds he, for two years are not paſſed yet ſince Herodotus was read at your father's table. This is what I do not take Mr. le Fevre to be very exact in, ſince there is nothing in Herodotus, from whence one can infer, with any probability, that Polycrates ſhared his buſineſs with Anacreon. I am ſorry to find, that men of great parts and learning have believed, without examining into the matter, that Plato and Herodotus really ſaid what this learned Critic makes them ſay. They ought to have made ſome difference between the text, and Mr. le Fevre's flouriſhes.

(13) Athen. lib. 12. cap. 9, 10.

[E] He was of ſo amorous a temper that he wanted both boys and girls.] Beſides Bathyllus and Smerdias, of whom hereafter (14), he was in love with the beautiful Cleobulus, whom he was near killing in his nurſe's arms, by running againſt him one day that he had drank pretty heartily; neither was he ſatisfied with that, but began to rail at the child (15). Upon this the nurſe wiſhed, he might one day praiſe him as much as he then found fault with him. Cleobulus became a beauty, and Anacreon, falling in love with him, made a great many verſes in his praiſe (16). This was a condign puniſhment, and a proper revenge for a nurſe.

(14) In Remark [G].

(15) Maximus Tyrius, Orat. 11. circa initium.

(16) Dio Chryſoſtomus relates ſome of them.

[F] Were all his Poems extant, we ſhould find in them a vaſt many ſtrokes of his voluptuous humour.] Here follow ſome paſſages pick'd out among a great many others, in which mention is made of the ſubject of his Poems. Ἄτοπος ὁ Ἀνακρέων ὁ πᾶσαν αὐτοῦ τὴν ποίησιν ἐξαρτήσας μέθης (17). i. e. "Anacreon was "abſurd, who interwove all his Poems with drunkenneſs." Ἀνακρέων ὁ Τήϊος πρῶτος μετὰ Σαλφὼ τὴν Λεσβίαν τὰ πολλὰ ὧν ἔγραψεν ἐρωτικὰ ποιήσας (18). i. e. "Anacreon of Teos, who firſt after Sappho of Leſ"bos ſpent the greateſt part of his Poems in love." Horace mentions Anacreon's amours in the following verſes:

(17) Athen. lib. 10. cap. 7. pag. 429.

(18) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 23.

Non aliter Samio dicunt arſiſſe Bathyllo
Anacreonta Teïum,
Qui perſæpe cava teſtitudine flevit amorem (19).

(19) Horat. Epod. 14. ver. 9.

"Thus ſoft Anacreon for Bathyllus burn'd
"And oft his love he ſadly mourn'd.

"He to his harp did various grief rehearſe,
"And wept in an unpoliſh'd verſe." Creech.

See likewiſe Tully, Lib. IV. Tuſcul. and Suidas.

[G] His Poems ſhew his violent paſſion for Bathyllus.] This overthrows Ælian's exceeding great charity, who would not have us by any means, to ſuſpect any evil of our Poet on account of his friendſhip with Smerdias, one of Polycrates's Minions (20). But it is ſtill more ſtrange, that ſuch a man as Ælian ſhould found his opinion on this general reaſon, viz. that no one can reproach Anacreon with incontinency and intemperance. Μὴ γάρ τις ἡμῶν διαβαλλέτω πρὸς Θεῶν τὸν Ποιητὴν τὸν Τήϊον μὴ δ' ἀκόλαστον εἶναι λεγέτω (21). i. e. "For let no one blame the Poet of Teos, or ſay "that he was guilty of incontinence." Polycrates perceiving that Anacreon had gained the good will of Smerdias, by means of ſome flattering verſes he wrote in his praiſe, became jealous of him to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed the boy to be ſhaved (22). His rival being ſenſible of what had prompted him to this action, behaved himſelf very cunningly, and wrote ſome verſes on that ſubject, wherein he managed Polycrates very dexterouſly. Such as remember the following four verſes of Petronius, c. 109.

(20) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 9. c. 4.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Id. ibid. See alſo Athen. lib. 12. cap. 9.

Quod ſolum formæ decus eſt cecidere capilli,
Vernanteſque comas triſtis abegit hyems.
Nunc umbra nudata ſua jam tempora mœrent,
Areaque attritis ridet aduſta pilis;

"His hair, that was his beauty's only boaſt,
"Is nipt by chilling winter's cruel froſt.
"Their former ſhade his naked temples mourn,
"And his bald head the piercing ſun-beams burn.

will conclude, that Polycrates choſe rather his Minion ſhould loſe his beauty, than prove unfaithful. Strabo obſerves, that Anacreon foiſts in every where the name of this Tyrant of Samos. Τούτῳ συνεῖωσιν Ἀνακρέων ὁ μελοποιὸς καὶ δὴ καὶ πᾶσα ἡ ποίησις πλήρης ἐστὶ τῆς περὶ αὐτοῦ μνήμης (23). i. e. "Anacreon the "Lyric Poet lived at the ſame time with him, and "all his Poems mention him;" no wonder then, concludes Voſſius, that he was ſo much in his favour. Polycrati, ſays he (24), carus fuit. Quod mirum? cum verſibus ſuis eum celebraret. Read, Quid mirum, cum verſibus ſuis eum celebraret? We ſhall ſee in the article BATHYLLUS how Mr. le Fevre juſtifies Anacreon's amours.

(23) Strabo, lib. 14.

(24) Voſſius, de Poet. Græc. p. 22.

[H] He was choaked with a grape ſtone..... Valerius Maximus aſcribes ſuch an eaſy death to a particular favour of the Gods.] His words are: Cui quidem (Pindaro) crediderim eadem benignitate Deorum, & tantum poeticæ facundiæ, & tam placidum vitæ finem attributum: ſicut Anacreonti quoque, quamvis ſtatum humanæ vitæ modum ſupergreſſo, quem uvæ paſſæ ſucco tenues & exiles virium reliquias foventem unius grani pertinacior in aridis faucibus humor abſumpſit (25). i. e. "I believe that Pindar had, by "the ſame goodneſs of the Gods, ſo great a skill in "Poetry, and ſo happy an end; and Anacreon alſo, "who after he had paſſed the uſual term of human "life, died by one ſtone of a raiſin ſticking in his "dry throat, as he was ſwallowing the juice of that "fruit to preſerve the ſmall remains of life."

(25) Val. Max. lib. 9. cap. 12. See alſo Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 7.

death [I], or decided what was his father's name [K]. There are ſeveral tranſlations of his Poems [L]; though ſome Critics are of opinion, that all the Poems, which are aſcribed to him, are not truly his (d). Such as have mentioned his paſſion for Sappho, have (d) Tanaq. Fab. Not. in Anacr. Mrs. le Fevre his daughter is not of the ſame opinion. See her Pref. to Anacreon.

[I] No one, to my knowledge, has recorded the place or time of his death.] 'Tis true, that Suidas ſays he was baniſhed from Teos on account of Hiſtieüs's revolt, and that he retired to Abdera in Thrace. But this is not ſaying, that he died there. It only furniſhes us with a probable conjecture. And indeed Anacreon muſt have been very old at that time; for the victories obtained by the Perſians over the abettors of Hiſtieüs's rebellion happened in the 71ſt Olympiad, a long time after the death of Hipparchus. We may conjecture from the abovementioned paſſage of Suidas, that Anacreon in leaving Athens, whither he had been invited by Hipparchus, had retired to Teos; which is a pretty ſtrong proof, that he retired to the ſame place after the downfal of Polycrates, and that the veſſel with fifty oars was ſent thither for him by Hipparchus, as Mr. le Fevre aſſerts. No wonder Anacreon pitched upon Abdera for his Aſylum, ſince that city was built by the inhabitants of Teos, when they were driven out of their native country by Harpagus, Cyrus's General, who had ſubdued all Ionia (26). Strabo is not ſo particular with regard to their migration; for he only ſays that the inhabitants of Teos, not being able to bear the oppreſſion of the Perſians, retired to Abdera (27). This event, and that mentioned by Herodotus, are, perhaps, one and the ſame; for Harpagus invaded Ionia in the 59th Olympiad, the time in which Anacreon made a great figure.

(26) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 168.

(27) Strabo, lib. 14.

[K] No one has decided what was his father's name.] Suidas names four perſons, who have all paſſed for Anacreon's father. If this be a diminutive of the honour paid Homer, to whoſe birth ſeveral Cities have pretended, it is but a very ſmall one; for, in ſhort, it ſhews the obſcurity of his family, rather than any thing elſe. Had his father been a man of diſtinction in the city of Teos, he had been better known, nor would Authors ſo eaſily have confounded him with others. Nevertheleſs I find that Madam le Fevre quotes Plato, to prove that Anacreon was of a noble extraction, and related to Solon, whoſe father was deſcended of the ancient family of King Codrus, and his mother couſin german of Piſiſtratus's mother (28). She endeavours to prove this from a paſſage in the Dialogue on temperance, where ſhe found, that the father of Chermidas was of the ancient family of Dropidas, of Anacreon, and Solon, which had always diſtinguiſhed itſelf by its beauty, virtue, and riches. As I do not queſtion in the leaſt this Lady's erudition, all I can do is to perſuade myſelf that either her Plato is very different from mine; or that ſhe has not copied this paſſage from the original; or laſtly, that ſhe has kept too cloſe, without being aware, to the bad tranſlation of John de Serres. All I can find in my Plato is that the family, from which Chermidas was deſcended by his father, had been commended by Solon, Anacreon, and ſeveral other Poets, as outſhining other families in beauty, virtue &c. Ἡ τε γὰρ πατρῴα ὑμῖν οἰκία ἡ Κριτίου ϑ' Δρωπίδη καὶ ὑπὸ Ἀνακρέοντος καὶ ὑπὸ Σόλωνος καὶ ὑπ' ἄλλων πολλῶν Ποιητῶν ἐγκεκοσμιασμένη παραδέδοται ἡμῖν ὡς διαφέρουσα κάλλει τε καὶ ἀρετῇ καὶ τῇ ἄλλῃ λεγομένῃ εὐδαιμονίᾳ. This paſſage is according to the Francfort edition of 1602, from which that of Serranus differs only as to the word ἐγκεκοσμιασμένη, which by a miſtake of the Printers of Francfort has been put inſtead of ἐγκεκωμιασμένη, which we find in the edition of Serranus. But the tranſlation of Ficinus is far better, tho' perhaps not ſo good as the following: Nam quæ paternum vobis genus eſt, domus Critiæ filii Dropidæ, tum ab Anacreonte, tum à Solone, multiſque aliis Poetis laudata nobis tradita fuit ut præcellens forma, virtute, cæteriſque quæ fælicitatis nomine veniunt. The tranſlation of Serranus is as follows: Nam paternum quidem genus quod cum iſto Critia commune habes, à Dropida & Anacreonte & Solone & aliis multis celeberrimis Poetis deducitur, & vobis traditur veluti & robore & virtute & alio omni genere felicitatis inſtructiſſimum. I might ſay, that one may be deſcended on the father's ſide from Solon and Anacreon, without their being related to each other. For we have all two ſorts of relations on the father's ſide, viz. the family of our father's father, and that of our father's mother.

(28) Anacreon's Life.

[L] There are ſeveral tranſlations of his Poems.] Here follow thoſe which Mrs. le Fevre takes notice of. It will be agreeable to my reader to hear her judgment on them. Anacreon, ſays ſhe, has been long ago tranſlated into French by Remi Belleau; but beſides that his tranſlation is in verſe, and, of courſe, not exact; it is in ſo obſolete language, that the reader cannot poſſibly find any pleaſure in it. He was alſo tranſlated into Italian ſome years ago, but the tranſlator has no more kept to the text, than Remi Belleau; his tranſlation however is pretty agreeable, though he does not always expreſs the true ſenſe of Anacreon, but takes continually ſuch liberty, that his tranſlation ought rather to be accounted a paraphraſe than a tranſlation. The Latin tranſlation, which is generally uſed, and was done partly by Henry Stephens, and partly by Elias Andreas, ſeems to me to be the beſt. It has nevertheleſs its faults, and being alſo in verſe, it is often obſcure, and makes Anacreon ſay what he never thought of. Thus Mrs. le Fevre in her preface to Anacreon, which ſhe publiſhed at Paris 1681, with the Greek text on one ſide, and the French tranſlation in proſe on the other, together with ſome remarks on each poem. I ſhall make a ſmall addition to the text I have quoted. Remi Belleau's tranſlation appeared in 1556. Dorat was ſaid to have been the true author of the verſion, which Henry Stephens publiſhed in his own name. Mr. Colomies atteſts that Iſaac Voſſius told him, that he had once in his poſſeſſion an Anacreon, in which Scaliger had noted with his own hand, that John Dorat, and not Henry Stephens, was the true author of the Latin tranſlation of Anacreon's Odes (29). The Italian tranſlation Mrs. le Fevre ſpeaks of, was done by Bartolomeo Corſini, and Mr. Regnier des Marais cauſed it to be printed at Paris in 1672 (30). No wonder that Mrs le Fevre takes no notice of the tranſlation of Anacreon by a child, who was afterwards very famous under the name of the Abbot de la Trappe; for I think that verſion was never printed. Mr. Baillet informs us of ſeveral things relating to this ſubject. He knew ſo well, ſays he (31), ſpeaking of Armand Bouthillier de Rencé, how to improve under his Maſters by aſſiduity and application, that at ten years old he underſtood the Greek Poets, and chiefly Homer. He had ſcarce very well attained to the age of twelve or thirteen years, when he publiſhed a new Edition of Anacreon's Poems, with Greek notes, which were admired by the learned. This edition appeared at Paris in 1639, 8vo, and the notes are to this day as much admired as ever by thoſe who reflect on the tender age he wrote them in. I do not ſpeak of a French tranſlation of the ſame Poet, which he wrote at that time, tho' it was highly approved of by thoſe, who had undertaken to refine our language, and ſhewed that the politeneſs of his ſtyle in French did not fall ſhort of his skill in Greek and Latin. As Mr. Baillet neither mentions the place nor the year in which this work was printed, nor even inſinuates in general terms that it was printed, I am apt to believe it only appeared in manuſcript; the more, becauſe Mr. de Long-Pierre takes no notice of this tranſlation, tho' he obſerves that Henry Stephens had tranſlated into French verſe the ſame Odes of Anacreon, which he afterwards turned into Latin. He alſo tells us, in the Preface to his tranſlation, that many of them were tranſlated by Ronſard. His work was publiſhed in 1684. The Greek text is on one ſide, and his tranſlation on the other, with critical remarks at the end of each piece (32). Mr. Regnier des Marais, perpetual Secretary to the French Academy, publiſhed in 1693 a tranſlation of Anacreon in Italian verſe with notes.

(29) Colomies Opuſcules, p. 108.

(30) See the Leipſick Journal for the year 1693, p. 236.

(31) Baillet, Enfans celebres, p. 359.

(32) See les Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Nov. 1684, Art. 8.

Here follows a very fine addition, which I take word for word out of a letter I have received from Mr. de la Monnoie. " No care has been taken hitherto " to collect and examine ſeveral curious particulars " relating to the Poems of Anacreon that are ſtill " extant. 'Tis true that Henry Stephens is ſaid to " have

(1) Lib. cap. 9.

have not much minded Chronology, as we ſhall make appear in the article SAPPHO. It is recorded, that a ſum of money, which Polycrates preſented him with, made him ſo uneaſy, that he could not ſleep for ſeveral nights, and that he returned it to that Prince. This is not very likely, though Stobœus gives us Ariſtotle for his voucher. Gyraldus quotes only the Greek Collections of Arſenius to prove it (e).

(e) Gyrald. Hiſt. Poët. Dialog. 9. p. 471.

" have diſcovered them firſt; but where or how, " few perſons know. He found the Ode Λέγουσιν αἱ " γυναῖκες, on the cover of an old book, as Victori- " us relates in his various readings, Lib. xx. Cap. " xvii. Till that time we had no knowledge of any " compoſitions of Anacreon, beſides thoſe, which " had been preſerved in Aulus Gellius, and in " the Anthologia. By a like chance the ſame " Henry Stephens happened upon two manuſcripts " containing various pieces of this Poet. He was " indebted for the firſt to John Clement an Engliſh- " man, one of Sir Thomas Moor's domeſtics; the " other he brought, after a long journey, from Ita- " ly into France. Having collated theſe pieces with " great care, he publiſhed his firſt edition of them " at Paris 1554. This book was not received by " all in the ſame manner. Moſt of the learned look'd " upon it as a happy diſcovery; and ſome ſuſpected " it. Robertel, in his Diſſertation on the art of cor- " recting books, does not acknowledge it to be " genuine. Fulvius Urſinus inſerted in his edition " of the Greek Lyrics only ſuch Poems of Ana- " creon, as he had found mentioned by the Ancients, " ſhewing thereby that he was in doubt about the " others. It were to be wiſhed, that theſe two " manuſcripts, the only that were known, had been " preſerved. But Henry Stephens, unhappily fal- " ling into a kind of diſtraction about the end of " his life, let them periſh, without ſo much as commu- " nicating them to Caſaubon, his ſon-in-law. He had " tranſlated into French verſe the ſame Odes of Ana- " creon which he afterwards turned into Latin verſe. " Eas Anacreontis Odas, ſays he in the Preface to his " Notes upon Anacreon of the Paris edition in 4to, " 1554. quas jam antea Gallicas feceram, in aliquot a- " micorum gratiam Latinè quoque aggreſſus ſum vertere. " What is reported of Iſaac Voſſius, viz. that he had " ſaid he had been Maſter of an Anacreon, in which " Scaliger had noted with his own hand, that John Do- " rat was the Author of the Latin tranſlation, which is " generally aſcribed to Henry Stephens, is not to be " minded. For either Voſſius was miſtaken, or Scaliger " miſinformed. Henry Stephens, who certainly was " no Plagiary, was capable of making ſuch a tranſla- " tion as that is; and beſides, Dorat would not have " failed to claim it, had it been really his. From this " tranſlation Remi Belleau made his in French verſe, " which Scaliger perhaps thought ſo fine, that after " having read it, he durſt not venture to publiſh " his own in the ſame language. Richard Renvoiſy, " Maſter of the Singing-boys of the holy Chapel of " Dijon, made, as we read in Anthony du Verdier's " Bibliotheque pag. 34, another French tranſlation " of Anacreon's Odes. But very likely du Verdier " was miſtaken. For this, I preſume, is the tranſla- " tion of Belleau, which Renvoiſy ſet to muſic in 1558 " or 1559, as du Verdier himſelf ſeems to intimate " by mentioning pag. 1222 Renvoiſy only as a Mu- " ſician. As to the French tranſlation of the ſame " Poet by Mr. Bouthillier of Rance, when twelve or " thirteen years old, it was never printed; and as, " very likely, in proſe, (if it was at all,) tho' the " Authors, who mention it, do not poſitively ſay " ſo."

☞We ſhall add to Mr. Bayle's account of this Poet ſome particulars relating to a late edition of him with notes [A]; and likewiſe an Italian tranſlation of his Odes.

ANANIA

[A] A late edition of him with notes.] This edition was publiſhed at Utrecht in 1732, in 4to, pag. 315. with the following title, Anacreontis Odæ & Fragmenta Græcè & Latinè, cum Notis Joannis Cornelii de Pauw: i. e. " The Odes and Frag- " ments of Anacreon of Teos in Greek and Latin, " with the Notes of John Cornelius de Pauw." The Editor in his Preface delivers his opinion concern- ing the author of theſe Odes; and inſinuates that he is fully perſuaded, that they were compoſed by dif- ferent Authors, ſince ſome of them are extremely elegant, and ſome the very reverſe; which is a con- vincing proof, that they were not all written by the ſame perſon. Beſides, he is not ſatisfied, whe- ther Anacreon was really the author of any ſingle Ode in the whole collection. With regard to thoſe, which he thinks to be very low and inelegant, he is certain, that they were not written by Anacreon, who was a moſt polite Writer, but by ſome ignorant Pedant. And he preſumes, that we have no ſuffici- ent grounds to aſcribe the others to him, tho' they may ſeem well worthy of ſo great a Poet. For he obſerves, that the manuſcript copies, by which Hen- ry Stephens, (and after him others) was induced to aſcribe them to Anacreon, are by no means to be re- lied upon, ſince they attribute them all promiſcuouſly to that Poet, who certainly could never have written ſeveral moſt wretched Odes, which we find in that Collection. As therefore, continues the Editor, the bad Odes are falſly aſcribed to Anacreon, ſo may the good ones; for we cannot doubt but others beſides A- nacreon were capable of making elegant Anacreontic verſes. Add to this, that Anacreon wrote, as we are informed by Suidas Ἰωνιχῶς, that is, in the Ionic Dia- lect, which is quite different from the Dialect uſed by the Authors of theſe Odes. Mr. Pauw acknow- ledges indeed, that Gellius (1) quotes out of Ana- creon an Ode contained in the collection. But he obſerves, that we can only infer from thence, that this Ode in Gellius's time was ſuppoſed to have been Anacreon's, and inſerted among his other compoſiti- ons. But is this any proof, that Anacreon was really the author of it? Who doubts but in Gellius's time ſeveral compoſitions paſſed under Anacreon's name, which were none of his? Forgery is as ancient as the world; and more pieces have been impoſed upon the Republic of Letters, than we know, or dare to declare. This is the ſubſtance of the Editor's objections, who does not ſeem to reflect, that the beſt Authors have been ſtrangely mangled and corrupted thro' the igno- rance of tranſcribers; but aſcribes whatever he finds amiſs to the Authors themſelves: which is not an equitable manner of arguing. Mr. Pauw ſhews the utmoſt contempt for the former interpre- ters of this Poet, and particularly Tanaquil Faber, Barnes, and Baxter. He has ſubjoined to the Odes of Anacreon all the Fragments of him, which have been collected by Stephens and others, except the ſeven pieces produced by Scaliger, which he ima- gines to have been forged by that Author. This edition has been very well animadverted upon by a learned Gentleman, who has lately given us an elegant Latin Verſion of this Poet in elegiac verſe, with the original, and curious notes upon it. The Ita- lian tranſlation is done by ſeveral hands, and intitled; Le Ode di Anacreonte nuovamente da varii illuſtri Poeti nella Italiana favella tradotte, ed altre Rime publi- cate nell' occaſione delle feliciſſime Nozze degli Ecc. Sign. Co. D. Filippo Archinto e Co. D. Giulia Borro- mea. i. e. " The Odes of Anacreon tranſlated into " Italian by ſeveral eminent Poets, and other pieces " of Poetry, publiſhed on occaſion of the marriage " of Count Don Filippo Archinto and the Counteſs " Donna Giulia Borromea." Signior Filippo Arge- lati prefixed to this a ſhort Account of the life and wrirings of Anacreon, which he tranſcribed from Mr. Bayle, without ever naming him, tho' he pro- miſed ſome new hints relating to the life and compo- ſitions of that Poet (2). The reader will not be diſ- pleaſed to ſee the firſt Ode, as it is tranſlated in his Collection.

(1) Lib. 19. cap. 9.

(2) See the Hiſtoria Litteraria upon it, Num. xvi. Vol. 3. Art. 20. printed for N. Prevoſt 1732.

Degli Atridi io canterei,
E di Cadmo i caſi rei;

ANANIA (JOHN LORENZO D') a native of Tàverna (a) in Calabria, lived about the end of the ſixteenth Century. He wrote a book of Geography in Italian; and a work in Latin entitled, De Natura Dæmonum, which was printed at Venice in 1582, in 8vo. The other work bears this title, Coſmographia, overo l'univerſale Fabrica del Mondo, and was publiſhed at Venice in 1576, 4to (b). This author is not mentioned by Voſſius in his catalogue of Geographers.

(a) In Latin Taberna, and hence he took the ſurname of Tabernas.

(b) Mr. Baudrand tom. 2. p. 445, only takes notice of the Venice edition in 1582.

Ma dal mio voler diſcorda
Dalla cetera ogni corda,
E l'aſcolto a tutte l'ore
Solo dir coſe d'amore.
Poco fa Cetra cambiai,
Che di nuove corde armai,
E a narrare il cor s'acceſe
Del grand' Ercole l'impreſe.
Ma contraria a me riſpoſe
Voci tenere e amoroſe.
Dunque gite in pace o Eroi,
Che ingombrate i miei penſieri;
Jo non poſſo dir di voi
L'alte geſta, e i nomi alteri,
Se la Cetra a tutte l'ore
Sol riſponde amore, amore.

And here we cannot omit preſenting the Reader with a verſion of the ſame Ode, by a very ingenious Gentleman, who is preparing a new Tranſlation of that Poet in Engliſh verſe, with Notes, and a Life of Anacreon, and a Diſſertation upon Lyric Poetry.

ODE I. On his Lyre.

" I'll ſing of Atreus' Godlike Race,
" And Cadmus ſhall my numbers grace.
" Hark! the great task my ſtrings deny,
" And in ſoft airs of love reply.

" The other day each rebel ſtring
" I chang'd, Herculean toils to ſing.
" In vain, alas! my Lyre I ſtrung,
" In vain Herculean toils I ſung;
" The rebel ſtrings reſponded love,
" Nor one heroic note would prove.

" Adieu, ye Heroes: my ſoft Lyre
" Will love, and only love reſpire.

T.

☞ANASTASIUS I, Emperor of the Eaſt, ſucceeded Zeno in the year 491, and was inaugurated that ſame year on April the 11th (a). He was not of the Senatorian rank, but he had enjoyed an honourable poſt under his Predeceſſor [A]. Though Zeno, who died without leaving any children, had a brother called Longinus, who hoped to ſucceed him [B], yet Anaſtaſius was advanced to the Purple by the means of Ariadne Zeno's widow, whom he married as ſoon as he had aſcended the throne (b). The Manicheans and Arians were greatly in hopes of being ſupported by the new Emperor; the former becauſe his mother was their friend, and favoured their ſect; the latter becauſe the Emperor's uncle was of their opinion (c): but if Anaſtaſius did not perſecute them, (as we do not find he ever did) yet it does not appear that he ſupported either of theſe ſects. He is accuſed indeed of having been an Eutychian; though before he was inſtalled by Euphemius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, he promiſed him upon oath, that he would not diſturb the church, nor alter any thing in her preſent condition; which promiſe he alſo delivered to the Biſhop in writing. And indeed he continued for ſome time neuter between the different parties, which divided the church [C], neither favouring the Hereticks, nor oppoſing the Catholicks (d). But in order to maintain the peace of the Church, upon which the tranquillity of the State very much depends, he declared, that ſuch Biſhops or other Clergymen, who ſhould diſturb the publick tranquillity, by maintaining with too much heat either ſide of the queſtion,

(a) Sigonius, De Imp. Occid. In Oper. ed. a Phil. Argelato, tom. 1. p. 2. Col. 578. not. (62).

(b) Evagrius. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 3. cap. 29. p. 359, 360. edit. Reading, Cambr. 1720.

(c) Cedrenus, Hiſt. Compend. p. 357. edit. Pariſ. 1647.

(d) Sigonius, ubi ſupra, in Textu.

[A] He had enjoyed an honourable poſt under his predeceſſor.] He had been what the ancients called Silentiarius: There were two ſorts of theſe Officers; the one leſs honourable, was of thoſe, whoſe buſineſs it was to ſilence the people, and to prevent any noiſe or diſturbance in the Emperor's Palace: the other was much more honourable, and conſiſted of thoſe perſons, to whom the Prince imparted the moſt ſecret affairs of the State (1); they may perhaps be called Privy-Counſellors. See Calepin. in voce Silentiarius.

(1) Meurſius, in Gloſſ. Græcobarbar. in Not. Var. ad Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 10. not. a. pag. m. 302.

[B] Zeno — had left a brother, called Longinus, who hoped to ſucceed him.] Longinus having enjoyed a great power under the Emperor his brother, thought that he might eaſily aſcend the throne in his ſtead (2), but he found himſelf ſoon diſappointed thro' Ariadne's policy. Evagrius ſays (3), that Anaſtaſius ſent Longinus back into his own country, that is, into Iſauria; but that Author muſt be miſtaken in this; for he ſuppoſes that Longinus, Zeno's brother, is the ſame with Longinus General of the Horſe, tho' it appears from Hiſtory, that they were two different perſons. Theophanes tells us (4), that Zeno's brother having raiſed a ſedition againſt Anaſtaſius, this Emperor baniſhed him to Alexandria, where he entered into Prieſt-orders, and died ſeven years after. There was another Longinus, Maſter of the Horſe, whom Anaſtaſius deprived of that poſt, and baniſhed into Iſauria, where he afterwards rebelled againſt the Emperor with the Iſaurians, and was ſlain in battle, as Evagrius relates (5), who mentions alſo another Longinus, ſurnamed Selinuntius, who was taken priſoner in that battle (6). Moreri is very inaccurate where he ſpeaks of this battle, he mentions indeed the two Longinus's, but does not ſay who they were, and it appears that he takes one of them to be Zeno's brother. He alſo ſays that both the Longinus's having ſurrendered themſelves, were puniſhed capitally; whereas it appears by Evagrius's account, that Longinus who had been General of the Horſe, was killed in this battle, and his head carried to the Emperor, and that the other Longinus, ſurnamed Selinuntius, was taken priſoner, and ſent to the Emperor.

(2) Evagrius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 3. cap. 29. p. 359, 360.

(3) Ibid.

(4) In Chron. Ann. 484. juxta Alexandrinos, i. e. A. C. 491. in Not. Varior. apud Evagr. ubi ſupra.

(5) Lib. 3. cap. 35. p. 369.

(6) Ibid.

[C] Different parties divided the Church.] At that time the moſt holy Churches did neither abſolutely admit nor entirely reject the Council of Chalcedon; but each Biſhop acted as he thought proper: Some maintained with the utmoſt zeal all the decrees of that Council, nor would they ſuffer the leaſt alteration to be made in them, not ſo much as of one ſyllable, or of one letter. They ſeparated entirely from all thoſe, who did not receive thoſe decrees, and refuſed to communicate with them. Others on the contrary, not only rejected the Council of Chalcedon, together with Pope Leo's Letter, but alſo condemned and anathematized them. Some there were, who adhered to Zeno's famous Henoticon or Edict of Union (7), and continued united among themſelves, notwithſtanding they differed in their opinions concerning the two Natures of Chriſt; ſome of them were impoſed upon by the manner in which that Edict was expreſſed, others thought it was proper to make a ſacrifice of their private ſentiments to the peace and union of the Church (8).

(7) See the article ACACIUS Patriarch of Conſtantin. Rem. [F].

(8) Evagr. ibid. cap. 30. p. 360, 361.

queſtion, for or againſt the Council of Chalcedon, ſhould be deprived of their benefices. Accordingly the diſputes concerning Eutychianiſm running to a very great height, and Euphemius being deeply concerned in them, the Emperor expelled him from his See, and choſe Macedonius in his ſtead. Theodorus Lector gives another reaſon, for which Euphemius was expelled and baniſhed. He tells us (f), that the Iſaurians having behaved themſelves in a very inſolent manner at Conſtantinople, the Emperor drove them out of the city, whereupon they openly revolted againſt him. The Emperor ſuſpecting that Euphemius had been the inſtigator and abettor of this inſurrection, aſſembled all the Biſhops, who were then at Conſtantinople; and they, to pleaſe their Sovereign, pronounced a ſentence of excommunication and deprivation againſt Euphemius. The people of Conſtantinople roſe up in arms to ſupport their Biſhop, but to no purpoſe; the Emperor was not to be prevailed upon, and the Biſhop was baniſhed to Eucheta, a city in Paphlagonia. Macedonius, who as we have ſaid was choſen in his ſtead, did, by the Emperor's advice, ſubſcribe to Zeno's Edict of Union [D]. The hatred, which the different parties entertained againſt one another, occaſioned often ſuch tumults and ſeditions at Conſtantinople, as threatened the life of the Emperor himſelf; who, to keep the people in awe, ordered, that the Governor of the city ſhould be preſent at all Church-aſſemblies, and publick proceſſions (g). This was ſo much the more neceſſary, becauſe theſe tumults were chiefly occaſioned by a kind of Doxology, or ſhort Hymn, which uſed to be ſung at Divine Service. This Doxology conſiſted only of the following words, ἅγιος ὁ Θεὸς, ἅγιος ἰσχυρὸς, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, that is, Holy God, holy the powerful, holy the immortal, for which reaſon it was called τρισάγιος, Triſagius [E], three times holy, becauſe the word holy was therein three times repeated. The Orthodox uſed to ſing that hymn, without any addition, or by adding only to it, ἁγία τριὰς, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς, i. e. Holy Trinity, have mercy upon us: But Peter the Fuller, Biſhop of Antioch, pretended to add theſe words to it, viz. ὁ ϛαυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς, i. e. who haſt been crucified for us; and as it was ſuppoſed, that the firſt Holy related to the Father, the ſecond to the ſon, the third to the Holy Ghoſt, the adding theſe words, who haſt been crucified for us, ſeemed to inſinuate that the whole Conſubſtantial Trinity had ſuffered, for which reaſon the Orthodox were reſolved not to admit this addition (h). Anaſtaſius deſiring to have thoſe fatal words added to that Hymn, whenever it ſhould be ſung at Conſtantinople, this occaſioned a terrible ſedition in the city, as though the very fundamentals of Chriſtianity had been overthrown. Macedonius and his Clergy are ſaid to have raiſed that ſedition [F], which came to ſuch a height, that the Emperor himſelf was obliged to come without his crown on his head, and in a very humble manner to the Circus (i), where he declared to the people, that he was very willing to quit the Imperial Throne; but he told them at the ſame time, that they could not all enjoy the ſovereign power, which does not admit of a partnerſhip; and that one perſon ſtill muſt govern them, if he reſigned the crown. This diſcourſe had ſuch a power over the raging multitude, that, as if they had been divinely inſpired, they immediately requeſted the Emperor to take up his crown, promiſing that they would be quiet and obedient for the future (k). Whether Macedonius was the author of this ſedition or not, we ſhall not determine; but it is certain that he was depoſed and baniſhed by the Emperor, and one Timothy was choſen in his ſtead. Anaſtaſius was not only obliged to ſtruggle with the different parties, which divided the Church, but likewiſe ſeveral times engaged in war againſt the Perſians, and the (f) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 9-12. ed. Reading, p. 573.

(g) Id. ibid. c. 21. Ibique Valeſii Annot. num. 1.

(h) Valeſius in Notis ad Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 3. cap. 44. not. 1.

(i) A place for publick exerciſes, as races, &c.

(k) Evagrius, ib.

[D] Macedonius did by the Emperor's advice ſubſcribe to Zeno's Edict of Union.] This is what we find in Theodorus Lector. Cedrenus (9) agrees with him in this; but Evagrius relates this particular in a different manner: he tells us (10), that one Xenius (11) Biſhop of Hierapolis, with ſome other Eutychians, required of Macedonius an account of his faith in writing, which he granted, declaring in that writing, that he admitted no other faith, but that of the three hundred and eighteen holy Fathers (12), and of the hundred and fifty (13), and that he condemned Neſtorius, and Eutyches, and all thoſe who maintained that there were two ſons, and two Chriſts, or who divided the natures in the perſon of our Lord; but he did not mention the Council of Epheſus, in which Neſtorius had been depoſed, nor that of Chalcedon, which had deprived and condemned Eutyches. Now this is the very ſubſtance of Zeno's famous Henoticon, or Edict of Union; and Macedonius's declaration of his faith may very well be conſidered, as a ſubſcription of Zeno's Edict. Yet becauſe he did not expreſly admit the Council of Chalcedon, tho' he did not explode it neither, the Monks of all the Monaſteries about Conſtantinople broke off all intercourſe, and refuſed to communicate with him.

(9) Hiſt. Comp. p. 358.

(10) Ubi ſupra, cap. 31. p. 362, &c.

(11) Otherwiſe called Philoxenus.

(12) The Council of Nice.

(13) The Council of Conſtantinople.

[E] Triſagius.] One Proclus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, ſays Valeſius (14), had learned that hymn from the Angels, and introduced it into the Church. As ſoon as the Prieſt was come to the altar, the Chantor or chief Singer began to ſing with a loud voice theſe words, Ἅγιος Θεὸς &c. The Chriſtians in the Eaſt alſo uſed to ſing this hymn in the morning at their firſt riſing out of their beds, or when they diſpoſed themſelves to worſhip God, or when they had a mind to liſt up their hearts to God. The whole Trinity was adored in this hymn, as John of Damaſcus tells us in his Epiſtle De Triſagio, and De Orthod. Lib. 3. cap. 10 (15).

(14) In Notis ad Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 44. not. 1. pag. 380.

(15) Ibid. in Not. Varior. not. a.

[F] Macedonius and his Clergy are ſaid to have raiſed that ſedition.] This is what Severus Biſhop of Antiochia wrote to Sotericus Biſhop of Ceſarea in Cappadocia, who had been ordained by Marcellinus himſelf. This Sotericus became afterwards an Eutychian, and joined with Xenias, to promote the intereſt of his Sect: It is therefore no wonder, ſays Valeſius (16), that Severus, the Leader of the Eutychians, writing to Sotericus, who was of his own party, ſhould have accuſed Macedonius, a Catholic Biſhop, of being the author of the ſedition, we have mentioned. But, adds he, Severus himſelf muſt rather be charged with it, ſince it was he that adviſed the Emperor, to add theſe words, who was crucified for us, to the Triſagius, as Cedrenus relates (17). We leave the reader to judge, whether Cedrenus, who lived in the eleventh Century, is more to be depended upon, than Severus, who was contemporary with Anaſtaſius.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Hiſt. Compend. p. m. 360.

the Bulgarians, the latter having firſt begun to appear under his reign. But as there happened nothing very remarkable in theſe wars, we think it unneceſſary to give a particular account of them. However we muſt take notice of the war which one Vitalianus a Scythian waged againſt him. He revolted againſt the Emperor about the year 510. Hypatius was ſent againſt him, who having been betrayed by his army fell into the hands of the enemy, and was obliged to pay an exorbitant ſum to be ſet at liberty. Cyril ſucceeded him in the command of the Emperor's troops, who being alſo taken by Vitalianus, this formidable General thought of nothing leſs than of taking Conſtantinople, and making himſelf Emperor (l). He advanced with his army towards the Imperial city, and having pitched his camp near it, he came himſelf to one of the gates, called the Golden Gate, and declared, that he undertook this expedition in favour of the Catholicks, and particularly of Macedonius, who had been unjuſtly depoſed and baniſhed. Anaſtaſius being terrified at this, promiſed to aſſemble a Council at Heraclea [G], to examine the matters in diſpute, and that he would admit the Biſhop of Rome at that Council. Vitalianus being ſatisfied with this promiſe retired with his army: The Council met accordingly, and was compoſed of about two hundred Biſhops; but they ſoon ſeparated, without having done any thing; upon which Vitalianus was ſo exaſperated, that he began again to attack the Empire (m), but having been vanquiſhed in a ſea-fight, and loſt a great part of his army, he retired with the remainder of it (n). Some Hiſtorians have drawn the character of Anaſtaſius in very black colours; they deſcribe him as a favourer of the Arians and Manicheans; nay, ſome ſay, he was himſelf ſuſpected of being a Mahometan, though not one ſingle fact is urged to ſupport this charge. He is alſo repreſented as an Eutychian, for no other reaſon that we know of, but becauſe he would add theſe words, who was crucified for us, to the famous Triſagius, though this addition may be underſtood in a very good ſenſe [H]. Some authors ſay he was of the ſect of Acephali, but what the particular opinions of this ſect were, is not very well known; only this we may affirm, that thoſe who did not admit the Council of Chalcedon, were called Acephali, or ſometimes Indifferents, becauſe they ſeemed to take part neither for nor againſt that Council, which perhaps was the moſt prudent conduct, ſince the deciſions of that Council had occaſioned ſuch diviſions in the church. Anaſtaſius is by the Popiſh writers repreſented as a great perſecutor of the Orthodox, becauſe he baniſhed and deprived Euphemius and Macedonius; but they ſhould prove that theſe two Prelates had been unjuſtly baniſhed, which is a very hard taſk, after what we have quoted from Evagrius. In ſhort, it is from Anaſtaſius's conduct we muſt form our judgment concerning him. We have laid before the reader the moſt material facts which are related concerning him, with regard to his conduct in Eccleſiaſtical affairs. As to his civil government it is confeſſed, that at the beginning of his reign he ſhewed himſelf a very good Prince, he eaſed the People of a very heavy tax, called Chryſargyrum, under which they had groaned for a long time [I]; he prohibited the fighting with wild beaſts; he raiſed ſeveral buildings; he avoided being involved in dangerous wars as much as lay in his power. It is true, that in the following part of his reign he laid ſome new taxes upon the people, or rather altered the manner of paying them; for whereas before his time the people uſed to furniſh proviſions for the army, Anaſtaſius ordered that they ſhould pay their quota in money; but he had a very good reaſon for this. For he uſed to give money to the Barbarians, to prevent their invading the Empire; by which means he delivered his ſubjects from large ſtanding armies, as well as from the deſolations which war occaſions; and for this purpoſe he wanted ready money more than proviſions (o). Anaſtaſius reigned twenty ſeven years, three months, and three days (p), or, according to F. Pagi (q), wanting three days; and died July the tenth, A. C. 518 (r), in the eighty eighth

(l) Id. ibid. cap. 43. P. 379.

(m) Sigonius, ubi ſupra, Col. 617.

(n) Evagrius, ubi ſupra.

(o) See Valeſius, Not. in Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 3. cap. 42. n. 3.

(p) Evagr. ibid. cap. 44. p. 381.

(q) Ib. in Not. Var. not. b.

(r) Sigonius, ubi ſupra, Col. 621.

[G] Promiſed to aſſemble a Council at Heraclea.] This is what Sigonius (18) relates from Theophanes (19), adding that Anaſtaſius made this promiſe only to amuſe Vitalianus and the people of Conſtantinople, but that neither the Emperor, nor Timothy Biſhop of Conſtantinople intended the Council ſhould come to any reſolution. But we muſt obſerve here, that to the beſt of our knowledge, Theophanes is the only ancient writer, who mentions this Council of Heraclea; neither Evagrius, nor Theodorus Lector, nor Cedrenus ſay a word of it; which is ſo much the more extraordinary, if what Theophanes ſays be true, that the two latter do not in the leaſt ſpare Anaſtaſius, and invelgh bitterly againſt him on ſeveral occaſions. The particulars, which Theophanes relates, muſt be therefore at leaſt very dubious.

(18) Ubi ſupra, Col. 617.

(19) In Chron. ad Ann. Alex. 506. A. C. 513.

[H] This addition may be underſtood in a very good ſenſe.] If the words of the Triſagius related to all the three Perſons of the Bleſſed Trinity, I own, it is abſurd to ſay of the whole Trinity, that it has been crucified for us: but why may we not ſuppoſe that this addition related only to the Son, and that the whole hymn was directed to him? If ſo, there was no more harm in adding to it the words we have mentioned, that in what St. Paul ſays (20), that God has purchaſed the Church with his own blood, which does not ſignify that the Divinity of Chriſt has ſuffered; but, what only belongs to his human nature, is by a figure of ſpeech applied to his divine nature.

(20) Act. xx. 28.

[I] A Tax, called Chryſargyrum, under which they had groaned for a long time.] This was a tax laid upon every individual perſon thro' the whole Empire: Every perſon, man or woman, free or ſlave, or beggar, was to pay a piece of ſilver into the treaſury. The ſame was to be paid, for an horſe, an ox, or a mule; and for an aſs the owner was to pay ſix oboli or pence: Nay this tax was even levied upon dogs, and upon the very dung; and was to be paid every fourth year. Anaſtaſius finding the people would not bear any longer ſuch an heavy tax, took it off entirely, and burnt all regiſters in which the ſum, which every one was to pay, was ſet down (21). This tax was very ancient, and Zoſimus ſays (22), it was impoſed by Conſtantine the Great, for which aſſertion Evagrius cenſures that Hiſtorian very ſeverely (23). We ſhall examine in another place (24), whether this charge againſt Conſtantine be well grounded, or not.

(21) Cedrenus, ubi ſupra. Evagr. ubi ſupra, p. 371.

(22) Hiſt. lib. 2. p. m. 115. edit. Oxon. 1679.

(23) Evagrius, ubi ſupra, cap. 41. p. 374-377.

(24) In the article CONSTANTINE the Great.

eighth year of his age, according to Theodorus Lector (s). Some Authors relate a ſtory concerning his death, which is not very probable [K]. He was ſucceeded by Juſtin.

(s) Lib. 2. cap. 37. p. m. 580.

[K] A ſtory concerning his death, which is not very probable.] Cedrenus tells us (25), that in the twenty ſeventh year of the Emperor's reign, a terrible man appeared to him in a dream, and ſhewed him a book, which the Emperor opened, and found his name in it; whereupon that ſpectre ſaid to him, "Behold, "becauſe thy faith is wrong, I ſtrike out fourteen "years of thy life;" which he did accordingly. Anaſtaſius being awaked out of his ſleep, ſent for one Amantius, to whom he told his dream. Amantius anſwered, "I alſo dreamt, that whilſt I was "ſtanding by your Majeſty, a great hog came, and "taking hold of my gown threw me upon the "ground, and devoured me." Proclus the Interpreter of dreams (26) told the Emperor and Amantius, that they would ſoon both die. But as Anaſtaſius had been told by an Oracle, that he was to periſh by fire, he ordered ſeveral conduits to be made to a ciſtern, that was in the palace, and as many barrels to receive the water, endeavouring thereby to evade his fate. But all this was to no purpoſe; for he was killed by lightning. Sigonius relates this ſtory as matter of fact (27). But neither Evagrius, nor Theodorus Lector ſay any thing of it; and there is no reaſon to believe they would have omitted it, if they had known it; the latter eſpecially, who is very far from being in the leaſt favourable to Anaſtaſius. When Authors, who lived ſome Centuries after the facts, which they relate, happened, quote no authority, they are not to be depended upon, if what they relate be not ſupported by the teſtimony of ſome contemporary Writer.

P.

(25) Ubi ſupra, p. 361.

(26) The famous Mathematician.

(27) Sigonius, ubi ſupra. Col. 621.

☞ANASTASIUS, ſirnamed Bibliothecarius, was a Roman Abbot, and Prieſt, and Library-keeper of the Church of Rome. He was one of the moſt learned men of the ninth Century, and the Author of ſeveral books [A]. It is a diſpute among the Learned, whether our writer was the ſame with him, who was called Anaſtaſius Cardinalis; in order to determine which, it will be proper to conſider firſt who this Anaſtaſius Cardinalis was, and then, whether he was the ſame with Bibliothecarius. We have an account of the former in the Annales Bertiniani, and the Acts of the Synod of Rome held under Leo IV, publiſhed by Holſtenius, and afterwards transferred in Father Labbe's Collection of Councils. His father's name was Arſenius, a man of great eminence at Rome, on account of his riches and power, of whom we have this account in the Annales Bertiniani under the year 868, that in his journey to the Emperor Lewis at Beneventum

[A] The Author of ſeveral books.] I. Acta Concilii Conſtantinopolitani IV; i. e. "The Acts of the fourth Council of Conſtantinople," in which he was preſent in the year 869. He wrote part of thoſe Acts, and tranſlated part of them out of Greek, and dedicated them to Pope Adrian II. They are publiſhed in the Paris edition of the Councils (1) in 1672. His tranſlation from the Greek into Latin is very rude and inelegant, and he took the liberty of changing and adding many things (2). II. Acta Concilii Nicæni II; i. e. "The Acts of the ſecond Council "of Nice," held in the year 787. Thoſe Acts are publiſhed in the Collection of Councils (3). They are dedicated to Pope John VIII, with this inſcription, Domino Coangelico Joanni Pontifici ſummo & Univerſali Papæ Anaſtaſius Exiguus (4). Father Labbe adds, (what he ſays, others have omitted to obſerve,) that he wrote the Acts of the fourth General Council or the third Council of Conſtantinople. But he ſhould have mentioned what reaſon or authority he had to aſſert this; whether he concluded it from the ſimilitude of the ſtyle, or the teſtimony of ſome ancient Writer. III. He tranſlated into Latin the Life of St. John the Almoner, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, which was done, according to Sigebertus (5) and Trithemius (6) at the deſire of Pope Nicholas from the Greek original of Leontius the Biſhop. It is publiſhed in Roſweyd's Collection of the Vitæ Patrum (7), and by Bollandus and Henſchenius in the ſecond volume of the Saints of the month of January (8). IV. He tranſlated from Greek into Latin the Life of St. Demetrius the Martyr. The Paſſion of St. Demetrius the Martyr tranſlated by him is publiſhed in the firſt volume of Father Mabillon's Analecta Vetera (9), and inſcribed Domino piiſſimo Imperatori Carolo ſemper Auguſto. V. Among the variety of pieces, which he tranſlated from Greek, we have a tranſlation of his of the Life of St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, which he ſent in 876 to the Emperor Charles the Bald. This piece is loſt, except the Preface, which was publiſhed by Surius (10); and afterwards from the MSS. by Father Mabillon in his Analecta. He tells us in that Preface, that he had not confined himſelf exactly to the original, but only endeavoured to repreſent the ſenſe. VI. Voſſius tells us (11), that there is a MS. in the Library at Cambridge of Dionyſius de Hierarchiâ cæleſti, de Hierarchiâ Eccleſiaſticâ, de divinis Nominibus, & myſticâ Theologiâ, cum Præfatione Anaſtaſii ad Regem Carolum Calvum; i. e. "Of the celeſtial Hierarchy, of the eccleſiaſtical "Hierarchy, the divine Names, and myſtic Divini-"ty, with a Preface of Anaſtaſius to the Emperor "Charles the Bald." This he was informed of by Thomas James in his Ecloga Oxonio-Cantabrigienſis. But Father Labbe aſſures us (12), that there is a MS. in the Jeſuits College at Bourdeaux written very beautifully about eight hundred years ago upon vellum, containing the four pieces of Dionyſius mentioned by Voſſius, and tranſlated by John Eringena or Erigena Scotus, with a Preface of ſome Verſes by the latter addreſſed to the Emperor Charles the Bald, and a Letter of Anaſtaſius to the ſame Emperor, dated the 10th of the Kalends of April in the eighth Indiction, that is probably in the year 875, in which he gives an account of the Scholia, which he had tranſlated into Latin, and are written in the margin of the MS. There are likewiſe ſeveral other MSS. of this kind in other Libraries (13). VII. Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica, ſive Chronologia tripartita; i. e. "An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, or a Chronology in three parts." This is a tranſlation of the Chronicle of St. Nicephorus, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and of a great part of the Chronicle, which was continued by George Syncellus and Theophanes from the creation to the reign of Leo the Armenian, as he obſerves in his Preface to John the Deacon of the City of Rome. It was publiſhed at Paris 1649, with the Notes of Fabricius (14). VIII. Collectanea de iis, quæ ſpectant ad hiſtoriam Monothelitarum Hæreticorum, & Martyrium ſancti Martini Papæ, itemque ſancti Maximi Abbatis & aliorum; i. e. "Collections relating to the "Hiſtory of the Hereſy of the Monothelites, and "the Martyrdom of St. Martin the Pope, and "St. Maximus the Abbot, and others." The reader may ſee the particular pieces of theſe Collections in Dr. Cave and Oudin. They were publiſhed in Octavo at Paris 1620, by Father Sirmond; and treat of thoſe perſons, who ſuffered impriſonment and other ſeverities under Conſtans, the Emperor of the Eaſt. There are two Anaſtaſius's mentioned in them; one S. Romanæ Eccleſiæ Apocriſiarius, the other a Scholar of St. Maximus, whoſe Epiſtles are extant in theſe Collections, which he tranſlated from the Greek, and digeſted into one body, for the ſervice of John the Deacon abovementioned, when he was preparing to compile an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. It appears from the Preface, that the author of the Collections of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory

(1) Tom. 8. Col. 961. ad 1175.

(2) Oudin. Comment. de Scriptor. & Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. Col. 252. edit. Lipſiæ, 1722.

(3) Tom. 7. col. 29.

(4) Oudin, ubi ſupra.

(5) De Script. Eccleſ. c. 103.

(6) De Script. Eccleſ. c. 276.

(7) Lib. 1.

(8) Die 23. See Lambecius, tom. Commentar. Biblioth. Vindobonenſis, p. 271. apud Oudin, ubi ſupra, Col. 253.

(9) P. 65.

(10) Tom. 5. ad Diem xi Octob. in fine Areopagiticorum.

(11) De Hiſt. Latin. l. 2. cap. 35.

(12) De Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. verbo Anaſtaſ. Bibliothecar.

(13) Oudin, Col. 254.

(14) Cave, Hiſt. Litt. p. 469. ed. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

hiſtory

Beneventum he fell ſick, and having committed his treaſure to Ingelberga the Empreſs, and held a converſation with the Devils, went to his own place without receiving the communion (a). He had a brother named Eleutherius, who was infamous for his many enormous vices. About the year 848 he was ordained by Pope Leo VI (b) Prieſt under the title of St. Marcellus; Preſbyter cardinis noſtri, quem nos in Titulo B. Marcelli, Martyris atque Pontificis, ordinavimus; which paſſage intimates, that the care of the church of St. Marcellus was committed to him, that he might be perpetually converſant in it, as the door turns upon the hinges; tanquam janua in cardine ſuo, as Dr. Cave expreſſes it; from whence he was commonly called Cardinalis. But he ſoon left this ſettlement, and concealed himſelf for two years together in the country about Aquileia (c), and though he was called to two Councils, refuſed to appear. Upon this account he was deprived of communion by Pope Leo, and a Synod of ſeventy five Biſhops, which was held at Rome the 16th of December 850. In the year 853 the 29th of May Leo called a Synod at Ravenna (d) in the Church of St. Vitalis, before which he cited Anaſtaſius, who had already been five years abſent from his church. But as he ſtill concealed himſelf, and the Emperor's Embaſſadors proteſted that they could not find him, Leo, with the conſent of the Synod, pronounced an Anathema againſt him. This ſentence was ſoon after confirmed, and he was deprived of his ſacerdotal character by a Council held at Rome in the Church of St. Peter, at which were preſent ſixty ſeven Biſhops,

(a) Arſenius ad Ludovicum Imp. pergens in Beneventum infirmitate correptus, & theſaurum ſuum in manus Ingelbergæ Imperatricis committens; &, ut, dicebatur, cum Dæmonibus confabulans ſine communione abiit in locum ſuum. See Dr. Cave, Hiſt. Literar. p. 470. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(b) Act. Synod. Rom. apud Holſten. Collection. Rom. p. 102. & alibi.

(c) Ibid. p. 102, and 138.

(d) Ibid. p. 139, 140.

ſtory was the ſame perſon; and he mentions ſeveral of theſe Tracts, which he had tranſlated into Latin, and inſerted in the Collectanea. Father Monfaucon in his Diarium Italicum publiſhed at Paris in 4to 1702 (15), tells us, that theſe Collectanea Anaſtaſii Bibliothecarii are extant in Greek in manuſcript in Italy in the Library of St. John de Corbonaria belonging to the Auguſtinian Monks. IX. He tranſlated alſo from Greek into Latin the Paſſion of the MCCCCLXXX Martyrs; which piece is ſtill at Rome in the Library Sanctæ Crucis in Hieruſalem; and the Preface to it has been publiſhed by Father Mabillon in his Iter Italicum (16), in which Anaſtaſius obſerves, that he had undertaken this work, after he had tranſlated at the deſire of the ſame perſon the Paſſion of the eminent Doctor and Martyr, Peter Biſhop of Alexandria (17). X. He tranſlated likewiſe the Life of St. Baſil Archbiſhop of Ceſarea in Cappadocia, the Preface to which was publiſhed by Father Mabillon in his Iter Italicum (18). XI. He undertook likewiſe a tranſlation of the Paſſion of St. Cyrus and St. John; the Preface to which is publiſhed by the ſame Father (19). XII. He tranſlated likewiſe from Greek into Latin the Life of St. Donatus Biſhop of Euria in Syria; the Preface to which is publiſhed by Mabillon (20). XIII. Anaſtaſii Presbyteri & Abbatis Bibliothecarii S. Romanæ Eccleſiæ ad Adonem Archiepiſcopum Viennenſem Epiſtola; i. e. "An Epiſtle of Anaſtaſius "Prieſt, Abbot, and Library-keeper to the Church "of Rome to Ado Archbiſhop of Vienne." This is publiſhed in the Collection of Councils publiſhed at Paris 1672 (21). We have likewiſe an Epiſtle of his concerning the death of Pope Nicholas I, and the election of Adrian II, among the Epiſtles of Pope Nicholas I, anno 867, Indiction XV; and another Epiſtle dated the nones of January 876 to Hincmar Archbiſhop of Rheims, in the Indiction IX, in the third Tome of the Councils of France (22), which was publiſhed from a MS. at Rheims by Father Sirmond. Photius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, wrote an Epiſtle to Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius (23), which ſhews that the latter had at that time a great authority at Rome. XIV. He gave likewiſe a tranſlation of the Sermon of St. Theodorus Studita, Abbot of Conſtantinople concerning St. Bartholomew the Apoſtle, publiſhed by Dacherius in his Spicilegium (24). XV. While he was Secretary to Pope John VIII, he wrote ſix Epiſtles in Greek and Latin under his name, relating to the affairs of the Eaſtern Church, which are publiſhed in the eighth Tome of the Councils printed at Paris, in the Appendix to the eighth Council of Conſtantinople (25). XVI. Father Ludovicus Jacob a Sancto Carolo, a Carmelite Friar, in his Bibliotheca Pontificia, publiſhed at Lyons in 4to 1643, tells us (26), that he tranſlated ſeveral Epiſtles of St. Martin I, who was elected Pope in 649, out of Greek into Latin, to which he prefixed a preface to Martin Biſhop of Narnia. We may obſerve here, that Father Labbe in his Hiſtorical Diſſertation concerning the Eccleſiaſtical Writers mentioned by Bellarmin (27), imagines that he has found a ſtrong argument in favour of the ſovereign power of the Pope, againſt thoſe, whom he ſtiles the moſt profligate enemies of the Church and the ſupreme Head of it, in the Preface of Anaſtaſius to Pope Nicholas, prefixed to the Life of St. John the Almoner. The paſſage is as follows: Neque enim fas eſt ut abſque Vicario Dei, abſque Clavigero cœli, abſque curru & auriga ſpiritualis Iſraelis, abſque univerſitatis Pontifice, abſque unico Papa, abſque ſingulari paſtore, abſque ſpeciali patre, abſque te omnium arbitro, aliquid conſummetur & divulgetur. Tu enim tenes claves David, tu accepiſti claves ſcientiæ; in areâ quippe pectoris tui tabulæ Teſtamenti & manna cœleſtis ſaporis requieſcunt. Tu enim quod ligas, nemo ſolvit, quod ſolvis nemo ligat; qui aperis & nemo claudit, claudis & nemo aperit; vicem namque in terris poſſides Dei; i. e. "For it is by "no means proper that any thing ſhould be perform-"ed or publiſhed without the conſent of you, who "are the Vicegerent of God, who bear the keys "of heaven, who are the Charioteer and the ſpiri-"tual Iſrael, the High-Prieſt of the Univerſe, the "only Pope, the ſingular Paſtor, the ſpecial Father, "and the Judge of all. For you keep the keys of "David; you have received the keys of know-"ledge; in your breaſt are the tables of the Cove-"nant and the heavenly Manna. What you bind, "no man looſeth; what you looſe, no man bindeth; "you open, and no man ſhuts; you ſhut, and no "man opens; for you are God's Vicegerent upon "earth." But this paſſage can be of no force with any unprejudiced and rational mind; for who can expect any thing leſs from a man who was an Abbot of Rome, Library-keeper to the Roman Church, and a Friend and Dependant upon the Popes? Nothing is more common than for men in their Dedications to make uſe of all the ſtrong hyperboles imaginable in honour of their Patrons; and a perſon muſt be extremely devoted to the See of Rome, who can urge ſuch paſſages as theſe in defence of a claim to an abſolute and ſovereign Dominion, which is the reproach and deſtruction of real and genuine Chriſtianity. But let us proceed now to a very remarkable work aſcribed to Anaſtaſius, intitled, Vitæ Romanorum Pontificum à Sancto Petro uſque ad Stephanum Sextum incluſive, vel uſque ad Papam Formoſum; i. e. "The Lives of the Popes of Rome from St. "Peter to Stephen VI incluſively, or to Pope For-"moſus." This is the title, as Oudin repreſents it (28). But Dr. Cave ſays that it extends to Pope Nicholas I. It was publiſhed under the name of Anaſtaſius by John Bufæus a Jeſuit at Mentz in 4to 1602 (29), and reprinted in fol. and corrected by the MSS. in 1649 at Paris by Charles Annibal Fabrotus a Civilian, and publiſhed together with Anaſtaſius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. But it is generally believed among the Learned, that he was not the author of this work; becauſe there are MSS. of it older than Anaſtaſius. Beſides it is quoted under the title of Geſta Pontificalia by Walafridus Strabo, Rabanus Maurus, Beda, and others, who were more antient than our Author (30), Father Labbe likewiſe aſſures us, that he had ſeen a MS. written in the time of Charlemagne, which contained the Lives of the firſt Popes; which, (15) C. 21. p. 309. apud Oudin.

(16) Part 2. p. 80.

(17) See Oudin, Col. 256.

(18) Part 2. p. 82.

(19) Ibid. p. 83.

(20) Ibid. p. 85.

(21) Tom. 8. Col. 568.

(22) P. 423.

(23) Ordine CLXX. p. 244.

(24) Tom. 3. p. 13.

(25) Col. 1451, 1461, 1473, 1477, 1479, 1485.

(26) Lib. 1. p. 160. apud Oudin, Col. 257.

(27) Tom. 1. p. 710. in Addendis & Corrigendis.

(28) Col. 258.

(29) Du Pin ſays 1612.

(30) Cave, pag. 146.

Biſhops, twenty Prieſts, and ſix Deacons. Leo ordered a picture of this Council to be placed in the Church were it was held; on the right hand of which was written the ſentence of the Council of Rome in 850, and on the left hand the ſentence of the Council of Ravenna, and upon the ſilver doors the ſentence declared againſt him in this laſt Council. But Leo died the 17th of June 855; upon which Anaſtaſius broke out of his concealment, and being armed with the ſecular power, came into St. Peter's Church, and deſtroyed the picture there. Benedict being elected Pope, he excommunicated and degraded Anaſtaſius, and reſtored the picture, but he dying the tenth of May 858, Nicholas I, who ſucceeded, ſeems to have received Anaſtaſius (e). But Nicholas dying the 12th of November 867, Adrian II was elected Pope eight days after, and immediately, according to the Annales Bertiniani, appointed Anaſtaſius Library-keeper to the Church of Rome, who the year following wrote the 11th Epiſtle of Adrian. But he did not maintain this degree of favour long, for on the 12th of October 868, being cited before that Pope (f), and his former crimes, with a great many other flagrant ones, being objected to him, he, and all thoſe who ſhould have any converſation with him, were put under a ſentence of Anathema, till he had cleared himſelf before the Council of all the imputations caſt upon him. However, notwithſtanding this, he ſeems to have been reſtored to favour; for the year following (if he was the ſame perſon with Bibliothecarius) he was ſent to Conſtantinople with the Counts Suppo and Everhard, Embaſſadors from the Emperor Lewis, and was preſent at the eight laſt which, if true, evidently proves, that it could not be entirely the compoſition of Anaſtaſius. The former part of this work was aſcribed to Pope Damaſus, who flouriſhed about the year 366; but this evidently appears falſe upon many accounts. Oudin (31) is of opinion, that this work is a Collection of Lives, which was compiled by Anaſtaſius, or ſome anonymous Writer, from various authors and treatiſes, to which the Compiler made ſeveral additions, and caſt it into his own form, and mixed his own barbarous ſtyle thro' the whole, that he might render it uniform, and induce the reader to think, that it was written by one Author. However Oudin imagines, that upon an attentive view of it he has diſcovered three or four diſtinct parts of it. The firſt conſiſts of three anonymous manuſcript Catalogues of the Popes, which being thrown together begin the Collection, and extend to about the year 500. This ſeems to be ſufficiently proved by the Continuators of Bollandus, who have introduced theſe Catalogues, and prefixed them to one volume of their Legends; which may be compared with the Lives of the old Popes in the Collection of Anaſtaſius, or whoever elſe was the author of it. The ſecond part extends from about the year 500 to 648 and the time of St. Martin; which part ſeems to have been compiled from ſuch materials as the author could procure, that the ſucceſſion of the Popes might not be interrupted. For if he could have found more, it is probable he would not have written in ſo ſhort and jejune a manner the Lives of thoſe Popes, from whoſe times he was not very remote. The third part ſeems to begin with the year 649, or the Life of St. Martin, in which part the anonymous Author takes a much greater ſcope than before, and gives an ample and circumſtantial account of the Lives of the Popes, as far as he could procure information concerning them; for he lived in the time of the ſixth general Council at Conſtantinople which was held in the year 680 or 681. And therefore it was in his power to write the Lives of the Popes from 648 with greater exactneſs, becauſe he might conſult thoſe, who were contemporary with thoſe Popes, and eye-witneſſes of their actions. It appears that the anonymous Author lived in thoſe times from a paſſage in the Life of Pope Leo II, where he ſays, that the ſixth Council had thro' the providence of God been lately held in the Imperial City. Hic ſuſcepit ſanctam ſextam Synodum, quæ per Dei providentiam nuper in regia urbe celebrata eſt, Græco eloquio conſcriptam. So that this writer lived about two hundred years before Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius, and wrote the Lives of the Popes to Sergius I, incluſively, that is, to the year 700 or 701, with a particular account of their character, birth, and qualifications of mind and body, which is the peculiar mark of a writer, who is contemporary with the perſons, whom he treats of. Francis Combefiſius likewiſe expreſly aſſerts in his Diſſertation upon the Acts of the ſixth Council (32), that the word nuper, i. e. "lately," inconteſtably proves, that this part cannot belong to Anaſtaſius, ſince he did not live near enough to that Council to write in that manner. The fourth part is written with the uſual brevity of Anaſtaſius or ſome anonymous Writer, who lived remote from thoſe times, without any account of the birth or other circumſtances of thoſe perſons, whom he treats of; and all the Lives follow in the ſame mothod, till by degrees they are more enlarged, as they came nearer to the time, in which the Writer lived. This ſeems to be the œconomy of this work De Vitis Romanorum Pontificum. Spanheim likewiſe in his Diſſertation concerning Pope Joan (33), printed at Leyden in 8vo 1691, ſays that he could never be induced to think, that the former part of this work was written by Pope Damaſus, or the latter part, including the Lives of Pope Benedict III, Nicholas I, and Adrian II, or John IX, by Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius. And he tells us in another place (34), that his reaſons why he could not incline to aſcribe them to Anaſtaſius, were as follow: 1. That neither Guillelmus Bibliothecarius, who is thought to have continued theſe Lives, nor Sigebertus in his Chronicle, or in his work De Scriptoribus Eccleſ. nor Trithemius in his book De Scriptor. Eccleſ. nor Platina in his Life of John IX, under whom he ſays Anaſtaſius was in great reputation, tho' he mentions his other tranſlations and writings with commendation, take the leaſt notice of this. Nay Platina ſays in his Preface, that all the Writers of the Lives of the Popes, except Damaſus, have no manner of elegance or ornament, which were not deſignedly avoided by them, but occaſion'd by their abſolute ignorance in point of Literature. Nullum florem orationis, nullam compoſitionem & elegantiam, non de induſtriâ ornatum fugientes, ſed inſcitia & ignorantia literarum. This character is very far from being ſuitable to our Anaſtaſius. 2. He never mentions this work, tho' he takes notice of his other tranſlations and collections, as particularly in his Epiſtle to John the Deacon, which Father Sirmond publiſhed among his Opuſcula. Beſides as he was extremely zealous in defence of Honorius, as appears from his Collectanea, which relate to the hereſy of the Monothelites, and was of opinion, that this people was unjuſtly accuſed, it is probable that he would have made ſome mention of the origin of that hereſy, which was falſely imputed to Honorius, if he had written his Life; whereas there is nothing of that kind in the Life of that Pope among thoſe aſcribed to Anaſtaſius. 3. It is generally agreed by Authors, particularly Guillelmus Bibliothecarius, Trithemius, Platina, and others, that he was a man of great eloquence, and exceedingly well skilled in the Greek and Latin tongues; ſo that he was engaged in a great many tranſlations from the Greek. But the Hiſtory aſcribed to him is abſolutely unworthy of him; and ſeems to have been written by a perſon, who was entirely ignorant of polite Learning, and whoſe ſtyle is full of barbariſms and ſoleciſms. 4. The authority of Onuphrius Panvinius is not ſufficient in oppoſition to theſe objections to determine

(e) Ibid. p. 144.

(f) Ibid. p. 145, 146.

(31) Col. 260.

(30) C. 3. apud Oudin. Col. 261.

(33) § lx. pag. 278, & ſeq.

(34) P. 279.

laſt Seſſions of the General Council there. In the year 871 he was ſent by Pope Adrian to Naples with the Abbot Ceſarius upon the cauſe of Athanaſius Biſhop of that city, where he excommunicated the Clergy and People on account of their obſtinacy. Upon the death of Adrian the 25th of November 872, and the ſucceſſion of John VIII, on the 14th of December, he was reſtored by the latter to the office of Library-keeper, and appointed his Secretary. At the deſire of this Pope, about the year 877 he tranſlated the Acts of the VIIth Oecumenical Council, which he had brought with him from the Eaſt, out of Greek into Latin, as Papebroch has ſufficiently proved from an antient manuſcript (g). How long he lived after this, is uncertain; but it is ſuppoſed that he was living till the year 887 (b). Theſe latter particulars are unqueſtionably to be underſtood of Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius; but it is not ſo very certain, whether they belong to Cardinalis or not. We ſhall examine this point in the Note [B]. However that be, Bibliothecarius was maſter of a ſhare of learning ſuperior to the generality of thoſe in that age; he was well ſkilled in Greek as well as Latin, and having lived for a conſiderable time at Conſtantinople, he had ſearched the Greek Libraries, and enquired after the Monuments of Literature every where. He cultivated a particular friendſhip with Photius and Hincmar, the moſt eminent men of that time. He was well ſkilled in the management of affairs, of a ſharp and ſubtle wit, and of great readineſs in diſputation

(g) Catalog. Romanor. Pontif. pag. 141. apud Cave, ubi ſupra, p. 471.

(b) Baronius ſays, that he lived till about 886.

an intelligent reader to aſcribe it to Anaſtaſius; tho' the editors of the edition at Mentz, and after them Charles Annibal Fabrotus urged this as a concluſive argument, unleſs we admit upon the ſame authority of Panvinius, that Pope Damaſus was the Author of the former part till the time of Silveſter, and that Guillelmus Bibliothecarius continued the Lives to Alexander II, who filled the See of Rome from the year 1061, and that Martinus Ciſtercienſis publiſhed the Collection of Lives till Honorius IV, beſides many abſurd and contradictory aſſertions of Panvinius. It is no wonder, continues Spanheim, that theſe Lives, the writer of which is unknown, ſhould appear under Anaſtaſius's name, ſince the Lives of the Popes of Rome had the name of Damaſus, and long after him that of Luitprandus Cremonenſis falſely prefixed to them. The latter is acknowledged by Lucas Holſtenius (35). The learned reader may ſee theſe points very amply diſcuſſed in Oudin's Commentarius (36), with an examination into the genuineſs of the famous paſſage concerning Pope Joan, which is to be found in ſome manuſcripts of this Collection of the Lives of the Popes. We ſhall give it as it was tranſcribed from a manuſcript of the King of France's Library by Claudius Sarravius, and ſent in a letter of his to Salmaſius in the year 1645 (37). Poſt hunc Leonem (quartum ſcilicet) Joannes Anglicus natione Moguntinus ſedit annis duobus, menſe uno, diebus quatuor, & mortuus eſt Romæ, & ceſſavit Epiſcopatus menſe uno. Hic, ut aſſeritur, fœmina fuit, & in puellari ætate à quodam ſuo amaſio in habitu virili Athenis ducta ſic in diverſis ſcientiis profecit, ut nullus ſibi par inveniretur; adeo ut poſt Romæ legens magnos Magiſtros, diſcipulos & auditores haberet. Et cum in urbe vita & ſcientia magnæ opinionis eſſet in Papam concorditer eligitur. Sed in Papatu per ſuum familiarem idem impregnatur. Verum tempus partûs ignorans cum de ſancto Petro in Lateranum tenderet anguſtiata inter Coliſæum & ſancti Clementis eccleſiam peperit; & poſt mortua ibidem, ut dicitur, ſepulta fuit. Et quia Dominus Papa, cum vadit ad Lateranum, eandem viam ſemper obliquat creditur à pluribus quod ob deteſtationem facti hoc faciat. Nec ponitur in catalogo Pontificum propter muliebris ſexus deformitatem quantum ad hoc. i. e. "After this "Leo IV, John of England, born at Mentz held "the See two years, one month, and four days, "and died at Rome; and the Popedom was vacant "for one month. This Pope, as it is affirmed, was "a woman, who whilſt ſhe was young was carried "by a lover of hers to Athens in the habit of a man, "where ſhe made ſuch a prodigious progreſs in the "different ſciences, that there was not one perſon "equal to her. So that when ſhe afterwards read "lectures at Rome, ſhe had ſeveral eminent Doctors "for her ſcholars and hearers; and having raiſed "herſelf a great reputation in that city by her life "and learning, ſhe was unanimouſly elected Pope. "But during the Papacy ſhe was got with child by "her former Gallant; and being ignorant of the "time when ſhe ſhould be brought to bed, as ſhe was "going from St. Peter's to the Lateran between the "Coliſæum or Amphitheatre of Veſpaſian and the "Church of St. Clement, ſhe was ſeized with the "pangs of child-birth; and afterwards dying ſhe "was, as it is ſaid, buried there. And becauſe the "Pope, when he goes to the Lateran, always turns "out of that way, it is thought by many perſons "that he does it out of abhorrence to this fact. "This Pope is not placed in the Catalogue of the "other Popes on account of the unfitneſs of her "ſex in this reſpect."

(35) In Collect. Roman. Part 2. p. 121. ad Breviarium Synodi ſub Leone IV.

(36) Vol. 2. ubi ſupra.

(37) Vide Cl. Sarravii Epiſtol. p. 172, 173, 174. edit. Arauſion. 1654.

[B] We ſhall examine this point.] Several eminent Writers are of opinion, that Cardinalis and Bibliothecarius are the ſame perſon; and particularly Voſſius (38), Lambecius (39), and Sagittarius (40). But Labbe, Ciampinus, and others, are of the contrary opinion. Voſſius's aſſertion is ſtrengthen'd by the conſideration, that they were both Prieſts of the Church of Rome, both Library-keepers, both lived at the ſame time, and ſerved the ſame Popes. However Labbe charges Voſſius and his followers with an error in confounding the two Anaſtaſius's together; though he mentions no reaſon, and urges no authority for this againſt Voſſius. But Dr. Cave imagines that the moſt proper method to determine this controverſy is to examine how far Anaſtaſius proceeded in writing the Lives of the Popes. It is the general opinion of the Learned that he concluded with Nicholas I, which opinion is eſpouſed by Voſſius. Ciampinus, who has made a more accurate enquiry into this work, having laid down ſome critical rules, in order to judge more exactly of the ſtyle of a writer, examines that of this book (41), and ſhews, that it was written by ſeveral Authors beſides Anaſtaſius. He concludes at laſt (42), that Anaſtaſius wrote only the Lives of Gregory IV, Sergius II, Leo IV, Benedict II, and Nicholas I; and that the reſt, which precede Gregory, and follow Nicholas, were compiled by other authors. If this hypotheſis be true, Dr. Cave does not doubt but that there were two Anaſtaſius's, which he concludes from this argument eſpecially, that both in the Life of Leo IV, and Benedict III, there is a direct account given of the depoſition of Anaſtaſius, and it is expreſly affirmed, that he was canonically depoſed, and this almoſt in the ſame words, which are found in the Acts of that Council at Rome under Leo IV. Now it is very improbable that Anaſtaſius Cardinalis ſhould relate this of himſelf. In ſhort there ſeems to have been a great diſparity between the temper and conduct of the two men. However after all, ſeveral men of eminent learning have thought that Anaſtaſius had no manner of ſhare in writing the Lives of the Popes, as we have ſeen in the preceding note; and we may add here, that this was likewiſe the opinion of Flor. Martinellus, who was many years Keeper of the Vatican Library, in his book De Româ ex Ethnicâ ſacrâ (43), ten or eleven of whoſe reaſons are mentioned by Ciampinus (44). This was alſo the opinion of Dr. Pearſon Biſhop of Cheſter (45), who affirms, that he never ſaw any thing to induce him to think, that Anaſtaſius was the Author of that book, except his name, which was to be found in a few manuſcripts; nor was it ever aſſerted by any writer before the 14th or 15th Century, that he had compiled a work of that kind. T.

(38) De Hiſt. Lat. l. 2. c. 35.

(39) Commentar. Bibl. Vindob. l. 8. p. 271.

(40) Introduct. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. c. 8. n. 3. p. 42.

(41) See Ciampin. Examen. Lib. Pontif. Rom. 1688, 4to. Sect. 3, 4, 5, 6.

(42) Ib. Sect. 11. p. 105.

(43) P. 409. apud Cave, ubi ſupra, P. 471.

(44) Ubi ſupra, Sect. 1. p. 27.

(45) De Succeſſ. Diſſert. 1. c. 11. n. 6. p. 128.

tation and writing. Mr. Du Pin (i) obſerves likewiſe, that he was an excellent Politician, and ſtrongly attach'd to the intereſts of the church of Rome.

(i) Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 7. p. 197. edit. de Paris 1696.

☞ANATOLIUS, an eminent writer among the Chriſtians, was born at Alexandria, and was Biſhop of Laodicea in Syria. He flouriſhed about the year 270 (a), under the Emperors Carus and Probus (b). He was a perſon of uncommon learning and abilities, as appeared from his book concerning Eaſter, and his other works [A]. He was exceedingly well ſkilled in Arithmetic, Geometry, Aſtronomy, Natural Philoſophy, Logic and Rhetoric. Theſe qualifications raiſed his character to ſuch a degree of eminence, that he was deſired by the people of Alexandria to eſtabliſh a School for the Ariſtotelian Philoſophy, after the manner of the Platonic School. Valeſius in his notes upon Euſebius (c) imagines, that he was the ſame with Anatolius, who, as Eunapius tells us (d), was the Preceptor of Jamblichus the Philoſopher; but this is a very groſs error; for there is a conſiderable difference in the times wherein they lived. There is ſtill extant a fragment of an Epiſtle of Jamblichus to Anatolius concerning Juſtice in Stobœus (e), and likewiſe ſeveral Letters of Libanius to him not yet publiſhed; but it is certain that this Anatolius was Governor of a Province, and did not profeſs the Chriſtian Religion. Our Author gained a great reputation at Alexandria, and was extremely valued and honoured by the greateſt men there. While he lived in that city, he gave a remarkable inſtance of his addreſs and policy [B]. At laſt leaving that city, he went to Syria, where Theotecnus (f), Biſhop of Cæſarea Palæſtina, ordained him Biſhop, and promiſed him that he ſhould ſucceed him in his See; and it is certain, that he aſſiſted Theotecnus for ſome time in the government of it. Afterwards in his journey to Antioch, paſſing through Laodicea, he was detained by the inhabitants of that city, and elected Biſhop in the room of Euſebius, who was juſt dead (g). We

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Litterar. p. 87. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(b) Hieronym. de Viris Illuſt. c. 73.

(c) Annotat. in lib. 7. cap. 32.

(d) In Vitâ Jamblichi, non longè ab initio.

(e) Serm. ix. p. 164.

(f) Dr. Cave and Olearius calls him Theotechnus, which is an error, for the Greek is Θεότεκνος.

(g) Euſeb. Hiſt Eccleſ. l. 8. c. 32.

[A] His book concerning Eaſter, and his other works.] Euſebius (1) tells us, that he did not write very many books; but thoſe, which were extant in his time, ſhewed the vigor and beauty of his eloquence, and the extent and variety of his learning; eſpecially that piece, wherein he defended his opinion concerning Eaſter. Ὅυμοι οὖν ἐσπεδώθη πλῦσα τῷ Ἀνατολίῳ συγγράμματα. Τοσαῦτα δὲ εἰς ἡμᾶς ἐλήλυθε, δι' ὧν αὐτοῦ καταμαθεῖν δυνατόν ὁμοῦ τό τε λόγιον καὶ πολυμαθές· ἐν οἷς μάλιστα τὸν περὶ τοῦ πάσχα δόξαν παρίστησιν. The Hiſtorian gives an extract of Anatolius's Paſchal Canons (2). An incorrect and imperfect tranſlation of this work, which ſeems to have ſuffered extremely from the negligence or ignorance of the tranſcribers, was firſt publiſhed at Antwerp in 1634 in fol. by Ægidius Bucherius, and illuſtrated with a very learned Commentary, at the end of the Canon Paſchalis of Victorius. The tranſlation of it is ancient, but it is not certain whether it was done by Ruffinus or not; however it is extremely obſcure and inaccurate. Dr. Cave aſſerts that this piece is genuine. But Du Pin ſeems to doubt of the authority of it. He owns, that the Fragment cited by Euſebius is to be found entire in the Latin, and that the paſſages quoted by Bede are exactly word for word in it. But he ſays, that it is not at all ſurprizing, that an impoſtor may have inſerted in it the paſſage mentioned by Euſebius, which was eaſily to be found; and that this work might have been forged before Bede's time. However he acknowledges, that he thinks this Canon is antient, tho' full of errors, and probably a little corrupted by the tranſlator. Dr. Cave is extremely ſurprized, that Du Pin ſhould attempt to ſuſpect the genuineſs of this piece, without mentioning any reaſon for it, or producing any manuſcripts, or the teſtimonies of any of the Fathers for that purpoſe; and ſhould only reply with regard to the Fragment quoted by Euſebius, that it might eaſily have been found and inſerted by ſome impoſtor in a book of his own compoſition. Let thoſe who are ſkilled in ſacred criticiſm conſider what a tendency ſuch a method of reaſoning will have; ſince, if it be once admitted, there will be an end of almoſt all the writings of the ancients, which are generally proved to be genuine by this argument, above all others, that the paſſages quoted from them by the ancients are to be found in them. It is evident that the whole work of Anatolius is exactly uniform and conſiſtent, and appears to be written by one and the ſame hand. Interim mirari ſubit Cl. Du Pinium (3) hujus opuſculi fidem vellicare, nullâ ratione redditâ, nullis codicibus MSS. Patrumve teſtimoniis in hanc rem adductis; nec ad locum ab Euſebium citatum aliud, quod reſponderet, habet, quam facilè fieri potuiſſe, ut aliquis impoſtor locum ab Euſebio allatum, cum facilè potuit inveniri, operi ſuo inſeruerit. Videant verò criticæ ſacræ magiſtri, quò tendat hæc argumentandi ratio, quâ ſemel admiſſâ, actum erit de pleriſque antiquorum monumentis, quæ hoc præcipuè argumento genuina eſſe demonſtrari ſolent, quod loca ex illis à veteribus citata, in iis reperiuntur. Certè integrum Anatolii opuſculum ejuſdem commatis & coloris eſt, & ab unâ eademque manu profectum eſſe videtur (4). He wrote likewiſe Ten Books of Arithmetic (5); ſome extracts of which are ſtill extant, according to Valeſius (6), in the Θεολογούμενα τῆς Ἀριθμητικῆς publiſhed at Paris 1543 in 4to. But Dr. Cave is of opinion, that they do not belong to our Author, but were written by a Pythagorean, as Dr. Gale intimated to him. He left alſo ſome other monuments of his learning and skill, eſpecially in ſacred Literature (7).

(1) L. 8. c. 32.

(2) Ἐκ τῶν περὶ τοῦ πάσχα Ἀνατολίου κανόνων.

(3) Tom. 1. in Anatol.

(4) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(5) Euſeb. ubi ſupra, and St. Hieronym. de Viris Illuſtrib. c. 73.

(6) Annot. in Euſeb. l. 7. c. 32.

(7) Euſeb. ubi ſupra.

[B] While he lived in that city he gave a remarkable inſtance of his addreſs and policy.] During the ſiege of Bruchium or Pyruchium, which was a part of Alexandria, the inhabitants laboured under an extreme want of proviſion, which was a dreadful calamity. Anatolius, who was with the beſieged party, contrived this expedient for the relief of them. One part of the city was in alliance with the Roman army, and upon that account were exempt from the ſiege; and among them was Euſebius, whoſe fame had reached the knowledge of the Roman General. Anatolius ſent a Meſſenger privately to him in order to inform him of the number of thoſe, who were ready to periſh by the famine, during the ſiege. Upon which Euſebius deſired it as a favour of the Roman General, that he would ſpare thoſe, who ſhould come over from the enemy; which being granted, he immediately acquainted Anatolius with it. He being extremely glad of this promiſe from the General, called together the Senate of Alexandria; and at firſt began to perſuade them all to agree to terms with the Romans. But finding them exaſperated at this, he told them, that he did not doubt of their aſſenting to him, if he ſhould adviſe them to permit the ſuperfluous and uſeleſs multitude, and particularly the aged of both ſexes, and the children, to go out of the gates where they pleaſed. "For why, "ſays he, ſhould we retain them with us, when they "are juſt ready to expire? Why ſhould we deſtroy "thoſe with hunger, whoſe bodies are entirely "weaken'd and diſabled? Whereas it is proper only "to maintain thoſe, who are in the vigor of life, "among us, and to diſpenſe the neceſſary proviſi-"ons to thoſe, who are capable of defending the "city." Having drawn over the Senate to his ſentiments by theſe reaſons, he roſe up firſt, and declared his opinion, that all the weak multitude of both ſexes ſhould be ſent out of the city; ſince if they ſhould

We have no ſatisfactory account of him after that time. But ſome writers affirm, that he ſuffered martyrdom (h).

(h) See Cave, ubi ſupra.

ſhould continue, there was no hopes of ſafety, and they muſt all periſh with hunger. The whole Senate approving of this opinion, Anatolius ſaved almoſt all the beſieged. For he took care firſt that the Chriſtians, and then others of every age; and not only thoſe, to whom the Senate gave leave, but even a great many others eſcaped privately, having diſguiſed themſelves in women's apparel, and being conveyed by his means in the night out of the gates of the city; from whence they went over to the Roman camp. There they were entertained by Euſebius, who acted like a Father and Phyſician to them, and reſtored them to their former health and vigor, tho' they had been emaciated by a long and ſevere ſiege (8). Mr. Tillemont places this under the reign of Gallienus, in the year 263 (9). T.

(8) Idem, ibid.
(9) Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 3. part 3. p. 974, 975. edit. Bruxelles 1693.

ANAXAGORAS, one of the moſt celebrated Philoſophers of antiquity, was born at Clazomenæ in Ionia, about the ſeventieth Olympiad, and was a diſciple of Anaximenes. His noble extraction, his richneſs, and the generoſity which induced him to reſign his whole patrimony to his relations [A], gained him a high character. He applied himſelf entirely to the ſearch of nature, without concerning himſelf with public affairs. Upon this he was aſked, whether he had any concern for his country: the anſwer he gave was ſuch, that no Chriſtian Philoſopher could have returned a better. Yes, ſaid he, lifting up his hands towards heaven, I am extremely concerned for my country (a). Being aſked, another time, for what end he was born; to contemplate the Sun, anſwered

(a) Ex Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 6, 7.

(5) Ariſtot. Eudemior. lib. 5. cap. 7. p. 184.
(6) Σοφὸς μὲν, φρονίμους δ' οὐ φασιν εἶναι ὅταν ἰδωσιν ἀγνοοῦντας τὰ συμφέροντα αὐτοῖς. Ariſtot. Eudemior. lib. 5. cap. 7. p. 184.
(7) See the 8th paragraph of the Plan of this Dictionary, at the end of the laſt volume.
(8) Philo de vita contemplativa.
(9) I quote his words in Rem. [B] of the article DEMOCRITUS.
(10) Philoſtrat. in vita Apollon. lib. 1. cap. 8.
(11) Himer. ap. Phot. p. 1088.
(12) Lact. l. 3. cap. 22. Origines contra Celſum, lib. 2.
(13) See his 7th Homily on the Acts of the Apoſtles, p. 67. Paris edition of 1636.
(14) See Rutilius Numatianus in his Itinerary. I have related ſome of his words at the end of Remark [E] in the article ADAMITES.
(15) Philoſt. in vita Apollon. l. 1. cap. 8. This paſſage has been wretchedly tranſlated by Vigenere, who makes the Author ſay, that Anaxagoras having betaken himſelf to the feeding of white beaſts and camels, had employed his Philoſophy more to the advantage of beaſts than men. The Latin tranſlation of Rhinuccinus is no leſs faulty. Aiebat Clazomenium Anaxagoram gregibus & camelorum armentis nutriendis intentum, pecorum gratia magis quam hominum philoſophatum eſſe.
(16) Euſeb. Præp. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 14. p. 750.
(17) See Plutarch's words in the citation (19).

[A] He reſigned his whole patrimony to his relations.] Before the Goſpel had taught men, that they muſt renounce the world and its riches, in order to attain, in a ſhort time, to a great degree of virtue, ſome Philoſophers were ſenſible of it, and had parted with their earthly goods, that they might more freely apply themſelves to the ſtudy of wiſdom, and the ſearch of truth. They were perſuaded, that the cares of a family, and of an inheritance, were ſo many clogs that prevented men from advancing towards the object, which moſt of all deſerves their affections. Anaxagoras and Democritus (1) were of this number. Quid ergo, ſays Tully (2), aut Homero ad delectationem animi ac voluptatem, aut cuiquam docto defuiſſe unquam arbitramur? An ni ita ſe res haberet, Anaxagoras, aut hic ipſe Democritus, agros & patrimonia ſua reliquiſſent, huic diſcendi quærendique divinæ delectationi toto ſe animo dediſſent? i. e. "What delight therefore or pleaſure could ever "be wanting to Homer or any learned man? If it "were not ſo, would Anaxagoras or Democritus "have left their eſtates and their patrimony, and "given themſelves up entirely to this divine pleaſure "of enquiring and learning?" It was to this renouncing of earthly things that Anaxagoras owned himſelf indebted for his wiſdom, or, to uſe his own expreſſion, for his ſafety. Quali porro ſtudio Anaxagoram flagraſſe credimus? qui cum è diutina peregrinatione patriam repetiiſſet, poſſeſſioneſque deſertas vidiſſet, "Non eſſem, inquit, ego ſalvus niſi ita periiſſent (3). i. e. "With what deſire muſt we think "Anaxagoras to have been inflamed, who when he "returned to his country after long travelling, and "found his eſtate gone to ruin, ſaid, If theſe things "had not been loſt, I ſhould not have been ſafe." Socrates, ſpeaking, as he generally uſes, ironically, ſhews that the Sophiſts of his time were wiſer than Anaxagoras, becauſe inſtead of renouncing, as he had done, their eſtates, they endeavoured, to the utmoſt of their power, to heap up riches, being cured of the folly that prevailed in ancient times, and convinced, that true wiſdom conſiſts in taking care of one's own intereſt; that is, in the art of getting money. Τουτέτου γὰρ Ἀναξαγόρα φασὶ συμβῆναι ἢ ὑμῶν. καταλιπόντα γὰρ αὐτῷ πολλὰν χρημάτων καταμελῆσαι, καὶ ἀπολέσαι πάντα. ὥστε αὐτὸν ὑμῶν σοφώτερον. λέγουσι δὲ καὶ περὶ ἄλλων τῶν παλαιῶν ἕτερα τοιαῦτα. τοῦτο μὲν οὖν μοὶ δοκεῖς καλὸν τεκμήριον ἀποφαίνειν περὶ σοφίας τῶν νῦν πρὸς τοὺς πρότερον· καὶ πολλοὺς συνοίσει, ὅτι γοῦν σοφὸν αὐτὸν αὐτῷ μᾶλλον δὴ σοφὸν εἶναι. τοῦτο δ' ὅρος ἐστὶν ἄκρος, ὃς ἂν πλοῦτον ἀργύριον ἀγάσηται (4). i. e. "It was "quite otherwiſe with Anaxagoras than with you: "for when he had an ample fortune, he let it all "run to waſte; and ſo philoſophized fooliſhly. And "many ſuch things are told of other ancients. "Wherefore you ſeem to me to have judged right-"ly, that the preſent Philoſophy is preferable to that "of our anceſtors. And many agree in this, that a "wiſe man ought principally to be wiſe for himſelf, "that is to get as much money as he can." This puts me in mind of a diſtinction I have read in Ariſtotle. Anaxagoras, ſays he (5), Thales, and ſuch like Philoſophers were deemed wiſe men, but not prudent; becauſe they were ignorant of what was profitable (6): they knew abſtruſe, ſublime, wonderful, and divine things, but which were of no uſe to them; for they did not mind the advantages and conveniences of life. This is the way of thinking of a great many men: they like no calling, but what ſerves to make a fortune. Whatever does not treat de pane lucrando, or is of no uſe πρὸς τὰ ἄλφιτα, that is, according to the modern expreſſion, to make the pot boil, ſeems to them vain and ſuperfluous (7). Anaxagoras was of a quite different opinion. He left his lands to the mercy of the cattle, to apply himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of Aſtronomy and natural Philoſophy. This is what Philo (8), Plutarch (9), Philoſtratus (10), Himerius (11), and Suidas ſpeak of: Democritus and Crates are always mentioned by ſuch as handle this ſubject. Even the Fathers of the Church take notice of the contempt which the ancient Philoſophers ſhewed for earthly things (12): but St. Chryſoſtom (13) is of opinion, that it ought to be called a folly and ſtupidity, rather than a true contempt of riches. The Devil, adds he, has always ſtudied to cry down and diſcredit God's creatures, becauſe men have not been capable of making good uſe of their wealth. This is paying the Heathens in their own coin; for they look'd upon ſuch Chriſtians, as reſigned their eſtates, and retired into ſolitudes, as fools and mad-men (14). Thus all things are liable to be blamed or commended according to the different prejudices men are led by. I obſerve that Apollonius Tyaneus taxed Anaxagoras with having a greater regard for the beaſts, than for men (15). But ſuch a cenſure is a mere cavil; for, not to mention the advantages that accrue to men from public paſtures, had not Anaxagoras reaſon to believe, that his relations would take care to till the lands he forſook? The four verſes Sit vos non vobis &c. we read in Virgil's Life, contain a great truth, viz. that the care, which is taken of oxen, ſheep, &c. redounds to the good of mankind. Euſebius has been more favourable to Anaxagoras than Apollonius; for he mentions the forſaking of his lands, to prove that he was more addicted to the ſtudy of natural Philoſophy than any other Philoſopher. Φασὶ γοῦν ὡς ἄρα οὗτος μάλιστα παρὰ τοὺς πρὸ αὐτοῦ ἐθαύμασε φυσιολογίαν. μηλόβοτον γέ τοι τὴν ἑαυτοῦ χώραν ἀφ' αὑτὴν εἴασι (16). i. e. "He excelled all that went before him in natural "Philoſophy, for the ſake of which he forſook his "fruitful paſtures." In the common tranſlation, by Francis Viger, obſerve, that μηλόβοτον χώραν ought to have been tranſlated thus, agros ovibus depaſcendos, and not agros magnitudine paſtionis uberrimos.

(1) See Remark [B] of the Article DEMOCRITUS.
(2) Cicero Tuſculan. lib. 5. circa finem.
(3) Val. Maximus, lib. 8. c. 7. num. 6, in Externis.
(4) Plato in Hippia majore, and not in Phædro, according to Mr. Menage's quotation in Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 6. p. 1246.

We have ſtill ſome obſervations to make on the diſintereſtedneſs of Anaxagoras. He was a man exceedingly well qualified for publick employments; for his advice not only proved ſerviceable, but neceſſary, to the perſon that governed the Athenians (17). Nevertheleſs he never cared to meddle with the government; nor would make uſe of the credit and authority of Pericles to raiſe himſelf to honours, but confined anſwered he, the Moon, and the Heavens (b). Accordingly he placed the ſupreme good, or the end of human life, in contemplation, and in the free ſtate which it occaſions (c). He was but twenty, when he began to philoſophize in Athens (d). We are told by ſome writers, that he was the firſt that removed thither the School of Philoſophy, which had flouriſhed in Ionia, from the time of Thales its founder, which I ſhall examine in the article ARCHELAUS. It is certain he had ſeveral diſciples of great note in Athens, and namely Pericles and Euripides, to whom ſome add Themiſtocles and Socrates; but as to Themiſtocles, their opinion is inconſiſtent with Chronology (e). Nothing can give us a better notion of his ability and talents, than the progreſs the great Pericles made under his diſcipline; for it was he that inſpired him with that grave and majeſtic deportment, which rendered him ſo fit to govern the Republick (f). He laid the firſt foundations of that ſublime and victorious eloquence, which made his diſciple ſo powerful (g), and taught him to fear the Gods, without ſuperſtition (h). To all this we may add, that he helped him greatly with his advice, to bear the heavy burthen of the government (i). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the novelty and ſingularity of his Philoſophy. For he held that there were hills, valleys, and inhabitants in the Moon; and that the Sun was a maſs of fire [B], bigger than Peloponneſus (k). He maintained that the ſnow is black (l); becauſe ſnow, ſaid he, is but condenſed water, (b) Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 16.

(c) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 2. pag. 416.
(d) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 97.
(e) Plutarch. in Themiſtoc. p. 112.
(f) Idem, in Pericle, p. 154.
(g) See note [E] of the Article PERICLES, near the end.
(h) See note [A] and [B] in the article PERICLES.
(i) See quotation (19).
(k) Diog. Laertius lib. 2. num. 8.
(l) Cicero Academ. Quæſtion. lib. 2. c. 23. and 31. Lactant. l. 5. cap. 3.

fined himſelf to philoſophical ſpeculations, having quite ſubdued that ambition, which many wiſe men cannot withſtand, tho' not ſo skilled in State affairs, as he was, nor ſupported with the protection and favour of men in power. No doubt but Tully had him particularly in view, when ſpeaking of ſome great men, he ſaid, that it was a great misfortune to the Public, that they had given themſelves entirely up to the ſtudy of nature. Eadem autem alii prudentia, ſed conſilio ad vitæ ſtudia diſpari, quietem atque otium ſequuti, ut Pythagoras, Democritus, Anaxagoras, à regendis civitatibus totos ſe ad cognitionem rerum tranſtulerint, quæ vita propter tranquillitatem, & propter ipſius ſcientiæ ſuavitatem, qua nihil eſt hominibus jucundius, plures, quam utile fuit rebus publicis, delectavit (18). i. e. "The ſame wiſdom has "been embraced by others, but to a different purpoſe of life, the enjoyment of quiet and reſt; as "Pythagoras, Democritus and Anaxagoras left the "government of Cities to ſtudy the knowledge of "things, which kind of life, on account of its tranquillity, and the very ſweetneſs of knowledge itſelf, than which nothing is more delightful to men, "has drawn away more than is conſiſtent with the "public good." He not only deſpiſed honours; but did not ſo much as take care to provide what was neceſſary for his maintenance. He was ſo far from hoarding up riches, as he might eaſily have done by means of the credit and authority of Pericles, that he did not even reflect on the neceſſities of old age. His enquiries into the ſecrets of nature ſtifled all other paſſions. However he was ſenſible at laſt, that his contempt for riches had been too great; for in his old age he was reduced to ſuch poverty, that he had not whereupon to ſubſiſt. In ſuch ſtraits, he reſolved, with great ſedateneſs of mind, to ſtarve himſelf to death, but was prevented by Pericles. Let us hear Plutarch: Pericles, ſays he (19), relieved a great many poor people with his riches, and among others Anaxagoras: of whom it is recorded, that Pericles being ſo much taken up with other affairs, that he could not mind him, he found himſelf forſaken by every body in his old age, and in that neceſſity lay down with his head wrapt up, reſolved to periſh with hunger. Which Pericles having notice of went immediately to him, and earneſtly entreated him to alter his reſolution, bewailing not ſo much the misfortune of Anaxagoras, as his own, becauſe he ſhould loſe in him ſuch a faithful and wiſe Counſellor in public affairs. Then Anaxagoras uncovered his face, and ſaid, Pericles, thoſe who want the light of a lamp, pour oil into it, to keep it in. Here is another inſtance of his contempt of honours. They offered to pay to his memory whatever honours he pleaſed; but he rejected this offer, deſiring only, that the day of his death might be a play-day for Scholars. Τὰς διδομένας ἀφεὶς τιμὰς, ἠτήσατο τὴν ἡμέραν ἐκείνην καθ' ἣν ἂν τελευτήσῃ τὰς παῖδας ἀφιέναι παίζειν σχολάζειν ἀπὸ τῶν μαθημάτων (20). "Declining the honours "that were offered him, he deſired that the day of "his death ſhould be a day of diſmiſſion to the boys "from ſchool." Did he not thereby deſire that his death might be a ſubject of pleaſure to many, and not of affliction? Does not this plainly ſhew that he had an utter contempt for every thing that flatters moſt the vanity of mortals?

(18) Cicero de Oratore, lib. 3. cap. 15 (and not lib. 2. according to Mr. Menage's quotation on Diogenes Laertius num. 7,) folio (91) [B].
(19) Plutarch. in vita Periclis, p. 162. I follow Amiot's tranſlation.
(20) Idem, in Præcept. Reipub. gerendæ p. 820, D. Diogenes Laertius varies in the circumſtances, as we have ſeen in the text of this article.

It will not be amiſs to make two ſhort reflections on the paſſage of Pericles's life. It informs us, that Anaxagoras was very well skilled in Politics, though he only profeſſed ſpeculative Philoſophy. Why then may we not aſcribe to him the treatiſe de Regno, out of which Ælian quotes a ſentence (21)? Granting it to have been written by another Anaxagoras, as Meurſius and Menage ſuppoſe it to have been (22); yet that is not ſufficiently proved by the reaſon Menage produces (23), which he himſelf would have been ſenſible of, had he minded that paſſage in Plutarch. This is my firſt reflection. The other is, that our Philoſopher's ſuppoſed old age does not agree with what others relate, viz. that he came to Athens at the age of twenty, and lived there thirty years. He muſt then have received the viſit of Pericles, which Plutarch mentions, before he was above fifty. I ſhall conclude with a paſſage out of Ovid, from whence we may infer, that the firſt Aſtronomers muſt needs have been men free from all ſenſuality, and from the cares that attend thoſe who aſpire to honours, or ſeek after riches. Anaxagoras is an eminent inſtance of it.

(21) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 14.
(22) See the notes of Kuhnius on this paſſage of Ælian.
(23) Alius igitur fuerit ab Anaxagora noſtro, &c. Menag. in Laert. lib. 2. num. 7. He deduces this conſequence from Anaxagoras's not concerning himſelf in the government.

Felices animos quibus hæc cognoſcere primis;
Inque domos ſuperas ſcandere cura fuit!
Credibile eſt illos pariter vitiiſque locisque
Altius humanis exſeruiſſe caput.
Non Venus & vinum ſublimia pectora fregit;
Officiumque fori, militiæve labor.
Nec levis ambitio, perfuſaque gloria fuco;
Magnarumve fames ſollicitavit opum.
Admovere oculis diſtantia ſydera noſtris,
Ætheraque ingenio ſuppoſuere ſuo.
Sic petitur cælum, non ut ferat Oſſan Olympus;
Summaque Peliacus ſydera tangat apex.
Nos quoque ſub ducibus cælum metabimur illis,
Ponemuſque ſuos ad ſtata ſigna dies (24).

(24) Ovid. Faſtor. lib. 1. ver. 297, & ſeq.

"Thrice happy ſouls, to whom it firſt was giv'n
"To reach the lofty courts of higheſt heav'n.
"They knew the art to raiſe th' exalted mind,
"Above the ſeats and faults of human kind.
"No ſlaves to Venus, or the wrangling bar,
"Or flowing bowls or labours of the war.
"No light ambition, or falſe glory ſway'd
"Their minds, nor wealth to any crimes betray'd,
"Their mighty ſouls could lead the captive skies,
"And place the diſtant ſtars before our eyes.
"The heav'nly manſions thus we may aſſault,
"And mount the lofty skies without a fault.
"To meaſure out the heav'ns they point the way,
"And to each ſign aſcribe its proper day.

[B] He held that the ſun was a maſs of fire.] I uſe this general expreſſion, becauſe the interpreters do not agree about the true meaning of theſe words of Diogenes Laërtius: Τὸν ἥλιον μύδρον εἶναι διάπυρον (25): ſome will have them to import a lump of red-hot iron, others a flaming ſtone, and ſome a fiery globe neither water, and all waters are naturally black (m); which is a very ſorry reaſon. He taught that our eyes are not capable of diſtinguiſhing the true colours of objects, that our ſenſes are fallacious, and conſequently, that in judging of things we ought to be led by reaſon, and not by them (n). He believed that the heavens were of ſtone (o), and prevented from falling down by the ſwiftneſs of their motion (p). Others ſay, that he believed the heavens to be of the nature of fire as to their eſſence, but that by their violent revolution, having drawn up ſtones from the earth, and kindled them, theſe ſtones became ſtars (q); he taught that the firſt animals were formed out of the earth, by means of a warm moiſtneſs (r), and that afterwards they engendred each other, the males on the right ſide, and the females on the left (s). He admitted as many different principles as compound bodies; for he ſuppoſed, that each ſpecies of bodies was made up of a great many particles of the ſame nature, which particles he called Homæomeriæ, by reaſon of their likeneſs. But this obliged him to admit a principle which perplexed his ſyſtem (t), viz. that each body contained the ſeeds, or principles of all the different ſpecies. Moreri has miſrepreſented this opinion [C]; though no leſs clearly explained than ſolidly confuted by Lucretius, which will afford us an occaſion of making ſome reflections

(25) Diog. Laertius lib. 2. num. 8.

(m) Sextus Empiricus Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. 1. cap. 13.

(n) Idem, adv. Mathem. lib. 7. p. 153.

(o) See the beginning of note [I].

(p) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 12.

(q) Plutarch. de Placitis Philoſoph. lib. 2. cap. 13. I follow Amiot's tranſlation.

(r) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 12.

(s) Id. ib. num. 9.

(t) See note [G].

of iron or ſtone. Videtur mihi Anaxagoras, ſays Caſaubon, per μύδρον διάπυρον non tam lapidem aut ferrum, quam globum quendam igneum λιθώδη & βαρὺν, ut ait Plutarchus, intelligere voluiſſe (26). Moſt of thoſe, who have mentioned this doctrine of Anaxagoras, have preferred the ſecond explanation to the other two, which entirely agrees with this Philoſopher's hypotheſis, as we ſhall hereafter make appear (27). I begin with Xenophon. Φάσκων δὲ τὸν ἥλιον λίθον διάπυρον εἶναι, καὶ τοῦτο ἠγνόει ὅτι λίθος μὲν ἐν πυρὶ ὢν οὔτε λάμπει, οὔτε πολὺν χρόνον ἀντέχει. ὁ δὲ ἥλιος τὸν πάντα χρόνον πάντων λαμπρότερος ὢν διαμένει (28). That is, according to Charpentier's verſion; Saying alſo, that the Sun was but a flaming ſtone, he did not reflect that a ſtone does not ſhine in the fire, nor can be long there without being conſumed; whereas the Sun continues always, and is an inexhauſtible ſource of light. Plato ſhall be my ſecond evidence. He introduces Socrates, who finding himſelf charged with ſaying that the Sun was a ſtone, and the Moon an earth (29) anſwers. They miſtake me for Anaxagoras, whoſe works are filled with ſuch diſcourſes, and they think, I am ſo ſilly as to teach young people ſuch abſurdities, who would laugh at me, if I aſcribed to myſelf a doctrine contained in the works of another man, which are ſold very cheap. As this paſſage gives but a general notion of Plato's words, it is reaſonable I ſhould ſet them down at length, for the ſatisfaction of ſuch as are not contented with the abſtract of an authority.

(26) If. Caſaubon. in hunc locum Diog. Laert.

(27) In note [I].

(28) Xenophon. Memorabil. l. 4.

(29) Τὸν μὲν ἥλιον λίθον φησὶν εἶναι, τὴν δὲ σελήνην γῆν. Plato, in Apologia Socratis, p. 21. A.

'Ανάξαγόρᾳ οἴει κατηγορεῖν, ὦ φίλε Μέλιτε. καὶ οὕτω καταφρονεῖς τῶνδε, καὶ οἴει αὐτοὺς, ἀπείρους γραμμάτων εἶναι, ὥστε οὐκ εἰδέναι ὅτι τ' 'Ανάξαγόρᾳ βιβλία τοῦ Κλαζομενίου γέμει τούτων τῶν λόγων. καὶ δὴ καὶ οἱ νέοι ταῦτα παρ' ἐμοῦ μανθάνουσιν ἃ ἔξεστιν ἐνίοτε, εἰ πάνυ, πολλοῦ, δραχμῆς ἐκ τῆς ὀρχήστρας, πριαμένοις, Σωκράτους καταγελᾶν, ἐὰν προσποιῆται ἑαυτοῦ εἶναι ἄλλως τε καὶ οὕτως ἄτοπα ὄντα (30).

(30) Id. ibid.

i. e. "You ſeem, my friend Melitus, to accuſe Anaxagoras, and ſo you deſpiſe theſe, and think them illiterate, as not knowing that the books of Anaxagoras the Clazomenian are full of ſuch opinions. And ſhall the young men learn ſuch things of me? who, as they can buy them, though they were ever ſo many, for a trifle at publick ſales would laugh at Socrates, if he was to put them off as his own, eſpecially when they are ſo abſurd." You will find in Plutarch, that Anaxagoras was condemned as an impious man for ſaying, that the Sun was a ſtone (31). St. Cyril of Alexandria (32) and St. Auſtin (33) are to be counted among thoſe, who have ſaid, that the Sun, according to Anaxagoras, was a blazing ſtone. Suidas tranſlates the μύδρον διάπυρον of Diogenes Laërtius πύρινον λίθον; and therefore I am ſurprized, that Charpentier ſhould ſay, that Anaxagoras maintained the Sun to be a lump of red hot iron (34).

(31) Plutarch. de Superſtit. pag. 169. E.

(32) Cyrillus, lib. 6. contra Julian.

(33) Auguſt. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 18. cap. 41.

(34) Charpentier, vie de Socrate, p. 7.

[C] Moreri has miſrepreſented this opinion, though no leſs clearly explained, than ſolidly confuted by Lucretius.] In this remark I ſhall collect all Moreri's miſtakes.

1. He fancies, that Anaxagoras taught, that the principles of things contained the characters of the parts; for as gold is compoſed of ſmall particles united together; ſo this great world is compoſed of ſuch like particles, which make up the whole, and are the primum mobile of all things. What nonſenſe! what obſcurity! could ever Heraclitus have expreſſed in a more unintelligible manner? To what purpoſe is the example he produces of gold compoſed of ſmall particles knit together? Is that peculiar to gold, and not common to all mixed bodies? Should he not have added, that the ſmall particles gold is made up of, are likewiſe of gold? This is what Anaxagoras held: He believed that a viſible bone was made up of many inviſible ones; and that the blood, we ſee, was compoſed of a great many ſmall drops, each of them being likewiſe blood; and this is the reaſon why he called his principles ὁμοιομερείας (35), ſimilaritates. Read the following verſes of Lucretius.

(35) Plut. de Placit. Philoſoph. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 876. Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 8.

Nunc & Anaxogoræ ſcrutemur Homœomerian,
Quam Græci memorant, nec noſtra dicere lingua
Concedit nobis patrii ſermonis egeſtas.
Sed tamen ipſam rem facile eſt exponere verbis
Principium rerum quam dicit Homœomerian.
Oſſa videlicet e pauxillis atque minutis
Oſſibu'; ſic & de pauxillis atque minutis
Viſceribus viſcus gigni; ſanguenque creari
Sanguinis inter ſe multis coeuntibu' guttis;
Ex aurique putat micis conſiſtere poſſe
Aurum; & de terris terram concreſcere parvis;
Ignibus ex ignem, humorem ex humoribus eſſe.
Cætera conſimili fingit ratione, putatque (36).

(36) Lucret. l. 1. verſ. 830.

That is,

" Now let's examine with a curious eye
" Anaxagoras his Philoſophy,
" By copious Greece term'd Homœomery:
" For which our Latin language, poor in words,
" Not one expreſſive ſingle voice affords:
" Yet by an eaſy ſhort Periphraſis
" We plainly can diſcover what it is.
" For this it means: that bones of minute bones,
" That fleſh of fleſh, and ſtones of little ſtones,
" That nerves take other little nerves for food,
" That blood is made of little drops of blood;
" That gold from parts of the ſame nature roſe,
" That earths do earth, fires fire, airs air compoſe,
" And ſo in all things elſe alike to thoſe.

Creech.

I ſhall only inſiſt upon the firſt reaſon Lucretius produces againſt this opinion, without mentioning the others. He ſhews, that if this opinion were true, the firſt principles of bodies would be as liable to corruption, as the moſt compounded bodies themſelves. This conſequence is attended with two great difficulties: The firſt is, that in the hypotheſis of Anaxagoras, there is no difference between the principles and the compounds. The difference I ſpeak of, conſiſts in this, that the principles (37) ought always to remain the ſame, let the mixt bodies be ever ſo often deſtroyed. The compounds are produced, deſtroyed, and are ſubject to a thouſand viciſſitudes of generation and corruption; but as to the principles, they maintain, without the leaſt alteration, the ſame nature under all the forms that are ſucceſſively produced. This is what Anaxagoras could not ſay of his principles; for if the principles of fleſh, for inſtance, were themſelves of fleſh, they would be no leſs ſubject to corruption, than a great lump of fleſh; and ſo of the others, for he admitted no indiviſible parts in matter (38). We ſhall ſee hereafter (39) whether

(37) I mean the matter or the ſubjectum ex quo.

(38) Nec tamen eſſe ulla parte idem in rebus inane concedit, neque corporibus finem eſſe ſecundis. Lucret. lib. 1. verſe 843. But he admits no VOID, he grants no LEAST. Creech.

(39) In remark [G].

reflections on this doctrine. The moſt commendable part of Anaxagoras's ſyſtem was, that he was the firſt who maintained that an intelligent being had given motion to matter, whether he could have ſuppoſed that the principles, being eternal and uncreated, ought to have been incorruptible. The other difficulty is, that the deſtruction of the firſt principles differs not from what we call Annihilation; for when they ceaſe to be, they are not reſolved into any other thing, by reaſon of the ſimplicity, which is peculiar to them, and excludes all compoſition. They are then utterly deſtroyed and annihilated. Now human reaſon cannot apprehend the poſſibility of ſuch an alteration (40). The deſtruction of mixt bodies is not liable to this difficulty; for they continue in their principles; as for inſtance wood, though deſtroyed by fire, ſtill ſubſiſts as matter, or as an extended ſubſtance. There is therefore a great defect in the ſyſtem of Anaxagoras: his principles are compoſed both of matter and form, and conſequently have not that ſimplicity and immutability which order requires. Neither would he have removed this difficulty, by ſuppoſing that the intelligence, which preſides over generations, never ſuffers them to be deſtroyed. Would it not be a ſufficient difficulty, that they were liable of their own nature to corruption, and could not be preſerved from it but by a particular privilege, or rather by a miracle. I ſhall ſay nothing of their vaſt number, which is another very conſiderable defect, it being eſſential to every good ſyſtem, that few cauſes ſhould produce many effects.

(40) At neque recedere ad nihilum res poſſe, Neque autem creſcere ex nihilo, teſtor res ante probatas. Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 857. That is, "But I by former arguments have taught, That things nor periſh to, nor riſe from nought." Creech.

Lucretius was not aware to propoſe an objection, which would have quite overthrown Anaxagoras's whole hypotheſis. What induced this Philoſopher to admit ſuch Homœomeries, or Homogeneities was, that no being is made out of, or reduced to nothing (41). Now if the earth, for inſtance, had been formed of things that were not earth, it had been made out of nothing, and would be reduced to nothing, it having been once earth, it ſhould ever ceaſe to be earth. It muſt therefore be made of, and, when deſtroyed or corrupted, reduced to, earth. According to this way of reaſoning, there was no generation or corruption, no birth or death, properly ſpeaking. The production of a plant was merely the knitting together of many ſmall plants; and the deſtruction of a tree nothing but the diſuniting and diſperſing of many ſmall trees. We find, added he (42), that the ſimpleſt food, as bread and water, is converted into hair, veins, arteries, nerves, bones, &c. there muſt be therefore little hairs, veins and arteries in bread and water, which, though not perceived by our ſenſes, yet are viſible to our underſtanding. It is plain his ſyſtem was founded on a falſe ſuppoſition, viz. that ſomething would be made out of nothing, if the parts of the bread which afford nouriſhment to the bones, had not the nature of bones in the bread itſelf. It is amazing ſo great a genius ſhould argue in this manner. Was he not ſenſible that a houſe is not made out of nothing, though the materials it is built with are not a houſe? Is not a ſquare formed by four lines, none of which is a ſquare? Is not a coat made of ſeveral pieces of cloth, none of which is a coat? Is there any ſuch thing as creation in this? Since therefore in things done by art, the bare change of the figure and diſpoſition of parts, forms a whole, different as to its ſpecies and properties from each of its parts; could he not infer from thence, that nature, which is far more powerful than art, can form bones and veins, without joining together parts that are already bones and veins, by operating upon ſuch corpuſcles as are capable of receiving ſuch or ſuch a ſituation or figure? By this means what was not fleſh will become fleſh, without any thing being formed out of nothing. Had Lucretius ſtarted this difficulty againſt our Philoſopher's Homœomeries, he would have quite overſet his ſyſtem. I proceed to Moreri's other faults (43).

(41) Plutarch. de Placitis Philoſoph. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 876. Ariſtot. Phyſicor. lib. 1. cap. 4. p. 256.

(42) Plutarch. ibid.

(43) I ſhall not take notice of his miſtakes with regard to the quotations. He only quotes Plutarch in vita Niciæ (he ought to have ſaid Niciæ;) but he relates nothing of what Plutarch ſays there; and there are other treatiſes of Plutarch more fit to be quoted.

II. Anaxagoras, ſays he, was ſurnamed Νοῦς, or the mind, by reaſon of the ſubtilty of his doctrine. This reaſon is not mentioned by Diogenes Laertius, who tells us, in expreſs terms, that he was ſo called, becauſe he held that a ſpiritual Being had preſided in the diſentangling of the chaos (44). Timon (45) and Harpocration (46) give the ſame reaſon. I know Plutarch mentions the reaſon alledged by Moreri; but ſince that Author produces alſo the reaſon we find in Diogenes Laertius (47), and which is the moſt likely, Moreri ought not to have paſſed it over in ſilence.

(44) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 6.
(45) Timon Phliaſius in Sillis, apud Laertium, lib. 2. num. 8.
(46) Harpocrat. voce Ἀναξαγόρας.

III. He falſely charges our Anaxagoras with admitting of atoms (48). This blunder is more unpardonable, becauſe he had ſaid juſt before, that Anaxagoras held infinite parts in all bodies. Theſe two opinions claſh one with another; for though, generally ſpeaking, the ſyſtem of atoms does not exclude infinite particles, yet it excludes them from each particular body; ſince one of the reaſons of the Atomiſts is the avoiding of the abſurdities, which ariſe from an infinite diviſibility, which neceſſarily follows from the ſuppoſition of each body's being compoſed of infinite parts.

IV. It is falſe that Lucian feigns Anaxagoras to have been killed by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt. I ſhall quote hereafter (49) Lucian's words.

V. I know not on what grounds Moreri tells us, that Anaxagoras travelled into Egypt, where he learnt the ſecrets and myſteries of the Sages of that country. I do not remember to have read this in any of the ancients. As for Theodoret, I beg leave to place him among the moderns, with regard to the point in queſtion. He mentions indeed this journey of Anaxagoras (50); but is at the ſame time miſtaken in making this Philoſopher and Pythagoras contemporaries. But let that be as it will; Moreri ſtill deſerves to be cenſured, for not having quoted Theodoret, or any Author for that journey.

(47) I quote Plutarch's words in remark [D] quotation (62).

(48) See Lucretius's verſes, p. 208. quotation (36).

(49) In remark [K] quotation (156)

(50) Theodoret, de Græcis affect. Serm. 2. p. 489.

VI. He held that the Stars (they are Moreri's words) had at firſt an irregular motion, which at laſt became regular. Anaxagoras held no ſuch opinion; but on the contrary believed, if we give credit to Diogenes Laertius (51), that at firſt the Stars moved in ſuch a manner, that, heaven having the form of a vault, the Pole, which never ſets, was vertical to the earth, but afterwards leaned to one ſide. This ſhews that he had but a very imperfect knowledge of the Sphere. For he knew not, that the North-Pole, tho' inclining towards the Horizon of Ionia and ſeveral other countries, is no leſs vertical to ſome place of the earth, than it could be at the beginning. If he meant, that the North-Pole was formerly in the Zenith of Ionia, but afterwards declined towards the Horizon, he expreſſed himſelf very improperly, and muſt have held Ionia to have been at firſt a moſt wretched and unhappy country. Plutarch relates this in another manner. For he tells us, that Anaxagoras believed, that the world was compoſed, and the living creatures produced out of the earth, that the world inclined of itſelf (ἐκ τοῦ αὐτομάτου) to the South, perhaps by divine providence, (ἴσως ὑπὸ προνοίας), that ſome parts of it might be temperate and habitable, and others uninhabitable by reaſon of the exceſſive cold or ſcorching heat (52).

(51) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 9.

VII. Diogenes Laertius mentions no Orator, called Anaxagoras, who had been a diſciple to Socrates. He makes him a diſciple of Iſocrates (53).

(52) Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſoph. lib. 2. cap. 8. p. 887.

(53) Diog. Laert. l. 2. num. 15.

VIII. It is falſe that our Anaxagoras held that the ſimilar parts were the primum mobile. We ſhall ſee in the next Remark, that, according to his principles, the primum mobile was a ſpiritual being diſtinct from his Homœomeries. Had Moreri underſtood the Author of our Philoſopher's Life, he would not have been guilty of ſuch a miſtake. Ἐκ τῶν ὁμοιομερῶν μικρῶν σωμάτων τὸ πᾶν συγκεκρῖθαι καὶ νοῦν μὲν ἀρχὴν κινήσεως (54). i. e. "The whole is "compounded of the homœomeries of ſmall bodies, "and the mind is the principle of motion."

(54) Idem, ibid. num. 8.

IX. Moreri has not well expreſſed the ſenſe of the firſt part of Diogenes Laertius's Greek text, which I have now quoted. All this great univerſe, ſays he, is made up of ſimilar parts, which conſtitute the whole. I have already complained of the nonſenſe of theſe words; but now I ſhall examine them more fully, in order to ſhew, how a French Writer ought to avoid the equivocations he is liable to, when he forgets, that a phraſe, which was clear to the Greeks, becomes very obſcure in our age, if it be not expreſſed by a circumlocution. I do not intend by this to make an apology for Diogenes Laertius, who, in abridging the opinions of the Philoſophers, often knew not matter, and digeſted the chaos; whereas all the other Philoſophers till his time, in reaſoning on the formation of the world, had only admitted on one ſide an indigeſted maſs of matter, and on the other meer chance, or a blind fatality to put it in order [D]. And not himſelf what he ſaid. I wiſh Moreri had expreſſed himſelf thus: The univerſe is the effect, or reſult, of the choice of the ſimilar particles. For he expreſſes himſelf in ſuch a manner, that one would take the world to be a whole made up of parts, each of them having the ſame name and quality (55); which is ſo flagrant a falſhood, that it is but opening our eyes to be convinced of it: nay the blind themſelves muſt be ſenſible of it; for they know, that they are compoſed of fleſh and bones, and that their hair is not like their nails. Such as have the leaſt tincture of School-Philoſophy muſt know that an homogeneous compound is that whoſe parts have all the ſame name and quality with the whole; whereas the parts of an heterogeneous compound have not the ſame name and nature with the whole, nor have they all the ſame properties. Water, milk, wine, fleſh, bones, are homogeneous compounds; becauſe each drop, for inſtance, of the liquid ſubſtance that compoſes a river, is called water, and has the eſſence of water. But it happens quite otherwiſe in an heterogeneous compound; the parts whereof have neither the name and nature of the whole, nor the name and qualities of each other. Such, for example, is the body of an ox, which is made up of blood, fleſh, bones, and divers other parts, each of them having their peculiar name and qualities. If ſo, no body can ſay, that the univerſe is an homogeneous, and not an heterogeneous, compound. For ſome of its parts are opake, others tranſparent, ſome liquid, others ſolid. Here is earth, there is air, and water; here a meadow, and there a wood. Anaxagoras could never call in queſtion ſo plain a truth, without raving more extravagantly than any fantaſtical pretender to viſions that ever was put into a mad-houſe. And nevertheleſs he is charged with this groſs abſurdity by Moreri, whoſe words plainly ſignify, that he taught that this univerſe was an homogeneous compound. He ought therefore to have uſed other terms, and choſe ſuch a phraſe as did not confound the collective ſenſe of the word whole with the diſtributive (56). This will appear plain by an example. Let us ſuppoſe, that all the inhabitants of a great city are divided into ten claſſes; that thoſe who are worth twenty thouſand livres, are placed in the firſt, thoſe, who are worth fifteen thouſand, in the ſecond, and ſo of the others in proportion. Now this propoſition, The town is inhabited by Citizens equally rich, could never be true, but in a diſtributive ſenſe, which our language can hardly admit of in this caſe. The true meaning of ſuch a propoſition would be this; each of the ten parts, which ten parts compriſe all the inhabitants, is made up of Citizens equally rich; but it would be wrapt up in improper, obſcure, and intricate terms, and ſtand in need of this further explanation, viz. that the equality in riches is only to be found among the Citizens of the ſame claſs; becauſe if thoſe of the tenth claſs be compared with thoſe of the firſt, there will be found a great inequality. This is the bad office, which thoſe do Anaxagoras, who make him ſay, that the univerſe is compoſed of ſimilar parts: they make the reader fancy that he held a ridiculous riddle; and if they do not explain themſelves with a that is to ſay, the reader is at a loſs, and rails at them. I will ſave him this trouble, and lay open our Philoſopher's opinion.

(55) I mean according to the ſyſtem of Anaxagoras.

(56) Mr. Arnauld in his Difficultez a Monſieur Steyaert, Part 6. p. 122, makes ſome remarks on theſe two ſignifications of the word whole.

An explanation of Anaxagoras's Syſtem.

His true meaning, I think, was this; that the intelligent Being, which formed the world, having found, in an infinite matter, infinite ſpecies of ſmall corpuſcles, reſembling each other, and ſurrounded, in a confuſed mixture, with others that did not reſemble them, joined together the corpuſcles of the ſame ſpecies, and, by that means, produced here a planet, and there a ſtone; in one place water, air, &c. and in another wood, &c. This action divided the univerſe into ſeveral maſſes made up of ſimilar parts; tho' at the ſame time the particles of one maſs did not reſemble thoſe of another: and therefore the word whole muſt not be taken in a collective, but in a diſtributive ſenſe; elſe you might as well ſay that the world is compoſed of diſſimilar, as of ſimilar, particles. Ludovicus Vives having obſerved, that theſe words of St. Auſtin, Anaxagoras ... dixit ex infinita materia, quæ conſtaret diſſimilibus inter ſe particulis, were in the old manuſcripts with this alteration, ſimilibus inter ſe particulis, added, utrumque recte.

As to the objections, which Anaxagoras's ſyſtem was expoſed to, I ſhall take notice of them in remark [G].

[D] He was the firſt, who ſuppoſed, that an intelligent Being gave motion to matter, and digeſted the chaos into order.] For this we have very good authorities. Πρῶτος τῇ ὑλῇ νοῦν ἐπίσησαν, ἀρξάμενος οὕτω τοῦ συγγράμματος, ὃ ἐστι τῶδιος καὶ μεγαλοφρόνως ἡρμηνευμένον. πάντα χρήματα ἦν ὁμοῦ, εἶτα νοῦς ἐλθὼν αὐτὰ διεκόσμησε (57). i. e. "He was the firſt that added a mind to matter, writing thus, in a ſweet and noble manner; in the beginning of his work all things were together, and afterwards the mind came and diſpoſed them." I have begun with this paſſage of Diogenes Laertius, becauſe it contains Anaxagoras's own words (58). Let us now hear Ariſtotle on the ſame ſubject. He finds fault with thoſe Philoſophers, who, in treating of principles, ſtopt at the material, without tracing out the efficient cauſe of generations and corruptions. The material cauſe, ſays he, is not the principle of its own alteration; copper does not change itſelf into a ſtatue, nor wood into a bedſtead; this change proceeds from ſome other cauſe, which if we endeavour to trace out, we ſhall aſcend to the firſt Mover. His words are ſo remarkable, that they well deſerve to be related. Ἐν ὑγιὲς ὅτι μάλιστα πᾶσα φθορὰ καὶ γένεσις ἔκ τινος, ὡς ἐνὸς ἢ καὶ πλείονων ἐστὶ, διὰ τί τοῦτο συμβαίνει, καὶ τί τὸ αἴτιον; οὐ γὰρ δὴ τό γε ὑποκείμενον αὐτὸ ποιεῖ μεταβάλλειν ἑαυτό. λέγω δ' οἷον, οὔτε τὸ ξύλον οὔτε ὁ χαλκὸς αἴτιον τοῦ μεταβάλλειν ἑκάτερον αὐτῶν. οὐδὲ ποιεῖ τὸ μὲν ξύλον κλίνην, ὁ δὲ χαλκὸς ἀνδριάντα, ἀλλ' ἕτερόν τι τῆς μεταβολῆς τὸ αἴτιον. τὸ δὲ τοῦτο ζητεῖν, ἐστὶ τὸ τὴν ἑτέραν ἀρχὴν ζητεῖν, ἀφ' ἧς ἡμεῖς φαίημεν, ὅθεν ἡ ἀρχὴ τῆς κινήσεως (59). i. e. "Since all corruption and generation is from ſomething, either one or more, why is this, and what is the cauſe? for the ſubject does not cauſe itſelf to be changed. For example, neither wood nor braſs are the cauſe that either of them is changed. For neither does wood make a bedſtead, nor braſs a ſtatue, but ſomething elſe is the cauſe of that change. Now to make this enquiry, is to ſeek another principle, as that which we call the cauſe the principle of motion." He adds I, that the Philoſophers, after being convinced of the inſufficiency of the elements, were, by the force of truth, obliged to have recourſe to ſome other mover. II, That the beauty of ſome beings, and generation of others cannot, with any probability, be aſcribed to fire, earth, &c. and that it is not likely the ancient Philoſophers held ſuch an opinion. III, That it is repugnant to reaſon to make chance and fortune the cauſe of ſuch a noble effect: Οὐδ' αὐτῷ αὐτομάτῳ καὶ τύχῃ τοσοῦτον ἐπιτρέψαι πράγμα καλῶς ἔχει (60). IV, That this was the reaſon, why Anaxagoras, who admitted a ſpirit in nature, as well as in animals, and held it to be the true author of the world, and all order, ſeemed to be a man of good ſenſe in compariſon of all the Philoſophers that had gone before him. But my explanation falls ſhort of the original, as thoſe, who underſtand the Greek paſſage I ſhall quote, will own. Νοῦν δέ τινες εἶπὸν εἶναι, καθάπερ ἐν τοῖς ζώοις, καὶ ἐν τῇ φύσει τὸν αἴτιον καὶ τοῦ κόσμου, καὶ τῆς τάξεως πάσης, οἷον νήφων ἐφάνη παρ' εἰκῆ λέγουσας τὰς πρότερον. φανερῶς μὲν οὖν Ἀναξαγόραν ἴσμεν ἁψάμενον τούτων τῶν λόγων (61). Tho' theſe authorities be clear, yet that of Plutarch is, perhaps, ſtill clearer. His words are, Ὃν (Ἀναξαγόραν) οἱ τοτ' ἄνθρωποι νοῦν προσηγόρευον, εἴτε τὴν σύνεσιν αὐτοῦ μεγάλην εἰς φυσιολογίαν καὶ περιττὴν διαφανεῖσαν θαυμάσαντες, εἴθ' ὅτι τοῖς ὅλοις πρῶτος ὑ τύχη ὑδ' ἀνάγκη, διακοσμήσεως ἀρχὴν, ἀλλὰ νοῦν ἐπέστησε καθαρὸν καὶ ἄκρατον, ἐμμιμειγμένοις πᾶσι τοῖς ἄλλοις, ἀποκρίνοντα τὰς ὁμοιομερείας (62). i. e. "The contemporaries of Anaxagoras called him the "Mind, either on account of his remarkable ſagacity in natural knowledge, or becauſe he was the "firſt who was made to preſide over the univerſe, "not

(57) Diog. Laert. in Anaxagora, initio lib. 2. num. 6.

(58) They are likewiſe to be found in Plutarch, de Placitis Philoſoph. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 876, D.

(59) Ariſt. Metaphyſ. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 645, H.

(60) Idem, ibid. p. 646, C.

(61) Idem, ibid.

(62) Plutarch. in Pericle, pag. 154, B.

And this, no doubt, is the true reaſon why that great Philoſopher was ſurnamed νῶς, that is, the mind, or underſtanding (u). But his orthodoxy was not clear from all errors [E], (u) See note [C] num. 2.

" not fortune or fate, but a pure and ſimple mind, " ſeparating the homœomeries from the reſt that " were blended together." Some Authors, who quote this paſſage, ſeem to prefer ἰμμιμιγμένον to ἰμμιμιγμένους; but I ſhould be for rejecting them both, and ſubſtituting in their room ἰμμιμιγμένας. Voſſius quotes this paſſage with the word ἰμμιμιγμένον, but in tranſlating it prefers ἰμμιμιγμένους. His tranſlation is as follows: Non fortunam neque fatum ordinatæ deſcriptionis principium, ſed mentem puram ac ſinceram præfecerit, ab aliis omnibus ADMIXTIS ſimiles particulas ſecernentem (63). Voſſius produces this very ſame paſſage, a few pages after, to prove, that Anaxagoras taught that God was intermixed with the whole matter. Quare ex ejus ſententia Opifex mundi Deus eſt, ut ex Plutarcho antea monitum, Νοῦς καθαρὸς καὶ ἄκρατος ἰμμιμιγμένος πᾶσι, Mens pura ac ſincera omnibus permixta (64). I cannot think Plutarch means, that the divine nature was mixed with the parts of matter; for that is repugnant to the epithets καθαρὸς and ἄκρατος he had juſt before uſed, giving very plainly to underſtand by them, that Anaxagoras held God to be a pure and unmixed Spirit diſtinct and ſeparate from matter. I am apt to think that his meaning was this; that this immaterial Spirit ſeparated the homœomeries from all the other bodies which they were at firſt mixed with. Thus we ſee, how difficult a matter it is for the moſt learned men, among whom we may count Voſſius, to write much and mind every thing. Their attention fails them very often; they forget in one place what they had ſaid in another, and ſometimes even contradict themſelves in the ſame period.

(63) Voſſius, de Origine & Progreſſu Idololatriæ, lib. 1. cap. 1. p. 5.

(64) Idem, ibid. cap. 2. p. 12.

I have another reaſon to believe, that I have taken Plutarch's true meaning. For not to mention here what I ſhall produce elſewhere out of Tertullian (65); I read in Ariſtotle that Anaxagoras ſaid, that the Spirit, which gave motion to matter was void of all mixture. Πλὴν ἀρχήν γε τὸν νοῦν τίθεται μάλιστα πάντων. μόνον γοῦν φησὶν αὐτὸν τῶν ὄντων ἁπλοῦν εἶναι, καὶ ἀμιγῆ τε καὶ καθαρὸν, ἀποδίδωσι δ' ἄμφω τῇ αὐτῇ ἀρχῇ, τό, τε γινώσκειν, καὶ τὸ κινεῖν, λέγων νοῦν κινῆσαι τὸ πᾶν (66. i. e. " He ſuppoſes the mind above all " things to be the principle. For he ſaid that it " alone of all things was ſimple, unmixt and pure. " And he aſcribes to it both knowledge and motion, " ſaying that the mind moved the univerſe." This ſentiment is ſtill more clearly expreſſed in the following words: Φησὶ (Ἀναξαγόρας) δ' εἶναι μεμιγμένα πάντα, πλὴν τοῦ νοῦ, τοῦτον δὲ ἀμιγῆ μόνον καὶ καθαρόν (67). i. e. " Anaxagoras ſays, that all things are mixt " except the mind, and that alone is unmixt and " pure." That Anaxagoras maintained God to be the firſt cauſe of motion and order, appears very plain from the following paſſage out of Plutarch: Ὁ δ' Ἀναξαγόρας φησὶν ὡς εἰρήκαι κατ' ἀρχὰς τὰ σώματα, νοῦς δ' αὐτὰ διεκόσμησε Θεοῦ, καὶ τὰς γενέσεις τῶν ὅλων ἐποίησεν. ὁ δὲ Πλάτων οὐκ ἐσηκότα ὑπέθετο τὰ πρῶτα σώματα, ἀπάκτως δὲ κινούμενα. διὸ καὶ Θεὸς (φησὶν) ἐπιδησας ὡς τάξις ἀταξίας ἐξὶ βελτίων διεκόσμησε ταῦτα (68). i. e. " Anaxagoras ſays, that the bodies ſtood ſtill at " the beginning, but that the mind of God diſpoſed them into order, and ſo made the beginnings " of all things. But Plato ſuppoſed that the firſt bodies did not ſtand ſtill, but were in a diſorderly " motion, till God obſerving that order was better " than confuſion compoſed them." You find here a wide difference between Anaxagoras and Plato. The former ſuppoſes, that God found the bodies at reſt; and the latter that he found them in motion. Plutarch's reflection on theſe two doctrines is very ſurprizing; for it not only contains a horrible impiety, but a moſt palpable contradiction. He had found fault with the Philoſophers, who admitted but one principle. He had ſaid, It is impoſſible (69), that matter ſhould be the only principle of all things; and therefore an efficient cauſe muſt be added to it; for ſilver cannot form a veſſel of itſelf, and without an artificer; neither can braſs, wood, or any other matter. In the ſame page he had commended Anaxagoras for admitting an intelligent being, who had digeſted the ſimilar particles into order. Τὰς μὲν ὁμοιομερείας, ὕλην, τὸ δ' ποιοῦν αἴτιον τὸν νοῦν τὰ παίλα διακο-

(65) In remark [E].

(66) Ariſtot. de Anima, lib. 1. cap. 11. p. 479, D. See alſo the 4th chapter of the 3d book, p. 503, G. where we find, that Anaxagoras ſaid, that the underſtanding could not be victorious if it were not void of all mixture. Ἀμιγῆ εἶναι ἵνα κράτῃ τοῦτο δ' ἐστὶν ἵνα γνωρίζῃ.

(67) Ariſtot. Metaphyſ. lib. 1. cap. 7. p. 651, [E].

(68) Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſoph. lib. 1. cap. 7. p. 881, A.

ξεύμενον (70). i. e. " He makes the homœomeries the " matter, and the mind the cauſe that diſpoſed all " things." That is, for adding the efficient cauſe to the paſſive ſubject, and the artificer to the matter. Ἀποδεκτέος οὗτος ἐστὶν ὅτι τῇ ὕλῃ τὸν τεχνίτην προσέζευξεν (71). What means he then by finding fault, five pages after, both with Anaxagoras and Plato; with Anaxagoras for aſcribing to God the motion and order of bodies; with Plato for attributing to him their order? Their common error, ſays he, is to fancy, that God minds us mortals, and was thereby induced to frame the world. Κοινῶς οὖν ἁμαρτάνουσιν ἀμφότεροι, ὅτι τὸν Θεὸν ἐποίησαν ἐπιστρεφόμενον τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων, ἢ καὶ τούτου χάριν τὸν κόσμον κατασκευάζοντα (72). After this he diſplays the moſt plauſible arguments an Atheiſt could employ againſt thoſe, who attribute to God the creating and governing of the world. Does he commend Anaxagoras for admitting an intelligent mind as the firſt mover of matter, and the efficient cauſe of the univerſe, and blame him at the ſame time for taking this firſt mover and agent to be God? Surely no one ever argued in a more pitiful and incoherent manner. And tho' we ſhould allow that this implies no contradiction; yet it muſt be owned at leaſt, that he confutes in this place a great many other paſſages in his books, wherein he ſuppoſes a Providence.

(70) Idem, ibid.

(71) Idem, ibid.

(72) Plutarch, de Placitis Philoſ. cap. 7. p. 881, A.

It would be too tedious to ſet down all the authorities that prove either of the following truths, or both of them, viz. 1. That Anaxagoras admitted an intelligent being, which gave motion to matter, and framed the world, by ſelecting the Homogeneites. 2. That he was the firſt author of ſuch a ſyſtem, I ſhall therefore only refer to Plato (73), Tertullian (74), Clemens Alexandrinus (75), Euſebius (76), Themiſtius (77), St. Auſtin (78), Theodoret (79), Proclus (80), and Simplicius (81). But as to Tully, I ſhall ſet down his words, becauſe they contain ſome difficulties, which we ſhall diſcuſs. Inde Anaxagoras, ſays he (82), qui accepit ab Anaximene diſciplinam, primus omnium rerum deſcriptionem & modum, mentis infinitæ vi ac ratione deſignari ac confici voluit. In quo non vidit, neque motum ſenſui junctum & continentem in infinito ullum eſſe poſſe, neque ſenſum omnino, quo non ipſa natura pulſa ſentiret, Deinde ſi mentem iſtam quaſi animal aliquod eſſe voluit, erit aliquid interius, ex quo illud animal nominetur. Quid autem interius mente? Cingitur igitur corpore externo. Quod quoniam non placet, aperta ſimplexque mens nulla re adjuncta quæ ſentire poſſit, fugere intelligentiæ noſtræ vim & notionem videtur. i. e. " Anaxagoras, who was the ſcholar of Anaximenes, " was the FIRST that would have the form and mode " of all things to be deſigned and brought together " by the force and reaſon of an infinite mind. In " which he did not ſee either that there can be no " motion added to ſenſe and united with it, in an " infinite, or any ſenſe at all, by which nature her " ſelf being ſtruck would not perceive. Beſides, if " he would have that mind to be as it were a ſort of " animal, there muſt be ſomething ſtill within this " very animal, to give it that name. Now what is " within the mind? It is therefore ſurrounded with " an external body. But a plain and ſimple mind, " without the addition of any thing ſenſitive, ſeems " to be beſide the power and notion of our under- " ſtanding." It is ſomewhat ſtrange that Tully ſhould ſay, that Anaxagoras was the firſt who held ſuch a doctrine, after having ſaid juſt before, that Thales (83) admitted an intelligent mind, or a God, who had formed all things out of water. Thales Mileſius, qui primus de talibus rebus quæſivit, aquam dixit eſſe initium rerum: deum autem, eam mentem, qua ex aqua cuncta fingeret (84). How could Cicero ſo ſoon forget his own words? Can we ſuppoſe he meant, that Thales aſcribed to God only the converting of water into other bodies; whereas Anaxagoras made him the author of the order and ſymmetry of the univerſe? This ſuppoſition has no appearance of truth, which makes me think, that the text is corrupted; as we may likewiſe conjecture from the obſcurity and confuſion of the words that follow this paſſage. But however that be, I would not have

(73) Plato in Phædone, p. 72.

(74) Tertull. de Anima.

(75) Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. 2. p. 364.

(76) Euſeb. de Præpar. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 14. p. 750.

(77) Themiſt. Orat. 15.

(78) Auguſtin. de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2.

(79) I quote his words in the 115th quotation.

(80) Proclus in Timæum Platonis.

(81) Simphi in Ariſtotel. de Phyſica Auſcult.

(82) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 10, 11.

(83) He was Anaxagoras's predeceſſor.

(84) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 10.

rors [E], nor without a great many imperfections; which is not half ſo ſtrange, as that the Philoſophers who had lived before his time, ſhould have been ſtrangers to the truth he have this authority of Cicero to be ſo much as compared with the teſtimonies of ſo many celebrated and ancient writers, who unanimouſly agree, that Anaxagoras was the firſt who joined the efficient cauſe to the material, that is, who aſcribed the ſymmetry and architecture of the Univerſe to an intelligent being. St. Auſtin valued ſo little this authority of Tully, that in the very place he follows him, in relating the opinion of the Philoſophers of the Ionian Sect, he contradicts him with regard to Thales. Iſte autem Thales, ut ſucceſſores etiam propagaret, rerum naturam ſcrutatus, ſuasque diſputationes literis mandans eminuit—aquam—putavit rerum eſſe principium, & hinc omnia elementa mundi ipſumque mundum, & quæ in eo gignuntur exiſtere. NIHIL autem huic operi, quod mundo conſiderato, tam admirabile aſpicimus, EX DIVINA MENTE præpoſuit (85). i. e. "Thales "taught that water was the principle of things, and "that therefore the elements of the world, the world "itſelf, and all things that are produced in it owe "their exiſtence to water. But he placed NO PART "OF THE DIVINE MIND over this work, which in "the contemplation of the world we find to be ſo "beautiful." Obſerve that Tully himſelf in another book denies what he here affirms of Thales, and makes Anaxagoras, without any reſtriction or limitation, the firſt author of the aboveſaid doctrine. I ſhall quote his words in Remark [F].

(85) Auguſt, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. p. 711.

The Jeſuit Leſcalopier endeavours to remove this contradiction, by ſaying, that Anaxagoras was the firſt, who publiſhed this doctrine; the other Philoſophers, who flouriſhed before him, having only imparted it to their diſciples (86). This is but a very indifferent ſolution; for ſince we know what opinions Anaxagoras's predeceſſors held, and in what they differed from one another; ſince, I ſay, we know this, though Anaxagoras was the firſt that publiſhed books, might we not alſo have known what they taught concerning the efficient cauſe of the world? As to the objections againſt our Philoſopher's doctrine, contained in the paſſage I have quoted out of Tully, I refer my reader to (87) St. Auſtin, who confutes them very ſolidly.

(86) Leſcalop. in Cicer de Nat. Deorum, p. 40.

(87) See the 56th Letter of St. Auſtin, p. 271, & ſeq.

[E] His orthodoxy was not free from all errors.] This is what Tertullian reproaches him with; for he held God to be an intelligent being, pure and unmixed; and at the ſame time mixed and confounded him with ſoul. Quam Anaxagoræ turbata ſententia eſt: initium enim omnium commentatus animum, univerſitatis ojcillum de illius axe ſuſpendens, purumque eum affirmans, & ſimplicem & incommiſcibilem, hoc vel maxime titulo ſegregat ab animæ commixtione, & tamen eundem alibi anima addicit (88). Ariſtotle obſerved this before Tertullian. Ἀναξαγόρας δὲ ἧττον διασαφεῖ περὶ αὐτῶν. πολλαχῆ μὲν γὰρ τὸ αἴτιον τοῦ καλῶς καὶ ὀρθῶς, τὸν νοῦν λέγει· ἑτέρωθι δέ, τὸν νοῦν ἴσον εἶναι τὸν αὐτὸν τῇ ψυχῇ ἐν ἅπασι γὰρ ὑπάρχειν αὐτὸν τοῖς ζώοις, καὶ μεγάλοις, καὶ μικροῖς, καὶ τιμίοις, καὶ ἀτιμοτέροις. οὐ φαίνεται δὲ ὅ γε κατὰ φρόνησιν λεγόμενος νοῦς, πᾶσιν ὁμοίως ὑπάρχειν τοῖς ζώοις, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις πᾶσιν (89). That is, "Anaxagoras is leſs "clear about them: for in many places he ſays the "mind is the cauſe of good and right actions. But "in another place he ſays, the mind is the ſame "with the ſoul; for he affirms it to exiſt in all ani"mals, both great and ſmall, both of value and no "value. But the mind, as it comprehends under"ſtanding, does not ſeem to be in all animals, nor "even ſo much as in all men." From this paſſage we may infer, that Anaxagoras admitted a ſoul in all Beaſts, which he called an Underſtanding, the very name he gave the firſt mover of matter, and author of the ſymmetry of the Univerſe. The ſame Ariſtotle obſerves, that Anaxagoras employed an intelligent being to produce things, as a meer machine; that is, he had only recourſe to that being, when he could not help it, and was at a loſs to find out any other cauſe. Ἀναξαγόρας τὲ γὰρ μηχανῇ χρῆται τῷ νῷ πρὸς τὴν κοσμοποιΐαν, κ᾽ ὅταν ἀπορήσῃ διὰ τίνι αἰτίαν ἐξ ἀνάγκης ἔσι, τότε ἕλκει αὐτὸν, ἐν ᾧ τοῖς ἄλλοις πάντα μᾶλλον αἰτιᾶται τῶν γινομένων ἢ νοῦν (90). On this, no doubt, is grounded an obſervation made by Clemens Alexandrinus; that Anaxagoras did not maintain the prerogatives and dignity of the efficient cauſe; for he aſcribes the operations of this cauſe to a mind, and at the ſame time mentions ſeveral revolutions made without the knowledge or cooperation of that mind. This I take to be the true meaning of the following words: Ἀναξαγόρας πρῶτος, ſays he (91), ἐπίστησε τὸν νοῦν τοῖς πράγμασιν· ἀλλ' οὐδὲ οὗτος ἐτήρησε τὴν ἀξίαν τὴν ποιητικὴν, ὅσους τινὰς ἀνοήτους ἀναζωγράφων, σὺν τῇ τοῦ νοῦ ἀπραξίᾳ τὴ καὶ ἀνοίᾳ. This paſſage was certainly copied by Euſebius, when giving it another turn, he ſaid that Anaxagoras did not maintain ſafe and ſound the doctrine, which aſcribes the production of things to an intelligent being. Αἰγῖται ἧ μηδὲ οὗτος σῶον φυλαξαι τὸ δόγμα. ἐπιστήσαι μὲν γὰρ τὸν νοῦν τοῖς πᾶσι, οὐκέτι ἧ κατὰ νοῦν κ᾽ λόγισμον τὴν περὶ τῶν ὄντων ἀποδοῦναι τὴν φυσιολογίαν (92). He proves his aſſertion with this reaſon, that Anaxagoras reaſoned upon nature, and explained the Phænomena without recurring to that Being. I know it may be ſaid, that all Euſebius means here is, that Anaxagoras gave ſuch philoſophical reaſons, as were repugnant to good ſenſe. But three reaſons perſuade me that my interpretation of Clemens Alexandrinus and Euſebius ought to be preferred to that other. And firſt, to ſay that a Philoſopher argues ſometimes nonſenſically, fooliſhly, and contrary to the rules, is but a very weak proof of his abandoning, or even enervating, the hypotheſis of Providence, and of the univerſal activity of God. The various ſects of Chriſtian Philoſophers reproach each other in the ſame manner; but do not therefore tax one another with heterodoxy as to the univerſal concourſe of God, the firſt cauſe of all beings. If then no other complaint could have been made againſt Anaxagoras, but that, in explaining ſeveral effects of nature, he reaſoned without judgment and impertinently, it had been a piece of injuſtice to upbraid him with forſaking, or overturning his own ſyſtem, which admitted an intelligent Being to preſide over the formation of the world. This reproach therefore muſt have been founded not upon his abſurd way of reaſoning, but upon his explaining the phænomena of nature in ſuch a manner as to exclude that intelligent Being. In the ſecond place, Euſebius produces a long paſſage out of Plato, wherein Anaxagoras is complained of for not recurring, in explaining the effects of nature, to an intelligent Being, and to the true cauſes of the beauty, and order of the univerſe, but only to the air, to the æther, water, &c. as the only cauſes of beings (93). Is it not therefore very likely that Euſebius made the ſame complaint? In the third place, Anaxagoras taught, if we give credit to Plutarch, that ſome things are brought about by neceſſity, others by deſtiny, ſome by deliberation, others by fortune, or by chance. Ἃ μὲν γὰρ εἶναι κατ' ἀνάγκην, ἃ δὲ καθ' εἱμαρμένην, ἃ δὲ κατὰ προαίρεσιν, ἃ δὲ κατὰ τύχην, ἃ δὲ κατὰ τὸ αὐτόματον (94). No doubt but by theſe unintelligible diſtinctions Anaxagoras robbed the intelligent Being of ſeveral events, which muſt have given occaſion to the complaint of Clemens Alexandrinus, copied by Euſebius.

(88) Tertullian, de Anima.

(89) Ariſtot. de Anima, lib. 1. cap. 2. pag. 478, G.

(90) Idem, Metaphyſ. lib. 1. c. 4. p. 646, H.

(91) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 2. p. 364.

(92) Euſebii, Præpar. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 14. p. 750.

(93) See Remark [R].

(94) Plutarch. de Placitis Philoſoph. lib. 1. cap. ultim. pag. 885. See alſo the paſſage Mr. Menage quotes in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2, num. 6, and copied from a book falſely aſcribed to Galienus, viz. φιλοσόφε ἱστορια.

I am in doubt, whether we ought to count among the other errors of Anaxagoras, a ſtrange opinion he is ſaid to have held about our hands; that they were the cauſe of the wiſdom and induſtry of men. This is what Plutarch charges him with, and calls him to an account for. It happens quite otherwiſe, ſays he (95), for man is not the wiſeſt of animals becauſe he has hands; but has received ſuch tools from nature, becauſe he is by nature rational and ingenious. As the works of Anaxagoras are not extant, we cannot decide whether, or not, he deſerved this cenſure. As for me, I cannot think he gave any occaſion to it. For his ſyſtem obliged him to differ in his opinion, with reſpect to this ſubject, from thoſe Philoſophers, who, aſcribing all the beings of this world to chance, were by that impious doctrine engaged to maintain, that organs were not given to man for any uſe, but that he, finding them uſeful, employed them. See Lucretius, Lib. IV. &c. (96).

(95) Plutarch. de Amicitia fraterna, init. pag. 478. I follow Amiot's tranſlation.

(96) Lucret. l. 4. ver. 821, & ſeq.

Mind the following words of one of the Fathers: Anaxagoras autem, qui & ATHEUS cognominatus eſt, dogmatizavit facta animalia decidentibus è cælo in terram ſeminibus, quod & hi ipſi in matris ſuæ tranſtulerunt ſemina, & eſſe hoc ſemen ſeipſos ſtatim confitentes he discovered, which was very obvious, and had been often celebrated by the Poets [F]. I must enquire whether the Homœomeries do not imply a great many contradictions [G].

sitentes apud eos qui sensum habent, & ipsos esse quæ sunt Anaxagoræ IRRELIGIOSI semina (97). That is, "Anaxagoras, who is also surnamed the Atheist, delivered that animals were formed by the falling of seeds from heaven to earth, which these have transferred into the seeds of their own mother, and that this seed is themselves who profess it with those who have sense, and that it is they that are the seeds of the irreligious Anaxagoras." This passage informs us, that Anaxagoras was surnamed the Atheist, and that St. Irenæus looked upon him as an impious man. Vossius takes notice of this; but only says, that Justin Martyr, in the Exhortation to the Greeks, calls Anaxagoras an Atheist; to this he adds some reflections (98). I find no such thing in Justin; and Vossius, methinks, had done better to save his excuses for St. Irenæus. If Justin stands in need of them, it is only for having suppressed what was most commendable in Anaxagoras's system, that is, his sentiments relating to the first Mover, which Justin passes over in silence to speak of his homœomeries (99).

(97) Irenæus, lib. 2. adverss. Hæres. cap. 19.

(98) Vossius, de Origin. & Progress. Idololat. lib. 1. cap. 1. pag. 5.

(99) Just. Mart. Orat. ad Græcos, p. 4.

[F] The Philosophers, who lived before his time, were strangers to the truth.... so often celebrated by the Poets.] That Anaxagoras was the first Philosopher, who ascribed the ordering of matter to the wisdom of a first mover, may be proved by innumerable witnesses (100). Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, who were his predecessors in the school of Ionia, endeavoured to explain the effects of nature without recurring to a first mover. Princeps Thales, unus e septem, cui se reliquos concessisse primas ferunt, ex aqua dixit constare omnia. At hoc Anaximandro populari & sodali suo non persuasit. Is enim infinitatem naturæ dixit esse, e qua omnia gignerentur. Post ejus Auditor Anaximenes infinitum aera, sed ea, quæ ex eo orirentur, definita: gigni autem terram, aquam & ignem, tum ex his omnia. Anaxagoras materiam infinitam, sed ex ea particulas similes inter se minutas, eas primum confusas, postea in ordinem adductas mente divina (101). That is, "Thales, one of the seven, to whom the other six are said to have given the preference, was the first who said that all things were made of water. But he could not persuade his countryman and companion Anaximander to believe it. For he said that all things were produced from the infinity of nature. Afterwards his scholar Anaximenes held the air to be infinite, but those bodies which arose from it to be definite: that the earth, water and fire were first formed, and out of them all the rest. Anaxagoras supposed an infinite matter, and out of it minute particles similar to each other; that they were at first confused, and afterwards brought into order by the divine mind." Is it not amazing that men of so great parts should have been guilty of such shameful mistakes? This is what the Jesuit Pererius takes care to observe. Ferunt primos philosophorum, says he (102), Pherecydem Syrum, & Anaxagoram, illum quidem immortalitatem animi nostri, hunc autem Deum, quam ipse mentem, vel intellectum vocabat, esse mundi, cunctarumque rerum opificem, Græcos docuisse: ut permirum sit, priores philosophos, qui hæc ignorarunt, sapientum nomen & honorem habuisse; & duas has res, quarum cognitio cunctis mortalibus optatissima est, & ad bene pieque vivendum maxime necessaria, tam sero ad Græcorum notitiam perveniisse. That is, "Pherecydes the Syrian, and Anaxagoras, are said to have been the first of the Philosophers who taught the Greeks the immortality of our souls, which was the doctrine of the first, and that God, whom he called the mind or understanding, was the former of the world and all things, which was the doctrine of the latter. Thus it is strange that the Philosophers who went before them should have the name and character of wise men: and that these two things, the knowledge of which is most desirable to all mortals, and most necessary to live well and piously, should have come so late to the knowledge of the Greeks." Father Thomassin's thought on this subject deserves notice. All the Poets, says he (103), who were the most ancient Philosophers, and the Sages of the fabulous times (as they are called) neither honoured with praises, or enquired after any cause besides the first, or the supreme Deity. How then could Thales, and those who came next after him, either not know, or not mention that which had been the main business of all the wise men, and of all ages, till that time? It is therefore very likely, that these first Philosophers of the Ionian School, taking for granted what was unquestionable, and till that time had never been called in question, relating to the first efficient cause, spoke only of the second causes, which had neither been known before, nor inquired into. They were afraid that, if they referred all particular effects immediately to God, men should neglect, as they had done formerly, to trace out the second causes, being satisfied with the first. The same may be said of Angels, whom Homer, and the other ancient Poets, or Philosophers, make the authors of all things, but subordinate to God. The disciples of Thales took care never to bring in the Angels, in order to shew the virtue and power of the corporeal and immediate causes.——But at last Anaxagoras judged, that in his time the world was capable of apprehending the subordination of corporeal causes to angelical substances, and of both to the wisdom and omnipotency of God.—As every one was sufficiently instructed in moral Philosophy and Metaphysicks, Thales and his disciples did not meddle with them, to the end men might apply themselves entirely to that part of Philosophy, which had been neglected to that time. But the knowledge of the second causes proving very uncertain; and besides, there being great danger that by enquiring after them men should forget the knowledge of God, of the Angels, and of morals, which was far more lasting, useful, and necessary, Anaxagoras, Socrates and Plato, restored Theology, and Morality to their former dignity and lustre.

(100) See the quotations 73, 82.

(101) Cicero Acad. Quæst. lib. 4. cap. 37.

(102) Pererius, de communibus omnium rerum naturalium principiis, lib. 4. c. 4. p. 206.

(103) Thomas. Methode d'etudier & enseigner la Philosophie, lib. 1. cap. 14. pag. 162, 163. See also p. 165.

This is an ingenious thought, but perhaps more plausible than true. For Anaximenes, the master of Anaxagoras, did not reason in his Philosophy, as one who supposed the existence of God, in quality of the first cause, to be so plain, that it was useless to speak of it. He mentions the Gods, but is so far from allowing them to be principles, that he maintains them to be produced by the principle he establishes. Qui (Anaximenes) omnes rerum causas infinito aeri dedit: nec deos negavit, aut tacuit; non tamen ab ipsis aerem factum, sed ipsos ex aere ortos credidit (104). That is, "Anaximenes ascribed all the causes of things to an infinite air: and he neither denied that there were any Gods, or was silent about them: yet he did not believe that the air was made by them, but that they were made of the air." Tully ascribes such another opinion to Anaximander, Anaximenes's master. Anaximandri opinio est nativos esse Deos, longis intervallis orientes, occidentesque, eoque innumerabiles esse mundos. i. e. "Anaximander's opinion was, that the Gods were born, rising and falling at long distances of time, and therefore that there are innumerable worlds." Observe, that Anaximenes's two disciples (105) corrected their master's system; Anaxagoras, by admitting an intelligent being, distinct from matter, to be author of the world; Diogenes Apolloniates, by supposing that the air (the principle of all things) was only a principle as endowed with divine knowledge. Diogenes quoque Anaximenis alter auditor aerem quidem dixit rerum esse materiam, de qua omnia fierent: sed eum esse compotem divinæ rationis, sine qua nihil ex eo fieri posset (106). This overthrows Father Thomassin's opinion. For these Philosophers not only have not been silent as to the doctrine of the existence of God, but have spoke of it so as to contradict both the ancient Poets and Anaxagoras. To this I may add, that their bare silence would prove too much; for the Philosophers of those times traced things to their original, and to the very chaos (107). It was therefore necessary for them to explain their opinion of the nature of God, and to exhaust the whole doctrine of the first principles; after which they might well be allowed to account for the particular and daily effects, without going back to the first cause. Our modern Philosophers mind only the second causes, (104) Augustin. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. See also Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1, where he says, Anaximenes aera Deum statuit, eumque gigni.

(105) Anaxagoras and Diogenes Apolloniates.

(106) Augustin. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. See also Cicero de Natura Deorum, l. 1. cap. 10. where he says, Quid? aer, quo Diogenes Apolloniates utitur Deo.

(107) See Cicero Tuscul. 5. near the beginning; and Virgil, Ec. 6. ver. 31.

tions [G]. In my opinion they are made up of contradictions, and, generally ſpeaking, the notions of the Ancients, who have mentioned the chaos, were no leſs confuſed cauſes, viz. the matter, form, &c. not becauſe they ſuppoſe the knowledge of God as the firſt cauſe to be ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, but becauſe they treat of this ſubject very copiouſly and diſtinctly in another part of their Philoſophy (108). But however that be, it is not to be doubted but that the ancient Philoſophers knew the ſentiments of the Poets about God. Why then did they not follow their example? Was it becauſe they made no account of Poems, finding them ſtuffed with ſo many trifles and vulgar opinions, which were not proof againſt a philoſophical enquiry (109)? This is what Ariſtotle inſinuates (110). They were perhaps of Socrates's opinion, who compared the Poets to Fanatics, adding that neither of them underſtand what they ſay. Ἔγνων οὖν αὖ καὶ περὶ τῶν ποιητῶν ἐν ὀλίγῳ τοῦτο, ὅτι οὐ σοφίᾳ ποιοῦεν. ἀλλὰ φύσει τινὶ, καὶ ἐνθουσιάζοντες, ὥσπερ οἱ θεομάντεις καὶ οἱ χρησμῳδοί. καὶ γὰρ οὗτοι λέγουσι μὲν πολλὰ καὶ καλὰ, ἴσασι δ' οὐδὲν ὧν λέγουσι. τοιοῦτόν τι μοὶ ἐφάνησαν πάθος καὶ οἱ ποιηταὶ πεπονθότες (111). i. e. "I ſoon "diſcovered with regard to the Poets, that they did "not act by wiſdom, but by a kind of natural en"thuſiaſm, like the inſpiration of Prophets. For "they alſo ſpeak many excellent things, but under"ſtand nothing of what they ſay. And the Poets "ſeem to me to be affected after the ſame manner."

(108) In Metaphyſics.

(109) As in Heſiod's Theogonia, which contains ſo many abſurdities concerning the Gods; and even as Lactantius complains in the 5th chapter of the firſt book of his Inſtitutions, the chaos is ſaid to be more antient than the Gods.

(110) Ariſt. Metaphyſ. lib. 3. c. 4. p. 662, B.

(111) Plato in Apologia Socrat. p. 17, F.

'Tis certain, that the moſt orthodox Poets have groſly erred concerning the nature of God; for Orpheus, who ſung, that God made the heavens, ſtyles him only the firſt-born of creatures; and adds, that the air was his father. Πρωτόγονος φαίτων περιμήκεος ἤερος υἱός (112). Diogenes Laertius pretends, that Anaxagoras borrowed one of his doctrines from the Poet Linus, but not that of the firſt Mover (113). Obſerve that Ariſtotle makes a great difference between Anaxagoras and Thales with reſpect to that point (114). I ſhall conclude with a fine paſſage out of Theodoret, which ſhews very plainly that the Philoſophers, who flouriſhed before Anaxagoras, were quite ſtrangers to the firſt cauſe. Ἀναξαγόρας.... τῶν πρὸ αὐτοῦ γεγενημένων φιλοσόφων οὐδὲν πεπαιτέρω τῶν ὁμημένων γενομένων, πρῶτος νοῦν ἔφησεν ἐφεστάναι τῷ κόσμῳ, καὶ τοῦτον εἰς τάξιν ἐκ τῆς ἀταξίας ἀγαγεῖν τὰ στοιχεῖα (115). i. e. "Anaxagoras, when the Philoſophers "before his time had underſtood nothing beyond what "they ſaw, was the firſt that ſaid a mind ſuperin"tended the world, and reduced the elements out of "confuſion into order."

(112) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 5.

(113) Diog. Laert. in Proœm. num. 4.

(114) Ariſt. de Anima, l. 1. c. 2. t. 479.

(115) Theod. de Græc. affect. Serm. 2. p. 489.

[G] I muſt enquire whether the homœomeries do not imply a great many contradictions.] I ſhall not recur to Ariſtotle's arguments (116) however ſubtil and ſolid; wherefore if our reflections agree, it will be by mere chance.

(116) See his Metaphyſ. lib. 1. cap. 7. and his Phyſ. lib. 1. c. 4.

I. We have already ſeen (117) what induced Anaxagoras to maintain that every thing is compoſed of ſimilar parts, viz. to avoid ſaying, that bodies are made out of nothing. Now as all the parts of an animal are nouriſhed with the ſimpleſt food, he could not help owning, that the graſs of a meadow, for inſtance, contained bones, horns, blood, fleſh, skin, &c. But if ſo, it was not made up of ſimilar particles, but was rather a mixture of all kinds of heterogeneities. To what purpoſe then were his homœomeries? Was he not obliged to forſake that opinion in each particular caſe, after having ſuppoſed it in general? What I have ſaid of graſs, ought to be underſtood of milk, wine, water, bread, &c. Is there any corporeal ſubſtance that does not ſerve as matter to many others in generations and corruptions? Such firſt principles therefore are, and, at the ſame time, are not homogeneous: they are homogeneous according to Anaxagoras's ſuppoſition, but are not ſo in effect; for ſince mixed bodies, which are made up of diſſimilar parts, ought, in his opinion, to be of the ſame nature with their principles, it plainly follows from thence, that their principles are heterogeneous. I ſhall touch upon this again in the fifth paragraph.

(117) In Remark [C].

II. According to his ſyſtem no one thing has its proper name; for if all the blood of an animal, was, for inſtance, in the graſs it fed upon, that food ought rather to have been called blood than graſs. To this Anaxagoras anſwered, that things deſerve ſuch or ſuch names according to the particles that were the moſt numerous in a mixed body, or being placed on the ſurface made it appear uniform (118). Lucretius confutes this anſwer by ſhewing the falſe inferences that may be deduced from it. "If this were true, "ſays he (119), it would follow, that by grinding "corn ſome particles of blood, or of ſome other part "of our body, might be drawn from it; which we "know by experience to be falſe."

(118) See Ariſt. Phyſic. lib. 1. c. 4. p. 456.

(119) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 874.

Linquitur hic tenuis latitandi copia quædam;
Id quod Anaxagoras ſibi ſumit, ut omnibus omnes
Res putet immiſtas rebus latitare; ſed illud
Apparere unum, cujus ſint pluria mixta,
Et magis in promptu, primaque in fronte locata.
Quod tamen à vera longe ratione repulſum eſt.
Conveniebat enim fruges quoque ſæpe minutas
Robore cum ſaxi franguntur, mittere ſignum
Sanguinis aut aliûm, noſtro quæ corpore aluntur.
Conſimili ratione herbas quoque ſæpe dicebat,
Et laticis dulces guttas, ſimilique ſapore
Mistere, lanigeræ quali ſunt ubera lactis:
Scilicet & glebis terrarum ſæpe friatis
Herbarum genera, & fruges, frondeſque videri,
Cum præfracta forent, igneſque latere minutos.
Quorum nil fieri quoniam manifeſta docet res,
Scire licet non eſſe in rebus res ita mixtas.

"But there's a little ſhift, a ſlight excuſe
"Which Anaxagoras's ſcholars uſe.
"Tho' ſuch lie mixt in all, that part alone
"Appears, which only to the ſenſe is ſhown;
"Which in the compoſition does comprize
"The greateſt part, and on the ſurface lies.
"But this is falſe; or thro' the weighty mill,
"From broken corn would bloody drops diſtil;
"Or ſome ſuch parts, as in our bodies grow:
"From herbs and flow'rs a milky juice would flow:
"In broken clods each ſearching eye might ſee
"Some lurking, ſcatter'd herb, or leaf, or tree:
"And in cleft wood, and broken ſticks admire
"Smoke, aſhes, flame, and little ſparks of fire.
"But ſince, on ſtricteſt ſearch, no parts appear,
"We muſt not fondly fancy they are there;
"That bodies are compos'd of ſuch combin'd:
"But common ſeeds in various order join'd."

Creech.

This confutation is not amiſs; for in ſhort, mix various ſorts of grains together as you pleaſe; take an hundred times more wheat than barley; what then? will you make any one believe that there is nothing but wheat in that heap? will no grains of barley appear even after it is ſcattered? Nothing can be imagined more abſurd. The only anſwer Anaxagoras could give to this objection, was to ſay, that in each ſenſible part of a grain of corn the heterogeneities are fewer than the particles of corn, and wrapt up in them; and that this is the reaſon, why we never diſcover, even when the corn is ground, the heterogeneous parts; but if the diviſion ſhould be extended to the inſenſible parts, in that caſe the blood, fleſh, bones &c. would appear to eyes that were ſharper than ours. In a word, he cannot ſolve this difficulty, but by recurring to the diviſibility of matter in infinitum; which is to do like a man, who to avoid the thruſt of a ſword, throws himſelf into a precipice of a prodigious depth. But I intend to inſiſt only on ſuch difficulties as imply ſome ſort of contradiction.

III. I maintain, that the ſimilar particles, according to Anaxagoras's ſyſtem, were, and were not the moſt numerous in bread: they were the moſt numerous, becauſe the compound was called bread; they were not, becauſe the bread, a few hours after it is eat, is called chyle; and nothing, beſides the qualities of chyle, appear in its perceptible particles. This will be made clear by comparing dough with corn, or bread with dough, In dough, for example, there are more corpuſcles of dough, than of any other body; but after it is become bread, the corpuſcles of dough are fewer than the corpuſcles of bread; and yet the corpuſcles of bread were before in the dough. From whence it is plain, that the homogeneities, fuſed than the chaos itſelf. But leſt I ſhould ſeem to make things worſe than they are, mogeneities, according to this ſyſtem, are, and at the ſame time are not, the moſt numerous particles in each mixed body.

IV. Here follows another contradiction. It is contradicting one's ſelf to lay down an hypotheſis, which implies thoſe very abſurdities, which it was deviſed to exclude. And this is the caſe of Anaxagoras's ſyſtem. For he ſuppoſed, that the parts of matter had been, from all eternity, in a ſtate of confuſion, that is, that the ſmalleſt homogeneous particles had been ſurrounded on all ſides by heterogeneous ones, and that at laſt an intelligent Being put an end to ſuch a confuſion by ſeparating the ſimilar particles from the diſſimilar. But he himſelf overturned this very ſuppoſition, being forced to own, that all ſorts of homœomeries were mixed together in all kinds of bodies, even with regard to the imperceptible particles. For there were, according to him, vaſt numbers of ſmall bones, drops of blood &c. in each blade of graſs, and in each morſel of bread: all things were mingled together, ſince every thing was made out of every thing. Διὸ φασὶ πᾶν ἐν παντὶ μεμίχθαι, διότι πᾶν ἐκ παντὸς ἑώρων γινόμενον (120). Ἀναξαγόρας μεμίχθαι πᾶν ἐν παντὶ φησι (121). Is not this the greateſt abſurdity and confuſion that can be imagined? Plato thought ſo; for he frequently uſes the doctrine of Anaxagoras as a ſymbol of the chaos. Κἂν εἰ συγκρίνοιτο μὲν πάντα, διακρίνοιτο δ' οὖν, ταχὺ ἂν τὸ τοῦ Ἀναξαγόρου γεγονὸς εἴη, ὁμοῦ πάντα χρήματα. i. e. "If "all things were to be confounded, and never to be "diſtinguiſhed, we ſhould arrive at Anaxagoras's "doctrine, that all things were together (122)." He ſays elſewhere, Τὸ τοῦ Ἀναξαγόρᾳ ἂν πολὺ ὂν, ὦ φίλε Πῶλε . . . ὁμοῦ ἂν πάντα χρήματα ἐφύρετο ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ, ἀκρίτων τ' ὄντων τῶν τε ὑγιεινῶν καὶ ἰατρικῶν καὶ ὀψοποιητικῶν (123). i. e. "Then Anaxagoras's hypotheſis "would be brought about, my friend Polus, that all things "ſhould be blended together, health, phyſic and food." We are told by Menage, that Luther called thoſe Divines Anaxagoriſts, who found every thing in each text of the Scripture. Atque inde eſt, quod Luthero Theologicus Anaxagoricus dicitur is, qui quodlibet in quolibet loco ſcripturæ ſacræ invenire poſſit (124).

V. His firſt principles were, and were not, firſt principles: they were according to his ſuppoſition; but were not ſo in effect, becauſe they were as much compounded, and liable to corruption as any mixed body. He admitted diviſibility in infinitum, and, of courſe, infinite ſmall bodies in the leaſt drop of water, which conſequently contained as many corpuſcles as the whole earth. Beſides, this infinite number of corpuſcles was made up of all kinds of heterogeneities, and therefore no leſs compounded than a tree, from which, as well as from other mixed bodies, it only differed by this, that its diſſimilar parts did not appear to the eye, as the diſſimilar parts of a tree. Laſtly, the intelligent Being, which gave motion to matter, might have divided theſe ſuppoſed firſt principles in infinitum, as eaſily as fire divides wood: wherefore they were as liable to corruption as wood is, and conſequently, if they exiſted at all, they exiſted not as firſt principles. Beſides, what can be more ridiculous and abſurd, than to lay down as principles things that have no exiſtence at all? for ſuch were, according to Anaxagoras's ſyſtem, the homœomeries.

Let us examine an anſwer he might have made: he might have ſuppoſed, that the eſſence of the homœomeries did not conſiſt in the likeneſs of all their parts, but in the conformity that is found between the contexture of the heterogeneities of a ſmall bone, for inſtance, and the contexture of the heterogeneities of any other bone. He might have ſaid; "I "do not pretend that a bone of ten inches divided "into an hundred thouſand parts, or (which is the "ſame thing in my ſyſtem) into an hundred thou"ſand little bones, does not contain any particle but "what reſembles all the reſt; I own that each of "theſe ſmall bones is made up of all kinds of prin"ciples, and contains fleſh, blood, membranes &c. "But as theſe various principles are diſpoſed after the "ſame manner in each of the ſmall bones, I have "reaſon to maintain, that the collection of an hun"dred thouſand of theſe ſmall bones is an homoge"neous compound, or a collection of homœomeries: "and as I ſuppoſe the intelligent Being, that ſelected "them, to have found them ready made, I may "well maintain that each of them taken aſunder is "incorruptible; for they always exiſted of them"ſelves."

This anſwer may be reduced to two heads; viz. the explanation of the hypotheſis with reſpect to the meaning of the word homœomery, and the incorruptibility of the homœomeries. I ſhall make the firſt plain by an example. Place all the copies of the ſame book, bound in the ſame manner, in a Library; this will be a collection of books, that are all alike, an homogeneous collection; not becauſe each of theſe volumes is made up of parts that are perfectly alike, but becauſe the ſpaces, letters, accents, points, comma's, and the other heterogeneous parts have the ſame ſymmetry in the one as in all the reſt. I ſhall not meddle with this part of the anſwer, but only argue againſt the ſecond.

VI. I don't ask him why the intelligent Being he admits left the homœomeries in confuſion during all eternity; how he came to think ſo late of moving and uniting them; nor why he denies, that ſomething may be made out of nothing, ſince he allows that motion had a beginning? Theſe three objections, and ſome others, do ſtrangely puzzle thoſe who admit a matter eternal, uncreated, and diſtinct from the divine Being. But as theſe objections may be urged againſt other Philoſophers as well as againſt Anaxagoras, it is beſide my preſent ſcope to lay any ſtreſs upon them. I ſhall therefore only explain, and in a few words, the laſt. It is paſt all queſtion, that the production of a quality diſtinct from its ſubject, does not differ from a true creation. This the modern Philoſophers (125) prove evidently againſt the Ariſtotelians, who admit innumerable ſubſtantial and accidental forms, diſtinct from matter; for ſince they are not compoſed of any pre-exiſtent ſubject, they muſt, of courſe, be made out of nothing. The beſt anſwer the Ariſtotelians can give, is to retort the objection, and ſay, that, if this be true, the Carteſians muſt own, that motion cannot be produced but by creation. The Carteſians admit this conſequence, and aſcribe the production of motion to God alone; adding, that the moving of matter is a creating of it at every moment in different places. From all this we may conclude, that Anaxagoras and ſeveral others contradicted themſelves, while on one ſide they denied, that ſomething could be formed out of nothing, and on the other held, that motion, or ſome other modification had a beginning in the eternal chaos (126). But laying this aſide, I ſhall only inſiſt on ſuch difficulties as concern none but Anaxagoras.

VII. I employ this maxim againſt him: things, that are diſtinct from each other, can be ſeparated from each other; and infer from thence, that each homœomery may be divided into parts in infinitum, ſince it is made up of all manner of principles mingled together. If motion therefore be a neceſſary principle of diviſion, and God produced motion in matter, it is plain, that by the ſame motive power he might divide each part of the univerſe, and break in pieces any homœomery whatſoever, which you ſuppoſe to be an unity. Were it an Epicurean atom, a body quite ſimple, ſingle, and void of all compoſition, I own it could not be divided. But Anaxagoras acknowledges no ſuch bodies, nor indeed any homœomery, how little ſoever, but what contains an infinity of corpuſcles, both diſtinct, and different from each other in their qualities. It is therefore plain, that his firſt principles are no leſs liable to corruption than the moſt compound bodies, as, for inſtance, that of an ox; this, I ſay, is plain, even allowing the homœomeries to have exiſted of themſelves from all eternity; for it ſuffices, that an external cauſe can make them paſs from motion to reſt, tho' it cannot produce or annihilate them. The admitting of a progreſs in infinitum would be to no purpoſe here. Neither can it be ſaid in anſwer to this objection, that the homœomeries being made up of infinite corpuſcles, ſuch of them, as form a ſmall bone, may be divided in infinitum, and ſtill continue to be a (120) Ariſtot. Phyſic. lib. 1. cap. 4. p. 256. G.

(121) Idem, Metaphyſic. lib. 3. cap. 5. p. 671. C.

(122) Plato in Phædone, p. 54.

(123) Idem in Gorgia, p. 317.

(124) Menag. in Laertium, lib. 2. pag. 73.

(125) See Gaſſendi. Phyſ. Sect. 1. lib. 7. cap. 3.

(126) Methodius apud Photium, Cod. 236. p. 943.

are, I ſhall only ſay, that their notions were not juſt, and that they could not aſſert, that the ſtate of confuſion ſubſiſted no longer [H]. Anaxagoras is ſaid to have foretold, that the ſtone which fell from heaven into the river Ægos, and was preſerved and honoured as a holy relique, would fall from the body of the Sun [I]. Beſides this ſome other ſmall bone, tho' ſmaller after each diviſion. This is no proper reply; for two things are to be conſidered in each homœomery: I, It contains infinite particles; and this is common to it with others: II, Its particles are diſpoſed after a certain manner; and this is peculiar to it, and its ſpecific form and eſſence; by this it is a little bone, a little drop of blood, and not any other of the firſt principles. Hence to alter the diſpoſition of the particles that compoſe the homœomery of a bone, is to ſtrip it of its eſſence, and make it change its ſpecies. Now if the intelligent Being, the firſt Mover, could divide the bodies, and diſentangle them from each other; he could ſurely have divided the corpuſcles of each particular homœomery, and given them a new combination; that is, made them change their ſpecies, as flower changes its ſpecies, when it is kneaded, by a different combination and diſpoſition of its particles.

I do not object againſt this Philoſopher, that he admitted the parts of matter to differ before they were moved; this objection always appeared to me very weak; for it is very plain to me, that diviſion ſuppoſes diſtinction, and that an iron pin driven into a piece of wood, and perfectly at reſt, is as different from the wood, as if it moved together with the wood.

VIII. I proceed to the laſt objection. What if we ſhould grant to this Philoſopher, that the ſame neceſſity, which cauſes bodies to exiſt, cauſes them to exiſt diſtinct in infinite homœomeries, each whereof muſt always remain entire, ſince the nature of things requires fixed bounds in each ſpecies, as it is generally ſaid, that there is a minimum quod ſic (127) in each ſpecies of living bodies? Would not ſuch a conceſſion prove advantagious to Anaxagoras's ſyſtem? would it not eſtabliſh the incorruptibility, and internal immutability of his firſt principles? would they not be ſo ſmall a bone, for inſtance, that if they became leſs by an actual diviſion of their parts, they would be no more a bone, and ſo with the other ſpecies? would not this be a ſign, that the neceſſity of nature made them indiviſible? If I ſhould allow it, it would be only avoiding one abſurdity by admitting another. For then I ſhould find fault with the ſyſtem for bringing in the Νοῦς, or underſtanding, contrary to rule; that is, for making him undertake the eaſieſt task, after the moſt difficult has been performed by a blind neceſſity. 'Tis very true, that every Philoſopher, who has a mind to give well-grounded reaſons for the order and ſymmetry of the univerſe, muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe an intelligent Being to be the author of that order. He has no occaſion to fear, that any reaſonable man will reproach him, as if he imitated thoſe Poets, who bring a God as a machine upon the ſtage to unravel a plot that is not worth his trouble. But if after ſuppoſing, that the homœomeries were formed without the direction of an intelligent cauſe, he ſhould have recourſe to ſuch a cauſe, for the diſentangling and ordering them, he might be ſaid, with a great deal of reaſon, to imitate the above mentioned Poets, contrary to all rules (128). To be ſenſible of the ſtrength of this objection we need only mind, that it is much more difficult to make good watches, than to pick them out of a parcel of medals and ſhells, which they are mixed with, and put them afterwards in better order: for this is what a young Apprentice, what a Child could perform. Every one will allow me, that the forming of Men (129) requires more direction, and ability, than the art of diſpoſing them according to the military evolutions. Moſt of the modern Philoſophers ſuppoſe that the general laws of nature are ſufficient to make a fœtus grow, provided it has been well formed and organized in the ſeed; but they ſuppoſe at the ſame time, that the little animals, which are organized in the ſeed, are the work of a moſt wiſe and mighty Creator. They are therefore perſuaded, that the chief difficulty, and which moſt of all requires the direction of an intelligent Being, conſiſts in firſt framing of an organized machine; that is, in the framing of the little animals, which they ſuppoſe to be in the ſeed. Each of theſe animals is, properly ſpeaking, one of Anaxagoras's homœomeries. It is therefore more difficult to frame homœomeries, than to make animals grow with nouriſhment. It is therefore chiefly to explain the formation of the homœomeries, that Philoſophers recur to an intelligent Being; for each homœomery is a collection of infinite ſorts of bodies; which collection muſt be formed according to certain proportions and ſituations. The collection which is requiſite for the homœomery of a bone, is very different from that which is neceſſary for the homœomery of fleſh; the firſt principles of blood require ſuch a ſymmetry; and thoſe of marrow and other mixed bodies a quite different diſpoſition and order of particles. Now Anaxagoras did not ſuppoſe an intelligent Being to be neceſſary for the forming of infinite ſpecies of homœomeries, each whereof is made up of all ſorts of bodies, mixed together in ſuch a manner, that thoſe of one ſpecies muſt prevail in number, and have ſuch a diſpoſition and no other, and, generally ſpeaking, a certain ſymmetry and proportion muſt prevail in each principle above any other. He has therefore aſcribed to a blind neceſſity what was moſt difficult; and conſequently did not argue right in thinking, that an intelligent Being was neceſſary, for what was leſs difficult. In his ſyſtem all the functions of ſuch a Being were reduced to the following; viz. to digeſt into order what was in confuſion, to move what was at reſt, to ſeparate ſuch things as were mingled together, and adorn thoſe that were void of ornaments. Ἀναξαγόρας .... ταῦτα παιδιύει, ἀρχὴ πάντων ὁ νοῦς, καὶ οὗτος αἴτιος καὶ κύριος τῶν ὅλων, καὶ παρέχει τάξιν τοῖς ἀτάκτοις, καὶ κίνησιν τοῖς ἀκινήτοις, καὶ διάκρισιν τοῖς μεμιγμένοις, καὶ κόσμον τοῖς ἀκόσμοις (130). He was liable to be attacked both in the front, and the rear. One might have ſaid; You admit too much, or too little; if you think that nature could form the homœomeries without any direction or knowledge; you ought alſo to hold that ſhe could move, ſeparate, and diſpoſe them; and conſequently an underſtanding is ſuperfluous. But if you are perſuaded that it is neceſſary for the ſeparating and diſpoſing of your homœomeries, you ought likewiſe to aſcribe their formation to it: You have not recourſe to its influence wherever it is neceſſary. So that one part of your ſyſtem deſtroys the other; you have not formed it of well ſuited and well compacted pieces (131). Were his works, or all the work of Theophraſtus (132) extant, we ſhould, perhaps, find that he anſwered ſome of theſe difficulties, and that he owned himſelf not to be fully ſatisfied with his ſyſtem, but ſunk under the difficulties he met with in the myſteries of nature. For he uſed to ſay, that all things were ſurrounded with darkneſs (133). Anaxagoras pronunciat circumfuſa eſſe tenebris omnia. Which other Philoſophers alſo complained of, ſo as to imagine, that the darkneſs mentioned by Moſes, which covered the deep, before God created light, was diſſipated only with reſpect to the eyes (134); for as to the darkneſs of the mind, ſay they, it is ſtill on the upper part of the deep. The light of truth concentred in that abyſs never breaks out, but ſends only ſome rays which reach our mind after ſo many reflections and refractions, and after having mixed their brightneſs with ſo many obſcure corpuſcles in the dark ſpaces they paſs through, that they are only proper to form falſe images.

[H] The notions of the Antients who have mentioned the chaos were not juſt, and they could not aſſert that the ſtate of confuſion ſubſiſted no longer.] I had a mind to make ſome reflections on this ſubject; but as the foregoing remarks, and thoſe that remain, will ſufficiently, if not too much, enlarge this article, I have altered my mind. I ſhall not want an occaſion to give in ſome other article what I omit here.

[I] Anaxagoras is ſaid to have foretold that a ſtone .... would fall from the body of the Sun.] It is

(127) That is a degree of ſmallneſs below which an animal, an ant for inſtance, could not be an ant.

(128) Nec deus interſit, niſi nodus vindice dignus inciderit. Horat de Arte Poet. ver. 191.

(129) I don't mean what parents contribute towards it, nor the material, but the efficient cauſe, which organizes the Fœtus.

(130) Hermias in Philoſophorum irriſione. This work is to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and at the end of Juſtin Martyr's works, Paris 1636, and Cologne 1686.

(131) See a paſſage of Ariſtotle in the quotation 195.

(132) He wrote a book περὶ τῶν Ἀναξαγόρου. See Diogenes Laertius in Theophraſt. lib. 5. num. 42.

(133) Lactant. lib. 3. cap. 28. p. 217.

(134) See the firſt chapter of Geneſis.

other predictions are aſcribed to him (x). He applied himſelf greatly to the ſtudy of Geometry (y); and wrote, while he was in priſon, on the quadrature of the circle (z). His genius qualified him for every ſtudy; the moſt abſtruſe Phœnomena of Nature, the Comets, the Milky-way, Earthquakes, Winds, Thunder, Lightning (aa), the overflowing of the Nile (bb), the Eclipſes, and ſuch like things, which he accounted for, beſides his Aſtronomical and Geometrical Speculations; all theſe, I ſay, could not prevent him from reading Homer with the attention of a man, who is deſirous of diſcovering ſecrets, and improving learning. He was the firſt that looked upon Homer's Poems, as moral books, explaining virtue and juſtice by allegorical narrations (cc). The particulars and iſſue of the action that was entered againſt him at Athens for impiety are variouſly related. Some ſay he was condemned, and others that he was acquitted [K]. Pericles, who protected him on this occaſion, was ſuſpected of Atheiſm, becauſe he (x) See Note [I].

(y) Proclus Diadochus, lib. 2. in 1. Librum Euclidis.

(z) Plutarch. de exilio. p. 607.

(aa) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 9.

(bb) Diod. Sic. lib. 1. cap. 38.

(cc) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 12.

is related by Diogenes Laertius (135), and mentioned by Plutarch in the following words. "Some ſay, "that this overthrow was prognoſticated by the fal- "ling of a ſtone (126); for about that time, a ſtone "of a vaſt bigneſs fell from heaven (as many be- "lieved) near the river Ægos. This ſtone is to be "ſeen to this day, and is highly valued by the in- "habitants of Cheroneſos. The Philoſopher Anaxa- "goras is ſaid to have foretold, that one of the bo- "dies faſtened to the vault of heaven would fall down "upon the earth by a ſliding and ſhaking which was "to happen. For, he ſaid, that the Stars were not "in the places in which they were formed, becauſe "they were heavy bodies, and of the nature of "ſtone; that they ſhone by the reflection of the "elementary fire, and had been drawn up by force, "and were kept there by the impetuoſity of the "circular motion of the heavens, as they had been "placed there at the beginning of the world, and "prevented from falling upon the earth, when the "cold and heavy bodies were ſeparated from the "other ſubſtances of the world (137)." I have ſet down this paſſage at length to acquaint the reader with the tradition of that prodigy, and, at the ſame time, with the ſingularity of the doctrine of Anaxagoras. The words of Pliny are no leſs remarkable. Celebrant Græci, ſays he (138), Anaxagoram Clazomenium Olympiadis ſeptuageſimæ octavæ ſecundo anno, prædixiſſe cœleſtium literarum ſcientia, quibus diebus ſaxum caſurum eſſe e ſole. Idque factum interdiu in Thraciæ parte ad Ægos flumen. Qui lapis etiam nunc oſtenditur, magnitudine vehis, colore aduſto, comete quoque illis noctibus flagrante. Quod ſi quis prædictum credat, ſimul fateatur neceſſe eſt majoris miraculi divinitatem Anaxagoræ fuiſſe; ſolvique verum naturæ intellectum, & confundi omnia, ſi aut ipſe Sol lapis eſſe, aut unquam lapidem in eo fuiſſe credatur: decidere tamen crebro, non erit dubium. In Abydi gymnaſio ex ea cauſa colitur hodieque modicus quidem, ſed quem in medio terrarum caſurum idem Anaxagoras prædixiſſe narratur. Colitur & Caſſandriæ, quæ Potidæa vocitata eſt, ob id deducta. i. e. "The "Greeks record that Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, "in the ſecond year of the ſeventy eighth Olympiad, "foretold by his knowledge of the heavens on what "day a ſtone would fall from the Sun; which hap- "pened at the river Ægos in Thrace. The ſtone "is now to be ſhewn, as big as a cart, of a burnt "colour, there having appeared a burning Co- "met when it fell. Now if any one believes this "prediction, he muſt confeſs at the ſame time that "the divination of Anaxagoras was a greater miracle "than the thing itſelf; and that ſo there is an end "of the knowledge of nature, and all things are con- "founded, if either the Sun itſelf be a ſtone, or it "be believed that there ever was one in it. But "that ſtones do often fall down there will be no "doubt. In the Gymnaſium of Abydos, there is "great reverence paid to one on that account; it is but "of a middling ſize, but it is ſaid that Anaxagoras "alſo predicted the fall of it in the middle of the "earth. There is another at Caſſandria, which was "formerly called Potidæa." You ſee by this, that Anaxagoras more than once foretold the falling of ſtones, and that the worſhip paid them increaſed proportionably. Obſerve, that Ammianus Marcellinus, and Tzetzes uſed the plural number in ſpeaking of the prodigy of the river Ægos, and aſſert that Anaxagoras foretold, that ſtones would fall from heaven (139). Philoſtratus expreſſes himſelf in the ſame manner: I ſhall ſet down his words at length, becauſe they afford matter for criticiſm. Apollonius would then have been unjuſtly charged with ſuch an impiety and error, for having foreſeen ſome things, and foretold others, in the ſame manner as Socrates had been fully informed of them by ſpirits before they happened. And Anaxagoras alſo; for who is ignorant, that he being once gone to the Olympic Games with a Gobardine on, to foretel that it would rain (140), although the day was very clear without the leaſt appearance of rain, yet not long after it rained apace? Having another time foretold that a houſe would fall in a few days, it fell ſoon after. Again having foretold that the day at noon would all on a ſudden become as dark as night; and another time that great ſtones would fall from heaven into the river Ægos; all happened as he had foretold. Now if we own that theſe things, and ſuch like, foreſeen by Anaxagoras, were only ſigns of a great knowledge, how can they be imputed to Apollonius for Magic (141)? Upon this a Commentator has made a very ridiculous note. As to what Philoſtratus ſays, that Anaxagoras foretold it would rain, and that a ſtone ſhould fall from heaven, and other things of that kind, there is no Aſtrologer now-a-days, be he ever ſo mean, but can do as much (142). What an abſurdity is this? However great fools ſoever our modern Aſtrologers may be, they never preſume to foretel that ſtones will fall from heaven. Our Almanack-makers, and ſuch as caſt nativities, take care not to expoſe themſelves by ſuch impudent predictions. They are ſenſible, that the foretelling of ſuch prodigies is beyond their reach. Pliny had reaſon to ſay, that the prediction of Anaxagoras would have been more miraculous than the falling of a ſtone from the body of the Sun (143). Obſerve, that between the time in which, according to Pliny, the prediction was made, and the time in which, according to Plutarch, it was fulfilled, there paſſed about ſixty years. Here follows another obſervation. Photius, in his abſtract of the Life of Apollonius, pretends, that Anaxagoras was looked upon as a great Prophet, becauſe he foretold by Magic, that it would rain (144). I cannot think that Photius could ſo widely miſtake Philoſtratus's meaning; and therefore count ſuch a notorious miſtake, among the many others his work has been filled with by the tranſcribers. I am greatly amazed, that the Tranſlator ſuffered that ſheet to be printed (145). His tranſlation is a ſeries of ſuch glaring abſurdities, and monſtrous reaſonings, and beſides, ſo directly contrary to the original of Philoſtratus, that his conduct ſeems quite unaccountable. Did he think that the text of Photius was correct? He muſt then have had ſome other idle fancy in his head. Did he believe that his readers would be ſo ſtupid as to approve of his performance? This was a moſt prodigious preſumption. I wiſh ſome men of parts would be at the pains of examining this place in Photius; they will find ſuch wounds in it as require moſt skilful hands; and perhaps they might cure them by comparing the manuſcripts with the text of Philoſtratus.

[K] Some ſay that he was condemned, and others, that he was acquitted.] He was accuſed of impiety by Cleon, for having ſaid that the Sun was a maſs of inflamed matter, and, notwithſtanding the protection of Pericles, baniſhed, and fined five talents. This is what Sotion relates (146). But others ſay, that he was indicted by Thucydides, and charged both with impiety and treaſon, and that he was condemned

(135) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 10.

(136) The deſtroying of the Athenian fleet by Lyſander.

(137) Plutarch in Lyſandro, pag. 439. I follow Amiot's tranſlation.

(138) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 58.

(139) Ammian. Marcell. lib. 22. cap. 8. p. 308. Tzetzes, Chil. 2. ver. 892.

(140) This is mentioned by Diog. Laert. l. 2. num. 10. Ælian. de Animal. c. 8. and by Suidas alſo.

(141) Philoſt. in vita Apollonii, lib. 1. cap. 2. I follow Vigenere's tranſlation.

(142) Artus Thomas Sr. d'Embri, Annotat. ſur la vie d'Apollonius, tom. 1. p. 91.

(143) See his words above, quotation (138).

(144) Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 241. p. 1017.

(145) Andreas Schottus.

(146) Sotion in ſucceſſoribus Philoſophorum, apud Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 12.

he had been instructed by such a master; as I observe elsewhere (dd). Diogenes Laertius, in relating a witty saying of Anaxagoras, is mistaken in point of Chronology [L], which [D].

(dd) In the article PERICLES Note [C] and ed to die, being absent (147). Others say he was in prison when the sentence of death was pronounced against him, and that Pericles asked the Judges, Do you find him guilty of any crime, and that seeing none was laid to his charge, he added; I am his disciple; destroy him not therefore, being prejudiced against him with calumnies; believe me rather, and restore him to his liberty. The Judges granted him his demand; but Anaxagoras took this trial so much to heart, that he resolved to die (148). Others relate, that Pericles brought him before the Judges, and that his melancholy had made him so lean, and weakened him to such a degree that he could hardly walk, so that he was acquitted, rather through compassion, than because he had been found innocent (149). I have said elsewhere (150) that Pericles could find no means more proper to save this Philosopher, than to induce him to leave Athens.

(147) Satyrus in vitis apud Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 12.

(148) Hermippus in vitis apud Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 13.

(149) Hieronym. in 2 lib. Commentar. Varior. apud Diog. Laert. l. 2 num. 12.

(150) In the article PERICLES remark [M] near the middle.

Four things occur here worthy of notice. 1. Those who accused Anaxagoras (151) were of a faction that opposed Pericles. They were not therefore prompted by zeal for religion to persecute this Philosopher; they had no other end than to keep up their cabal and weaken the authority of Pericles, by maliciously throwing the suspicion of irreligion upon him. They could not better compass that end than by accusing Anaxagoras of impiety. This is, generally speaking, what gives rise to imputations of this nature. When men have a mind to revenge an affront, or to remove an obstacle to their authority, and fortune, they call the passions of the people to their aid, pretending that the honour of God lies at stake. 2. It is not true, that those who informed against Anaxagoras, grounded their accusations on his acknowledging an intelligent being to be the author of the universe. What they laid to his charge was that by maintaining the Sun to be a stone, he stripped him of his supposed Divinity, and upon this he was condemned (152). Vossius therefore was mistaken when he said, Laertii industria nobis ipsa Anaxagoræ verba conservavit; sunt autem hujusmodi: Πάντα χρήματα ἦν ὁμοῦ. εἶτα νοῦς ἐλθὼν αὐτὰ διεκόσμησε. Quam aperte hic opificem ab opificio distinguit! Hoc ferre non potuere Athenienses, ac ἀθεότητα vel ἀσέβειαν vocarunt (153). i. e. "The industry of Laertius "has preserved us the words of Anaxagoras entire. "They are these, All things were together, then "came the mind and disposed them. How clearly "does he distinguish here the workman from the "workmanship! The Athenians could not bear this, "and called him an Atheist or Impious." Anaxagoras was not condemned merely for distinguishing God from his works, but because he did not agree with the Poets in teaching, that the Sun was both the work of God, and a God. For according to the belief of the people, grounded on the writings of the Poets, the Sun was Apollo, Sun of Jupiter, and one of the prime Deities. Vossius's mistake is like that of one who should say, that the Inquisition has condemned one to die, for having taught, that God alone, who is the author, preserver, and sovereign Lord of all things, deserves the supreme worship of Latria, and that no creature in heaven deserves our invocations, and the worship of Dulia. This doctrine comprises two points, and one would be punished in Salamanca only for the second. Would not a Protestant be in the wrong, who should say he was punished for the first point? However Eusebius is in the right to think it strange, that Anaxagoras should have been like to be stoned as an Atheist, notwithstanding his Orthodoxy as to the existence of God, author of the universe, which doctrine he taught first among the Greeks. Θαυμάσαι δ' ἔστιν ὡς οὗτος πρῶτος παρ' Ἕλλησι τοῦτον θεολογήσας τὸν τρόπον, δόξας Ἀθηναίοις ἄθεος εἶναι, ὅτι μὴ τὸν Ἥλιον ἐθεολόγει, τὸν δὲ Ἥλιον ποιητήν, μικροῦ δεῖν καταλευσθεὶς ἔθανε (154). i. e. "It is strange that he "who first taught the Greeks this kind of Theology "should seem an Atheist to the Athenians, because "he did not allow the Sun but the maker of it to "be a God, and hardly escaped being killed by them." This, I say, is amazing; for in short, (and this is my third remark) it is unaccountable that in such a learned City as Athens a Philosopher could not explain the properties of the Stars by natural reasons without hazarding his life. Is it not a misfortune to have more knowledge than a superstitious mob guided by self-conceited men? What advantage can a man reap from a superior understanding and knowledge among such people? Is it not accounted as a crime? Does it not expose him to a thousand calumnies and dangers? Would he not live a more easy and comfortable life by following the current of ignorance and superstition? Οἱ προγεγραμμένοι τοῦ χριστοῦ κατὰ τὸ ἀνθρώπινον λόγῳ πειραθέντες τὰ πράγματα θεωρῆσαι καὶ ἐλέγξαι, ὡς ἀσεβεῖς καὶ περίεργοι εἰς δικαστήρια ἤχθησαν (155). That is, "Those who lived before Christ, endeavour- "ing to consider and investigate things by reason "adapted to human capacity were brought to judg- "ment as impious and over curious persons." I say in the fourth place, we have great reason to complain, that the Historians have not been better informed of such a remarkable trial as that of Anaxagoras, in which Pericles, the chief man of Athens, was so much concerned. For they relate it in a thousand different ways; nay they flatly contradict one another even with respect to the main point, which is not much for the credit of antiquity.

(152) See Josephus, lib. 2. contra Appion. pag. 1079. F. S. Cyrill. contra Julian. lib. 6.

(153) De origine & progressu Idololat. lib. 1. cap. 1. pag. 5.

(154) Euseb. Præpar. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 14. pag. 750. C.

(155) Justin. Martyr, Apolog. 1. p. 48.

I must not omit a fine passage in Lucian, where it is supposed, that the first and greatest of all the Gods endeavoured to crush Anaxagoras to pieces; but that he missed him, and that the thunderbolt, being turned off by Pericles, consumed a temple, and was like to break against a rock. Δίκην δώσουσιν ἐπιδὰν τὸν κεραυνὸν ἐπισκευάσω· κατεαγμέναι γὰρ αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀποσεσωρωμέναι εἰσὶ δύο ἀκτῖνες αἱ μίγιστοι, ὁπότε φιλοτιμότερον ἠκόντισα πρὸς τὸν σοφιστὴν Ἀναξαγόραν, ὃς ἐπιδὴ τοὺς ὁμιλητὰς μηδὲ ὅλως εἶναί τινας ἡμᾶς τοὺς Θεοὺς. ἀλλ' ἐκείνου μὲν διήμαρτον. ὑπερεῖχε γὰρ αὐτοῦ τὴν χεῖρα Περικλῆς. ὁ δὲ κεραυνὸς, εἰς τὸ ἀνάκειον παρασκήψας, ἐκεῖνό τε κατέφλεξε, καὶ αὐτὸς ὀλίγου δεῖν συνετρίβη παρὰ τὴν πέτραν (156). i. e. "They shall be "punished as soon as I have prepared my thunder- "bolt. For the two biggest rays of it were broken "and blunted, when some time ago I threw it furi- "ously at Anaxagoras the Sophist, who persuaded "his acquaintance that there were none of us Gods. "But I missed him, for Pericles held out his hand "and saved him. And the thunderbolt being turn- "ed aside, burnt the temple of Castor and Pollux, "and had like to have been broken against a rock." Vossius by only saying, that Jupiter darted his thunderbolt against Anaxagoras (157), gave Moreri occasion to say, that he was crushed to pieces by it; for it is natural to think that a thunderbolt, levelled against one, should have killed him. But this ought to teach us to recur to the originals, and not content ourselves with the moderns, who relate only such circumstances as are to their purpose. Vossius, for instance, who had no occasion to tell whether Jupiter succeeded in his attempt or no, omitted that jest of Lucian; and his omission proved a trap for Moreri, which he had avoided, had he only translated, and not paraphrased, Vossius's words. Lambert Barlæus in his comments on this passage of Lucian asserts, that Anaxagoras was accused of Atheism, because he taught that an intelligent Being was the first Mover &c. (158). This is an error which he had from Vossius, and I have already confuted it. He adds, that a talent was promised as a reward to any one that should kill Anaxagoras (159); wherein he seems to me to confound our Philosopher with the Atheist Diagoras. Lastly he compares, as to orthodoxy, Anaxagoras with Lucian, and complains of Justin Martyr for counting Lucian among the Atheists, Anaxagoræ .... non absimilis fuit Lucianus noster, quem immerito Ἄθεον vocat Justinus Martyr in oratione contra Græcos (160). But his comparison is no better grounded than his complaint. The occasion of his mistake was this: he had read in Vossius, Lucianus in Timone ait Jovem in Anaxagoræ caput .... sed Lucianum quid dico? Ecce Justinus Martyr oratione ad Græcos eum Ἄθεον vocat (161); and did not reflect that eum refers to Anaxagoras, and not to Lucian.

(156) Lucianus in Timone, p. 65. tom. 1. Operum.

(157) Vossius, de Philos. sectis pag. 27.

(158) Lambert. Barlæus in Luciani Timon. p. 62.

(159) Idem, ibid.

(160) Idem, ibi pag. 63.

(161) Vossius, de Origine & Progressu Idolol. lib. 1. cap. 1. p. 5.

[L] Diogenes Laertius in relating a witty saying of which I am ſurpriſed no one has hitherto obſerved. The conſtancy of our Philoſopher at the news of his condemnation, and of the death of his ſons was wonderful [M]. He was indifferent to live and die out of his native country (ee), and well knew what ſtations of life are the moſt happy [N]. Some authors tell us, that he was never ſeen to laugh, or even to ſmile (ff). Tully ſays, that he was very grave, maxima fuit & gravitatis & ingenii gloria (gg). He died at Lampſacus, where he was honoured with a decent funeral, and a noble epitaph; nay even an altar was erected to him [O]. He was viſited, a little before his death, by the chief men of the city, who aſked him, whether he had any commands for them: The Philoſopher anſwered, that all he deſired was, that yearly diverſions might be allowed the children in the month he ſhould die (hh); which was granted, and this cuſtom was ſtill obſerved in the time of Diogenes Laertius. He is ſaid to have lived ſeventy two years (ii). It is not certain, that he (ee) See note [M].

(ff) Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. l. 8. cap. 13. Plutarch in the Life of Pericles.

(gg) Cicer. Quæſtion. Academ. lib. 2. cap. 23.

(hh) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 14. See note [A] near the end.

(ii) Idem, ibid. n. 7.

of Anaxagoras is miſtaken in point of Chronology.] He tells us that Anaxagoras beholding the tomb of Mauſolus, cried out, This is a monument of the converſion of gold into ſtone; I do not confine myſelf to a literal tranſlation; the Greek words are, Τάφος πολυτελὴς λελιθωμένης ἐξ ὐσίας εἴδωλον (162). He might have ſaid ſo at the ſight of a ſumptuous tomb, but that could not be the tomb of Mauſolus, which was built many Olympiads after his death. Anaxagoras ....Olymp. LXXXVIII mortuus eſt, Mauſoli autem ſepulchrum ante Olymp. CVII conditum non eſt. Aut igitur hæc verba philoſophus ille non dixit; aut alia certe occaſione dixit: Mauſoleum enim nunquam vidit: quod ab illuſtratoribus Laertii nondum opinor obſervatum eſt. Verba ſunt Johannis Pearſonii, viri undecunque doctiſſimi in libro de Epiſtolis ſancti Ignatii pag. 9. ſecundæ partis, quibus ego aſſentior. Id ipſum obſervatum à Gisberto Cupero in antiquis numiſmatibus explicatis, viro elegantiſſimi ingenii (163). i. e. "Anaxagoras died in the 88th Olympiad. But "the ſepulchre of Mauſolus was not erected before "the 107th Olympiad. Therefore either the Philoſopher did not ſpeak theſe words, or elſe he ſpoke "them on ſome other occaſion; for he never ſaw "the Mauſoleum: which I think has not been before obſerved by the Commentators of Laertius. "The words are the learned Pearſon's in his book of "the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius, pag. 9, of the ſecond "part, to which I aſſent. The ſame is obſerved "by the very ingenious Cuper, in his explication of "ancient coins."

(162) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 10.

(163) Menag. in Diog. Laert. pag. 77. Col. 2.

[M] The conſtancy of that Philoſopher at the news of his condemnation, and of the death of his ſons, was wonderful.] When he received news of the firſt, he ſaid, Nature has long ago pronounced her ſentence againſt them (164), as well as againſt me; and, when news was brought him of the ſecond, I was ſenſible I had begot them mortal (165). Diogenes Laertius inſinuates, that he loſt them all; and adds, that, according to Demetrius Phalereus, his ſons interred him with their own hands (166). This would be a contradiction among authors; but might be removed by ſuppoſing, that after he had ſhewn that conſtancy, he had other children; or that he gave this anſwer when he received news of the death of one of his ſons. Tully uſes the ſingular number. Quem (Anaxgoram) ferunt, nunciata morte filii, dixiſſe, ſciebam me genuiſſe mortalem (167). The ſame number is uſed by Valerius Maximus (168), Plutarch (169), and Simplicius (170). But Ælian tells us, that Anaxagoras had but two ſons, and that he ſpoke thoſe words, when he received news that they were both dead (171). This news was brought him while he was reading a lecture in Philoſophy (172).

(164) That is, againſt his judges.

(165) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 13.

(166) Idem, ib.

(167) Cic. Tuſcul. Quæſt. l. 3. cap. 24.

(168) Val. Maximus, l. 5. in fine.

(169) Plutarch. Conſol. ad Apollon. p. 118. de cohib. ira. pag. 463. de tranquill. animi, p. 474. Mr. Menag. in Laert. lib. 2. num. 13. quotes the treatiſe de Cohibenda ira, and that περὶ ἀοργησίας, as two different treatiſes.

(170) Simplic. in Epictet. Enchirid. cap. 22.

(171) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 3. cap. 2.

(172) Plutarch. de Conſol. ad Apollon. p. 118; Ælian. Var. Hiſtor. lib. 3. cap. 2. Stobæus Serm. 106.

I ſhall inſert here the anſwer he gave his friends, when they asked him at Lampſacus, whether he deſired to be carried after his death to Clazomenæ his native country. There is no occaſion for that, ſaid he, the way to the realms below is not further from one place than from another. Præclare Anaxagoras, qui cum Lampſaci moreretur, quærentibus amicis velletne Clazomenas in patriam, ſi quid ei accidiſſet, afferri, nihil neceſſe eſt, inquit, undique enim ad inferos tantundem viæ eſt (173). Diogenes Laertius ſuppoſes, he ſaid ſo to one, who was unwilling to die out of his native country (174). I have often wondered, how the fine ſayings of the ancients came to be reported ſo variouſly, and examined what might have occaſioned ſuch a variety. Of all the reflections, that occurred to me on this ſubject, the following has to me moſt appearance of truth. The readers retain the ſubſtance of a fact better than the circumſtances, and therefore in relating it ſupply, in the beſt manner they can, what they have let ſlip out of their memory; and as their taſtes are different, they never agree in what they ſupply. I don't ſpeak of the additions that are made deſignedly to adapt things better to the ſubject in hand, nor of any variations that proceed from inſincerity and unfair dealing. What I ſay of readers may be applied to all others: nay men are ſtill more apt to relate differently what they hear, than what they read.

(173) Cicero Tuſcul. Quæſtion. lib. 1. cap. 43.

(174) Diog. Laert. l. 2. num. 2.

[N] He well knew what ſtations of life are the moſt happy.] He uſed to ſay that thoſe ſtations were the moſt happy, that ſeemed the leaſt to be ſo; and that ſuch as enjoy great riches or honours are ſtrangers to true happineſs, which is to be found among thoſe, who free from all ambition till a little ground, or apply themſelves to the ſciences. Valerius Maximus will tell you it better than I can do. Nec parum prudenter Anaxagoras interroganti cuidam, quiſnam eſſet beatus; nemo, inquit, ex his quos tu felices exiſtimas: ſed eum in illo numero reperies, qui à te ex miſeris conſtare creditur. Non erit ille divitiis & honoribus abundans: ſed aut exigui ruris, aut non ambitioſæ doctrinæ fidelis ac pertinax cultor, in ſeceſſu quam in fronte beatior (175).

(175) Val. Max. lib. 7. cap. 2. num. 9. in externis, p. 604.

[O] He was honoured with a noble epitaph, nay even an altar was erected to him.] This epitaph is recorded by Ælian and Laertius, and conſiſted of the two following verſes:

Ἐνθάδε, πλεῖον ἀληθείας ἐπὶ τέρμα περήσας
Οὐρανίης κόσμου, κεῖται Ἀναξαγόρας (176).

(176) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 15.

"Here Anaxagoras the Sophiſt lies,
"Who knew the inmoſt ſecrets of the ſkies."

This diſtich expreſſes as much as the ſeven following French verſes, which contain a like elogium.

Des Cartes dont tu vois icy la ſepulture,
A deſſillé les yeux des aveugles mortels,
Et gardant le reſpect que l'on doit aux Autels,
Leur a du monde entier demontré la ſtructure.
Son nom par mille ecrits ſe rendit glorieux,
Son eſprit méſurant & la terre & les cieux,
En pénétra l'abîme, & perça les nuages (177).

(177) Baillet, vie de des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 443.

"Des Cartes, whom this grave contains,
"Has opened the eyes of blind mortals,
"And preſerving the reſpect due to God,
"Has revealed to them the ſtructure of the univerſe.
"His name is become glorious by a thouſand "writings;
"His mind meaſuring both the earth and the "heavens,
"Penetrated down to the abyſs, and up above "the clouds."

Diogenes Laertius ſays nothing of Anaxagoras's altar; but it is mentioned by Ælian (178), who ſeems to inſinuate that two altars were conſecrated to him, one under the title of the underſtanding, and the other under that of truth. But a learned Critic (179) takes this paſſage in another ſenſe, and ſays, that the true meaning of it is this; that the altar was dedicated, according to ſome, to the underſtanding, and, according to others, to truth. Ariſtotle obſerves, that the inhabitants of Lampſacus continued to ho-

(178) Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 19.

(179) Kuhnius in hunc locum Ælian.

he held the doctrine of Predeſtination [P]. He was the firſt Philoſopher that publiſhed books [Q]. Socrates, not having found in them what he expected, did not approve of them; but that was probably his own fault [R], as I ſhall make appear in my reflections on his diſcourſe. One of the reaſons why Socrates ſlighted Aſtronomy was, nour Anaxagoras (180). 'Tis to be obſerved, that in St. Auſtin's time, the authority of that Philoſopher was ſtill of great weight. Quam (veritatem) ſi ſenſit Anaxagoras, eamque Deum eſſe vidit, mentemque appellavit, non ſolum nomen Anaxagoræ, quod propter literatam vetuſtatem, omnes, ut militariter loquar, literatiores libenter ſufflant, nos doctos & ſapientes non facit, ſed ne ipſa quidem ejus cognitio, qua id verum eſſe cognovit (181). i. e. "If Anaxagoras perceived truth, and knew it to be God, and called it the Mind, not only the name of Anaxagoras, which on account of its antiquity, all the Learned are willing to extol, does not make us learned and wiſe, but not ſo much as the very knowledge of that by which he knew it to be true."

(180) Ariſtot. Rhetoricor. lib. 2. c. 23. p. 445.

(181) Auguſt. Epiſt. 16. pag. 272.

[P] It is not certain that he held the doctrine of Predeſtination.] He is ſaid to have oppoſed that doctrine very ſtrenuouſly (182), and confuted it in his works; but Alexander Aphrodiſienſis is the only Author who aſſerts it, and that in ſuch a manner as to make us ſuſpend our judgment. For he obſerves, that Anaxagoras refuted that doctrine not by a deliberate and previous choice, but in order to maintain another doctrine; that is, he wrote againſt fate, becauſe he could not otherwiſe anſwer thoſe who oppoſed one of his opinions. Alexander Aphrodiſienſis judiciouſly inſinuates, that ſuch a circumſtance makes the faith of Anaxagoras ſomewhat doubtful. And indeed an Author will do any thing in the heat of a diſpute to deprive his adverſaries of the advantages they might draw from his ſilence, or from what he allows. He will rather contradict himſelf, and aſſert what he does not believe, than ſuffer his own weapons to be employed againſt himſelf. But let that be as it will; here follows a fine paſſage of Gabriel Naudæus. Obtulit ſe tandem Alexander ex Aphrodiſiade, facemque in his tenebris verſanti prætulit, quanquam ex ſcrupulo injecto, quod fide dignus Anaxagoras, dum iſtud aſſereret, minime fuerit, non quod propoſitio ejuſmodi vera non eſſet; verum quia in alterius opinionis ſuæ defenſionem, quam ſuſcipere cogebatur, non autem ex ſola determinataque voluntate adverſus fatum ſcribendi, illam protuliſſet* (183). i. e. "At length came Alexander Aphrodiſienſis, and gave a clue to lead out of this labyrinth, tho' with ſome kind of doubt, obſerving that Anaxagoras was not to be depended upon in this aſſertion, not that his propoſition was not true, but becauſe he produced it to defend another of his opinions, which he was obliged to maintain, and not out of any fixt inclination to write againſt fate." This Author had ſaid juſt before, that the moderns, who aſſert, that Anaxagoras oppoſed predeſtination, do not quote any ancient Author for what they aſſert. He had alſo obſerved, that no ſuch thing is mentioned by Diogenes Laertius, Tully, Galen, Plutarch, or Origen.

(182) Commmni hominum opinioni de fato quantum potuit reluctatus eſt. Naudæus, de fato & vitæ termino, p. 20.

* Lib. de fato cap. 1. & lib. de anima, cap. ult.

(183) Idem, ib.

[Q] He was the firſt Philoſopher that publiſhed books.] This is what Diogenes Laertius ſays in expreſs terms: Πρῶτος ὁ Ἀναξαγόρας καὶ βιβλίον ἐξέδωκε συγγραφῆς (184). i. e. "Anaxagoras was the firſt that "publiſhed a book." But as he ſeems elſewhere to agree with Phavorinus, who ſays, that Alcmæon, a diſciple of Pythagoras, was the firſt that wrote upon Phyſics (185), his authority becomes doubtful. Clemens Alexandrinus leaves the queſtion undecided; for he only ſays, that ſome aſcribe to Alcmæeon the firſt book that was publiſhed upon Phyſics, and that others maintain, that Anaxagoras was the firſt, who offered a book to the public (186). Both theſe opinions would prove falſe, if Thales had written books, as St. Auſtin avers (187); or if the Greek tradition mentioned by Suidas (188) were true, that the firſt books were wrote by the Philoſopher Pherecydes. Note that Ariſtotle obſerves, that the works of Anaxagoras came out after thoſe of Empedocles, tho' the latter was younger than Anaxagoras (189).

(184) Diog. Laert. l. 2. num. 2.

(185) Diog. Laert. lib. 8, num. 83. See the article ALCMÆON of Croto, quotation (a).

(186) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. l. 2. p. 308.

(187) See quotation (85).

(188) Suidas in Ἑκαταῖος.

(189) Ariſtot. Metaphyſ. lib. 1. cap. 3. See Fonſeca's Commentary p. 218.

[R] Socrates did not approve of them, but that was probably his own fault.] I ſhall inſert here an abridgment of Socrates's complaint, and afterwards ſome reflections. When I came to know, ſays he (190), that Anaxagoras had laid down in his works, that an underſtanding had produced all things, and governed them (191); I was well pleaſed with ſuch a cauſe, and imagined, that from thence it would follow, that each being was endowed with the beſt qualities, and ſituated after the moſt excellent manner. I hoped therefore, with great joy, to find at laſt in Anaxagoras's book a maſter, who could inſtruct me in the cauſes of every thing, and inform me whether the earth is round or flat, and afterwards give me the reaſon for what he had determined: and as I believed that this reaſon would be grounded on moſt ſublime notions, I hoped he would have ſhewn me, that the ſituation the earth is in, was the beſt it could be in; and that if he placed it in the center, he would have told us, why that ſituation was the beſt. I was reſolved not to look out for any other cauſe, provided he had made all this clear to me, but only to enquire after the proportions of ſwiftneſs and revolution &c. between the Sun, Moon, and other Planets; what is the beſt reaſon why thoſe bodies in the quality of agents and patients, are what they are; for I ſhould never have thought, that a Philoſopher, who holds that an intelligent Being governs all things, would produce any other cauſe, but prove, that the ſtate, in which they are, is the beſt that can be. I likewiſe believed, that after explaining the particular nature of each body, he would proceed to what is convenient and common to them all. Full of this hope, I began to read, with the greateſt eagerneſs his works, that I might ſpeedily know what is the beſt, and what the worſt: but I found, that this Philoſopher does not aſcribe the ordering of the univerſe to the ſupreme Underſtanding, or to any other cauſe, but refers all things to the air, the æther, and the water, as their origin (192). This is juſt as if any one after ſaying that I do by the underſtanding whatever I do, ſhould account for my particular actions thus: Socrates is ſitting, becauſe his body is made up of bones and nerves, which, according to the rules of mechaniſm are the cauſe that he can bend his limbs. He ſpeaks becauſe the motion of his tongue moves the air, and conveys its impreſſion to the ear &c. Such a man would forget the true cauſe, that the Athenians having judged it the beſt to condemn me, I found it better for me to ſit down here, and that it was more juſt, I ſhould ſuffer the puniſhment they have inflicted. If any one ſhould object, that without my bones and nerves &c. I cannot do what I would, he judges right; but if he pretends, that my bones and nerves are the cauſe of my doing it, and not the choice of what is beſt, and at the ſame time ſuppoſes that I act by underſtanding, he reaſons very abſurdly (193).

(190) Plato in Phædone, p. 72, & ſeq.

(191) Ὡς ἄρα νοῦς ἐστιν ὁ διακοσμῶν τε καὶ πάντων αἴτιος. Plato in Phædone, pag. 72.

(192) Ὁρῶ ἄρα τῷ μὲν νῷ οὐδὲν χρώμενον, οὐδὲ τινας αἰτίας ἐπαιτιώμενον εἰς τὸ διακοσμεῖν τὰ πράγματα, ἀέρας δὲ καὶ αἰθέρας καὶ ὕδατα αἰτιώμενον καὶ ἄλλα πολλὰ καὶ ἄτοπα. Plato in Phædone, pag. 73, D.

(193) Πολλὴ ἂν καὶ μακρὰ ῥαθυμία εἴη τοῦ λογοῦ. Plato in Phædone, pag. 74, A.

In theſe words you plainly ſee Socrates's taſte. He had given over the ſtudy of natural Philoſophy, and applied himſelf wholly to the Moral; and therefore was for having all things explained by moral reaſons, and by the ideas of order and perfection. I'll venture to ſay, that his cenſure is no ways to the purpoſe. When a Philoſopher has once ſuppoſed that an intelligent Being gave motion to matter, and digeſted the parts of the univerſe into order, he is not obliged to recur to that cauſe for each particular effect of nature. He ought to explain the vegetation of plants, the meteors, the light, gravity, opacity, fluidity &c. by the action and re-action of bodies, by the qualities of elements, by the figure of the parts of matter &c. Such is the method of the Chriſtian Philoſophers of all ſects. 'Tis a current maxim among the Schoolmen, that a Philoſopher ought not to recur to God, Non eſt Philoſophi recurrere ad Deum: they call ſuch a recourſe the Sanctuary of ignorance. And indeed what could you ſay more abſurd in a treatiſe of Phyſics, than this; that ſtones are hard, fire is hot, and cold freezes the rivers, becauſe God will have it to be ſo. The Carteſians themſelves, who make God not only the firſt Mover, but the only, continual, and perpetual Mover of matter, do not recur to his will and action, when they explain the effects of fire, the properties of the was, becauſe Anaxagoras, who had applied himſelf greatly to that ſtudy, fell into a great many miſtakes [S]. What is obſerved concerning the Treatiſe, in which he reaſons the loadſtone, colours, ſmells &c. they only conſider the ſecond cauſes, the motion, figure, and ſituation of their particles. So that if the abovementioned remark (194) of Clemens Alexandrinus was founded only on this diſcourſe of Socrates, it was a very unjuſt one. Had Anaxagoras not only made no mention of the divine Underſtanding in explaining many Phænomena of nature, but poſitively and formally excluded it with reſpect to ſome, in this caſe that reflection had been juſt. And who knows but that he maintained ſomewhere in his works what was afterwards taught by his diſciple Euripides, that God only concerns himſelf with great things, and leaves the leſſer to fortune (195): as if the world were like a Prætor's tribunal; de minimis non curat Prætor. We have obſerved above (196), that our Philoſopher aſcribed ſome effects to chance, and others to neceſſity, &c. and that he called to his aid the ſupreme Underſtanding only when he could not make appear, that an effect was owing to neceſſity (197). We may ſuppoſe in general that his ſyſtem was not well digeſted, nor finiſhed. This is what Ariſtotle inſinuates, where he ſpeaks of the firſt Philoſophers who acknowledged two cauſes, the material and efficient. He compares them to ſuch as have not learnt the military exerciſe, and yet often incommode the enemy, tho' not directed by any rule. In like manner thoſe Philoſophers had not a well grounded knowledge of what they advanced. Οὗτοι μὲν οὖν... δυεῖν αἰτίαν ἐφήψαντο... τῆς τε ὑλῆς, καὶ τοῦ ὄθεν ἡ κίνησις. ἀμουσοτέρως μέν τοι ἢ οὐδὲν σαφῶς, ἀλλ' οἷον ἐν ταῖς μαχαῖς οἱ ἀγύμναστοι ποιοῦσι. καὶ γὰρ ἐκεῖνοι περιφερόμενοι, τύπτουσι πολλάκις καλὰς πλήγας, ἀλλ' οὔτε ἐκεῖνοι ἀπὸ ἐπιστήμης, οὔτε οὗτοι ἱκανῶς οἴδασιν λέγειν ἃ λέγουσι (198). We ſhall ſee elſewhere (199), that there are ſome things, which Anaxagoras did not touch upon, but would, without all doubt, have admitted, had he been put in mind of them, had any one diſcloſed them to him; and that many ſound doctrines might be deduced from his principles, if well cleared and digeſted.

(194) In the remark [E] quotation (91).

(195) Τὰν ἄγαν γὰρ ἄπτονται θεοὶ, τὰ μικρὰ δ' εἰς τύχην ἀνεῖς ἐᾷ, κατὰ τὸν Εὐριπίδην. Plutarch. in Reipublicæ gerendæ præceptis, p. 811, D.

(196) In the remark [E] quotation (94).

(197) Quotation (90).

(198) Ariſtot. Metaphyſ. lib. 1, cap. 4. p. 646, G.

(199) Idem, ib. cap. 8. pag. 651, C.

I cannot blame Socrates for deſiring ſuch an explanation of the univerſe as he inſinuates; for could any thing be more excellent and curious than to know diſtinctly and particularly, why the perfection of the ſtructure of the world required that each Planet ſhould have the figure, magnitude, ſituation and ſwiftneſs, which it has, and ſo of the reſt. But ſuch a knowledge is not for us mortals; and it was a piece of injuſtice to expect it from Anaxagoras. Had we the idea, which God followed in framing the world, we might give the explanation Socrates deſired; but without that it is impoſſible. All that the moſt skilful Philoſophers can ſay thereupon, amounts to this. That ſince the earth is round, and placed at ſuch a diſtance from the Sun, the beauty and ſymmetry of the univerſe required ſuch a figure and ſituation; ſince the Author of this vaſt fabric is endowed with an infinite wiſdom. From hence we infer in general, that the whole has its due perfection, and that nothing is amiſs in it. But if we ſhould undertake to ſhew, that each part in particular is in the beſt condition it can poſſibly be in, we ſhould infallibly give very wrong reaſons. We ſhould do like a Peaſant, who, having no notion of a clock, ſhould undertake to ſhew that the wheel, which he ſees thro' a chink, was to be of ſuch a thickneſs, and bigneſs, and preciſely placed where it is, becauſe if it had been leſs, thinner, or placed elſewhere, great inconveniences would have happened. He would judge of this machine, as a blind man of colours, and, without all doubt, argue wretchedly. The Philoſophers are no more capable to judge of the fabric of the world, than that Peaſant of a clock. They underſtand but a ſmall portion of it, and are quite ſtrangers to the model, deſign, and ends of the Artificer, as well as to the reciprocal relation of all the parts. If you ſay, that the earth ought to be round, that it may turn the eaſier about its axis, one may anſwer, that it would be more proper it were ſquare, to the end it might turn more ſlowly, and give us longer days. What could you anſwer to the purpoſe, were you obliged to ſpecify the inconveniences that would happen, if Mercury were bigger, or nearer the earth? Would Sir Iſaac Newton, who has made ſo many fine mathematical and mechanical diſcoveries in the heavens, affirm, that if things were not ſuch as he ſuppoſes them to be, as to their magnitude, diſtance, and velocity, the world would be an irregular work, ill built, and ill contrived? Is not the divine Underſtanding infinite? God has therefore the ideas and models of infinite worlds, differing from each other, and all perfect, regular, and mathematical, to the higheſt degree. Do you imagine he could not draw from an earth of a ſquare figure, and nearer Saturn ſuch uſes, as would be anſwerable to thoſe of our earth? From all this we may conclude, that Socrates was in the wrong to expect that Anaxagoras ſhould ſhew him by particular reaſons that the preſent ſyſtem of the univerſe is the beſt that can be; for God alone is capable of proving it in this manner.

Why we cannot prove by particular reaſons, that each body in the univerſe is in the beſt ſtate it can poſſibly be in.

How ſhould we do what Socrates required with reſpect to the univerſe, ſince we cannot do it with reſpect to an animal, after ſo many diſſections, and lectures of Anatomy, which have taught us the number, ſituation, uſe, &c. of its chief organs? By what particular reaſons can it be proved, that the perfection of man, and of the univerſe, requires, that we ſhould have but two eyes, and thoſe placed as they are, and that ſix eyes placed round the head would be repugnant both to the ſymmetry of our body and of the univerſe? It may be reaſonably pretended, that in order to give a man ſix eyes round his head, without acting contrary to the general laws of mechanics, the other organical parts ought to have been ſo altered, that a man's body would have been framed after another model, and been a quite different machine; but no particular reaſon can be produced for this; and all you could ſay would be liable to objections as probable as your proofs. We muſt therefore inſiſt upon this general reaſon, that the wiſdom of the Artificer is infinite, and conſequently the work is ſuch as it ought to be; we muſt not deſcend to particulars. which can hardly be attempted without turning one's ſelf into ridicule (200).

However, this diſcourſe of Socrates ſhews that he was not a diſciple of Anaxagoras; for had he been his diſciple, he would never have ſtood in need of being informed by one, who had read Anaxagoras's works, that this Philoſopher held an intelligent being to be the cauſe of all things (201).

(200) See the Diſcours Anatomiques de Guillaume Lami, a Phyſician of Paris.

(201) Plato in Phædone, pag. 72, &c.

[S] Socrates ſlighted Aſtronomy, becauſe Anaxagoras, who had greatly applied himſelf to that ſtudy, fell into a great many miſtakes.] That Socrates's thoughts upon this ſubject may appear more plain, I ſhall ſet down ſomewhat at length the words of his Hiſtorian. "He was of opinion that ſome time "ſhould be ſpent in ſtudying Aſtronomy, to know, "by the Stars, what a clock it is, what day of the "month, and what ſeaſon of the year; when a "centinel is to be relieved in the night, when it is "proper to travel by ſea, and when by land. He "ſaid this would be eaſily learned by converſing with "ſeamen, or ſuch as uſed to hunt in the night time. "But to endeavour to dive deeper into the matter, "ſo as to know what Stars have not the ſame de"clination; to attempt the explaining of the differ"ent motions of the Planets, and find out their diſ"tance from the earth, in what time they make their "revolutions, and what their influence is, were "things he by no means approved of; for ſuch ſci"ences ſeemed to him quite uſeleſs, not becauſe he "was unacquainted with them, but by reaſon they "took up a man entirely, and diverted him from "many other uſeful employments. In a word, he "was not for ſearching too curiouſly into the won"derful art, with which the Gods have framed the "univerſe, becauſe it is a ſecret beyond the reach of "human underſtanding; and beſides, it cannot be "pleaſing to the Gods, that we ſhould endeavour to "find out what they have thought fit to conceal "from us. He was alſo perſuaded that in ſuch high "ſpeculations men are ſubject to great errors and "miſtakes, like thoſe Anaxagoras fell into, though he "pretended to be well verſed in ſpeculations of "that

ſons of Eclipſes, is very curious, and to be found in the article PERICLES, note [B]. I muſt not forget, that the Mount Mimas near Clazomenæ, was one of the places from whence he uſed to contemplate the Stars (kk); much leſs muſt we forget, that his ſublime genius, labour, application, and the many diſcoveries he made, ſerved only to raiſe new doubts in his mind; for he uſed to complain, that every thing was covered with darkneſs (ll); and this perhaps was what made him ſay, that all conſiſts in opinion, and that the objects are whatever we pleaſe to make them, that is, whatever we fancy them to be (mm). Though he taught, that the ſoul of man was an aereal being (nn), yet he held that it was immortal (oo); which honour he would not allow to the world, being one of thoſe, who believed that heaven and earth were to periſh (pp); and being once aſked, whether the mountains of Lampſacus ſhould one day become part of the ſea; yes, anſwered he, provided they are not gone to decay before that time (qq). I have explained elſewhere (rr) his opinion touching the ſouls of beaſts. It is a great pity he was no friend to Democritus, and that theſe two great men did not concert together about their hypotheſes; for the defects of the one might have been corrected by the perfections of the other; but there paſſed no manner of correſpondence between them: Nay Anaxagoras hated Democritus, becauſe the latter refuſed a viſit which the former deſired to pay him (ss). Servius, and Sidonius Apollinaris were ſtrangers to the opinions of Anaxagoras [T]. There are a great many Greek paſſages in the remarks upon this article, which ought to pleaſe ſuch as underſtand that language, and like to judge of things by the very words of the authors that are quoted; neither have thoſe, who are ignorant of the Greek tongue, any reaſon to complain. For beſides that my pages on this account will be ſhorter to them, they will find in them a general notion of what the Greek texts contain. Let this be ſaid once for all. Leſt I ſhould be too prolix in this article, I ſhall refer to another place (tt) ſome chronological diſcuſſions.

(kk) Philoſtrat. in vita Apollonii, lib. 2. cap. 2.

(ll) See note [G] near the end.

(mm) Ariſt. Metaphyſ. lib. 3. cap. 5. p. 671, G.

(nn) Theodoret, de Græcis affect. Serm. 5. p. 547.

(oo) Idem, ibid. p. 548.

(pp) See the Jeſuits of Conimbra in Ariſtot. lib. 1. de Cœlo, cap. 3. pag. 65.

(qq) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 10.

(rr) In the article PEREIRA, note [E].

(ss) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 14.

(tt) To the article ARCHELAUS the Philoſopher, note [A].

" that nature. For when he taught, that the Sun
" was the ſame thing with fire, he did not reflect,
" that fire dazzles not the eyes, whereas it is impoſ-
" ſible to bear the Sun-ſhine (202). I ſhall not mention two other reaſons produced by the Hiſtorian againſt this doctrine of Anaxagoras; for they are no better than the firſt, and leſs worth mentioning than Socrates's notion of the Gods, who imagined them to be very jealous of their ſecrets, and apt to be diſpleaſed with ſuch as curiouſly enquired into them. Xenophon's words are as follow. Ὅλως δὲ τῶν οὐρανίων ἧ ἕκαστα ὁ θεὸς μηχανᾶται, φροντιστὴν γίγνεσθαι ἀπέτρεπεν· οὔτε γὰρ ἔμπροσθεν αὐτὰ ἑωρᾶν ἀνθρώποις ἐνόμιζεν εἶναι, οὔτε χαρίζεσθαι θεοῖς ἄν ἡγεῖτο τὸν ζητοῦντα ἃ ἐκείνοις σαφηνίσαι οὐκ ἐβουλήθησαν (203). Ariſtotle entertained a better opinion of the Deity. He owns that if the Gods were ſubject to jealouſy, they would be chiefly jealous of this ſublime knowledge, but denies what the Poets affirmed of the pretended jealouſy of the Gods. His words are very remarkable. Εἰ δὴ λέγουσί τι οἱ ποιηταὶ καὶ πέφυκε φθονεῖν τὸ θεῖον, ἐπὶ τούτῳ συμβῆναι μάλιστα εἰκὸς, καὶ δυστυχεῖς εἶναι πάντας τοὺς περιττοὺς, ἀλλ' ὅτι τὸ θεῖον φθονερὸν ἐνδέχεται εἶναι, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν πολλὰ ψεύδονται ἀοιδοί (204). i. e.
" If the Poets ſay any thing, and the Divinity be " ſubject to envy, it is probable that it chiefly hap" pens on this account, and that all are unhappy
" who aſpire above their reach. But the Divinity
" cannot be envious, but, according to the proverb,
" Poets tell many lies. Quod ſi aliquid poetæ dicunt, & in naturam divinam cadit invidia, veriſimile eſt hac in re maxime accidere, & infelices eſſe eos omnes, qui altiora ſe quærunt (205). Sed neque divinitas invida eſſe poteſt, multaque, ut eſt in proverbio, mentiuntur Poetæ.

(202) Xeneph. De Socrat. Memorab. l. 4. pag. 384. I have followed Charpentier's tranſlation.

(203) Xenophon ἀπομν. lib. 4. p. 474.

(204) Ariſtot. Metaphyſ. lib. 1. cap. 2. p. 644, E.

(205) Thus Beſſarion renders περιττούς. Argyropylus renders it, qui hæc ſuperflua quærunt. See Fonſeca upon this paſſage of Ariſtotle, p. 130.

[T] Servius and Sidonius Apollinaris were ſtrangers to the opinions of Anaxagoras.] The firſt ſays, that he held fire to be the principle of all things (206); wherein he confounds him with Heraclitus: the other, that, like Thales, he maintained water to be the firſt principle. This deprives him of his homæomeries, which doctrine Sidonius Apollinaris was well acquainted with, but aſcribes it, without any ground, to Anaximander, as alſo the παντσπερμία, that is, that the ſeeds of all things were every where, which doctrine was taught by Anaxagoras, and likewiſe by Democritus, as Ariſtotle obſerves in the fourth chapter of the third book of his Phyſics.

(206) Servius in Virg. Ec. 6. ver. 31.

Sed rebus inutile ponit (207).
Principium, dum credit aquis ſubſiſtere mundum.
Hujus diſcipuli verſa eſt ſententia, dicens,
Principiis propriis ſemper res quaſque creari,
Singula qui quoſdam fontes decrevit habere
Æternum irriguos, ac rerum ſemine plenos.
Hunc etiam ſequitur, qui gignere cuncta putabat
Hunc aerem, pariterque Deos ſic autumat ortos.
Quartus Anaxagoras Thaletica dogmata ſervat:
Sed divinum animum ſentit qui fecerit orbem (208).

(207) That is Thales.

(208) Sidon. Apollin. Carm. 15. ver. 81. pag. 151, 152.

" His principles are wrong when he ſuppoſes,
" The world is made of water. His ſucceſſor
" Is of a diff'rent mind; that all things riſe
" From their own principles, that theſe have ſtreams
" For ever running, fill'd with ſeeds of things.
" A third maintains that all things owe their birth
" To air, and that the Gods were thus produc'd.
" But Anaxagoras retains the doctrine
" Of Thales, and he adds a Mind divine,
" That form'd the univerſe."

Theſe miſtakes have eſcaped the learned Savaro in his notes on this Poem of Sidonius Apollinaris.

ANAXANDRIDES, King of Lacedæmon, and ſon to Leo, is the only man of his country who had two wives at one time (a); which he was not ſo much to be blamed for as the Ephori, who obliged him to divorce his wife, becauſe ſhe was barren, and marry another by whom he might have children. As he was very fond of his wife, he proteſted, that he would never divorce her (b). The Ephori, ſeeing him fixt in this reſolution, propoſed to him the marrying of another, without divorcing his firſt wife, inſinuating, that if he did not comply with their requeſt, he ſhould repent it. Upon this he accepted the ſecond propoſal, but would not ſuffer his two wives to live under the ſame roof. The new ſpouſe was ſoon delivered of Cleomenes, and at the ſame time the firſt proved with child. This was a bad piece of news to the domeſtics of the other Queen, who therefore ſpread abroad a thouſand ſlanderous reports of her, giving out that it was but a ſham to deceive the world with a ſuppoſititious child; which rumour made ſuch an impreſſion on the Ephori, that when the time of her lying in drew near, they placed guards about the Queen to prevent their being impoſed upon (c). It proved no fiction, for ſhe was delivered of a boy, who was named Dorieüs. Not long after ſhe was brought to bed of twins; whereof the one was the brave King Leonidas, who died ſo glorioufly at the Streights of Thermopylæ, and the other was called Cleombrotus (d). The ſecond wife's ſon had ſcarce common ſenſe; whereas Dorieüs ſurpaſſed in every thing all thoſe of his age. Nevertheleſs his pretenſions, viz. that a greater regard ſhould be paid to merit than to birth-right, were rejected, and Cleomenes, according to the laws of the country, called to the crown he no ways deſerved (e). Anaxandrides was more favoured by fortune, with reſpect to the Tegeates, than any of his predeceſſors had been; for in his reign the Lacedæmonians began to conquer them (f), that is, about the ſixtieth Olympiad [A]. Plutarch gives us a collection of the Apophthegms of Anaxandrides among thoſe of the Lacedæmonians. The ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary is full of miſtakes with reſpect to this ſubject [B].

(a) Pauſanias, lib. 3. p. 84.

(b) She was his ſiſter's daughter.

(c) The words of Herodotus might be tranſlated ſo as to make this ſenſe, that they themſelves were the inſpectors, or the Queen's guards.

(d) Some ſay, that Leonidas and Cleombrotus were not born at one birth.

(e) Ex Herodoti lib. 5. cap. 39, & ſeq. See alſo Pauſanias, lib. 3. pag. 84.

(f) Pauſanias, ibid. Herodotus, lib. 1. cap. 67.

[A] In his reign the Lacedæmonians began to conquer the Tegeates, that is, about the 60th Olympiad.] 'Tis obſerved by Hiſtorians, that the Tegeates were not vanquiſhed by the Lacedæmonians, before the latter had removed to their city the bones of Oreſtes, who was buried at Tegea; which tranſlation happened in the 58th Olympiad. Priſcorum autem teſtantur molem etiam Oreſtis ſuprema, cujus oſſa Olympiade quinquageſima & octava Tegeæ inventa à Spartanis oraculo monitis diſcimus impleſſe longitudinem cubitorum ſeptem (1). i. e. "The remains of Oreſtes prove "the bulk of the ancients, whoſe bones being found "in the 58th Olympiad at Tegæa by the Spartans, who "were admoniſhed by an Oracle, we learn to have been "full ſeven cubits long." 'Tis further known, that Cleomenes, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Anaxandrides, was exhorted to wage war with Polycrates, Tyrant of Samos (2), who died an unhappy death in the ſecond year of the 64th Olympiad (3). I do not take notice, that Cleomenes had reigned a conſiderable time, when the deſcendants of Piſiſtratus were obliged to leave Athens, which happened about the 67th Olympiad (4). Moreri ſhould not have ſaid, that it is uncertain in what time Anaxandrides lived, nor that the Ephori obliged him to divorce his firſt wife, nor that his eldeſt ſon by his firſt wife was called Dorceus; Dorieus he ſhould have called him. I take no notice of his omiſſions, which are pretty conſiderable. I muſt not forget to acquaint my readers, that it is no eaſy matter to reconcile Solinus and Herodotus in point of Chronology. Solinus places the tranſlation of the bones of Oreſtes in the 58th Olympiad. But, according to Herodotus (5), the Lacedæmonians had already obtained ſeveral victories over the Tegeates, after that tranſlation, when Crœſus deſired their friendſhip; which he did before his expedition againſt Cyrus, and this happened about the end of the 30th Olympiad (6). How then can we reconcile Solinus's Chronology with that of Herodotus? But however that be, Moreri had no reaſon to ſay, that it is uncertain in what time Anaxandrides reigned, ſince Herodotus tells us, that he reigned in the time of Crœſus (7).

(1) Solinus, l. 1. p. 9.

(2) Plutarch. in Apophtheg. P. 223, C.

(3) Calviſius ad annum mundi 3428.

(4) Idem, ad ann. mundi 3440.

(5) Herodotus, lib. 1. cap. 68, 69.

(6) See Calviſius ad annum mundi 3398.

(7) Herod. l. 1. cap. 67.

[B] The Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary is full of miſtakes with reſpect to this ſubject.] To Moreri's three miſtakes, juſt now mentioned, I add thoſe of his continuator. I, 'Tis falſe that Anaxandrides was the ſon of Eurycrates the ſecond: he was his grand-child (8), and ſon to Leo. II, 'Tis not true, that Anaxandrides took the city of Tegea, before the bones of Oreſtes were removed from thence. Fortune did not begin to frown upon the Tegeates before they were removed; how therefore could their city be taken? Is not the taking of the Capital attended with the total ruin of ſuch little Republics? III, Glycas (9) did not make his entry into Tegea in company with the victorious Anaxandrides: he went into it, as men uſe, in time of peace, to go into the cities of the neighbouring States. IV, It was not he who diſcovered the tomb of Oreſtes, and took up his bones; he only related on his return to Lacedæmon, that he believed Oreſtes to be buried at a Smith's in Tegea. For the Smith had told him, that as he was digging a well in the court of his houſe he had diſcovered a tomb of ſeven cubits, and found, in opening it, that the perſon whoſe tomb it was, had been of that ſize. Lychas concluded, that it was the tomb of Oreſtes, becauſe the Oracle had foretold, that his tomb would be diſcovered at Tegea, in a place where two winds were driven with violence, and the repreſentation of a battle was to be ſeen with wounds upon wounds. He applied this to the Smith's bellows, hammer, and anvil. He only made this conjecture, and imparted it to his Superiors, who thereupon baniſhed a criminal. The criminal retired to Tegea, hired of the Smith the place where the tomb had been diſcovered, took up the bones of Oreſtes, and brought them to Lacedæmon. V, 'Tis falſe, that the Oracle ſaid, that to make this tranſlation, the winds, the ſtriker, and the ſtruck were to be removed with the plague and ruin of men. Herodotus, who is quoted in the Supplement, ſays no ſuch thing. VI, There was no need to remove all theſe things in order to find out the tomb of Oreſtes; for it was not under the forge, but in a court, where the ſmith had been digging a well. VII, The war was not at an end, as ſoon as the bones of that Prince were interred at Lacedæmon. All, that Herodotus ſays, is, that from that time forth the Lacedæmonians got the better of the Tegeates in all the wars they waged with them. Ἀπὸ τουτοῦ τοῦ χρόνου ὅπως ἐπιῤῥώατο ἀλλήλων, πολλῷ κατυπέρτεροι τῷ πολέμῳ ἐγίνοντο οἱ Λακεδαιμόνιοι (10). VIII, Hence it is falſe, that the Tegeates were entirely ſubdued by the Lacedæmonians, as ſoon as the bones of Oreſtes were buried at Lacedæmon. IX, There was no occaſion to quote Plutarch, for he makes no mention of any thing advanced in this article.

(8) Pauſan. l. 3. p. 83.

(9) It ſhould be Lychas, as before.

(10) Herod. l. 1. cap. 68.

ANAXANDRIDES, a comic Poet, born at Camirus [A] in the Iſle of Rhodes, flouriſhed about the 101ſt Olympiad [B]; and was the firſt, if we give credit to Suidas, who brought upon the ſtage love-adventures, and the misfortunes which befal young women after the loſs of their virginity (a). I could be eaſily perſuaded, that ſo nice parts as thoſe of ſuch unhappy maids were not introduced upon the ſtage before the hundredth Olympiad; but I cannot think, that the introducing of love-adventures is of ſo late a date. Anaxandrides was a man of a proper ſize, and noble aſpect; he took great care of his hair, and wore rich clothes, his uſual garment being a purple gown fringed with gold (b). But ſuch an equipage did not become a Poet. He affected pomp and (a) Πρῶτος ἐρωτας καὶ παρθένων φθορας εἰσήγαγεν. Suidas.

(b) Chamæleon Heracleotes, l. 6. de Comœdia, apud Athen. lib. 9. P. 374.

[A] Born at Camirus (1).] Suidas agrees in this with Chamæleon; but at the ſame time inſinuates, that Authors were not unanimous in this, but divided in their opinions; ſome of them holding him to be a Colophonian, and others to be a Rhodian.

[B] He flouriſhed about the 101ſt Olympiad.] The anonymous Author of the Olympiads agrees in this with Suidas; and as the latter obſerves, that Anaxandrides was at the Olympic games of Philip King of Macedon, he gives us a matter of fact which fixes this age of Anaxandrides. Beſides it is well known, that this Poet abuſed Plato (2), and ſome of his Comedies are quoted by Ariſtotle (3). He muſt therefore have flouriſhed in the time mentioned by Suidas.

(1) Cham. Heracleot. lib. 6. de Comœdia, apud Athen. lib. 9. P. 374.

(2) Diog. Laert. in Platone, l. 3. num. 26. edit. 1692.

(3) Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. 3. cap. 12.

and grandeur to ſuch a degree, that being once engaged to read a Poem at Athens, he went to the appointed place on horſeback, and rehearſed part of his performance in that poſture. Such a behaviour renders probable what is further ſaid of him, viz. that he was extremely grieved when his pieces did not carry the prize (c). He never uſed, like other Poets, to poliſh or correct them, that they might enter the liſts again in a better condition; he ſent them to the Grocers of that time, to wrap up pepper and cinnamon (d). Such a moroſe and ſpiteful humour againſt the ſpectators occaſioned the loſs of ſeveral fine comedies. However it muſt needs have often given way to paternal affection, for he won the prize but ten times (e); whereas we find above twenty of his plays quoted, (ſee in the Notes the reflection of Athenæus) [C], and he wrote in all ſixty five (f). The Athenians condemned him to be ſtarved for cenſuring their government [D]. Perhaps the Comic Poet Alexandrides is only a miſtake of the Tranſcribers [E], and we might ſubſtitute our Anaxandrides wherever we meet with the name of the other.

(c) Ὅτι γάρ μὴ νικῶν λαμβάνων ἤδωκεν εἰς τὸν λιβανωτὸν καταπιμπῆν. Cham. Heracleotes, lib. 6. de Comœdia, apud Athen. l. 9. p. 374.

(d) See Boileau's firſt epiſtle.

(e) Suidas.

(f) Idem.

[C] See in the remarks the reflection of Athenæus.] After quoting a verſe (4) out of the Tereus of Anaxandrides, a piece not much valued, he takes an opportunity of mentioning what I have cited out of Chamæleon, and then asks, with ſome ſurprize, how the Tereus, and ſuch other pieces of the ſame Poet, as had not carried the prize, came to be preſerved? He might have found the ſolution of his difficulty in the very words of Chamæleon, which plainly inſinuate, that Anaxandrides uſed only in his old age to vent upon his performances the indignation which the judgment of ſpectators had raiſed. He had therefore ſpared ſeveral of his vanquiſhed Comedies, before old age had made him peeviſh and moroſe. Πόλλα ἴσχυσε κομψῶς τῶν δραμάτων ἀφανίζειν δυσκολαίνων τοῖς θεαταῖς διὰ τὸ γῆρας (5). i. e. "He "deſtroyed ſeveral beautiful Plays, being angry with "the audience, thro' the peeviſhneſs of old age."

(4) Athen. l. 9. pag. 373.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 374.

[D] The Athenians condemned him to death for cenſuring their government.] In one of his Comedies he inſerted this verſe:

Ἡ πόλις ἐβούλεθ' ἥ νόμων οὐδὲν μέλει.

That is, "The City would have it ſo, that City "which has no regard to laws."

Wherein he had only altered a word in the following verſe of Euripides,

Ἡ φύσις ἐβούλεθ' ἥ νόμων οὐδὲν μέλει (6).

That is, "Nature, which hearkens to no laws, "would have it ſo."

(6) Euripid. ver. 295, inter incerta, edit. Barneſii.

See Euſtratius on the tenth chapter of the ſixth and ſeventh books of Ariſtotle's morals. Ovid is thought to have mentioned this puniſhment of Anaxandrides in the following diſtich of his Poem againſt Ibis, ver. 523;

Utque parum ſtabili qui carmine læſit Athenas
Inviſus pereas deficiente cibo.

"O may'ſt thou hated ſtarve like him, whoſe tongue
"With wretched verſe could his own Athens wrong.

[E] Perhaps the Comic Poet Alexandrides is only a miſtake of the Tranſcribers.] This is Caſaubon's opinion (7), and the reaſon he produces is this; that Suidas no where mentions Alexandrides, and that the ſame piece (8), which is aſcribed to Alexandrides in the eleventh book of Athenæus (9) is quoted under the name of Anaxandrides in his fourteenth book (10). Caſaubon adds a third reaſon. Pollux, in the ſixth chapter of the ninth book, quotes the Anchiſes of Alexandrides, and it is certain that Anaxandrides wrote a piece bearing that title; for it is quoted by Athenæus in the 18th chapter of the ſixth book (11). Meurſius is quite of Caſaubon's opinion, and aſcribes to Anaxandrides the two or three dramatic pieces, which, in the editions of Athenæus, are aſcribed to Alexandrides; and the Helena (12) and Piſander too (13), which in Suidas paſs under the name of Alexandrides. See his Treatiſe of The Iſle of Rhodes, p. 87. Voſſius is of the ſame opinion (14). So that according to this account, which is probable enough, there are no fewer than thirty pieces of Alexandrides quoted. Meurſius knew nothing of his Theſeus, which Diogenes Laertius quotes (15). Authors are in a like confuſion with relation to one ANAXANDRIDES of Delphi. The Scholiaſt upon Euripides (16) quotes him, Ἀναξανδρίδης ὁ Δελφὸς, where he mentions the puniſhment inflicted upon Apollo, for killing the ſerpent Python, which was to ſerve Admetus as a hired ſervant. Plutarch quotes him (17) Ἀλεξανδρίδης ὁ Δελφὸς, where he ſpeaks of the money which Lyſander depoſited in the temple of Delphi. He mentions elſewhere (18) one Anaxandrides in ſpeaking of the times, in which the Prieſteſs of Delphi delivered her Oracles. At firſt ſhe delivered them but once a year, and a long time after once a month. It is very probable, that Plutarch has quoted in both places one and the ſame Author, and that the ſame is mentioned by the Scholiaſt upon Euripides. We muſt now enquire, whether his name was Alexandrides or Anaxandrides. Voſſius is quite at a loſs (19) what to think of it. The work mentioned in the collection of Proverbs, publiſhed by Andreas Schottus from a manuſcript of the Vatican Library, ought, without all doubt, to be aſcribed to the ſame Anaxandrides. It treats of the ſacrileges committed in the temple of Delphi, Περὶ τῶν συληθέντων ἐν Δελφοῖς ἀναθημάτων, and was compoſed by one Anaxandrides. He relates a ſtory, which gave riſe to the Greek proverb Ἄκρου λάβου, καὶ μέσου ἕξεις, i. e. "Take the upper part, and "you"ll be ſure of the middle." See Voſſius's Greek Hiſtorians, pag. 320.

(7) Caſaub. in Athen. lib. 6. cap. 18. p. 455.
(8) Entitled Μανίαται.
(9) Cap. 2. pag. 460.
(10) Cap. 20. p. 654.
(11) Page 263.
(12) Suidas in Ἀβδηρίτησ.
(13) Idem in Ἀρισταγόρης.
(14) Voſſius de Poetis Græcis, p. 49.
(15) Diog. Laert. lib. 3. num. 26.
(16) In Alceſtid. initio.
(17) Plutarch. in Lyſandro, p. 443.
(18) Plut. in Quæſt. Romanis, p. 292.
(19) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, p. 502.

☞ANAXIMANDER, a famous Greek Philoſopher, and the author of ſeveral important diſcoveries [A], was born at Miletus in the third year of the forty ſecond Olympiad, and flouriſhed in the time of Polycrates tyrant of Samos (a). He was the ſon

(a) Diog. Laert. in Vita Anaximandri.

[A] The author of ſeveral important diſcoveries.] He demonſtrated the Compendium of Geometry (1); and was next to Homer the firſt maſter of that ſcience (2). He was the firſt who publiſhed a geographical table, as appears from Laertius, who affirms, that he deſigned the circumference of the ſea and land. In the 58th Olympiad (3) he diſcovered the obliquity of the Zodiack, by which means, as Pliny obſerves (4), he opened the gates of things. Obliquitatem ejus intellexiſſe, hoc eſt, rerum fores aperuiſſe, Anaximander Mileſius traditur primus Olympiade quinquageſima octava. He invented the Gnomon, and ſet up the firſt in an open place at Lacedæmon (5). He found out the Æquinoctial Solſtices and Horologies (6). He framed Horoſcopes to denote the Tropics and Æquinoxes (7). From hence Salmaſius (8) obſerves, that the uſe of his dial was only to delineate the Tropic and Æquinoctial Points. And that they did not ſerve to diſtinguiſh the hours or twelve parts of the day, he proves from this conſideration, that the very name Ὥρα in that ſenſe, or the diviſion of the day into twelve equal parts, was not known till a long time after. Laertius tells us likewiſe, that he formed a Sphere.

(1) Suidas.
(2) Strabo, l. 1.
(3) Mr. Stanley ſays in the 50th Olympiad; which is evidently an error.
(4) L. 2. c. 8.
(5) Laert.
(6) Suidas.
(7) Laert.
(8) Plinian. Exercitat. in Soſſinum.

ſon of Praxiades (b), who is corruptly called by ſome writers Praxidamus (c). He was countryman (d), companion, and kinſman (e) of Thales, and was likewiſe his diſciple and ſucceſſor in the propagation of his doctrine (f). We ſhall give an account of his Philoſophy in the note [B]. He adviſed the Lacedæmonians to abandon their city and houſes, and to lie armed in the open field, foretelling an earthquake, which demoliſhed the whole city, and broke off part of the mountain Taygetus (g). It is ſaid, that as he was ſinging, the boys uſed to ridicule him, upon which he ſaid, we muſt learn to ſing better for their ſakes. Anaximenes and Parmenides were his auditors (h). Apollodorus the Athenian in his Chronicles quoted by Laertius obſerves, that he was ſixty four years old in the ſecond year of the fifty eighth Olympiad, and died ſoon after. He wrote ſeveral books, particularly one περὶ φύσεως (i), that is, Of Nature. This probably is that intended by Laertius, who tells us, that he digeſted his opinions into Commentaries, which book fell into the hands of Apollodorus the Athenian. Γῆς περίοδος. Περὶ τῶν ἀπλανῶν; Of the Sphere, and ſeveral other works. There was likewiſe another Anaximander a Mileſian, who was an Hiſtorian (k).

(b) Id. ibid.
(c) Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1.
(d) Cicero Acad. Quæſt. 4.
(e) Suidas.
(f) Strabo, l. 1. and 14.
(g) Cicero de Divinat. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 79.

(h) See Stanley's Lives of the Philoſophers, Part 2. c. 1. p. 61. 2d edit. 1687.
(i) Suidas.
(k) Laert.

[B] We ſhall give an account of his Philoſophy in the note.] He ſuppoſed a certain infinite firſt matter, which he did not define to be either air, or water, or earth, to be the ſole principle of the univerſe (9). That the celeſtial bodies and infinite worlds, were made of it by ſecretion; and that generation and corruption proceeded from their moving circularly together from eternity. He aſſerted alſo, that the generative principles of heat and cold being ſeparated, when this world was made, a certain ſphere of fire firſt aroſe, and encompaſſed the air, which ſurrounds the earth, as the bark doth a tree. This being afterwards broken and divided into ſmaller ſpherical bodies formed the Sun, Moon, and Stars (10). He held alſo, that the firſt animals were generated in moiſture, and encompaſſed with certain thorny barks, by which they were defended; which, after further growth, becoming more dry, and cracking, they iſſued forth, but lived only a ſhort time (11). That men were at firſt generated in the bellies of fiſhes, and being there nouriſhed till they grew ſtrong, and were able to ſupport themſelves, they were afterwards caſt out upon dry land. And the reaſon of this ſtrange opinion with regard to the original of mankind was, becauſe other animals ſoon after their birth betake themſelves to their food; but man alone in his infancy needs to be nurſed up for a conſiderable time, and therefore could not be preſerved at firſt in any other manner (12). From Anaximander's making this univerſal principle of his infinite, ſome late Writers, and even Clemens Alexandrinus (13) among the ancients, have erroneouſly inferred, that by this he meant a God, according to the true notion of him, or an infinite mind, the efficient cauſe of the univerſe, and not ſtupid matter (14). But it is evident, that the Gods, whom he acknowledged, owed the original alſo to that infinite matter, from which he ſuppoſed all things to be ſecreted, and into which they would return; for he held the Gods to be generated, riſing and vaniſhing again in long periods of time; and that therefore there were innumerable worlds. Anaximandri autem opinio eſt, nativos eſſe Deos, longis intervallis orientes occidenteſque, eoque innumerabiles eſſe mundos (15). He aſſerted, that the heavens conſiſt of cold and heat mixed (16); that the Stars are globous, and conſiſt of air full of fire, reſpiring flames at ſome certain part, and moved by the circles and ſpheres, in which they inhere (17); which aſſertion was borrowed from him by Ariſtotle. That the Sun is ſeated the higheſt, the Moon next. and then the fixed Stars and Planets (18). That the circle of the Sun is twenty eight (Theodoret ſays twenty ſix) times greater than the earth, having a hollow circle about it like a chariot wheel, full of fire; in one part whereof is a mouth, at which the fire is ſeen as out of the hole of a flute, which is the Sun, equal in bigneſs with the earth (19). That the cauſe of the Sun's eclipſe is the ſtopping that hole in the midſt, out of which the fire iſſues. That the circle of the Moon is twenty nine times greater than the earth, and is like a chariot wheel, having a hollow orb in the midſt full of fire like the Sun, and oblique, breathing fire out at one part as out of a tunnel. That the eclipſe of the Moon happens according to her converſions, when the mouth, out of which the fire iſſues, is ſtopp'd (20). That the Moon hath a light of her own, but very thin and languid (21); and ſhines from the light, which ſhe borrows from the Sun (22). Which two aſſertions, as Mr. Stanley obſerves, are ſo far from being inconſiſtent, that it is the opinion of ſeveral learned Writers, that both are true (23). With regard to Meteors Anaximander affirmed, that the wind is a fluxion of the air, when the moſt ſubtle and liquid parts of it are put in motion, or reſolved by the Sun (24). That thunders, lightnings, preſters, and whirlwinds are cauſed by the wind incloſed in a thick cloud, which by reaſon of its lightneſs breaks forth with violence: the rupture of the cloud occaſions the noiſe, and the divulſion by the reaſon of the blackneſs cauſes a flaſhing light (25). Seneca repreſents this hypotheſis in a ſtronger manner (26). "Anaximander aſcribed all to "wind. Thunder, ſays he, is the ſound of a breaking cloud. Why is it unequal? Becauſe the breakings are unequal. Why doth it thunder in a clear day? Becauſe even then the wind breaks thro' the thick and dry air. Why does it ſometimes thunder and not lighten? Becauſe the thinner and weaker ſpirit is able to make a flame, but not a ſound. What is lightning? The agitation of the air ſevering itſelf, and ruſhing down, diſcloſing a faint fire. What is thunder? The motion of a piercing thick ſpirit." Anaximandrus omnia ad ſpiritum retulit. Tonitrua, inquit, ſunt nubis ictæ ſonus. Quare inæqualia ſunt? quia & ipſe ictus inæqualis eſt. Quare & ſereno tonat? quia tunc quoque per craſſum & ſiccum aëra ſpiritus profiliit. At quare aliquando non fulgurat & non tonat? quia tenuior & infirmior ſpiritus, qui in flammam non valuit, in ſonum valuit. Quid eſt ergo ipſa fulguratio? aeris diducentis ſe corruentiſque jactatio; languidum ignem, nec exiturum aperiens. Quid eſt fulmen? acrioris denſioriſque ſpiritus curſus. He affirmed, that all things are ſo ordered, that ſome influence deſcends from the æther upon inferior things. So fire ſounds being forced upon cold clouds. When it breaks, then it ſhines; the ſmaller flames produce lightnings, the greater thunder. Anaximandrus ait, omnia iſta ſic fieri, ut ex æthere aliqua vis in inferiora deſtendit. Ita ignis impactus nubibus frigidis ſonat. At cum illas interſcindit, fulget; & minor vis ignium fulgurationes facit, major fulmina (27). T.

(9) Laertius. Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſ. l. 1. c. 3. and Simplic. in Ariſtotel. Phyſic. l. 1. c. 6.
(10) Plut. apud Euſeb. de Præp. Evangel. lib. 1. c. 8. See the Univerſal Hiſtory, Introduction, p. 18, 19.
(11) Plutarch. de Placit. Phil. l. 5. c. 19.
(12) Idem, apud Euſeb. ubi ſupra, and in Sympos. l. 8. Quæſt. 8.
(13) In Protrept. p. 43. See the Univ. Hiſt. p. 19.
(14) See Cudworth's Intellectual Syſtem, p. 124.
(15) Cicero, de Natur. Deor. l. 1.
(16) Stobæus, apud Stanley, p. 62.
(17) Idem.
(18) Idem.
(19) Plut. de Placit. Phil. 2, 20, 21.
(20) Idem, 2, 24, 25.
(21) Id. 2. 28.
(22) Laert.
(23) See Eraſm. Reinholdus in Theoricas Purbachii, p. 164.
(24) Plutarch. de Placit. Phil. 3. 7.
(25) Id. 3. 3. and Stob.
(26) Natur. Quæſt. l. 2. c. 18.
(27) Id. l. 2. c. 19.

☞ANAXIMENES, an eminent Greek Philoſopher, was born at Miletus, and the ſon of Euriſtratus (a); he was the friend (b), ſcholar (c), and ſucceſſor of Anaximander. His Philoſophy was very little different from that of his maſter, for he held air to be the firſt principle, and infinite (d); but that the things which aroſe out of it were finite, and ſhould at laſt be reſolved into it again. He ſuppoſed all things were generated by a ſucceſſive condenſation and rarefaction of this air; the earth, water and fire being firſt produced out of it, and then the other parts of the univerſe. He held alſo, that motion was from all eternity; that the Sun gained its heat from the ſwiftneſs of its courſe,

(a) Laertius, in vita Anaximenis.
(b) Simplic.
(c) Cicero Academ. Quæſt. and Plin. l. 2. c. 76.
(d) Laert. Ariſt. de Auſcult. Phyſ. and Cicero Acad. Quæſt. l. 2. See The Univ. Hiſt. Introduct. p. 19.

courſe, and that the air held the world together in the ſame manner as the ſoul, (which he ſuppoſed to be air alſo,) did the human frame (e). He does not appear to deny the exiſtence of Gods, but he was ſo far from allowing them to have formed the world, that he believed them likewiſe to have taken their riſe from the air (f). We ſhall give ſome further account of his Phyſiology in the note [A]. Euſebius tells us, that he flouriſhed in the ſecond year of the fifty ſixth Olympiad; but Suidas ſays he lived in the 55th Olympiad at the taking of Sardis, when Cyrus conquered Crœſus; ſo that the account of Apollodorus in Laertius, which aſſerts that he was born in the ſixty third Olympiad, is erroneous (g). Some likewiſe affirm that he heard Parmenides (h). He uſed the Ionic dialect plain and unaffected. Pliny (i) calls him the inventor of Gnomonicks; but this perhaps is a miſtake for Anaximander. There are two epiſtles of his extant in Laertius [B]. Anaxagoras and Diogenes Apollonites were his auditors (k).

(b) Laertius.
(i) L. 2. c. 76.
(k) Stanley, ubi ſupra.

(e) Plutarch. in Strom. apud Euſeb. de Præpar. Evangel. l. 1. c. 8. and de Placit. Philoſ. l. 1. c. 3.
(f) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, l. 8. c. 2.
(g) Stanley, Lives of the Philoſophers, Part 2. p. 63. 2d edit. 1687.

[A] We ſhall give ſome further account of his Phyſiology in the note.] Plutarch having delivered the opinion of this Philoſopher and of Anaximander obſerves, that they were both extremely miſtaken in ſuppoſing the world to have been generated from matter only, without any efficient cauſe; ſince matter of itſelf is able to produce nothing, any more than a veſſel can be made out of a maſs of ſilver, without the help of an Artificer (1). Anaximenes held, that the external ſuperficies of the heavens is formed of earth (2). That the Stars are of a fiery ſubſtance, inviſible, earthly bodies being intermixt with them; and that they are inherent, as nails in a cryſtal. That they are forced back by the thick reſiſting air (3), and move not above (or under) but about the earth (4). That the Sun is flat as a plate, and of a fiery ſubſtance (5). That the ſigns of Summer and Winter come not by the Moon, but by the Sun only (6). That the Sun is eclipſed, when the mouth, from which his heat iſſues, is cloſed (7). That the Moon is likewiſe of a fiery nature, and is eclipſed, when the mouth, out of which iſſues her heat, is ſtopp'd (8). With regard to Meteors he affirmed, that the clouds are formed by a condenſation of air; rain by condenſation of the clouds, out of which it is ſqueezed; ſnow of rain congealed in falling; and hail of the ſame contracted by a cold wind (9). Concerning thunder, lightning, &c. he maintained the opinions of Anaximander (10); to which he added the compariſon of the ſea, which ſhines when it is broken with oars (11). He held, that the rainbow is formed by a reflection of the ſun-beams upon a thick cloud, which not being able to penetrate it are refracted upon it (12). That earthquakes proceed from the rareneſs and dryneſs of the earth, one being cauſed by exceſſive heat, the other by exceſſive cold (13). This is further explained by Ariſtotle (14), who tells us, that Anaximenes held, that the earth breaks, as well when it is moiſt as when it is dry, and is ſhaken by thoſe great pieces of it, which fall upon it. Hence it is, that earthquakes happen either in a dry ſeaſon, or during great rains. It is broken by the former, and being moiſten'd by exceſſive ſhowers divides aſunder. He called the contraction and condenſation of matter, Cold; the laxation and rareneſs of it, Heat; from whence a man breathes out of his mouth both hot and cold. His breath compreſs'd by his lips and condens'd is cold; but breathed out with an open mouth is hot by reaſon of the rareneſs (15).

(1) De Placit. Philoſ. l. 1. c. 3. See Univ. Hiſt. ubi ſupra.
(2) Plutarch. ib. 2. 11.
(3) Ibid. 2. 23.
(4) Laert.
(5) Plutarch, ubi ſupra, 2. 29.
(6) Idem, ibid.
(7) Idem, 2. 24.
(8) Idem, 2. 29.
(9) Id. 3. 4.
(10) See his article note [B].
(11) See Stanley, ubi ſupra.
(12) Plut. ubi ſupra, 3. 5.
(13) Id. 3. 15.
(14) Meteor. 2. 7. and Seneca, Natur. Quæſt. l. 6. c. 10.
(15) Plutarch. de primo frigido.

[B] There are two Epiſtles of his extant in Laertius.] We ſhall give them in the tranſlation of the learned Mr. Stanley. "Anaximenes to Pythagoras. "Thales having lived happily even to old age, "ended his days unfortunately. One night going "out of his houſe, as he uſed, with his maid, to "contemplate the Stars, gazing and not taking heed "to the place, he lighted upon a precipice and fell "down. This was the fate of the Mileſian Aſtronomer. But let us, who were his auditors, preſerve the memory of the perſon, and our ſons and "auditors after us. Let us ſtill retain his ſayings, "and begin all our diſcourſes with Thales." The other Epiſtle was as follows. "Anaximenes to Pythagoras. You are more adviſed than we, who "leaving Samos for Crotona live there in quiet. The "Æacides prove injurious to others, and the Mileſians want not Tyrants of their own chooſing. The "King of Media is likewiſe terrible to us, but would "not be ſo, ſhould we pay him tribute. The Ionians "are reſolved to war with the Medes for the general "liberty; and if they fight, we have no hope of "ſafety. How then can Anaximenes perplexed with "fear of death and ſlavery apply his mind to celeſtial ſpeculations? But you are coveted by the Crotonians and all the Italians. Auditors come to you "as far as from Sicily." T.

☞ANAXIMENES the ſon of Ariſtocles of Lampſacus, an Orator, was the diſciple of Diogenes the Cynick, and of Zoilus of Amphipolis, the railer againſt Homer. He was Preceptor to Alexander of Macedon, and followed him to the wars. When the King was incenſed againſt the people of Lampſacus, becauſe they had taken the part of the Perſians, and threatened them with grievous puniſhments, he circumvented him after the following manner. The people being in danger of loſing their wives, children and country, ſent Anaximenes to intercede for them. Alexander knowing the cauſe of his coming, ſwore by the Gods, that he would do the very reverſe of what he deſired of him. Upon this Anaximenes ſaid to him, Grant me the favour, O King, to enſlave the wives and children of the people of Lampſacus, to burn their temples, and lay their city even with the ground. Alexander not being able to evade this ſtratagem, or counter-plot it, and being held down by the obligation of his oath, pardoned Lampſacus againſt his will. Anaximenes revenged himſelf on his enemy Theopompus the ſon of Damoſtratus after a very cunning but very odious manner. For as he was a Sophiſt, and could imitate the ſtyle of Sophiſts, he wrote a book againſt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, carefully framing a railing ſtory, and ſetting the name of Theopompus to it, ſent it to thoſe cities. Hence aroſe an univerſal hatred of Theopompus throughout all Greece. Anaximenes is ſaid to be the inventor of ſpeaking ex tempore (a).

(a) Suidas.

☞ANCHARANUS or DE ANCHARANO (PETER) an eminent Civilian of the fourteenth Century, and author of ſeveral works [A], was born at Bologna in Italy,

[A] Author of ſeveral works. Commentaria in ſex Libros Decretalium; i. e. "Commentaries upon "ſix Books of the Decretals;" with the Scholia of Codecha and John de Monteferrato, at Bononia in fol. 1581 (1). Lectura ſuper Clementinas; i. e. "A "Lecture upon the Clementines;" with the Additions of Cathar. Pariel and others, at Lyons fol. 1549 and 1553. Selectæ Quæſtiones omnium præſtantiſſimorum Juriſconſultorum in tres tomos digeſtæ; i. e. "Select Queſtions from all the beſt Civilians digeſted "in

(1) Oudin. Comment. tom. 3. col. 1239.

Italy, and deſcended from the illuſtrious family of the Farneſes. Beſides his uncommon knowledge in the Civil Law, he was extremely converſant in Philoſophy and political affairs, and maſter of a noble eloquence. Theſe qualifications raiſed him a prodigious reputation, and gave him a great authority among his own countrymen. He was likewiſe in high eſteem with the Princes of Italy, and applied to by many divers cities and univerſities (a). He ſtudied chiefly under Baldus, whoſe intimate friendſhip he gained, and who inſtructed him in the moſt abſtruſe parts of the Civil Law. He read public Lectures upon the law at firſt in Padua, and afterwards at Bologna, in conjunction with Bartholomew Salicetus, with the greateſt applauſe of his auditors. He flouriſhed about 1380, and the following years; for in May 1382 Salicetus, who was his contemporary, began his Commentaries in IX Libros Codic. (b) at Bologna. Our author died there about the year 1410, and was buried in the church of St. Benedict (c); though ſome writers pretend, that he lived till 1497, which they infer from his epitaph [B]. But this is evidently a miſtake, ſince the manuſcript of his Lecture upon the Clementines and Reſcripts, which is preſerved in the Library at Augſburg, appears to have been written in 1397; and another manuſcript of his Lecture upon the ſecond book of the Decretals, which is likewiſe in that Library, ſhews that it was finiſhed at Venice in 1392 (d).

(a) Oudin. Comment. de Script. & Scriptis Eccleſ. tom. 3. Sæc. 14. Col. 1239. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) John Fichard, in Vitis Juriſconſultorum recentiorum, ſays it was in the church of St. Dominic.

(d) Hen. Wharton, apud Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Appen. p. 77. ed. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

" in three volumes," at Francfort upon the Main, fol. 1581. Conſilia ſive Reſponſa Juris; i. e. " Counſels or Anſwers in Law;" with the Additions of Jerom Zanchius, at Venice, 1568, 1585, 1589, 1599, in fol. Repetitiones in C. Canonum Statuta, de Conſtit. Venice 1587 (2).

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] His Epitaph.] Upon the upper part of his monument there is the following inſcription in Roman characters. D. O. M. Petro Ancharano Juris Pontificii & Cæſarei clariſſimo Interpreti ejus amantiſſimi Saxum hoc inſtauratum poſuere anno Sal. MCCCCLXXXXVII. i. e. " To the memory of Peter " Ancharanus, a celebrated Profeſſor of the Canon " and Imperial Law this monument was erected by " thoſe, who have the greateſt regard for him, in the " year 1497." Upon the lower part of the monument are the following verſes in Gothic characters.

Canonis hic ſpeculum, civilis & Anchora Juris
Hic jacet, æternas mens tenet alta domos.
Nomen erat Petrus, genuit Farneſia proles;
Nunc Ancharanum dat ſibi Juris opes.
Quis ſuperavit eum virtute micante? quis iſto
Conſiliis hominum clarior ante fuit?
Pro meritis nunc aſtra dedit ſibi Jupiter almus,
Et voluit gelido membra jacere ſolo.

That is,

" Peter, who from the great Farneſian race
" Was ſprung, and bore the name of Ancharanus,
" Of Canoniſts the Mirrour, and the Anchor
" Of Civil Law, lies here interr'd below;
" But his vaſt mind is rais'd to bliſs eternal.
" Who equall'd him in every noble virtue?
" Who more was fam'd for great extenſive wiſdom?
" Heav'n crowns his merits with unfading joys,
" While the cold earth conceals his mortal part."

T.

ANCHISES, a Trojan Prince, deſcended from Dardanus, and ſon of Capys (a), was ſo pleaſing to Venus, that ſhe appeared to him under the form of a beautiful nymph, to make known her love to him. She told him ſhe was conſtrained by her deſtiny to come and offer herſelf in marriage to him: She aſſured him he would find her a virgin (b), and conjured him to preſent her to his relations, in order to have the marriage contract ſpeedily prepared. Anchiſes, like a well bred man, made anſwer, that ſince ſhe was not a Goddeſs, nothing ſhould prevent his enjoying her on the ſpot (c). He was taken at his word; they went to bed, &c. towards evening Anchiſes fell aſleep, and at his waking was ſenſible he had lain with a Goddeſs. He was apprehenſive, that, after ſuch an adventure, his life would be but ſhort [A]; but Venus encouraged him, and told him, ſhe ſhould bear him a ſon, who would be called Æneas; that ſhe would cauſe Sylvan Nymphs to breed up the child, till it attained to the age of

(a) Hom. Iliad. lib. 20. ver. 239.

(b) Ἀπυρήτην φιλότητος. Homerus in Hymno Veneris, ver. 133.

(c) Πρὶν σὴ φιλότητι μιγαναὶ ἀνθρώπου ἀκοίτιν ἔλθῃ. Homerus in Hymno Veneris.

[A] He was apprehenſive after having lain with Venus his life would be but ſhort.] There was a tradition in thoſe days, that mortals, who lay with Goddeſſes, were not long-lived. For this reaſon Anchiſes, underſtanding the adventure he had had, entreated Venus to have compaſſion on him.

Ἀλλά σε πρὸς Ζηνὸς γουνάζομαι αἰγιόχοιο
Μή με ζῶὸν ἀμενηνὸν ἐν ἀνθρώποισιν ἐάσῃς
Ναίειν· ἀλλ' ἐλέαιρ' ἐπεὶ ὀ βιοδάλμιος ἀνὴρ
Γίγνεται, ὅτε θεαῖς εὐνάζεται ἀθανάτῃσι (1).

(1) Homer. in Hymno Veneris, ver. 188.

" But I intreat thee by Jupiter
" Do not ſuffer me to live weak among men.
" But pity me, becauſe no man is long liv'd,
" Who enjoys immortal Goddeſſes.

At firſt ſight one would imagine, that this thought of the ancients could have had no manner of foundation; for this cloſe union of a mortal man with the immortal nature, this mixture, this confuſion of principles, ought to be deemed an advance towards immortality, and not a cauſe of ſhort life. Thus we ſee, that the moſt refined Cabal has taught, that the inhabitants of the elements repair the misfortune of their deſtiny, which has ſubjected them to an annihilation; " by " the alliance, which they are capable of contracting " with man. . . . Thus a Nymph or a Sylphe become " immortal and qualified for the enjoyment of that " beatitude to which we aſpire, when they are ſo " happy as to marry a Sage: and a Gnome or a Sylphe " ceaſe to be mortal, the moment they marry one of " our daughters (2)." But if we examine this affair thoroughly, we ſhall find a plauſible reaſon for Anchiſes's fear, and for the maxim laid down by him. The Gods, according to the opinion of the Heathens, were jealous of their ſuperiority, and took care, that man ſhould not be unmindful of his inferiority. It was therefore incumbent on them to exclude him from the poſſeſſion of Goddeſſes, and to give him to underſtand, that this was too delicious a morſel for him. It was neceſſary they ſhould inſtil into him the fear of an exemplary puniſhment, ſuch as is that of a premature death, in caſe he ſhould taſte a pleaſure of this nature, which they reſerve for themſelves. They were to ſtrike terror, not only into thoſe men, who ſhould be ſo audacious as to tempt a Goddeſs, but alſo into every mortal, that ſhould be overcome by of five years, and that ſhe would then put him into his hands. She gave him notice to be on his guard not to boaſt his having enjoyed Venus; at the ſame time letting him know, that, ſhould his diſcretion ever fail him, he would be thunder-ſtruck by Jupiter (d). It is pretended, that Anchiſes had not the power to refrain from ſpeaking of this his good fortune [B], and that one day drinking with his friends, the ſecret eſcaped him. Venus's menace had its effect; he was ſtruck by thunder, but did not die of it [C]. Some ſay it occaſioned only the loſs of his ſight [D]; others pretend that the wound never cloſed [E]. It is ſaid he lived to the age of eighty, and was buried on Mount Ida [F],

(2) See the Comte de Gabalis, p. 54.

(d) Idem, ibid.

by the declarations of love made to him by the Goddeſſes, even tho' he ſhould believe them to be but women. Don't we ſee, that human laws puniſh with death ſervants, who lie with their Maſter's wife or daughter? It little avails them to plead in excuſe, their having long reſiſted the temptation, and that ſo many advances have been made them, and even threatenings uſed to prevail on them, that at laſt they had not been able to defend themſelves from the ſnare: the law, notwithſtanding it ſuppoſes their excuſe to be true, delivers them over to the executioner. The Gazette a few days ago (3) informed us, that a ſervant had been hanged at Paris for a like caſe. And as the public intereſt in ſome inſtances requires, that the rigor of the law ſhould paſs the bounds of juſtice, becauſe injuſtice exerciſed againſt an individual (4) is, politically ſpeaking, leſs an evil than the public utility, which reſults from it, is a good, I don't believe, that Judges animated by a rigid zeal for the preſervation of the purity of families would have any regard to the apology of a ſervant founded on the daughter or wife's having come to him diſguiſed like a ſervant, &c. It is of uſe, that ſervants ſhould, in this caſe, have no hopes of pardon, not even from ignorance of the fact; for this is proper to keep them on their guard, and to make them look with horror on the ſuppoſed advantage of being beloved. This may ſerve them for a caution againſt promiſes, againſt menaces, againſt the wiles of diſguiſement. If they could promiſe themſelves impunity, in the caſe of a ſeducement diſguiſed, they would hope for it in a plain ſeducement; and if they hoped to eſcape by alledging with truth, that they had been tempted, they would ſoon arrive at the audaciouſneſs of tempting on the leaſt appearance of ſucceſs. They muſt therefore be reſtrained by fear as much as poſſible; for the man that does not depend upon their reſiſtance, has not all the neceſſary helps the caſe requires. Now as the Pagans imagined, that men of the higheſt rank were in a greater degree inferior to the Gods, than a footman to a man of the firſt diſtinction, it is not to be wondered at, if they believed that Anchiſes was by the celeſtial law expoſed to chaſtiſement, altho' he enjoyed not Venus but under the notion of her being a woman.

(3) This was written in July 1698.

(4) See Tacit. Annal. lib. 25. cap. 44.

[B] It is pretended that Anchiſes had not the power to refrain from ſpeaking of this his good fortune.] Yet was the menace a terrible one.

Εἰ δὲ κὲν ἐξείπῃς καὶ ἐπεύξεαι ἄφρονι θύμῳ
Ἐν φιλότητι μιγῆναι εὐστεφάνῳ Κυθερείῃ,
Ζεύς σε χολωσάμενος βαλέει ψολόεντι κεραυνῷ (5).

(5) Homer. in Hymno Ven. ſub fin. ver. 287.

" If you reveal this ſecret, and madly boaſt,
" That you have mixed in love with Venus,
" Jupiter will be enraged againſt you
" And ſtrike you with a fiery thunderbolt.

This adventure is a picture often copied. Ladies of the firſt quality, who fall in love with their inferiors, are obliged to make all the advances; they exact great ſecrecy, and threaten an heavy puniſhment on indiſcretion, notwithſtanding which the favourite, when the wine has got into his head, abſtains not from prating more than is proper. Sometimes he is ſo vain as to talk too much even when ſober. Let us bring ſome authority for Anchiſes's indiſcretion. Fulminatus eſt Anciſes, quia ſe cum Venere concubuiſſe jactabat. i. e. " Anchiſes was ſtruck with thunder, " becauſe he boaſted of having lain with Venus." This is what Servius ſays (6). Here follows what Hyginus ſays: Venus Anchiſam Aſſaraci (7) filium amaſſe, & cum eo concubuiſſe dicitur: procreavit Æneam, eique præcepit ne id apud homines enunciaret. Quod Anchiſes inter ſodales per vinum eſt elocutus. Ob id à Jove fulmine eſt ictus (8). i. e. " Venus is " ſaid to have been in love with Anchiſes the ſon of " Aſſaracus and to have lain with him. She had Æ- " neas by him, and charged him not to ſpeak of it " amongſt men. But being in liquor he blabbed it out " amongſt his companions, for which he was thun- " derſtruck by Jupiter."

(6) Servius in Æneid. lib. 2. ver. 649.

(7) Hyginus had done better to have given him Capys for father, and not Aſſaracus, who was father to Capys.

(8) Hygin. cap. 94.

[C] He was ſtruck with thunder, but did not die of it.] Venus underſtanding that Anchiſes had boaſted of the favours he had received from her, complained to Jupiter, and obtained that he ſhould be thunder-ſtruck: but as ſhe had no deſire to deſtroy him, nor had hopes of his eſcaping a ſtroke of thunder, ſhe took care to divert the blow. Cum inter æquales exultaret Anchiſes gloriatus traditur de concubitu Veneris, quod cum Jovi Venus queſta eſſet, emeruit ut in Anchiſam fulmina mitterentur; ſed Venus eum, cum fulmine poſſe vidiſſet interimi, miſerata juvenem in aliam partem detorſit. Anchiſes tamen afflatus igne cæleſti ſemper debilis vixit (9). Here we have an original again from which copies are drawn in all ages. Women are angry with an indiſcreet Gallant; are glad to make him ſenſible of his fault; yet don't carry matters too far, but leave room for his return.

(9) Servius in Æneid. lib. 2. ver. 649.

[D] It occaſioned only the loſs of his ſight.] We learn from Servius, that Anchiſes, for having boaſted of favours granted him by Venus, was deprived of his ſight by thunder: Quòd cum jactaret Anchiſes, afflatus eſt fulmine, oculoque privatus eſt (10). We are not to imagine from oculo in the ſingular, that he was only blind of one eye; for Servius in another place (11), makes uſe of the authority of Theocritus, to inform us that it was a total blindneſs.

(10) Servius upon theſe two verſes of the 1ſt of the Æneid. Tunc ille Æneas, quem Dardanio Anchiſæ Alma Venus genuit Phrygii Simoentis ad undas, ver. 617.

[E] The wound never cloſed.] In Virgil he complains only of a great weakneſs occaſioned by the thunder-ſtroke.

Jampridem inviſus divis & inutilis annos
Demoror, ex quo me divum pater atque hominum rex
Fulminis afflavit ventis, & contigit igni (12).

(11) In Æneid. lib. 2. ver. 687.

(12) Virg. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 647.

" 'Tis long ſince I, for my celeſtial wife,
" Loath'd by the Gods, have drag'd a ling'ring life:
" Since ev'ry hour and moment I expire,
" Blaſted from heav'n by Jove's avenging fire."
Dryden.

I am ſurprized that Scarron, who in his burleſque Paraphraſe on this paſſage of Virgil, has ſhewn he was not ignorant of the cauſe of this misfortune, has been ſo reſerved; it ſeems to me a ſubject capable of having been well ridiculed by him. However that be, his verſion is as follows.

Vieil, caſſé, mol propre à la guerre,
Je ne ſers de rien ſur la terre.
Spectre, qui n'ai plus que la voix,
J'y ſuis un inutile poids.
Depuis le tems que de ſon foudre
Jupin me voulut mettre en poudre:
Depuis le tems qu'il m'effraya,
Ce grand Dieu qui me giboya,
Par une vengeance ſecrette;
Mais je ſuis perſonne diſcrete;
Je n'en dirai point le ſujet:
Suffit que s'aurois eu mon fait,
Sans Venus, qui ſauva ma vie:
J'ay depuis eu cent fois envie
De m'aller pendre un beau matin,
Et finir mon chien de deſtin.

" Old, worn out, for war unfit,
" I am uſeleſs on earth.
" A ſpectre, whoſe voice alone remains,
" An unſerviceable weight.

" Ere

Ida [F], where ſhepherds paid honours to his monument. This opinion differs much from that of Virgil; for, according to that Poet, the night on which Troy was taken, Æneas took his father on his ſhoulders [G], and carried him to a place of ſafety; and this good old man died not till the Trojans, who had joined Æneas, were, after numberleſs fatigues, arrived in Sicily. This tenderneſs of Æneas for his father, together with the care he took to ſave the houſhold Gods, is the foundation of the character by which he is diſtinguiſhed from other heroes. This character conſiſts in his piety (e). There are ſome who ſay, that Anchiſes lived till his ſon's arrival in Italy, that Land of Promiſe, which the deſtinies had ordered him to go in ſearch of through a thouſand dangers (f). Cato, Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, and Strabo, embrace this opinion (g). Laſtly, Venus's love for Anchiſes was no tranſitory paſſion; the firſt child-birth did not

(e) Virgil often applies the epithet of Pius Æneas to him.

(f) See amongſt other paſſages the firſt book of the Æneid, ver. 205, and 258.

(g) See the note [F] towards the end.

" Ere ſince the time that with his thunder
" Jove was about to reduce me to powder;
" Ere ſince the time he frighted me,
" That great God who ſhot at me,
" Out of a ſecret vengeance;
" But I'm a diſcreet perſon,
" And will not mention the cauſe:
" Let it ſuffice I had been deſtroy'd,
" Had not Venus ſaved my life.
" I have ſince an hundred times been prompted
" To hang myſelf ſome morning or other,
" And end my ſcoundrel deſtiny.

If we compare a paſſage of Plutarch with one of Dionyſius Halycarnaſſeus, we ſhall prove that the thunder-ſtroke cauſed a wound which never cloſed. Plutarch ſomewhere ſays (13), that if on one hand garments the moſt torn are by musk rendered odoriferous; on the other the corruption of an ulcer impoiſons the richeſt ſtuffs (14). This is his thought; but inſtead of ſpeaking in general, as I make him, he applies himſelf to the particular example of Anchiſes. From under the rich and precious attire of Duke Anchiſes, ſays he, according to Amyot's verſion, there iſſued a very ſtinking matter, as the Poet ſays,

(13) Plutarch. de Vitio & Virtute. Oper. Moral. p. 100.

(14) I do not tie my ſelf up to Plutarch's words, but his thought.

Son veſtement, qui de fin lin eſtoit,
Boue d'odeur puante dégoutoit,

" His garment, which was a fine linen,
" Dropt a ſtinking matter.

Meziriac tranſlates thus,

" Anchiſes's ulcer threw out a ſtinking matter.

Qui ſuppurant, ſons ceſſe dégoutoit
Sur ſon habit, qui de fin lin eſtoit (15).

(15) Meziriac, Ovid's Epiſtles, p. 671.

In the original thus;

Τῷ δὲ Ἀγχίσῃ τὸ ῥάκος ἰχῶρα πονηρὸν ἐξεδίδου,
Μοσχῷ καταζώννυτα βύσσινον φάρος.

Now as according to the common uſage, ῥάκος ſignifies ragged, tattered garments, there is no likelihood that ſuch a word ſhould be left in the Greek text; therefore a learned Critic puts ἕλκος, wound, ulcer, inſtead of ῥάκος (16). The Tranſlators were not ignorant, that Plutarch reports the words of ſome Poet, but that is not ſufficient; we muſt farther know what Poet's words they are. Meziriac will inform us (17); he found them in Dionyſius Halycarnaſſeus (18), who reports ſome verſes of Sophocles, of which the third is the ſame that Plutarch cites.

(16) Ibid. pag. 670.

(17) Ib. p. 671.

(18) Dion. Hal. lib. 1. cap. 48. Theſe verſes of Sophocles are taken out of his Laocoon.

Νῦν δ' ἐν πύλαισιν Αἰνείας ὁ τῆς θεοῦ
Πάρες' ἐπ' ὤμων πατέρ' ἔχων, κραυνίᾳ
Μοσχῷ καταζώννυτα βύσσινον φάρος.

Je vois deſ-ja le fils de Cytherée,
Le bon Ænée, aux portes d'Ilion,
Deſſus ſon dos portant ſon pere Anchiſe,
Qui du grand coup de foudre qu'il receut
Garde la playe encore diſtillante
Sur le fin lin dont il eſt reveſtu.

" I ſee already the ſon of Cytherea
" The good Æneas, at the gates of Ilium,
" Upon his back carrying his father Anchiſes,
" Who from the great thunder-ſtroke he received,
" Retains the wound ſtill diſtilling
" Upon the fine linen with which he is clad.

Meziriac, who is the author of theſe French verſes, has corrected a fault in the beginning of the third verſe of Sophocles, inſtead of νάτῳ, which we read in all the editions of Dionyſius Halycarnaſſeus, he has put μοσχῷ. There is nothing in that which is not according to the rules of criticiſm; the comparing of authors, who have at different times cited the ſame paſſage, often occaſions the true reading's being found out. Sylburgius, who reviſed the Latin verſion of Dionyſius Halycarnaſſeus done by Sigiſmund Gelenius, has left in a bad condition what relates to the third verſe of Sophocles. Here follows the tranſlation of thoſe three verſes:

Nunc in porta eſt Æneas deæ filius,
Humeris bajulans patrem fulminata
Terga amictum fluxa veſte byſſina.

We do not find here the ſuppurating wound, and we ſee Anchiſes ſmitten on the back; that is to ſay, we ſee not what Sophocles wrote, and we ſee what he did not write. If the antient writers were to return into the world, they would be very much ſurprized to find in their books a great many things which they never thought of.

[F] He was buried on Mount Ida.] Euſtathius relates this (19); but Pauſanias is of quite another opinion. He ſays, that Æneas, going to Sicily, put into Laconia, and there built two cities, and that Anchiſes, dying at the foot of a mountain in Arcadia, was there buried, which occaſioned the Mountain's being called Anchiſia (20). Pauſanias adds, that the ruins of a temple of Venus were to be ſeen near this ſepulchre of Anchiſes; and that the inhabitants of Troy did not in any place ſhew the monument of this old man. Stephanus Byzantinus will have it, that Anchiſes was buried in a city of Thrace built by Æneas (21); or rather, he cites an old Scholiaſt named Theon, who had ſaid this. Tzetzes is of the ſame opinion; he only differs in ſaying that city was in Macedonia (22). Virgil has brought the good man as far as Sicily; it is in that Iſland he makes him die; with this paſſage it is he concludes his hero's long narration to Dido.

(19) Euſtathius in Iliados, lib. 12.

(20) Pauſan. lib. 8. p. 247.

(21) Steph. Byzant. in Ἄγχισα.

(22) Tzetzes in Lycophron.

Hinc Drepani me portus & illætabilis ora
Accipit. Hinc pelagi tot tempeſtatibus actus,
Heu Genitorem, omnis curæ caſuſque levamen,
Amitto Anchiſen. Hic me, pater optime, feſſum
Deſeris, heu tantis nequidquam erepte periclis (23).

(23) Virgil. Æn. lib. 3. ver. 707.

" At length on ſhore the weary fleet arriv'd;
" Which Drepanum's unhappy port receiv'd.
" Here, after endleſs labours, often toſt
" By raging ſtorms, and driv'n on ev'ry coaſt,
" My dear, dear father, ſpent with age I loſt.
" Eaſe of my cares, and ſolace of my pain,
" Sav'd thro' a thouſand toils, but ſav'd in vain.
Dryden.

According to Servius, Anchiſes monument was on the mountain of Eryx, near Drepanum (24). I have quoted three writers, who have ſaid, that Anchiſes died in Italy. Cato (25), Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (26) and Strabo (27) ſay ſo.

(24) Servius in Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 570.

(25) Apud Servium, ibid.

(26) Antiquit. lib. 1. cap. 64.

(27) Lib. 5. p. 158.

[G] He took his father on his ſhoulders and carried him to a place of ſafety.] Virgil's words are ſo beautiful as to deſerve citing.

Ergo

not cure it, ſhe brought Anchiſes a ſecond ſon, as Apollodorus takes notice in the third book of his Bibliotheca.

(28) Virgil. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 707.

Ergo age, chare pater, cervici imponere noſtræ,
Ipſe ſubibo humeris, nec me labor iſte gravabit (28).

(29) Ibid. ver. 721.

Hæc fatus, latos humeros ſubjectaque colla
Veſte ſuper, fulvique inſternor pelle leonis,
Succedoque oneri; dextræ ſe parvus Iülus
Implicuit, ſequiturque patrem non paſſibus æquis (29).

(30) Ibid. ver. 728.

Nunc omnes terrent auræ: ſonus excitat omnis
Suſpenſum, & pariter comitique onerique timentem (30).

" Haſte, my dear father, ('tis no time to wait,)
" And load my ſhoulders with a willing fraight.

" Thus, ord'ring all that prudence could provide,
" I cloath my ſhoulders with a lion's hide;
" And yellow ſpoils: Then, on my bending back,
" The welcome load of my dear father take.
" While on my better hand Aſcanius hung,
" And with unequal paces tript along.

" At ev'ry ſhadow now I am ſeiz'd with fear,
" Not for myſelf, but for the charge I bear."
Dryden.

The Poets have very much celebrated this action; it deſerved it well. They have even ſaid, that the flames ſhewed him reſpect, and that for fear of hurting a ſon, who had ſuch great tenderneſs for his father, they ſeparated to leave a ſpace free for Æneas (31).

(31) See the proofs of this in La Cerda's Commentary on this paſſage of Virgil.

ANCILLON (DAVID) a Miniſter of the Reformed Church at Metz, where he was born (a) the ſeventeenth of March 1617. He ſtudied from the ninth or tenth year of his age in the Jeſuits College, which was then the only one at Metz, where there was an opportunity of learning polite Literature (b). In this College he gave ſuch lively proofs of his genius, that the heads of the Society left nothing unattempted in order to draw him over to their religion and party; but he continued firm againſt their attacks, and upon this took a reſolution of ſtudying Divinity (c). He was indefatigable in labour (d), ſo that his father was often obliged to interpoſe his authority to interrupt his continual application; for he was guilty of an exceſs, and if we may term it ſo, an intemperance in his manner of ſtudying (e). He went to Geneva in the year 1633 (f), and performed his courſe of Philoſophy there under Mr. du Pan (g), and his Divinity ſtudies under Spanheim, Diodati and Tronchin, who had a prodigious love and eſteem for him (h). He left Geneva in April 1641, and offered himſelf to the Synod of Charenton, in order to take upon him the office of a Miniſter (i). His abilities were greatly admired by the Examiners, and his modeſty by the Miniſters of Paris (k); and the whole Aſſembly was ſo highly ſatisfied with him, that they gave him one of the moſt conſiderable Churches, which was unprovided for (l). It was that of Meaux. He exerciſed his Miniſtry there with all the ſatisfaction imaginable till the year 1653. He was prodigiouſly loved by his people. He married to very great advantage [A]; he raiſed himſelf an extenſive reputation by his learning, eloquence and virtue, and was even highly reſpected by thoſe of the Roman Catholick communion. He ſhewed theſe excellent talents of his with ſtill greater reputation and ſucceſs in his own country, where he was Miniſter from the year 1653 till the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. He retired to Francfort after that fatal blow (m); and having preached in the French church at Hanaw, the whole Aſſembly was ſo edified by it, that they immediately called together the heads of the families, in order to propoſe that he might be deſired to accept of the office of Miniſter among them.... (n) The propoſition was agreed to; and they ſent Deputies to him, who obtained what they deſired. He began therefore the exerciſe of his miniſtry in that church about the end of the year 1685 (o). We ſhall ſee below the reaſon why he returned ſo ſoon to Francfort [B], where he would have fixed, if the circumſtances of his family, which

(a) Diſcours ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 6.
(b) Ib. pag. 8.
(c) Ibid. pag. 9.
(d) Ibid. p. 13.
(e) Ibid. p. 13, 14.
(f) Ibid. p. 14.
(g) Ibid. p. 18.
(h) Ibid. pag. 20, 21.
(i) Ibid. p. 31.
(k) Ibid. p. 35.
(l) Ibid. pag. 36.
(m) Ibid. p. 352.
(n) Ibid. 353.
(o) Ibid. p. 354.

[A] He married to very great advantage.] The manner, in which this affair was managed, is very curious. " The principal Heads of families of the " Church of Meaux ſeeing how much their Miniſter " diſtinguiſhed himſelf, and hearing him ſometimes " ſaying, that he would go to Metz to ſee his father and " relations, whom he had not ſeen for ſeveral years, " were apprehenſive leſt they ſhould loſe him. They " thought of a thouſand expedients in order to fix him " with them for a long time; and the ſureſt way in " their opinion was to marry him to ſome rich Lady of " merit, who had an eſtate in that country or near " it. One of them recollected he had heard, that " Mr. Ancillon having preached one Sunday in the " morning at Charenton, he was univerſally applaud- " ed; and that Mr. Macaire eſpecially, who was a " venerable old Gentleman, of very exemplary vir- " tue and piety, and poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate " at Paris and about Meaux, had given him a thou- " ſand bleſſings and commendations, and ſaid aloud " to thoſe, who ſat near him in the Church, that " he had but one daughter, who was an only child, " and very dear to him; but if that Gentleman, " ſpeaking of Mr. Ancillon, ſhould come and ask her " in marriage, he would give her with all his heart. " Upon this, they went to ask him, whether he ſtill " continued in that favourable opinion of him; he " replied, that he did; and accompanied that anſwer " with new expreſſions of his eſteem and affection " for Mr. Ancillon; ſo that the marriage was con- " cluded in the year 1649, and conſummated a little " time after. Mademoiſelle Mary Macaire, his ſpouſe, " was then very young, for ſhe was but fourteen " years of age; but as ſhe had then all the virtues " growing in her, we ſhall ſee in the progreſs of this " diſcourſe, that ſhe was not only an help to him in " piety, and in the comforts of ſociety, which ren- " der'd her agreeable to him, but likewiſe in point " of œconomy, and the care of his family, which he " repoſed entirely in her (1)."

(1) Diſcours ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 75, &c.

[B] He returned very ſoon to Francfort.] His preaching made a great noiſe at Hanaw (2). Several perſons, who had quitted the French Church, for ſome diſguſt, which they had received, returned to it again. The Profeſſors of Divinity, and the German and Dutch Miniſters attended frequently upon his Sermons. The Count of Hanaw himſelf, who had never before been ſeen in that Church, was ſo obliging as to come thither to hear Mr. Ancillon. They came from the neighbouring parts, and even from Francfort.... people, who underſtood nothing of French, flock'd together with great eagerneſs, and ſaid, that they lov'd to which was very numerous, had not obliged him to go to ſome other place, where he might ſettle himſelf (p). He choſe Berlin, where he received a kind reception from his Highneſs the Elector of Brandenbourg (q). He was made Miniſter of Berlin, where he had the pleaſure of ſeeing his eldeſt ſon made Judge and Director of the French, who were in that city (r), and his other ſon rewarded with a penſion, and entertained at the Univerſity of Francfort upon the Oder, and at laſt Miniſter in ordinary of the Capital (s). He had likewiſe the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his brother made Judge of all the French in the States of Brandenbourg [C], and Mr. Cayart, his ſon-in-law, Engineer to his Electoral Highneſs (t). He enjoyed theſe agreeable circumſtances, and ſeveral others till his death; and he finiſhed his courſe with all the ſentiments of piety which are worthy of a faithful Miniſter of Chriſt, at Berlin, the third of September 1692, aged ſeventy five years (u). I could make this article much longer than I have done, for the book, from which I have extracted this, contained a great many particulars; but as that is a work which it is much eaſier to conſult than to procure this Dictionary, I choſe rather to refer the reader to it, than to give too large an extract from it (x). I ſhould have taken another method, if I had been to write from manuſcript memoirs. I ſhall only mention two things, one which relates to the Library of the late Mr. Ancillon, and his manner of ſtudying [D], and the other to the books which he publiſhed [E];

(2) Ib. p. 354.

(p) Ibid. p. 366.
(q) Ibid. p. 372, &c.
(r) Ib. p. 375.
(s) Ibid. p. 397.
(t) Ibid. p. 395.
(u) Ib. p. 487.

(x) It is entitled, Diſcours ſur la Vie de feu Monſ. Ancillon, & ſes dernieres Heures. It was printed at Baſil in 1698, and contains 500 pages in 12mo.

to ſee him ſpeak. Inde iræ & lacrymæ. This diſtinction gave occaſion to the jealouſy of two other Miniſters. Nature influenced by this paſſion forgot its duties (3); they took umbrage from the marks of eſteem and affection which were ſhewn to their new Collegue; they were diſpleaſed at it; and obliged him by a thouſand uneaſy circumſtances to abandon voluntarily a place which they could not force him from. The virtue of Mr. Ancillon was a ſecond time engaged in the combat. His two kinſmen (4), inſtead of the zeal, which they teſtified for his intereſt, which was ſo extraordinary, that they ſeemed to wiſh, that they could change the ſtones into bread to ſupport him, while he was only as a ſtranger in their city, as ſoon as ever he was engaged to their congregation, they became his abſolute enemies; they gave him a thouſand mortifications, and they would readily have changed the bread into ſtones, to drive him out of the city, ſo uneaſy was he to them. . . . . This conduct of theirs produced two very conſiderable effects (5); one, that the Roman Catholics and the irreligious made this a ſubject of raillery; and the other, to enrage the people (6). Mr. Ancillon maintained their favour and good opinion; and if he would have made uſe of that, it is probable he might have ſurmounted the malice of his enemies; but as he thought a faithful Paſtor ought not to eſtabliſh his own intereſts upon any diviſion between a congregation and its Miniſters, and thro' his whole life he had been averſe to parties, and had remonſtrated often againſt cabals and factions, he would not take advantage of the diſpoſition, which the people were in towards him, nor permit them to act. Having therefore attempted every method, which charity and honeſty ſuggeſted, to recover theſe two men to their duty, he reſolved to quit Hanaw, ſince that place, which he had regarded as a quiet refuge, and a ſafe port, into which he was driven by the ſtorm, was now become a field of battle, where he muſt contend without intermiſſion, and where his patience, which had ſupported ſeveral grand trials, might poſſibly be at laſt overcome; and upon theſe conſiderations he left it. . . . (7). He departed therefore. from Hanaw privately, at a time when they leaſt expected it; or rather he ſuffered himſelf to be taken out of the hands of his enemies and of his friends (8); the one holding him, if I may ſo expreſs it, by one hand, abuſed him; and the other holding him by the other hand, endeavoured all they could to reſcue him from the oppreſſion, which he ſuffered; and both of them were ready to come to a quarrel, that is, to make their contention public, and to ſee who ſhould carry the diſpute. To avoid this ſcandal he ſacrificed his own intereſts to peace; he went away without acquainting any perſon, for fear leſt his friends by endeavouring to detain him ſhould raiſe again the flame which lay lurking under the aſhes, and which he was willing to extinguiſh.

(3) Ibid. p. 356.

(4) One had been married to his ſiſter, and the other was actually husband to his niece. ibid. P. 353.

(5) Ibid. p. 357.

(6) Ibid. p. 359.

(7) Ib. p. 360.

(8) Ib. p. 361.

An obſervation concerning the jealouſy occaſion'd by another's eloquence.

I think I have ſome where obſerved (9), that the jealouſy of another's eloquence is the ſtrongeſt paſſion in the world. We ſee too often the ſcandalous diviſions which it produced. The reflections, which might be made upon this point, are proper only to be ſuppreſſed. The ſubject is of too delicate and invidious a nature. I ſhall only ſay, without alluding to any particular caſe, that in this affair people do not conduct themſelves with prudence and charity enough. They ought to chooſe for their Paſtors men, whoſe qualifications are pretty near equal; or if one of them is very remarkably ſuperior to his Collegues, they ought not to magnify his ſuperiority too much. They have no compaſſion for human infirmities, they run in troops to hear one Preacher, while they leave the churches of the reſt almoſt empty. They ſhew theſe marks of diſtinctions in ſo open a manner, that this imprudence of theirs may be conſidered as a chief cauſe of the diſagreement. This is ſowing of tares; whereas men of ſenſe are never guilty of this indiſcretion. All the hearers ought to follow this example; but as this is not to be expected from the people in general, the beſt method perhaps, that can be taken, would be, that thoſe, who manage the elections, ſhould avoid too viſible an inequality in the talents of the Candidates; and ſhould conſider, that in certain profeſſions many perſons approve of that law of Epheſians, that there ſhould be no perſon among us of too great eminence and ſuperiority; and if there be ſuch an one, that he be ſent to ſome other part, rather than be ſuffered to continue in our city (10). This law was condemned by Heraclitus; but he was a Philoſopher. I ſhall give here a remark of the Author of the book, which I have ſo often quoted above. Mr. Ancillon, ſays he (12), having none of thoſe defects, which it is obſerved are the common ſources of diviſion among Miniſters of the ſame Church; as, 1, an attachment to their particular opinions, and a deſire of promoting them; 2, a fondneſs for the eſteem and glory of the world; 3, a love of power; 4, a regard to their own intereſts; and having a great eſteem for Mr. Ferry (13) on account of his great age, and his approved merit for many years; he obliged, if I may ſo expreſs it, that great man to live in a conſtant and inviolable Friendſhip with him.

(9) In the rem. [B] of the article ATTICUS.

(10) See the quotation following.

(11) Eſt apud Heraclitum Phyſicum de principe Epheſiorum Hermodoro. Univerſos ait Epheſios eſſe morte mulctandos, quod quum civitate expellerent Hermodorum ita locuti ſunt; "Nemo de "nobis unus excellat; ſed ſi "quis extiterit, "alio in loco & "apud alios ſit. Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. l. 5. c. 36.

(12) Diſc. ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 93.

(13) The Collegue of Mr. Ancillon at Metz.

[C] He had the ſatisfaction to ſee his brother (14) made Judge of the French in Brandenburg.] "A "poſt, which he ſtill fills with honour; and which, "as laborious as it is, does not hinder him from "obliging the world in the Journals of Berlin with "a great many accurate and judicious pieces, which "ſhew the ſolidity and vaſt extent of his knowledge "and learning (15)."

(14) He had been a famous Advocate at Metz.

(15) Diſcours ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, pag. 102, 392, 393.

[D] I ſhall ſpeak of his library and manner of ſtudying.] The riches, which he obtained by his marriage, having enabled him to gratify his favourite paſſion (16), he bought all the chief books, which may be called the Pillars of a large Library, ſuch as the Bibles, which are moſt curious on account of the edition or the notes, the ſeveral Dictionaries, the beſt Commentators upon Scripture, the Works of the Fathers, the Collections of the Councils, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories, and ſeveral others of the ſame kind. He choſe the beſt editions (17). He always followed the ſame rule, and gave good reaſons for it; which would be too long to mention particularly; but the ſubſtance

(16) He ſaid ſometimes of himſelf, that he was troubled with the Bibliomania, or diſeaſe of buying Books, ib. p. 105.

(17) Ib. p. 77.

ſubſtance of them in ſhort is this: He ſaid, that it is certain the leſs the eyes are fatigued in reading a work, the more liberty the mind has to judge of it. As we ſee more clearly the excellencies and defects of a printed book, than when it is in manuſcript; ſo we ſee them more plainly, when it is printed in a fair character and upon good paper, than when the impreſſion and paper are both bad. After he had laid this good foundation of a Library, he enlarged it with all the good books of any importance, which were publiſhed afterwards. He had the pleaſure of having them new; for his friends at Paris, and in Holland, England, Germany, Switzerland, and Geneva, with whom he kept a ſtrict correſpondence, ſent him them as ſoon as ever they were publiſhed. The opinion of thoſe, who ſay that the firſt editions are the leaſt valuable, becauſe they ſerve only as a fair copy of the works of an Author, had no effect upon his curioſity. He knew well enough that the famous Mr. Menage, Dean of St. Peter's at Angers, in the Dedication of his Origines de la Langue Françoiſe to Mr. Du Puy, tells him, that he once heard from him, that Mr. Loyſel, a celebrated Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, uſed to ſay that the firſt editions of books ſerve only as a fair copy of the works of an Author; and that this judicious Gentleman ſpoke this of all kinds of books with great reaſon; but that the obſervation is more true with regard to Dictionaries, than to any other ſorts of writings. He knew that others were of opinion, that firſt editions were only to be conſidered as imperfect Eſſays, which the Authors propoſe to Men of learning in order to know their ſentiments of them. But all this did not hinder him from indulging his curioſity; and the event having ſhewn him, that he run but a ſmall riſque in it (18), he continued the ſame cuſtom. In ſhort we have ſeen hitherto but a few Authors like Cardinal Perron in this reſpect, who ſpared no pains, nor care, nor coſt in his works, and always had them printed twice over; the firſt time only to diſtribute a few copies amongſt his particular friends, that he might have their obſervations upon them; and the ſecond time, to publiſh them in the form, which he thought proper: and to prevent the firſt impreſſion from being publiſhed contrary to his deſign, he had them printed in his own houſe, where he had a printing-preſs on purpoſe.

(18) See the quotation (29) below.

" The Library of Mr. Ancillon was very curious " and very large, and he enlarged it every day with " all that appeared new and important in the Re- " public of Letters; ſo that at laſt it was one of " the nobleſt collections, which was in the hands " of any private perſon in the Kingdom. Foreig- " ners, who were curious, uſed to viſit it, as they " paſſed thro' the city of Metz as the moſt valuable " curioſity there (19)." When he ſaw the Catalogue of pretended heretical books, publiſhed by the Archbiſhop of Paris, he laid aſide all thoſe books, which were ordered to be ſuppreſſed (20); and they compoſed his Library in the foreign countries, which he retired to (21); for his own was plundered after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; he would not have had a book remaining, if thoſe, which he had hid, had not been concealed from the perſons who ſeized the reſt of his Library. . . . . The Monks and Eccleſiaſtics of Metz and the neighbouring towns had long coveted the Library of Mr. Ancillon (22). His being obliged to depart on a ſudden gave them a fair pretence to take poſſeſſion of it; ſome of them propoſed to buy the whole together, and others required, that it ſhould be ſold by retail; but neither the one nor the other had any deſign to pay the value of it; they only contrived how to get poſſeſſion of it. The expedient of the laſt was followed, as the moſt favourable to this unjuſt deſign. A company of Eccleſiaſtics of all orders came from every part to lay hands on this fine and copious Library, which had been collected with the utmoſt care for forty years, and conſiſted of thoſe books, which were moſt rare and worthy of the curioſity of the moſt learned Men. They took away a large number of them together, and gave a little money, as they went out, to a young girl of twelve or thirteen years of age, who look'd after them, that they might have it to ſay, they had paid for them. Thus Mr. Ancillon ſaw that valuable treaſure diſperſed, which he had been ſo long collecting, and in which he had placed his chief pleaſure, and as it were his heart. We may obſerve, that the loſs of his Library involved in it that of an infinite number of letters, which he deſigned to have publiſhed (23), and which Mr. Ancillon received from ſeveral perſons of diſtinguiſhed genius and learning; and particularly thoſe, which his intimate friend Mr. Daille wrote to him: An irreparable loſs (24)!

(19) Diſcours ſur la Vie de Mr. Ancillon, p. 102, 103.

(20) Ib. p. 328.

(21) Ib. p. 383.

(22) Ib. p. 342.

(23) Ib. p. 219.

(24) They gave one another, inſtead of the common title of Monſieur, only that of Mon cher Atticus, my dear Atticus. ibid. A reflection upon the fate of ſome Libraries, and upon the indolence of thoſe who wait for ſecond editions.

This might furniſh us with ſeveral ſubjects for reflection; for is it not a very melancholly thing, to ſee one day deſtroy all that has been doing with a prodigious deal of care and expence for ſeveral years? Is it not a deplorable misfortune to be deprived in one moment of what had been collected in a long courſe of time by the moſt innocent methods, and prepared as a continual ſource of the moſt laudable delight, and noble inſtruction? Is it not a ſad reflection to ſee one's ſelf deprived at once of an infinite number of volumes, which had been amaſſed together with the utmoſt care, and which we had fixed our peculiar ſatisfaction upon? We ſhould have been much more eaſy, if the flames had conſumed them; but there is no poſſibility without a peculiar ſhare of grace of bearing the thought, that they ſhould be the prey of an unjuſt poſſeſſor, to whom they coſt nothing but the pains of carrying them home. The Triumvirate, who diſpoſſeſſed thoſe of their lands, who had manured them for their whole life, and gave them to people, who had never contributed any thing for their cultivation, never occaſioned ſo ſenſible a grief, as that was of thoſe Scholars who ſaw their Libraries diſpers'd, and falling into the hands of a cruel perſecutor, who deſerved hatred, if he acted contrary to his conſcience; and pity, if his falſe Religion perſuaded him, that he was doing God good Service.

Impius hæc tam culta novalia miles habebit?
Barbarus has ſegetes (25).

(25) Virg. Ec. 1. ver. 71.

" Did we for theſe Barbarians plant and ſow?
" On theſe, on theſe our happy fields beſtow?
Dryden.

Thus exclaimed the good people of Italy, when they ſaw themſelves obliged to reſign their eſtates to the ſoldiers of the Triumvirate:

En queis conſevimus agros!
Inſere nunc Melibæe pyros, pone ordine vites (26).

(26) Id. ibid. ver. 13, 14.

Vivi pervenimus, advena noſtri,
Quod nunquam veriti ſumus, ut poſſeſſor agelli
Diceret, hæc mea ſunt; veteres migrate coloni (27).

(27) Id. Ec. 9, ver. 2.

" Now let me graft my pears, and prune the vine?
" The fruit is theirs, the labour only mine.

. . . . At laſt
" The time is come I never thought to ſee,
" (Strange revolution for my farm and me!)
" When the grim Captain in a ſurly tone
" Cries out, pack up, ye raſcals, and be gone.
Dryden.

Mr. Ancillon, and ſeveral others, might have applied moſt of theſe expreſſions to their own misfortunes. It had been better perhaps not to have fixt ſo much of his happineſs on his Library, ſince he was obliged to addreſs himſelf to it after this manner;

Nuper ſollicitum quæ mihi tædium,
Nunc deſiderium, curaque non levis (28).

(28) Horat. Od. 14. l. 1. ver. 17.

" O lately thou, my grief and fear,
" And now my freſh and preſent care.
Creech.

But let us leave, if poſſible, the remembrance of that fatal revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which was attended with ſo many inſtances of injuſtice; and turn our view to objects, which do not raiſe ſuch a tumult of paſſion. Let us commend the juſt way of thinking of this excellent Divine. He choſe to take the firſt edition of books, tho' there was a probability they would be reprinted with additions and corrections (29). This is to underſtand things; this is what may be juſtly called a Love of books, a Deſire of inſtruction. But thoſe, who wait calmly for a book, till it is reprinted, ſhew plainly that they are reſigned to their ignorance, and prefer the ſaving of a piſtole to the acquiſition

(29) He found ſometimes that this probability was without effect. See above the quotation (18).

publiſhed [E]; and as for the reſt, I ſhall ſay in general, that the diſcourſe which is publiſhed of his life, repreſents him as a perſon of a very extraordinary merit. It gives us quiſition of uſeful knowledge. I ſpeak of thoſe, (and the number of them is very conſiderable,) who on one hand are perſuaded that a new book will teach them a thouſand things, and on the other, tho' they are able to purchaſe it, yet defer the buying it, becauſe they are told, that there will be a better or cheaper edition of it. This indolence is very blameable; it is nothing but a ſtupid acquieſcence in their want of that knowledge, which they might obtain. Mr. Bigot told me one day, that a perſon at Roan, who applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Genealogies, wanted to make uſe of the works of Father Anſelme; yet he would not buy them, but waited for a ſecond edition, which never appeared; and ſo it is probable the man died without gratifying his curioſity. Mr. Bigot repreſented to him more than once, that it was much better to have two editions of a book, than to deprive himſelf of the advantage, which the reading of the firſt might procure him; and that he muſt have a very indifferent judgment of things, who would prefer three or four crowns to that advantage. Thoſe, who can bear the charge of it, cannot be better adviſed, than to purchaſe the firſt editions. I confeſs, that thoſe printed in foreign countries are cheaper; but then are they ſo exact? Do not they make alterations in them? Do not they add ſomething? Does not the Abbe de la Roque complain publickly (30), that the Printers in Holland have corrupted his book? I have been aſſured a few days ago, that the Hiſtory of Davila, and that of Strada, printed in the Low-Countries, are different from the editions of Italy; the Printers of Flanders having ſuppreſſed or altered ſeveral things, out of complaiſance to ſome noble families. It will be urged to me, that an Author generally corrects his errors in the ſecond edition; I acknowledge this; but then they are not always real errors; they are only alterations, which he makes out of regard to prudential reaſons to his own peace, or to the injuſtice of his cenſors, whoſe power is formidable to him. The ſecond edition which Mezerai gave of his Abregé Chronologique, is more correct; he has taken away ſeveral errors; but he has at the ſame time taken away ſeveral truths, which happened to be diſpleaſing; and it is upon this account that the curious always endeavour to procure the edition in 4to, which is the firſt, and pay a great price for it. I ſay nothing of the advantage, which may reſult from comparing the editions. This is ſo great, when a man of genius has reviſed his work exactly, that his firſt eſſay deſerves to be kept. All this ſhews us, that Mr. Ancillon was very intelligent in affairs relating to books.

(30) In the Preface to his Journal des Savans. See likewiſe the remark [F] of the article PELISSON towards the end.

Let us now ſpeak of his manner of ſtudying: He loſt not a moment of time in vain and uſeleſs ſtudies. He read indeed all ſorts of books, even ancient and modern Romances. There was not one, from which he thought he might not draw ſome advantage. He often mentioned thoſe words, which are attributed to Virgil, Aurum ex ſtercore Ennii colligo (31). i. e. "I collect gold from Ennius's dung." We find, ſaid he frequently, in ſome neglected Authors particular things, which are to be met with no where elſe; and tho' it were only for the ſtyle, yet we may diſcover ſomething worth obſerving. But he did not give a particular attention to theſe, but only to works of importance, and ſerious ſubjects..... He placed a prodigious difference between the reading of thoſe books, which he look'd upon, as he ſaid himſelf, only that he might not be ignorant of any thing; and thoſe, which he eſteemed uſeful to his profeſſion. He read the former but once, and that tranſiently, and as the Latin proverb expreſſes it: Sicut canis ad Nilum bibens & fugiens; i. e. "Like a dog drinking at the Nile as he runs;" but he read the other with care and application. He read them ſeveral times; the firſt, he ſaid, ſerved only to give him a general idea of the ſubject; and the ſecond diſcovered the beauties. Indexes, which other great men have called the Soul of Books, were entirely uſeleſs to him, becauſe he read them over with ſufficient attention and often enough to make himſelf Maſter of the work; and beſides he had a ſtrong memory, and particularly a local one, which is of great advantage to men of learning. He read them over exactly, and even to the title, the name of the Printer, the place and year of the impreſſion; for every thing in his opinion had its proper uſe. He ſcored the books as he read them, and placed in the margin references to other Authors, who treated of the ſame ſubjects, or related ſomething, that had regard to what he read.... (32). He changed the ſubject he was reading ſometimes; and this change was inſtead of a relaxation to him *. He did not always read a book throughout; he ſtudied ſometimes the ſubject to the bottom, and then he conſulted the Authors, who had treated of it. He frequently ſaw the ſame thing in different Authors; but this did not diſguſt him; on the contrary he ſaid they were as ſo many new ſtrokes, which compleated the idea, which he had conceived, and gave it the utmoſt perfection. The variety of Authors, which he conſulted, was the cauſe, that there was generally to be ſeen in the middle of his ſtudy a large table, covered with books for the moſt part open (33). The famous Father Paul, whom I mentioned, ſtudied in this manner; he did not diſcontinue it, as we are told by the accurate and faithful Writer of his Life, till he had ſeen all; that is, till he confronted the Authors one with another, and the places, times, and opinions: and this method he fixed upon, that he might have no occaſion to doubt, or think again of the ſame thing, but might take the proper ſide of the queſtion, and ſatisfy himſelf at once as much as he could naturally do. It was thus Mr. Ancillon ſtudied ſometimes, and he gave the ſame reaſons for it. As he read a great deal, he found many things worth his obſervation; and tho' he had an admirable memory, yet he noted in his common-place books what he found moſt remarkable. He knew well enough, that Govean, for inſtance, who would not have an ink horn in his ſtudy, and Salmaſius and Menage, and ſeveral other great men, condemned theſe Collections, and were ſo far from conſidering them as helps in learning the Sciences, that on the contrary they regarded them as obſtacles, which interrupted the courſe of reading and meditation, and deſtroyed the proper fruits of them. But he thought, that as thro' a misfortune peculiar to the preſent age, it is not ſufficient to know things accurately, and their analyſis, and all their reaſons they are built upon, if we do not quote our authorities for it, and the text itſelf, it was neceſſary to have a book, which ſhould ſerve as a vein or current of water to lead him directly to the ſpring; and ſo much the more, becauſe as he was to ſpeak before ſome perſons, who were rather ſpies than hearers, and would frequently demand of him authorities and proofs for what he advanced, it was in ſome meaſure neceſſary to have a repertory to refreſh his memory, and to direct him immediately to what he wanted, according to the different conjunctures in which he was. Theſe obſervations, I think, will be of ſome advantage to a great many of my readers. We ſhall ſpeak below (34) of his conſtant application to ſtudy.

(31) Diſc. ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 107.

(32) Ib. p. 109.

* Πόση μεταβολὴ εἶδως ἐςὶν ἀναπάυσεως.

(33) Ib. p. 111.

(34) In remark [F].

[E] The books which he publiſhed.] He publiſhed at Sedan a volume in 4to in the year 1657, in which the whole diſpute concerning traditions is amply and ſolidly examined (35). This is a faithful account of all that paſſed in the conference, which he had with Mr. de Bedacier, Doctor of Sorbonne, Biſhop of Auguſte, and Suffragan of the Biſhop of Metz (36). He diſputed with him before ſeveral perſons, at firſt in his own houſe (37), and afterwards before a large audience in the Biſhop's palace (38). All the articles were reduced to writing, and ſigned. He maintained this grand cauſe with honour, and finiſhed it with ſucceſs. After he had replied methodically to all the objections which were urged, he repreſented, that it was his turn then to propoſe his arguments. But as he had given a mortal wound to error in his anſwers, it was apprehended, that he would deſtroy it, if he had the liberty of eſtabliſhing the truth, as he pretended. Mr. de Bedacier thought proper to break off the diſpute; and to conceal his reaſons for it, he ſaid, that it was much better to continue the argument by writing than by perſonal diſputation. It was agreed however, that neither party ſhould publiſh the particulars of this conference (39). There was a Monk notwithſtanding,

(35) Diſc. ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 218.

(36) Ibid. pag. 207, 208.

(37) Ibid. p. 212.

(38) Ib. p. 213.

(39) Ib. p. 214.

(y) See, concerning the ill consequences of doing otherwise, the same Disc. sur la Vie de Monsr. Ancillon, p. 175, &c.

us in short in him the model of an accomplished Minister. He is painted there as learned, eloquent, wise, pious, modest, charitable, dispensing his reproofs with mildness, or vigour, according to the circumstances of the case; practising what he preached (y), employed entirely in the functions of his Ministry [F], without intermeddling, as too many do, with secular affairs, and suffering his house to be open to informers and standing, who took upon him to print a false account

(40) Ib. p. 217. of it (40), whose imprudence was so flagrant, that although Mr. Ancillon had managed this contest with great honour to himself, yet he attempted to persuade the publick, that it was very fatal to him and to his party, and that he lost the victory in it irrecoverably
(41) Ib. p. 218. (41). This occasioned Mr. Ancillon to publish the book abovementioned. Mr. Hottinger commends it extremely in his sixth chapter of the third book of
(42) Ib. p. 220. his Bibliothecarius Quadripartitus (42). Father Clivier, a Minim, and Provincial of that Order, undertook to refute that work, and published a piece with that design intitled, Le Fort des Traditions abbatu par les Maximes de Mr. David Ancillon. Others wrote Satyrs upon it; but all these Libels failed in
(43) Ibid. their success (43). The Roman Catholicks themselves advised Mr. Ancillon not to answer them, as he had undertaken; they told him, that he and his book were too much above the level of common writers for
(44) Ib. p. 221. him to engage with them (44). When the Method of Cardinal de Richlieu appeared, "he wrote a full and "excellent answer to it; but he understood that Mr. "Martel, Professor at Montauban, had written one "which was ready to be published; and that Mr. "Claude, who had the same design, had desisted "from executing it for the same reason, as appears "new from the third Letter of his Collection of "Letters, in the fifth tome of his posthumous works. "He suppressed therefore what he had done, and "published only some sheets, which contain an an"swer to the sixth chapter of that Method, or, to "speak more properly, an Apology for Luther, Zuinglius, Calvin, and Beza, and that was the "title which was given them in the edition publish"ed at Hanaw in 1666. Mr. Ancillon wrote the "Life of William Farel, or the Idea of a faithful "Minister of Christ. The famous Mr. Conrart, who "was one of his intimate friends, read this and ap"proved it, and wrote with his own hands several "remarks in the margin of the manuscript. This "was a piece, that well deserved to be published: "but he would not agree to it; which was the oc"casion, that a copy of it full of faults falling into "the hands of a Bookseller in Holland, he was in"duced by the reputation of the Author to print it. "This edition was surprizingly incorrect and defec"tive; and if ever that copy revised by Mr. Conrart "appears, the other will be scarce known to be the "same book, it is so mutilated and faulty. Tho' "Mr. Ancillon explained several entire books of the "holy Scripture, and wrote all his Sermons, yet "he never could be persuaded to print any one of
(45) Ib. p. 255. "them . . . . (45). All that we have of him in that "kind is a Sermon preached at Metz on a Fast"day. The Consistory used some sort of authority "towards him to induce him to print it, which was "done at Paris in 1676. This Sermon is upon the "18th and 19th verses of the 3d chapter of St. "Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, and is entitled, "The Tears of St. Paul. He wrote at last an ex"cellent Answer to the Pastoral Advice, the Circular "Letters, and the Methods, which the Clergy ad"dressed to the Reformed of France in the year "1682. But he kept it concealed in his cabinet, "till several Persons of Figure having obliged him to "publish it, he sent it to Monsieur Turretin, Profes"sor of Divinity at Geneva, his old friend, with "leave to dispose of it as he thought proper: but "the copy, which he sent, very probably miscarri"ed; for there was never any thing more heard "of it. Mr. Ancillon had so little regard to his "own writings, that he never gave himself the "trouble of enquiring after it. However this An"swer, which was then expected to be published, "is mentioned in the Preface to a very solid and ju"dicious book, entitled, Examen des Méthodes, &c. "where we are told, that we shall soon see an An (46) Ib. p. 258. "swer written by an eminent Hand at Metz (46).

[F] He was employed entirely in the functions of his Ministry.] Those, who devote themselves to the office of a Pastor of souls, "have occasion for their "whole time, to employ it in study, labour, and the "discharge of their duty. And it is without doubt "for this reason, that the sixth of those which are "called the Apostolical Canons orders, that no Bi"shop, Priest, or Deacon shall apply himself to any "secular affairs, or undertake any public office; and "the sixth of the African Canons forbids all per"sons of that character to take upon them the care "of affairs and law-suits of others. The loss of "the time, which is spent in worldly concerns, is "not one of the least motives of these excellent "constitutions; but I believe this was not the only "consideration, which gave occasion to them. Ex"perience shewed that the intrigues of the world, "the hurry of affairs, and the ambition of paying "court to the Great, are the three rocks, which al"ways have been, and always will be fatal to them. "They abandon insensibly that apostolical simplici"ty, which ought to be their chief ornament. "They learn the maxims of this world; they ac"custom themselves to its intrigues, its compli"ances, and artifices; and afterwards practise them "insensibly themselves (47)." The Minister, whom (47) Ib. p. 95, I am speaking of, avoided all these rocks; he loved 96. study, ease, and retirement; he never embarrassed himself with the business and hurry of the world (48). "He was appointed by the laws of the coun- (48) Ib. p. 100. "try, and against his own inclination Guardian to "his brother and sister; but he left the administra"tion of the estate and other affairs to his brother, "who was then, tho' under age, a very able man. . . "So that his Guardianship being concluded upon his "pupil's coming to age, his brother, the minor, gave "in his accounts to his Guardian, and his Guardian "upon this gave them up, for form's sake only, "to his minors, in the same manner, that he re"ceived them, quite contrary to the common and "natural custom. He never interposed at all in "any worldly affairs. Like a true hermit he secluded "himself from the conversation of men, and attend"ed only upon God and his Church (49). He had (49) Ib. p. 102. "a very curious and copious Library. . . . . There "you was always sure to find him. . . . . (50). He (50) Ib. p. 103. "never went out of his lodging, but to go to "church to discharge some of the duties of his "functions. He never left his books but for this; "and as if the days were not long enough, he pas"sed part of the night in meditation or study. "Tho' he had several country-houses, and some of "which were bought for him in the suburbs of the "city very near him, in order to engage him the "more readily to pass some days, or at least some "hours there, yet he never saw them above three "or four times for two and thirty years that he was "Minister at Metz. He was always calm and serene "in his chamber, insensible to jealousy, which occa"sions so many uneasy moments to others. He "lived peaceably at home, without any regard to "the reputation, which is procured by frequent vi"sits, by intense application to affairs, and the great "measures that are exactly to be kept.

This is a model which every Minister of the Gospel ought to regulate himself upon. They have all chosen the better part with Mary (51); but some of (51) Luk. x. 42. them seem to imitate Martha too much, who was busied about many things (52). They interpose in (52) Ib. ver. 41. State-affairs; they thrust themselves into the intrigues of the city; they seek to know all kinds of news; they traffic, and pay their court. They sometimes even hazard themselves in giving their advice in war and negotiations, and are not at all shock'd at the contempt, which is shewn to their wrong counsels. They are frequently to be seen in the anti-chambers of great men; they attend impatiently to be introduced. This is not upon affairs of conscience and religion; it is only to ask favours; to recommend their children, relations, and friends to posts of honour and news-mongers [G]. We cannot form a truer idea of the variety of learning, which enlivened his converſation, than from the book which I ſhall mention below [H]. I ſhall examine in another place (z) ſome particulars relating to a cut of him. I muſt not omit mentioning that he was the ſon of an eminent Lawyer; that one of his anceſtors was formerly PRESIDENT AU MORTIER in one of the principal of the ſupreme courts of France; and that GEORGIN ANCILLON, one of the chief members of the church of Metz, was likewiſe one of the firſt founders and managers of it (aa).

(z) In the remark [F] of the article FERRI.

(aa) Diſc. ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 7.

nour and profit. They know exactly when a place is vacant, and they endeavour to fill it up immediately upon their recommendation. They were to be commended indeed, if their intereſt was employed only in procuring bread for thoſe, who want it; but they generally uſe it only in favour of thoſe, who are already rich enough; perſons, who would not attempt to ſollicit them, if they eſteemed them true Miniſters of Chriſt; for in ſuch a caſe, they would expect a reproof, and apprehend that St. Paul's rule would be repreſented to them, that if we have but food and raiment, we ought to be therewith content (53). It is not the duty of a Miniſter to procure for his flock the means of engaging them in too ſtrict an attachment to the things of this world. He ought rather to wean their minds from them, and abate their covetouſneſs and ambition; and he would do this undoubtedly, if he was himſelf diſengaged from the deſires of vain-glory. But as the neceſſities of his own paſſions require, that the offices of a city ſhould be in the hands of thoſe, who have obligations to him, and who, either out of gratitude or hope of new favours, are always ready to ſerve him; he endeavours all he can to raiſe them; he applauds their ambitious views; and in order to ſupport himſelf in this management of affairs, he is obliged to intrigue, and to have his Emiſſaries every where. Such a perſon deſerves that threatning, which is ſometimes uſed againſt thoſe Biſhops, who break the canons of reſidence, and never reflect with themſelves, that their office is of ſuch a kind, that all the powers of human nature are ſcarce ſufficient to diſcharge it fully. Thoſe, who conſider this, imitate Mr. Ancillon, and do not ſpend ſo much time in viſits of compliment and ſollicitation;

(53) Epiſtle to Timothy, c. vi. ver. 8.

Forumq; vitat, & ſuperba civium
Potentiorum limina (54).

(54) Horat. Epod. Od. 2. ver. 7.

That is,

" He flies the bar; from noiſe retreats;
" And ſhuns the Nobles haughty ſeats.

Creech.

Obſerve that thoſe who do not follow this conduct, ſometimes employ their intereſt likewiſe for thoſe who are not in good circumſtances; but if we conſider rightly we ſhall find, that theſe perſons are what we call uſeful men, proper for every thing, and inclined to devote all their leiſure to the gratification of the paſſions of their patron who procured it them. They treat him as their Deity:

Deus nobis hæc otia fecit:
Namq; erit ille mihi ſemper Deus; illius aram
Sæpe tener noſtris ab ovilibus imbuet agnus (55).

(55) Virg. Eclog. 1. ver. 6.

That is,

" Theſe bleſſings, friend, a Deity beſtow'd;
" For never can I deem him leſs than God:
" The tender firſtlings of my woolly breed,
" Shall on his holy altars often bleed.

They acknowledge themſelves to be his creatures, and perform all the duties expreſſed in that term.

[G] He never ſuffered his houſe to be open to informers and news-mongers.] " He was never fond of " ſtories nor ſtory-tellers; and he held it for a max- " im, that they were ſcarce ever to be believed, " becauſe a report is never ſo true and exact, but " that it receives ſomething from the paſſion of " him that repeats it, and is like water, which re- " tains the tincture of the veins of the earth or mi- " nerals which it paſſes through. He had particu- " larly an extreme averſion to thoſe who go from " houſe to houſe to know what paſſes, and to ſet " people a talking, and then to report abroad what " they have as it were extorted from them by arti- " fice and fraud ..... (56). He ſaid there was a " great deal of danger in crediting too ſoon what " is reported abroad. He was always upon his " guard in this point (57)." The houſe of ſuch a Miniſter was far from being the reſort of news-mongers, it would have been a great ſcandal. I have ſpoken of this above in the remark [H] of the article (HENRY) ALTING; and I ſhall ſpeak further in the remark [N] of the article of (JANUS) GRUTERUS.

(56) Diſc. ſur la Vie de Monſ. Ancillon, p. 229.

(57) Ib. p. 230.

[H] We may judge by the book mentioned below of the variety of learning, which enlivened his converſation.] This book is entitled, Melange Critique de Litterature, recueilli des Converſations de feu Mr. Ancillon (58). It was publiſhed at Baſil in 1698 in two volumes in 12mo, by Mr. Ancillon the Advocate, the eldeſt ſon of the Miniſter, who was before well known in the Republic of Letters (59). I ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention this miſcellaneous collection; and though I do not ſometimes allow that it is every where exact, yet it is without pretending at all to prejudice either the author or the publiſher. It is rather to be admired, that Mr. Ancillon in an extempore converſation ſhould be ſo exact in many places, than that his memory ſhould not be infallible every where: and with regard to his ſon, he was obliged to publiſh things, as he heard them from his father's mouth. See what I have remarked concerning the Menagiana (60). The caſe is juſt the ſame. We ſee in the preface to this collection the reaſon why it was not intitled Ancilloniana.

(58) See the Journal de Leipſic for June 1698, p. 287.

(59) We have ſeveral pieces his, tho' for moſt part wi out his name.

(60) In the remark [A] of the article MENAGE.

☞ ANCILLON (CHARLES), ſon of the preceding, and the author of ſeveral works [A], of

[A] The author of ſeveral works.] 1. L'Irrevocabilité de l'edit de Nantes prouvé par les principes du droit & de la politique: i. e. " The Unlawfulneſs of " revoking the edict of Nantes proved from the " Principles of Law and Policy." Amſterdam 1688 in 12mo, pagg. 226. II. Reflexions Politiques, par leſquelles on fait voir que la perſecution des Reformez eſt contre les véritable interêts de la France: i. e. " Political Reflections, by which it is ſhewn, that " the perſecution of the Reformed is contrary to " the true intereſts of France." Cologne 1686 in 12*mo*. Mr. Bayle was miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that this work was written by Sandras des Courtils, the author of the Nouveaux Interêts des Princes (1). III. La France intereſſée a rétablir l'Edit de Nantes. i. e. " The Intereſt of France to reſtore the Edict " of Nantes." Amſterdam 1690, in 12*mo*. IV. Hiſtoire de l'Etabliſſement des Francois Refugiez dans les Etats de Son Alteſſe Electorale de Brandebourg; i. e. " An Account of the Settlement of the French Re- " fugees in the Dominions of his Electoral Highneſs " of Brandenbourg." Berlin 1690, 8*vo*. He wrote this out of gratitude to the Elector for the generoſity which he had ſhewn to the French Proteſtants. It appears from this piece, that the Elector's humanity extended to all the different ranks of perſons among them. The men of learning taſted all the ſatisfactions of eaſe notwithſtanding the preſſures of misfortune and diſtreſs, and enjoyed the charms of ſociety in the conferences which were held at Mr. Spanheim's, their Patron and Mecænas, who was one of the ornaments of that court, as well as of the Republick of Letters. The ſoldier found employments to exert his valour in; and the artificer had

(1) Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 7. p. 384.

of two of which we ſhall give a more particular account [B], was born at Metz the 29th of July 1659. He began his ſtudies in that city, and went to Hanaw for the proſecution of them. He afterwards applied himſelf to the Civil Law at Marpurg, Geneva, and Paris, in the laſt of which cities he was admitted an Advocate. Upon his return to Metz in 1679 he followed the bar, where he began to raiſe himſelf a conſiderable reputation. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, the Proteſtants of Metz deputed him to court in order to repreſent, that they ought not to be comprehended in this revocation. But all that he could obtain was, that this city ſhould be treated with more lenity and favour (a). He followed his father to Berlin, where the Elector of Brandenbourg an opportunity of exerciſing his induſtry and skill. In ſhort they compoſed as it were one body, which was ranged under proper Judges of their own nation. The Elector ſeemed willing rather to exhauſt his treaſury, than his charity towards them (2). This opened a noble and extenſive field of panegyric for our Author, who has very happily applied that line of Ovid, Sæpe premente Deo, fert Deus alter opem.

(a) Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 7. p. 382. edit. Paris 1729.

(2) See Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, Juillet 1690, Art. 11, p. 511, 512.

V. Melange Critique de Litterature recueilli des converſations de feu M. Ancillon, avec un diſcours ſur ſa vie & ſes dernieres heures; i. e. "A critical Miſcellany relating to points of Literature collected from "the converſations of the late Mr. [David] Ancillon; "with an Account of his life and laſt hours." Baſil 1698, in 8vo, three volumes (3). Mr. Bayle tells us (4), that this book was printed at Baſil in two volumes in 12mo. There was likewiſe a new edition of it publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1702 in one volume in 12mo, which was diſowned by Mr. Ancillon, becauſe there were ſeveral things inſerted in it, which were injurious to his father's memory, and his own character (5). This Collection of Ancillon was formed from what he heard his father ſpeak of in converſation, and he has digeſted it under proper heads. It contains a great number of uſeful and curious remarks; but there are ſeveral miſtakes in it (6). VI. Diſſertation ſur l'uſage de mettre la premiere pierre au fondement des edifices publics, addreſſée au Prince Electoral de Brandebourg, à l'occaſion de la premiere pierre, qu'il a poſée lui même au fondement du temple qu'on conſtruit pour les François Refugiez dans le quartier de Berlin nommé Friderichſtadt; i. e. "A Diſſertation upon the cuſtom of laying the "firſt ſtone in the foundation of public buildings, "addreſſed to the Electoral Prince of Brandenbourg, "on occaſion of his laying the foundation of the "church built for the French Refugees in that quar"ter of Berlin, which is called Friderichſtadt." Berlin 1701 in 8vo, pagg. 98. The Author having given an account of every thing which his knowledge and reading would ſupply him with on this ſubject, acknowledges at laſt, that this cuſtom is very like thoſe rivers, whoſe ſource is unknown, tho' we may obſerve the courſe of them (7). VII. Le dernier triomphe de Frederic Guillaume le Grand, Electeur de Brandebourg, ou diſcours ſur la Statuë Equeſtre érigée ſur le Pont Neuf du Berlin; i. e. "The laſt "triumph of Frederic William the Great, Elector of "Brandenbourg, or a Diſcourſe upon the Equeſtrian "Statue erected upon the New Bridge in Berlin." Berlin, 1703, fol. pagg. 75. Mr. Beauval tells us (8), that this piece is an Oration and a Diſſertation united together, and that the ſtyle is a little too turgid. He has introduced into it ſo many remarks relating to Literature, that they are ſufficient to compoſe a Diſſertation in form. He has in ſhort collected every thing that can be ſaid concerning equeſtrian and pedeſtrian ſtatues. VIII. Hiſtoire de la Vie de Soliman II, Empereur des Turcs; i. e. "The Life of Soly"man II, Emperor of the Turks." Rotterdam 1706, in 8vo, pagg. 270. This Hiſtory is not very correct. IX. Traité des Eunuques, par C. d'Ollincan; i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning Eunuchs by C. d'Ollincan." 1707, in 12mo. Ancillon wrote this piece on occaſion of an Italian Eunuch, who wanted to marry. He examines the right of ſuch perſons with regard to marriage, which he proves to be abſolutely prohibited to them. There is a great deal of learning in this tract, and a variety of curious and diverting remarks. The name Ollincan, which he aſſumed, is taken from the Anagram of his own (9). X. Memoires concernant les Vies & les Ouvrages de pluſieurs modernes celebres dans la Republique des Lettres; i. e. "Memoirs concerning the Lives and Works of "ſeveral modern Writers of eminence in the Repub"lic of Letters." Amſterdam, 1709, in 12mo. Theſe Memoirs are a little too diffuſe (10). XI. Hiſtoire de la Vie & de la Mort de M. Ltſcheid; i. e. "An Account of the Life and Death of M. Ltſcheid." Berlin, 1713 (11).

(3) Memoirs, &c. p. 384, 385.

(4) In the article DAVID ANCILLON, note [H].

(5) Memoires, &c. p. 385.

(6) Ibid. and Bayle, ubi ſupra.

(7) Memoires, &c. p. 385, 386.

(8) Hiſt. des Ouvrag. des Savans 1703 Mars, p. 142.

(9) Memoires, &c. p. 386, 387.

(10) Ib. p. 387.

(11) Ibid.

[B] Of two of which (works) we ſhall give a more particular account.] The firſt is his Hiſtory of Solyman the ſecond, Emperor of the Turks. There is prefixed to it a long Dedication to the ſon of the Count de Wartemberg, firſt Miniſter of State and Great Chamberlain to the King of Pruſſia; in which is a Compliment both to the father and ſon. Then follows a very long Preface, in which the Author explains his deſign. He tells us, that he gives this Life as a ſpecimen of a more conſiderable work, which he was engaged in. And to ſhew the advantage of his book, he diſcourſes very largely upon the uſe of Hiſtory in general; and adds authority to his reaſons. He aſſerts, that God himſelf propoſed to form the manners of men, when he thought proper, that the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament ſhould be written; and he tells us, that Chriſt himſelf had no other view in the Goſpel. This paſſage has given occaſion to a criticiſm of Mr. Bernard in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (12); who obſerves, that this is a mere figure of Rhetoric, which may paſs in a Preface. However that Mr. Ancillon was too good a Divine to imagine that Chriſt had no other view in the Goſpel, than to give us all kinds of examples proper to form our manners. We muſt not expect the exactneſs of a logical treatiſe in a piece of mere oratory. Our Author likewiſe intimates, that he propoſed to tranſlate the Elogia of Thuanus, which ſhould ſerve him for the text of his articles, and then to write the Lives of thoſe eminent learned men, whoſe characters had been given by that noble Hiſtorian. He informs us, that ſeveral perſons of learning had promiſed to aſſiſt him in that attempt; and that he had the opportunity of conſulting a great many curious Libraries at Berlin. The Preface is followed by an Extract from a book of Mr. Charles Arndius, Public Profeſſor at Roſtock, entitled, Bibliothéque Politique-Heraldique Choiſie, printed at Roſtock and Leipſic in the year 1705, in 8vo, tranſlated from the Latin into French. This Extract contains ten remarks relating to Thuanus, the ſubſtance of which is as follows: 1, The courſe of his life. 2, The ſweetneſs of his temper. 3, The difference of his ſtyle. 4, His employments in Poetry and Painting. 5, The regard which ought to be had to the ſeveral editions of his Hiſtory, 6, The ſupplement of that Hiſtory. 7, Some errors with regard to the names. 8, The eſteem and hatred, which he has met with. 9, The excellence of his Library. 10, His ſon puniſhed with death for his fidelity to his friend in keeping his ſecret. After theſe preliminaries we have the Elogium of Thuanus upon Solyman II tranſlated into French, and the Life of that Emperor by Mr. Ancillon. He informs us, that we are not to imagine, that he choſe to publiſh this Life firſt as his maſter-piece, and as if he eſteemed it ſuperior to all the other Lives, which he was compiling. Since it was only chance, which determined him to pitch upon that before any other, becauſe it was finiſhed firſt; whereas he waited for ſome further lights with regard to the reſt. But for the future he ſhould follow the order of Chronology, and begin with Lewis XII, King of France. He has given us likewiſe an alphabetical Table of the names of thoſe perſons of either ſex, whoſe Lives he propoſed to publiſh, which are about five hundred in all. However theſe are not the only

(12) Sept. 1706, Art. 6. p. 342.

(13) Ibid.

Brandenbourg appointed him Judge and Director of the French who were in that city. In 1695 that Prince gave him new marks of his confidence and favour, by ſending him to Swiſſerland in order to negotiate ſome affairs of importance. The Marquis of Baden Dourlach, who was then at Baſil, having had an opportunity of ſeeing him, entertained ſo great an eſteem for him, that he choſe him for his Counſellor, and deſired the Elector of Brandenbourg to give Ancillon leave that he ſhould ſerve him for ſome time. Our author did not return to Berlin till the end of the year 1699, and was then appointed Inſpector of all the Courts of Juſtice which the French had in Pruſſia, and Counſellor of the Embaſſy. The Elector being crowned King of Pruſſia made him likewiſe his Hiſtoriographer and Superintendant of the French School, which had been founded at Berlin, according to the ſcheme which he had formed. He died in that city the fifth of July 1715, being fifty ſix years of age (b).

(b) Ib. p. 383.

ly works, which he promiſed; for he mentioned ſeveral others, which he had in view. And yet he owns that he was not born to be an Author; but ſince he was engaged in that employment, he reſolved not to bury his talent (13). The other work of our Author, which we ſhall mention, is his Memoirs concerning the Lives and Works of ſeveral modern Writers of eminence in the Republic of Letters. He informs us in his Advertiſement to the Reader, that Mr. Leers Bookſeller at Rotterdam having reſolved to print a Supplement to Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, wrote to Mr. Ancillon, that eight or ten men of learning, as well in England as in Holland, had undertaken to compile each of them a certain number of articles, and deſired him likewiſe to draw up ſome Lives for that purpoſe. He accepted of that propoſal, and pitched upon twenty famous Moderns, whoſe Lives he deſigned to write. But his health not permitting him to continue that work, he was obliged to abandon it. But being afterwards a little recovered, and imagining that the Supplement was either finiſhed or at leaſt very forward, and that he ſhould not have time to complete his part in order to be inſerted, he thought proper to digeſt it into his own form, and publiſhed it ſeparately. In this piece he has collected all that he could poſſibly find with regard to the learned men, whom he writes of; and has added ſeveral reflections of his own. He tells us in his Preface, that the Journals of Paris, Hambourg, and of Fontenelle, Bayle, Le Clerc, Beauval, Bernard, and Chauvin, are the ſources, to which he had the moſt frequent recourſe, and which furniſhed him with the greateſt part of the materials. The learned men, which he mentions in this volume, are Valentine Conrart, whoſe article contains 133 pages; Bartholomew d'Herbelot, Urban Chevreau, Henry Juſtel, Adrian Baillet, James Aubery, Benjamin Aubery Sieur du Maurier, Lewis Aubery, John Aubery, Claudius Aubery, John Baptiſt Cotelier, and Laurence Beger. He promiſed a continuation of this work, and informed the Publick, that this new deſign would not prevent him from proſecuting his former ſcheme of publiſhing in French the Elogia of famous Men extracted from Thuanus's Hiſtory, with ſuch additions as his reading would ſupply him with. However he ſhould draw them up in a different form from that of the Specimen, which he had publiſhed. For he was now of the ſame opinion with his friends, who had repreſented to him, that his former undertaking was too vaſt and extenſive, and that he could hardly expect to live long enough to execute it. Upon this account he propoſed only to give the Elogia as they ſtand in Thuanus, and to ſubjoin to them ſeparately ſuch additions, as the materials, which he had collected upon every article, would permit him to make, without attempting to write all that might be ſaid with regard to every learned man, but only to give what he knew, in the ſame manner as he had done in his Memoirs abovementioned (14). T.

(13) Bernard, ibid. p. 345.

(14) Idem, ibid. Mois d'Avril 1709, Artic. 4. p. 428, &c.

☞ANCINA (JOHN JUVENALIS) Biſhop of Saluſſes in Piedmont in the ſixteenth Century, was born at Foſſan near Saluſſes. His father was a man of great probity, and perceiving the quickneſs and vivacity of his ſon's genius, put him under the care of the beſt maſters, in order to be inſtructed in every branch of learning. The prodigious progreſs which he made in polite Literature, appears from the verſes which he wrote while he was a youth with the utmoſt elegance, and particularly a Poem in praiſe of the Academy in Piedmont (a). His virtue likewiſe in this critical and dangerous part of life was no leſs remarkable [A]. He applied himſelf afterwards to the teaching and practice of Phyſick, which he had principally in his view in his firſt ſtudies; and in this function he acted in ſuch a manner, that in a ſhort time his name became very celebrated, and he was appointed Phyſician to Frederic Madrutius, who was at firſt Ambaſſador of the Duke of Savoy, and afterwards of the Emperor Rodolphus, and attended him to Rome. In this city he gained an intimate friendſhip with the moſt eminent and learned men there, particularly Francis Toletus, Martin Navarre, M. Anthony Muretus, Robert Bellarmin, Sylvius Antonianus, Francis Panicarola, and others. Here he formed a reſolution of abandoning his profeſſion of a Phyſician, and applying himſelf to Divinity, in conſequence of that ſerious turn to piety which he originally had in his mind. He made a vaſt progreſs in this ſtudy in a ſhort time, ſo that he received holy orders, and was determined to put himſelf under all the rigours of a monaſtic life, if he had not been diverted from this deſign by St. Philip de Neri, the Founder of the Congregation of the Oratory at Rome, into which he entered himſelf. Here he behaved in ſo exemplary a manner, that there was a deſign afterwards of having him canoniz'd. He had ſeveral rich benefices offered him, which he rejected, but at (a) De Academiæ Subalpinæ laudibus. Jan. Nicius Erythræus, Pinacothec. 1. pag. 171. edit. Lipſiæ 1712.

[A] His virtue likewiſe in this critical and dangerous part of life was no leſs remarkable.] While he was young, beſides the excellence of his genius, he was diſtinguiſhed by a peculiar honeſty and probity of temper, which was never the leaſt altered by the freedom he enjoyed of acting in his own manner, or by the heat of youth; but he always proceeded in an uniform courſe of virtue, without any failure or blemiſh in it; ſo that it was generally believed, that he had preſerved his modeſty untainted, and acted in every inſtance of life to his laſt moments with the moſt perfect integrity and regularity. Erat etiam in puero præter docilitatem ingenii ſumma probitas, quam nec liberior vivendi poteſtas, nec ætatis fervor, nec lubricæ adoleſcentiæ viæ, de ſtatu dimovere potuerunt, ſed ſemper recta omnem vitæ ſuæ curſum, ſine caſu & prolapſione, confecit. Quare conſtans erat omnium opinio, nullam eum unquam pudicitiæ vel alienæ labem intuliſſe, ſed uſque ad extremum vitæ ſpiritum ſe integrum incorruptumque ſervaſſe (1).

(1) Nic. Erythr. ubi ſupra, pag. 171, 172.

at last was obliged by Pope Clement VIII to accept of a Bishoprick, the Functions of which he executed with the utmost zeal and application [B]. Erythræus wrote a particular account of his life and character, besides the elogium which he has given of him in his Pinacotheca.

[B] To accept of a Bishopric, the functions of which he executed with the utmost zeal and application.] He shewed, in this case, the disinterestedness of his mind, and his regard for the salvation of men rather than his own private advantage, for when he had several vacant Bishoprics proposed to him, that he might choose which he thought proper, he determined upon that of Saluzzes, which was much inferior to the rest in point of revenue, but required more application, and was attended with greater danger, as Erythræus informs us; who says that this was occasioned by the Calvinistical Religion, which had overrun that Diocese. In eo vero animi sui moderationem, atque animarum salutis, non utilitatis suæ studium, declaravit, quòd aliquot ipsi propositis ecclesiis, rectoribus suis orbatis ejus, quam vellet, eligendi optio data esset, eam amplexus est, quæ cæteris opibus inferior, sed laboribus periculisque superior, Salutiarum nimirum cathedram, in cujus diœcesin Calvinianæ hæresis contagio pervaserat (2). Erythræus observes, upon this occasion, that there can be no stronger characteristic of a true Shepherd, according to our Saviour's representation, than his avoiding no labours, fearing no dangers, and withdrawing himself from no pains of body or mind, on account of the flock committed to him. This is the only circumstance, which distinguishes the true Shepherd from the mercenary and pretended. But let us hear the reflection of this zealous Roman Catholic Writer in his own words. Nullum ex Christi Domini sententia ne excogitari quidem potest, neque certius, neque clarius egregii pastoris documentum, quam si ille nullos pro ovibus sibi traditis labores subterfugiat, nulla pericula reformidet, nullos corporis animique cruciatus doloresque deprecetur. Etenim hac una præsertim in re verus pastor a simulato, gratuitus à mercenario dignoscitur (3). Our Bishop was eminent for this resolution and fortitude; he acted up to the most perfect idea of a Pastor and a Bishop; he exposed himself to the greatest fatigues, and the most formidable dangers; and even to death itself at last in the discharge of his office. For having used his authority in restraining a Monk of a very vicious and profligate character from visiting the Convents of the Nuns, which gave great offence to every body; it is imagined that this man poisoned our Ancina. Nam cum improbum religiosæ cujusdam familiæ virum à sacrarum Deo virginum septis repelleret, qui circum loca illa, magnâ hominum cum offensione, obambulabat, ab illo creditur per summum nefas veneno fuisse sublatus (4).

(2) Idem, ibid. p. 172, 173.

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 171.

(4) Idem, ibid.

☞ANCOURT (FLORENT CARTON D'), an eminent Actor and Comic Writer in France was born at Fontainbleau in October 1661. His father was Florent Carton Esq; Sieur d'Ancourt; and his mother's name was Louisa de Londé, who was descended by the mother's side from the Budé, and related to the Chevalier de Londé, who settled in England, and was made a Knight of the Garter. D'Ancourt's parents had both been Protestants, but afterwards embraced the Roman Catholick religion. Our author studied at first in the Jesuits College at Paris under father de la Rue, who discovering a prodigious vivacity, penetration and capacity for learning in him, was extremely desirous of engaging him in their order; but d'Ancourt's aversion to a religious life rendered all his efforts ineffectual. After he had passed through a course of Philosophy, he applied himself to the Civil Law, and was admitted Advocate at seventeen years of age (a). But falling in love with an Actress, whose name was Therese le Noir, he was induced to go upon the stage; and though his birth and rank might have diverted him from such an employment, yet he engaged in it, and in 1680 married the Actress, who had first inspired him with that resolution. As he had all the qualifications necessary to succeed upon the Theatre, he soon distinguished himself to great advantage. He was not contented only with the applause of an Actor, but he wrote likewise a great number of pieces for the stage [A], many of which had such prodigious success, that most of the players grew rich from the profits of them. The ease with which he spoke, and the natural eloquence which animated all his discourses, was the

(a) Memoires pour servir à l'Hist. des Hommes Illust. tom. 16. p. 287, 288. edit. Paris 1731.

[A] A great number of pieces for the stage.] They are fifty two in all; most of which were printed separately at the time when they were first represented. They were afterwards collected into five volumes, then into seven, and at last into nine. We shall mention particularly what is contained in the last edition, which is the most compleat of all. It is intitled, Les Oeuvres de M. d'Ancourt, troisiéme edition, augmentée de plusieurs Comédies, qui n'avoient pas été imprimées; i. e. "The Works of Mr. d'Ancourt; "the third edition, enlarged with several Comedies, "which were never printed before." Roan 1729, in 12mo, nine volumes. The first volume contains six Comedies. 1. Les Fonds perdus; a Comedy in prose in three Acts, acted the first time the 8th of June 1686. 2. Le Chevalier à la mode; a Comedy in prose in five Acts, represented in October 1687. 3. La Maison de Campagne; a Comedy in prose in one Act, represented the 27th of January 1688. Sir John Vanbrugh has translated this into English, under the title of The Country-House. 4. La Folle enchere; a Comedy of one Act in prose, represented the 30th of May 1690. 5. L'Eté des Coquettes; a Comedy of one Act in prose, represented the 12th of May 1690. 6. La Parisienne; a Comedy of one Act in prose, represented the 13th of June 1691. The second volume likewise contains six pieces, all in prose. 7. La Femme d'intrigue; a Comedy of five Acts, represented the 30th of January 1692. 8. Les Bourgeoises a la mode; a Comedy of five Acts, represented the 15th of November 1692. 9. La Gazette; a Comedy of one Act, represented the 24th of April 1693. 10. L'Opera de Village; a Comedy of one Act, represented the 18th of August 1693. We have a piece in English, intitled, The Village Opera, written by Mr. Charles Johnson. 11. L'Impromptu de Garnison; a Comedy of one Act, represented in November 1693. 12. Les Vendanges; a Comedy of one Act, represented the 30th of September 1694. The third volume contains also six Comedies in prose, all of one Act each. 13. Le Tuteur; represented the 13th of July 1695. 14. La Foire de Besons, represented the 14th of August 1695. 15. Les Vendanges de Suresne; represented the 15th of October 1695. 16. La Foire S. Germain; represented the 19th of January 1696. 17. Le Moulin de Javelle; represented the 7th of July 1696. 18. Les Eaux de Bourbon; represented the 4th of October 1696. The fourth volume contains seven Comedies, all of one Act and in prose. 19. Les Vacances; represented the 31st of October 1696. 20. Renaud & Armide; represented the 12th of June 1697.

the reaſon that his fellow-actors always choſe him for their ſpeaker upon all particular occaſions, and the publick always heard him with applauſe. His merit procured him a very favourable reception at court; and Lewis XIV honoured him with many marks of peculiar favour [B]. The charms of his converſation, and the politeneſs of his behaviour, made his company deſirable to all the men of figure both at court and in the city; and the moſt conſiderable perſons were extremely pleaſed to have him at their houſes, and to viſit him at his own (b). Having taken a journey to Dunkirk to ſee his eldeſt daughter who lived there, he took the opportunity of paying his compliments to the Elector of Bavaria, who was then at Bruſſels. This Prince received him with the utmoſt civility, and having retained him a conſiderable time, diſmiſſed him with a preſent of a diamond valued at a thouſand piſtoles. He likewiſe rewarded him in a very generous manner, when upon his coming to Paris, d'Ancourt made a particular entertainment for his diverſion. At laſt our author began to grow weary of the Theatre, which he quitted entirely in Lent 1718, and retired to his eſtate of Courcelles-le-Roy in Berry, where he applied himſelf wholly to devotion. He compoſed a tranſlation of David's Pſalms in verſe, and a ſacred Tragedy, which were never printed. When he found himſelf near death, he ordered his tomb to be made in the chapel belonging to his ſeat, and went to ſee it with all the reſolution and firmneſs of a ſoul abſolutely diſengaged from the objects of this world, and aſpiring only after thoſe of the other life. He died the ſixth of December 1726, being ſixty five years of age. He left two daughters, the eldeſt of whom was married to a Commiſſary and Comptroller of the Marine; and the younger to a Gentleman, who was ſon to a Lieutenant General of the Artillery (c).

(b) Ibid. pag. 289, 290.

(c) Ibid. p. 291.

1697. 21. La Loterie; repreſented the 10th of July 1697. 22. Le Charivary; repreſented the 19th of September 1697. 23. Le Retour des Officiers; repreſented the 19th of October 1697. 24. Les Curieux de Compiegne; repreſented the 4th of October 1698. 25. Le Mary retrouvé; repreſented the 25th of October 1698. The fifth volume contains only four Comedies. 26. Les Fées; a Comedy of three Acts in proſe, repreſented the 29th of October 1699. 27. Les Enfans de Paris; a Comedy of five Acts in verſe, repreſented the 18th of December 1699. 28. La Fete de Village; a Comedy of three Acts, in proſe, repreſented the 13th of July 1700. 29. Les trois Couſines; a Comedy of three Acts in proſe, repreſented the 18th of October 1700. The ſixth volume contains ten pieces. 30. Colin-Maillard; a Comedy of one Act in proſe, repreſented the 28th of October 1701. 31. L'Operateur Barry; a Comedy of one Act in proſe, repreſented the 11th of October 1702. 32. Nouveau Prologue, & nouveaux Divertiſſemens pour la Comedie de l'Inconnu; in verſe, repreſented the 20th of Auguſt 1703. 33. Nouveau Prologue & nouveaux Divertiſſemens pour la Comedie des Amans magnifiques; in verſe, repreſented the 21ſt of June 1704. 34. Le Galant Jardinier; a Comedy of one Act in proſe, repreſented the 10th of November 1704. 35. Prologue & Divertiſſemens nouveaux pour Circé, Tragedie en Muſique; in verſe, repreſented the 6th of Auguſt 1705. 36. L'Impromptu de Livry; in verſe, repreſented the 12th of Auguſt 1705. 37. Le Diable Boiteux; a Comedy of one Act in proſe, repreſented the 5th of October 1707. 38. Second Chapitre du Diable Boiteaux; a Comedy of two Acts in proſe, repreſented the 20th of October 1707. 39. Divertiſſement de Sceaux; in verſe and proſe, repreſented the 13th of September 1705. The ſeventh volume contains four Comedies. 40. La Trahiſon punie; a Comedy of two Acts in verſe. 41. Madame Artus, a Comedy of five Acts in verſe. 42. Les Agioteurs; in three Acts in proſe. 43. La Comedie des Comediens, ou l'Amour Charlatan; in three Acts in proſe, repreſented the 5th of Auguſt 1710. The eighth volume contains likewiſe four Comedies. 44. Cephalus & Procris; in three Acts in verſe, repreſented the 27th of October 1711. 45. Sancho Pança, Gouverneur; in five Acts in verſe. 46. L'Impromptu du Sureſne; in one Act in proſe, repreſented the 21ſt of May 1713. 47. Les Fêtes du Cours; in one Act in proſe. The ninth and laſt volume contains five Comedies. 48. Le Verd-Galant; in one Act in proſe, repreſented the 18th of December 1699. 49. Le Prix de l'Arquebuſe; in one Act in proſe. 50. La Metempſycoſe; in one Act in verſe. 51. La Déroute du Pharaon; in one Act in proſe. 52. La Deſolation des Joüeuſes; in one Act in proſe. He left likewiſe, beſides the tranſlation of the Pſalms into French verſe, and a ſacred Tragedy, two large comic pieces in verſe, which had been received by the Players; but were withdrawn by him, before they were repreſented, upon his quitting the Stage; and likewiſe an Entertainment of three Acts in verſe, and ſeveral little pieces, which may ſome time or other be publiſhed (1).

(1) Ibid. p. 297.

[B] Honoured him with many marks of his favour.] When the King intended to go to the Play, d'Ancourt uſed to read his performances to him in the cloſet, where no perſon was admitted but Madam de Monteſpan. And it is ſaid, that one day finding himſelf diſordered by the great fire, which was there, the King took the trouble himſelf of opening a window in order to give him air. Another time d'Ancourt having the honour to ſpeak with him, as he went from Maſs, upon ſome affairs, which related to the Company of Comedians, and walking backward to the top of a pair of ſtairs, which he did not perceive, the King held him by the arm, and ſaid to him, Have a care, d'Ancourt, you are going to fall; and turning back then to the Lords, who ſtood round him, he ſaid to them, It muſt be owned, that this man ſpeaks extremely well; and granted all that he deſired (2).

(2) Ibid. p. 289.

T.

ANCRE (the Mareſchal d'). See CONCINI.

☞ANDERSON (EDMUND) Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and author of ſeveral valuable books in the Law [A], was born of a good family at Broughton in Lincolnſhire, and was the younger ſon of Thomas Anderſon Eſq; who was deſcended from the Anderſons of Scotland, and lived in Northumberland before he removed to Broughton. Our author ſtudied firſt at Lincoln

(1) V. 1. Col. 328.
(2) Idem, ibid.
(3) See Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part 3. p. 183. edit. London 1699.

[A] Author of ſeveral valuable books in the Law.] Mr. Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienſes tells us (1), that he wrote much, but that nothing is printed under his name, except the following books: Reports of many principal caſes argued and adjudged in the time of Queen Elizabeth in the Common Bench. London, 1644, fol. (2); French in two parts (3). Reſolutions and Judgments on the caſes and matters agitated in all the Courts of Weſtminſter in the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Theſe were collected by John Goldesburg Eſq; Prothonotary of the Common Pleas, and publiſhed at London 1653 in 4to (4).

(4) See Wood, ubi ſupra, and Col. 453. and Nicholſon, ubi ſupra, p. 185.
T.

coln College in Oxford; from whence he went to the Inner Temple, where by his indefatigable application he gained a prodigious knowledge of the Law. In the ninth year of Queen Elizabeth he was either Lent or Summer Reader in that Houſe; in the ſixteenth, Double Reader; and in the nineteenth Serjeant at Law. In 1582 he was appointed Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas upon the death of Sir James Dyer, and in the year following was knighted (a). In 1586 he ſat in judgment upon Mary Queen of Scots (b), and cenſured Secretary Davilon on account of the execution of that Queen, for having done Juſtum non juſtè *. He was ſtrongly attached to the intereſts of the Church of England, and very ſtrict in his proſecution of the Puritans, eſpecially the Browniſts (c). Mr. Pierce in his Vindication of the Diſſenters (d), ſpeaks with great ſeverity of his behaviour in the trial of Mr. Udal the Puritan in the year 1590. He died at London Auguſt 1ſt 1605 (e), and was interred September 5th at Eyworth or Eworth in Bedfordſhire, where he had an eſtate. He left iſſue ſeveral ſons (f). He was ſucceeded in his place of Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas by Sir Francis Gaudy of the Inner Temple (g).

(a) Wood's Athenæ Oxon. Vol. 1. Col. 328. edit. 2. 1721.
(b) Camden's Annals of Queen Eliz. ann. 1586. See Kennet's Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. p. 519.
(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

* See Fuller's Worthies in Lincolnſhire.
(d) Part 1. pag. 129, 130. edit. London 1717.
(e) Camden's Annals of King James.
(f) Wood, ubi ſupra.
(g) Camden and Wood, ubi ſupra.

ANDLO (PETRUSAB) a fictitious name, aſſumed by a Carteſian, when he wrote againſt the Diſſertation de Abuſu Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ ſurrepente & vitando in rebus theologicis & fidei. Mr. Des Marets, Profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, the author of that Diſſertation, publiſhed it in 1670, to repreſent to the Proteſtant churches the great inconveniences, which were to be apprehended, if the opinions of Mr. Des Cartes were permitted to paſs from the ſchools of Philoſophy to thoſe of Divinity. Some months after there appeared a book intitled, Petri ab Andlo, Batavi, Specimen Confutationis Diſſertationis de Abuſu Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ, &c. There never was any confutation written in a more violent ſtyle; Mr. Des Marets was treated in the ſevereſt manner in the world. He did not continue ſilent upon this; his Apology was ſoon publiſhed, intitled, Vindiciæ Diſſertationis de Abuſu Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ, in which there is no kind of reproaches which he has not caſt upon his antagoniſt. He treats him as an inſolent Socinian, Spinoſiſt, an impious, unchriſtian, and atheiſtical perſon. Petrus ab Andlo ſoon publiſhed a reply, intitled, Animadverſiones ad Vindicias Diſſertationis, quam Samuel Mareſius edidit de Abuſu Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ. If he was violent in his firſt diſſertation, he was much more ſo in the ſecond, intermixing however, as well as in the former, ſome ſtrokes of pleaſantry amidſt all his paſſion. He denied abſolutely that he knew Spinoza, or had ever ſeen him, or approved at all of his ſentiments (a). Mr. Des Marets received a ſecond piece from Petrus ab Andlo the 19th of December 1670, and anſwered it with ſuch expedition, that his rejoinder was finiſhed the third of January following (b). It is intitled, Samuelis Mareſii Clypeus Orthodoxiæ, ſive Vindiciarum ſuarum priorum pro ſua Diſſertatione de Abuſu Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ .... Vindiciæ poſteriores, &c. The author declared that he would write no more againſt ſuch an inconſiderable perſon [A]; but that he ſhould be always ready to enter the liſts for the ſake of truth with any learned and reputable writer, who would not be aſhamed to declare his name. He kept his word; for he gave no reply to the third piece of Petrus ab Andlo, intitled, Specimina Bombomachiæ Samuelis Mareſii ſe defendentis clypeo orthodoxiæ, ceu Vindiciis Vindiciarum Diſſertationis de Abuſu Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ. Thus ended the diſpute which verified the proverb, nullum violentum durabile; i. e. "nothing that is violent, "is long laſting," though it is otherwiſe very often falſe in conteſts of learning [B]. Mr. Des Marets never was able to diſcover the true name of his antagoniſt [C]. There appeared in 1673 a little book in 4to intitled, DANIELIS AB ANDLO, Petri Filii, Κατήγορος ἀδελφῶν ἐλεγχόμενος, ſive ad clariſſimi Theologi Samuelis Mareſii Tractatum brevem de ſtudio Theologico notæ breves.

(a) Spinozam non novit Petrus, nec vidit, nec audivit, nec abſ.vda ejus dogmata probat. Animadverſ. ad Vindicias, p. 7.

(b Vindic. Vindiciarum Diſſert. ſub finem.

We

[A] Mr. Des Marets declared, that he would write no more againſt ſuch an inconſiderable perſon.] The term that he uſed is the ſame with what the Scripture uſed againſt the Gods of the Gentiles, calling them Gods of Dung. Animo non ulterius hanc ſerram cum hoc STERCOREO HOMINE reciprocandi (1). In anteceſſum me proteſtari nihil amplius mihi futurum negotii cum hoc hominis ſterquilinio & infami nebulone, quem pudet ſui ipſius (2).

(1) Mareſ. Vindic. Vindiciarum Diſſert. ſub finem.

(2) Idem, in Judicio de Theologia Pacifica Wittichii, ſub fin.

[B] The proverb NULLUM VIOLENTUM DURABILE; i. e. "nothing violent is long laſting," is very often falſe in conteſts of learning] We ſhall not go far for an inſtance of this. The diſpute between Des Marets and Mr. Voetius was extremely violent, and laſted about thirty years, as long as the war in Germany, which was concluded at the peace at Munſter.

[C] Des Marets was never able to diſcover his true name.] He employed his own conjectures, and the enquiries of his friends to no purpoſe; ſo that he was obliged to deſiſt from his vain ſearch, and leave his antagoniſt under the mask. Quis ſit ille larvatus Petrus ab Andlo, Batavus .... ut nec hactenus conjecturâ aſſequi, nec amicorum diligentiâ reſcire potui, ita nolo amplius inquirere. Thus he ſpeaks in the beginning of his Clypeus Orthodoxiæ. His friends, who were diſperſed in ſeveral parts, and were over officious to ſerve him with more zeal than diſcretion, as it generally happens to thoſe who ſet up for the ſcourgers of innovators, made him believe that there was a Miniſter in Zealand, named Petrus ab Andlo, married to a daughter of Cocceius. He publiſhed this in order to make ſuch uſe of it as occaſion might require, but finding that Cocceius's ſon-in law was named Anſelaer, he begged his pardon for it: Apud R. D. Anſelaer curavi me honeſte, quod id mihi excidiſſet ex relatione honeſti cujuſdam R. viri, etiam in Carteſianiſmum .... pronioris, cui non erat cur ultro aſſerenti fidem detrectarem (3). i. e. "I deſired the "Reverend Mr. Anſelaer's pardon for publiſhing "this, though I had it from a very honeſt and Re- "verend Gentleman, who has likewiſe ſome biaſs "to the Carteſian hypotheſis, and whom I had no "reaſon to queſtion, as he aſſerted it of his own ac- "cord." He tells us ſomewhere, that there was a rumour diſperſed about that three perſons were engaged in the defence of Wittichius, and that they had publiſhed their performance under the fictitious name of Petrus ab Andlo (4). We ſhall ſee whether Mr. Placcius or Mr. Baillet will ſucceed better in unmasking this writer, whom I imagine to be Regnier de Manſvelt, Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Utrecht.

(3) Vindic. Vindiciar. p. 6.

(4) In Judicio de Theologiâ Pacificâ Wittichii.

We may obſerve, that there is a true ANDLO an author (c). He was of Alſace, a Doctor of Canon Law, and Canon of Colmar (d). The two books which he wrote de Imperio Romano, Regis & Auguſti Inauguratione, &c. deque Officio & poteſtate Electorum, &c. were publiſhed at Straſburg with notes in the year 1603, by Marquard Freher.

(c) Petrus de Andlo.
(d) Mich. Hortzius, Biblioth. German. num. 224.

ANDRADA (DIEGO DE PAYVA D') in Latin Andradius, a learned Portugueſe, born at Conimbria, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the Council of Trent, to which King Sebaſtian ſent him as one of his Divines (a). He preached before the Aſſembly the ſecond Sunday after Eaſter in 1562. He was not contented with the ſervice which he did them in explaining thoſe points, upon which he was conſulted, but he voluntarily employed his pen in defence of the Canons of the Council. This he did in a book intitled, Orthodoxarum Explicationum Lib. X(b). He anſwers in this piece a book which Chemnitius publiſhed againſt the doctrine of the Jeſuits [A], before the cloſe of the Council of Trent; and as Chemnitius took this opportunity of writing a very large work intitled, Examen Concilii Tridentini, Andradius thought himſelf obliged to defend his firſt piece againſt his learned antagoniſt [B]. He compoſed therefore a book, which was publiſhed after his death by his two brothers at Liſbon in 1578, intitled, Defenſio Tridentinæ fidei Catholicæ quinque libris comprehenſa, adverſus hæreticorum calumnias, & præſertim Martini Kemnitii. Theſe writings of Andradius were reprinted ſeveral times (c), and yet are now ſo ſcarce at Paris, that Mr. Peliſſon could not find them in all the Rue St. Jaques [C]. There is hardly any Catholick author who has been more quoted by the Proteſtants than he; and this is becauſe he maintained ſome opinions a little extravagant concerning the ſalvation of the Heathens. He was an eminent preacher; his ſermons were publiſhed in three parts, the ſecond of which was tranſlated out of Portugueſe into the Caſtillian language by Benedict de Alarcon (d). The Bibliotheca of Spaniſh writers does not mention all his works [D]. Great elogiums

(a) Palavic. Hiſt. Concil. Tridentin. l. 19. c. 16. num. 7.

(b) Printed at Cologne in 1564. The firſt of theſe ten books, which is an apology for the Jeſuits, was printed in French at Lyons in 1565. Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franc. p. 266.

(c) Ex Nicolai Antonii Bibl. Hiſpan. tom. 1. p. 236.

(d) Idem, ibid.

[A] He anſwered a book of Chemnitius againſt the doctrine of the Jeſuits.] A Lutheran Miniſter, who made the Elogium upon Chemnitius, expreſſes himſelf in this manner: Breve quidem, ſed nervoſum Scriptum, durante adhuc Concilio Tridentino, Jeſuitarum Theologiæ oppoſuit, cujus Opuſculi cum Andradius Luſitanus in ſe ſuſcepiſſet refutationem, Chemnitio occaſionem ſubminiſtravit inſigne illud .... Opus, quod TRIDENTINI CONCILII EXAMEN nuncupavit (1). I ſhall add to this a paſſage from Eiſengreinius, becauſe it ſeems to furniſh a little point of criticiſm. That author pretends that Andradius did wonderful things againſt the Hereticks in his orthodox explications, and eſpecially againſt Chemnitius; Præſertim contra Martini Kemnitii petulantem audaciam, qui Colonienſem Cenſuram, quam a viris Societatis Jeſu compoſitam eſſe ait, una cum ejuſdem ſanctiſſimæ Societatis vitæ ratione temere calumniandam ſuſcepit (2). Nicholas Antonio having quoted this paſſage, cenſures Eiſengreinius for imagining that Andradius was a Jeſuit: Hæc ille, ſays he, falſus ſaltem in eo quod Andradam noſtrum unum ex Jeſuitico Sodalitio credidit. If this cenſure has no other foundation than the words which Don Antonio has quoted, I am of opinion it is falſe.

(1) Spizelius in Templo Honoris, p. 4.

(2) In Catalogi Teſt. Veritatis, apud Nicol. Anton. Bib. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 235.

[B] Andrada ..... maintained his firſt piece againſt his learned Antagoniſt.] This Elogium is due to Chemnitius; and in reality I ſay no more of him than Don Nicholas Antonio has done. It ſeems at firſt view, that theſe words of his, Cui cum repoſuiſſet profligatiſſimus hæreticus librum, in quo graviſſimas adverſus univerſalem Eccleſiam contumelias intorquebat, deſcendere denuò in campum ſibi opus eſſe Paiva vidit, ut immanem hoſtem totis viribus profligaret. That is, "When this moſt profligate heretic had publiſhed an Anſwer to this, in which he caſt the moſt "ſevere reflections upon the univerſal Church, "Payva thought it neceſſary for him to enter the "field again, that he might attack this dreadful "enemy with his whole ſtrength;" theſe words, I ſay, ſeem at firſt very ſevere upon him; but when they are well weighed, they will appear the greateſt compliment to Chemnitius, and ſufficient to raiſe his vanity; for is it not an exquiſite gratification to a man, to be conſidered as the Goliah and Polyphemus of his party by thoſe of the contrary ſide, when he thinks himſelf defending a good cauſe?

[C] Mr. Peliſſon could not find his works in all the Rue St. Jaques.] An account of this will not be diſpleaſing to the curious. Mr. Leibnitz in his Remarks againſt the reflections upon the differences of Religion (3), alledges amongſt other things, that Andradius wrote a book intitled, Explicationes orthodoxæ de controverſis religionis capitibus, in which he aſſerted in plain terms, that the Philoſophers, who uſed their utmoſt endeavours to know the true God and to worſhip him in the beſt manner, had ſuch a faith, as the juſt ſhall live by..... That it would be the greateſt cruelty in the world (neque immanitas deterior ulla eſſe poteſt) to condemn men to eternal puniſhment for the want of a faith, which they never had the means of obtaining (4). Mr. Peliſſon replies to this, that he had never ſeen that Author, but that he would enquire for him for curioſity ſake, when he ſhould go to Paris (5). Some time after, he gave the world to underſtand, that he had ſearched with the utmoſt care for the book of this Portugueze Doctor Payva Andrada; "but, continued he (6), it is no ſmall difficulty "to find it at Paris. The Rue St. Jaques knows no"thing of it; the moſt conſiderable Libraries have "it not; not even that of the Jeſuits, which is very "remarkable, becauſe it was written in their favour. "At laſt I diſcovered it in the Library of Sorbonne. "The Abbot Pirot, a Gentleman of as great merit, "as any one in France and other Countries, and one "of the moſt able and illuſtrious Members of that "houſe, who knew no more of this Author than "myſelf, gave himſelf the trouble of reading it at "my deſire..... This Writer has a great deal of me"rit, and is not a dry inſipid School-man as too "many are; we find every where in him a ſpirit, "elegance, and vivacity, much above the common "rate; in ſhort he anſwers the character, which he "had at the Council of Trent." It is ſurprizing, that a book ſo little known to the moſt conſiderable Bookſellers and the moſt copious Libraries, ſhould be quoted by an hundred Authors, who have ſcarce any books: This, I ſay, is ſurprizing to thoſe, who do not know that the Examen Concilii Tridentini of Chemnitius is a very common book, and that from thence they have an opportunity of quoting Doctor Andradius without ever ſeeing him themſelves. A great many other Authors have ſpoken as ſtrongly as he upon this point, as Monſieur La Mothe le Vayer ſhews in one of his books (7). How comes it then, that they have not been quoted ſo often as Andradius, when the point has been to excuſe Zuinglius by way of recrimination, or to reproach the Papiſts with inclining towards the hereſies of Pelagius? How comes this, I ſay, if I have been miſtaken in accounting for the frequent quotations from Andradius?

(3) This is the title of a book of Mr. Peliſſon.

(4) See the book of Mr. Peliſſon, intitled, De la Tolerance des Religions, p. 19. It was printed at Paris in 1692.

(5) Ibid. p. 71.

(6) Ibid. p. 83.

(7) At the end of his Traite de la Vertu des Payens.

[D] The Bibliotheca of Spaniſh Writers does not mention all his works.] We do not find there the book, which he wrote upon the authority of the Pope, during the ſitting of the Council, in the year 1562 (8). The Legates of the Pope, who were very well

(8) Palavic. lib. 19. cap. 16. num. 7.

ums have been given to Andradius [E]; you will find them in the remarks.

well pleaſed with this piece, ſent it to Cardinal Borromeo. The Court of Rome approved it extremely. The Pope thank'd the Author very obligingly. I believe this work is the ſame with that De Conciliorum Autoritate, which Palavicini has quoted in his firſt book (9).

(9) Id. lib. 24. c. 10. num. 17.

[E] Great Elogiums have been given to Andradius.] We have ſeen the judgment of Mr. Peliſſon concerning him. Oſorius, in his Preface to the Orthodox Explications of Andradius, gives him the character of a man of genius, great application and knowledge in the languages, and all the zeal and eloquence neceſſary to a good Preacher. Roſweidus ſpeaks of him as follows: Ad Concilium Tridentinum & profundiſſimi Theologi mentem, & linguam Oratoris attulit (10); that is, "He brought to the Council of "Trent the genius of a moſt profound Divine, and "the eloquence of an Orator."

(10) In Lege Talionis Caſaubono retaliata, apud Nicol. Antonium, tom. 1. p. 236.

ANDREAS (JOHN) a famous Canoniſt of the fourteenth Century, was the ſon of a Prieſt [A], and born at Mugello near Florence. He was very young when he went to Bologna on account of his ſtudies (a). He would have been under ſome difficulties to maintain himſelf, if he had not happened upon the place of a Preceptor; but by means of the ſupport which that employment procured him, he was enabled to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of Canon Law, in which he made a very great progreſs under the Profeſſor Guy de Baïf (b). He had always a peculiar reſpect for the perſon and the gloſſes of that Profeſſor; for he had an equal regard to theſe gloſſes as to the text itſelf. Beſides he had another obligation to him, which is generally more ſenſible than that of inſtruction. Guy de Baïf perceiving, that for want of money he could not venture to demand his Doctor's degree, he put him upon deſiring it, and procured it for him gratis; Andreas himſelf acknowledges this particular (c). The ſame Guy encouraged him to aſk for a Profeſſorſhip, in which he had all the ſucceſs that he could promiſe himſelf. We find that Andreas was a Profeſſor at Padua about the year 1330, and likewiſe at Piſa; but he was recalled to Bologna (d), where he acquired the greateſt reputation. We are told wonderful things of the auſterity of his life [B]. He macerated his body with prayer and faſting, and lay upon the bare ground every night for twenty years together, covered only with a bear ſkin (e). He affirmed, that he had obtained ſeveral things by his prayers (f). He married a woman named Milantia, whom he mentions ſometimes in his writings. He acknowledges, that he learned a great many things of her, and amongſt the reſt, that if names were to be ſold, parents ought to buy good ones for their children (g). I forgot to obſerve that his mother was named Novella, and that he had a daughter of the ſame name, who was ſo well accompliſhed in learning, that he uſed to ſend her to read Lectures in his place [C], when he had not time

(a) Bononiam admodum adoleſcens venit, ubi ob paupertatem pædagogum geſſit, Scarpettam filium Mainardi Ubaldini audiendo. Volater. lib. 21.

(b) He is better known by the name of Archidiaconus, i. e. the Archdeacon, which Eccleſiaſtical office he bore at Bologna. Doujatius, Præno. Canon. pag. 602.

(c) In 1 Sexti Decretal. apud Doujat. Prænot. Canon. p. 603.

(d) Panzirol. de Claris Legum interpret. lib. 3. c. 19.

(e) Volaterr. lib. 21. p. 781.

(f) Apud Panz. de Claris Leg. Interpret. lib. 3. c. 19.

(g) In cap. cum ſecundum, Extravag. de Præbend.

[A] He was the ſon of a Prieſt.] All Authors agree that Andreas's Father was a Prieſt, but not that he was ſo when he begot him. Patrem conſtat presbyterum fuiſſe; an filium ante, an poſt ſacerdotium, genuerit incertum. Thus ſpeaks Mr. Doujat (1) after having read Panzirolus, who aſſerts poſitively, that John Andreas was born before his Father became a Prieſt. Is ex Andrea presbytero, antequam ſacerdos fieret, et matre nomine Novellâ genitus (2). This ſhews, that Mr. Doujat did not much regard, at leaſt in ſuch a point as this, the determination of Panzirolus; and what reaſon is there to believe this latter Author, rather than Volaterranus, who aſſures us of the contrary? Joannes Andreas patre Andrea presbytero & matre concubinâ natus apud Mugellum Agri Florentini oppidum, juris ſcientiâ virtutibuſque aliis natalium pudorem contexit (3). He tells us poſitively, that John Andreas was born of a Prieſt in concubinage; and no perſon has ever pretended to ſay, that Novella was married at all to his father. It is indiſputable therefore, that our celebrated Canoniſt was born, as Eraſmus was, out of lawful matrimony, and that his father was a Prieſt. We are not then to imagine, that Forſterus aſſerts, that he did not become a Prieſt, till after the birth of his ſon. He means only, that the father of John Andreas was a Prieſt at the place where he was born: Patre Joanne Andreæ, cive initio, deinde presbytero Mugellano, natus eſt (4).

(1) Prænot. Canon. p. 604.

(2) Panzirol. de Clar. Leg. Interpret. l. 3. c. 19. init.

(3) Volaterran. lib. 21. p. 781.

(4) Forſter. Hiſt. Juris Civil. lib. 3. c. 26.

[B] We are told wonderful things of the auſterity of his Life.] Here is a Comment, which has been communicated to me (5); I have altered nothing in it. "What you obſerve of the auſterity of John "Andreas's manner of life is atteſted by very good "Authors. However if the ſtory, which Poggius "tells of him in his Jeſts, be true, there is reaſon "to ſuppoſe that he afterwards relaxed very much "of his former continency. Joannem Andream, "ſays he, Doctorem Bononienſem, cujus fama admodum vulgata eſt, ſubagitantem ancillam domeſticam uxor deprehendit. Re inſuetâ ſtupefacta mulier in virum verſa; Ubi nunc, ait, Joannes, eſt ſapientia veſtra? Ille, nil amplius locutus; In vulvâ iſtius, reſpondit, loco admodum ſapientiæ accommodato. The French tranſlation of this perhaps will not be diſpleaſing.

(5) By Mr. de la Monnoie.

"Jean, dit André, fameux Docteur és Loix,
"Fut pris un jour au péché d'amourette:
"Il accolloit une jeune ſoubrette.
"Sa femme vint, fit un ſigne de croix.
"Ho ho, dit-elle, eſt-ce vous? non je penſe:
"Vous, dont par tout en vante la prudence.
"Qu'eſt devenu cet eſprit ſi ſubtil?
"Le bon André, pourſuivant ſon négoce,
"Honteux pourtant, Ma foi, répondit-il,
"Prudence, eſprit, tout giſt dans cette foſſe."

Since it is agreed, that John Andreas had a baſtard, this ſtory is at the bottom very probable; and it was perhaps with the mother of Banicontius, that his wife found him. If it be ſo, he might be placed in the liſt of the Menagiana (6).

(6) See the remark [E] of the article BRISEIS.

[C] He ſent his daughter to read Lectures in his place.] I do not find this fact in Forſterus, nor Panzirolus, nor Mr. Doujat; but only in the Cité des Dames of Chriſtine de Piſe. This book was printed at Paris in 1536, and written in the reign of Charles VI. The paſſage is as follows: In like manner, to ſpeak of more modern times, without ſearching into ancient Hiſtories, John Andry, a famous Lawyer at Bologna, not quite ſixty years ago, was of opinion, that is was not amiſs to make women Scholars. For he inſtructed his beautiful daughter Novella, whom he loved extremely, ſo well in all parts of Learning, and particularly in the Laws, that when he was employed in any affair, which hindered him from reading Lectures to his Scholars, he ſent his daughter Novella in his room; and leſt her beauty ſhould prevent the attention of the hearers, ſhe had a little curtain drawn before her. And thus ſhe ſometimes aſſiſted her father in his Profeſſorſhip, who had ſuch an affection for her, that to perpetuate the memory of her name, he call'd a famous book, which he wrote, upon the Law, by her name (7). It is ſtrange,

(7) Cité des Dames de Chriſtine de Piſe, Part. 2. chap. 36.

time himſelf. It was for love of his mother, and this daughter, that he intitled his Commentary upon the Decretals of Gregory IX, the Novellæ (h). He had a natural ſon, named Banicontius, who publiſhed ſeveral books [D]; and it is ſaid, that having loſt him, he adopted John Calderinus, a learned Canoniſt, and married his daughter Novella to him [E]. He had another daughter, whom he married to John de St. George, a famous Profeſſor of Canon Law at Bologna. She was named Betina and died in 1355 (i) at Padua, where her huſband was ſent for to take upon him a Profeſſorſhip. John Andreas died of the plague at Bologna in 1348, after he had been a Profeſſor five and forty years, and was buried in the church of the Dominicans. He wrote ſeveral books [F]. He has pompous elogiums given him; but he is accuſed of being a great plagiary [H]. We are told by ſome authors that the extraordinary ſhortneſs of his ſtature ſet (h) Panzirol. de Claris Leg. Interpret. lib. 3. cap. 19.

(i) Panzirolus mentions her Epitaph in his 3d book, c. 19. de Clar. Leg. Interpret.

ſtrange, that a thing of ſo extraordinary a nature as this ſhould not be found in any other authors, who treat of John Andreas, or at leaſt in the greateſt part of them; and I own this makes me a little doubtful, whether to credit it or not. But however that be, it may give the hint to a very diverting queſtion; and that is, whether this young Lady contributed to, or leſſened the profit of her hearers, by hiding her beautiful face. There are an hundred things, that might be ſaid on both ſides. I own the Scholars might have been too much amuſed in obſerving her beauty, and ſo have loſt their attention to her Lectures; but in other reſpects, we are generally more affected and perſuaded by what comes from a fine mouth; and we obſerve a great many women, who fix their eyes moſt intently upon an handſome Preacher, and yet equally retain what he ſays. What an old Poet remarks concerning virtue, that it pleaſes moſt in a beautiful body (8), may be applied to learning likewiſe. However, if the daughter of the Profeſſor John Andreas placed a curtain between herſelf and the auditory, that the charms of her beauty might not ſtrike them too forcibly, and interrupt their attention, ſhe made a great ſacrifice to them, which they would willingly have diſpenſed with. 'Tis probable they would have been well pleaſed to have ſeen her, and ſhe on her part would not have been unwilling to be ſeen, if ſhe had not preferred their profit to her own ſatisfaction. This is very reaſonable to ſuppoſe, and what nature dictates; for ſhe was not one of thoſe learned women, who have reaſon to ſay, as Sappho did,

(8) Gratior & pulchro veniens de corpore virtus. Virgil Æneid. lib. 5. ver. 344.

Si mihi difficilis formam natura negavit,
Ingenio formæ damna rependo meo (9).

(9) Ovid. Epiſt. Sapph. ver. 31.

" To me what nature has in charms deny'd
" Is well by wit's more laſting charms ſupply'd.
Pope.

See below the remark [D].

[D] His natural ſon Banicontius publiſhed ſeveral books.] This was the name of his grandfather. The books which he publiſhed, were De Privilegiis & Immunitate Clericorum; De Accuſationibus & Inquiſitionibus; De Appellationibus. I have taken this from Panzirolus.

[E] He adopted Calderinus, and married his daughter Novella to him.] The ancient manner of adoptions would not have allowed ſuch a marriage as this (10); and perhaps we are to underſtand nothing by this adoption of Calderinus, but that John Andreas made him his ſon-in-law. It is ſaid that Calderinus very often conſulted his wife. Is conjugem velut eruditis parentibus (Milantia the wife of John Andreas was a learned woman) ortam, prudentem nactus, ſæpe ob ſapientiam conſulere conſueverat (11). But if we are to judge of the other matters, which he conſulted his domeſtic Oracle upon, from that, which Calderinus mentions himſelf, we ſhall ſee nothing in it, that anſwers to the character, which Chriſtine de Piſe gives of Novella. There is ſcarce any woman, but what might paſs for as ingenious a perſon as ſhe. The fact ſtands thus. Calderinus asked his wife one day, whether, if a man invited company to a feaſt with him, he ought to ſend to let his gueſts know, when it was ready? She replied, that it was neceſſary to do ſo to Ladies and Foreigners, but not to others, unleſs they were Perſons of Quality and Figure. See the raillery of Francis Hotman upon this ſubject. Verum enim vero medius fidius, ſays he (12), nequaquam inficiandum aut dubitandum eſt, quin mulieres conſilium dare poſſint, quandoquidem (ô dignam hiſtoriam & digito ligandam,) refert Joh. Calderinus Canoniſt. famoſiſſimus, quod ſemel conſuluit ſuam uxorem, an convivator teneatur horâ prandii mittere ad convivas ut veniant, quæ ſapienter & tanquam altera Sybilla reſpondit, ad fœminas & extraneas eſſe mittendum, qui ſe faciſe non ingerunt, ſed non ad alios, niſi eſſent graves perſonæ. Joh. Calderin. in c. ult. de renunt. & poſt eum Ægid. Bell. in c. quidam col. 3. verſ. tertio quæro. eo. ti. & Panormit. in c. cum inter univerſal. in fin. de elect. & de hoc etiam ſer collect. in cap. à crapula. Ext. de vit. & hon. cleric. & Bal. in proœm. Gregor. col. 5. verſ. quære, quidam Scholaris. That is, " It is not to be denied or doubted, " that women are capable of giving counſel, ſince " we have a very curious and remarkable Hiſtory con- " cerning the famous Canoniſt John Calderinus, who " conſulting his wife, whether a perſon who makes " a feaſt, ought to ſend to his gueſts to acquaint them " when dinner is ready, ſhe like another Sibyll an- " ſwered with great prudence, that we ought to do ſo " to Ladies and Foreigners, becauſe they are ſuppoſed " not to be very forward to come, but not to others, " unleſs they are Perſons of Figure. Joh. Calderin. " in c. ult. de renunt. &c.". What moſt inclines me to think, that Calderinus married the daughter of John Andreas, is that I obſerve one John Calderinus, who repaired the monument of Andreas in 1501, calls him his fourth grandfather, —— atavum, and ſays, that one John Calderinus was his third grandfather, —— abavus (13). I queſtion whether the adoption of theſe latter ages has founded ſuch degrees of kindred to the fifth generation; and I do not really believe, that if Madam de Gournai had left iſſue behind her, that her deſcendants would ſtyle themſelves in a public inſcription ſimply and abſolutely the grand-children or great grand-children of Michael de Montagne.

(10) Octaviam Claudius antequam Neroni traderet, ne ſororem is ſuam ducere videretur, Claudii & ipſe filius adoptivus, in aliam familiam adoptandam dedit. Torrentius in Sueton. Claudii, c. 35. ex Xiphil. & Zonarâ.

(11) Panzirol. lib. 3. c. 21.

(12) Hotman. adverſus Italo-Galliam Matharelli, p. 214.

(13) See Panz. de Clar. Leg. Interpret. lib. 3. c. 19.

[F] He wrote ſeveral books.] His firſt work was a Gloſs upon the ſixth book of the Decretals. He was very young, when he wrote this, and he reviſed and enlarged it afterwards. He wrote likewiſe Gloſſes upon the Clementines, and after that a Commentary upon the Decretals, which he intitled Novellæ for the reaſon abovementioned. He wrote a Commentary in Regulas Sexti, which he intitled Mercuriales, becauſe he either was engaged in it on Wedneſdays (Diebus Mercurii), or inſerted his Wedneſday-diſputes in it. He enlarged the Speculum of Durant in the year 1347. I ſhall not ſpeak particularly of his other writings. It is a great misfortune, that he followed the method of the Pyrrhonians ſo much; for he proves his own opinion very ſolidly, when he has a mind to it; but this he ſeldom does; he chooſes rather to relate the ſentiments of others, and leaves his reader in the midſt of the diſpute (14).

(14) Idem, ibid.

[G] He has pompous Elogiums given him.] He is called, Archidoctor Decretorum, i. e. " the Arch- " Doctor of the Decretals," in the Epitaph upon his daughter Betina. In his own Epitaph he has the title of Rabbi Doctorum, Lux, Cenſor, Normaque Morum. i. e. " the Rabbi of the Doctors, the Light, Cenſor, " and Rule of Manners." It is ſaid that Pope Boniface VIII gave him the compliment of Lumen Mundi, i. e. " the Light of the world (15)".

(15) Idem, ibid.

[H] He is accuſed of being a great Plagiary.] The greateſt part of his additions to the Speculum of Durant were taken word for word from a book of Oldradus (16); ſo that Baldus having detected and expoſed their piece of Plagiariſm, could not forbear ſtyling him, an eminent plunderer of other men's labours, inſignis alienorum laborum fur (17). This was ſo much the more inexcuſable in him, becauſe in (16) Intitled Conſilia.

(17) Panzirol. de Clar. Legum Interpret. lib. 3. c. 19.

set the Cardinals a laughing [I] in an audience, which Boniface VIII gave him in a full consistory. It is said he foretold his death a year before it happened (k).

(k) Panz. ibid.

in those same Additions he discovers and points out a great number of instances of Durant's Plagiarism (18). He is accused likewise of having stolen the treatise De Sponsalibus ac Matrimoniis, which was composed by John Anguissola of Cesena (19).

(18) See Thomas. de Plagio Literario num. 359. 414.

(19) Panz. de Clar. Leg. Interp. l. 3. c. 19. Doujatius prænotion. Canonic. p. 604.

[I] The extraordinary shortness of his stature set the Cardinals a laughing.] It is said, that some of the Decretals being suspected of forgery, the Academy of Bologna sent James de Castello, who was a very short and ill-favoured man, to Pope Boniface VIII. He entered the Consistory with a great number of attendants. The Pope shewed him a great deal of respect, and supposing him to be kneeling, bid him rise three times together (20). The Deputy could not tell what to say he was so confounded. Upon this one of the Cardinals said, that he was a second Zaccheus, which threw every body into a laughter. Several are of opinion, that this happened, not to Castello, but to John Andreas, who was a man of a very short and mean figure (21).

(20) See the remark [I] of the article ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

(21) Panz. de Clar. Leg. Interp. l. 3. c. 19.

ANDREAS (JOHN), author of a book intitled, The Confusion of the Sect of Mahumed, was born a Mahometan at Xativa in the Kingdom of Valencia, and succeeded his father in the dignity of Alfaqui of that city. He was enlightened with the knowledge of Jesus Christ by being present at a sermon in the great church of Valencia on the day of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin in the year 1487 (a). Upon this he desired to be baptiz'd, and in memory of the calling of St. John and St. Andrew he received the name of John Andreas. "Having received holy orders, says he (b), and "from an Alfaqui, and a slave of Lucifer, become a Priest and Minister of Christ, "I began, like St. Paul, to preach and publish the contrary of what I had erroneously "believed and asserted; and with the assistance of Almighty God, I converted at first a "great many souls of the Moors, who were in danger of hell, and under the dominion "of Lucifer, and conducted them into the way of salvation. After this I was sent for by "the most Catholick Princes King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, in order to preach "in Grenada to the Moors of that Kingdom, which their Majesties had conquered. "By God's blessing on my preaching, an infinite number of Moors were brought to "abjure Mahumed, and to turn to Christ. A little after this I was made a Canon by "their Grace, and sent for again by the most Christian Queen Isabella to Arragon, that "I might be employed in the conversion of the Moors of those Kingdoms, who still "persisted in their errors to the great contempt and dishonour of our crucified Saviour, "and the prodigious loss and danger of all Christian Princes. But this excellent and "pious design of her Majesty was rendered ineffectual by her death." He adds, that he might not continue idle, he undertook to translate from the Arabick into the language of Arragon the whole law of the Moors, that is, the Alcoran and its Glosses, and the seven books of the Suné. He resolved upon this work at the command of Martin Garcia, Bishop of Barcelona, and Inquisitor of Arragon (c). And having finished this design, he composed that work, which I mentioned at the beginning [A], and which is esteemed a pretty good one [B].

(a) The Preacher was named Marques Adesora.

(b) In his Preface to his Confusion de la Secta de Mahumed, fol. 3 verso.

(c) Taken from the same Preface.

[A] The work, which I mentioned at the beginning.] I mean the book, which is intitled The Confusion of the Sect of Mahumed.] It contains twelve chapters. The Author has collected there the fabulous stories, impostures, forgeries, brutalities, follies, obscenities, absurdities, impossibilities, lies, and contradictions, which the perverse and impious Mahumed, in order to deceive the simple people, has dispersed in the writings of that Sect, and especially in the Alcoran; which, as he says, was revealed to him in one night by an Angel in the city of Meke, tho' in another place he contradicts himself, and affirms that he was twenty years in composing it. He entitles this book the Confusion of the Sect of Mahumed (1). He tells us (2), that he wrote this work, that not only the learned amongst Christians, but even the common people, might know the different belief and doctrine of the Moors, and on the one hand might laugh at and ridicule such insolent and brutal notions, and on the other might lament their blindness and dangerous condition.

This book, which was published at first in Spanish, has been translated into several languages. I make use of the French translation, which Guy le Fevre de la Boderie made of it from the Italian, printed at Paris by Martin le Jeune, in 1574, in 8vo.

[B] This book is esteemed a pretty good one.] All those, who write against the Mahometans, quote it very much. See among others Hoornbeeck in his Dispute de Muhammedismo (3), Hottinger in his Historia Orientalis, and Samuel Schultetus in his Ecclesia Mahummedana breviter delineata.

(1) John Andreas in his Preface, fol. 4.

(2) Ibid.

(3) This is one part of his Summa Controversiarum.

ANDREAS (TOBIAS) Professor of History and Greek at Groningen, was born at Braunfels in the county of Solms the tenth of August 1604. His father was Minister to Count de Solms-Braunfels, and Inspector of the churches which belong to that county. His mother was daughter to John Piscator, a famous Professor of Divinity at Herborn in the county of Nassau. He performed his humanity-studies at Herborn, and then studied Philosophy at the same place under Alstedius and his uncle Piscator (a); after which he went to Bremen, where he lived seven years [A]. He was one of the

(a) Son to the Professor of Divinity.

[A] He lived seven years at Bremen.] The reader would be in the wrong to believe this, if the Author of the Lives of the Professors of Groningen was not more exact in his calculation, than he was with regard to the time that Tobias Andreas was at Herborn. It is strange, that a Corrector of the press should leave such blunders in the space of five or six lines, when the Author thro' the hurry of his thoughts was prevented from observing them. We find in the Life of our Andreas, that he went to Herborn in CIↃIↃCXVII; that he studied five years in the Schools and one year in Philosophy; that he continued the same studies at Bremen for seven years; and that after this, having made a tour into his own country, he went to Groningen in the year CIↃIↃCXXVIII. There was nothing written in numbers; the faults were apparently in the copy. Paul Freher has transcribed this very exactly (1), without perceiving the mistake in the calculation.

(1) In his Theatrum Virorum Illustrium, pag. 1538.

the moſt conſtant Auditors of Gerard de Neuville, a Phyſician and Philoſopher; and as he had a deſire to attain a publick Profeſſorſhip, he prepared himſelf for it by ſeveral Lectures, which he read in Philoſophy. He returned to his own country in 1628, where he did not continue long, but went to Groningen, being ſent for by his kind patron Henry Alting. He read there for ſome time Lectures upon all parts of Philoſophy; after which Alting made him tutor to his ſons; and when they had no longer occaſion for his inſtruction, he procured him the ſame employment with a Prince Palatine, which laſted for three years, part of which he ſpent at Leyden, and part at the Hague at the court of the Prince of Orange. He was called to Groningen in 1634 to ſucceed Janus Gebhardus, who had been Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Greek (b). He executed that Profeſſorſhip in the moſt ample and induſtrious manner imaginable till his death, which happened the ſeventeenth of October 1676 (c). He was Library-keeper to the Univerſity, and a great friend to Mr. Des Cartes [B], which he ſhewed both during the life [C], and after the death of that illuſtrious Philoſopher [D]. He wrote ſeveral pieces in his defence, as we ſhall ſee in the remarks. He married the daughter of a Swede (d), famous among other things for charity towards thoſe who ſuffered for the ſake of the Goſpel.

(b) Ex Vitis Profeſſor. Academiæ Groning. p. 124.

(c) Witte, Diar. Biograph.

(d) Lewis de Geer.

[B] He was a great friend to Mr. Des Cartes.] He ſerved him vigorouſly in the law-ſuit againſt Martin Schoockius, Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Groningen. This Profeſſor was proſecuted by Mr. Des Cartes on account of the ſcandalous calumnies, which he caſt upon him; for he had accuſed him publicly of Atheiſm. Tho' Mr. Des Cartes had never ſeen our Andreas but once in his Life, yet he recommended this affair to him, finding him full of very kind ſentiments towards himſelf. Mr. de la Thuillerie Ambaſſador of France, and the friends of Mr. Des Cartes, exerted themſelves on one ſide, and the enemies of Voetius at Groningen on the other (2); and by this means Mr. Des Cartes obtained juſtice. His accuſer acknowledged him to be innocent of his charge (3); and this acknowledgment acquitted him of any further trouble, which was a ſcandalous indulgence towards him, and of very bad example; for if he had been obliged to ſuffer the Law of retaliation, which he well deſerved, this would have reſtrained a little the inſolence of thoſe abuſive writers, which ſo raſhly throw the imputation of Atheiſm upon ſo many valuable perſons. Mr. Des Cartes wrote the 26th of May 1645 to the Sieur Tobias Andreas to thank him in particular for his good offices, and to deſire him to preſent in his name his very humble thanks to the Judges: And tho' his adverſary had been treated very gently, notwithſtanding he had deſerved the puniſhment of a public ſlanderer, yet he could not but acknowledge, that the Judges had given him all the ſatisfaction, which he deſired, and could lawfully pretend to. " For, ſays he (4) to the Magiſtrates of " Utrecht, private men have no right to demand the " blood, or honour, or eſtate of their enemies." It is " ſufficient, that they are cleared as far as it is in the " power of the Judges. The reſt has no regard to " them, but only to the Public." The text of my remark obliging me to mention the good offices of Tobias Andreas to Mr. Des Cartes, I thought the reader would not be diſpleaſed without changing the page, to know in general the iſſue of this cauſe.

(2) The condemnation of Schoockius fell by a counter-blow upon Voetius.

(3) See the Life of Mr. Des Cartes by Mr. Baillet, tom. 2. pag. 252, &c. ad ann. 1645. AN exceſſive indulgence towards one, who accuſed Mr. Des Cartes of Atheiſm.

(4) Tom. 3. of his Letters, pag. 17. See the Life of Des Cartes, p. 257.

[C] He ſhewed his friendſhip for Mr. Des Cartes during his life, &c.] We have ſeen a proof of this. I ſhall add, that he was a favourer of the Diſciples of Mr. Des Cartes, and that he procured him as many followers as he poſſibly could. It was by his advice, that Claubergius became a Carteſian (5); and this was a conqueſt, that was a great honour and advantage to the whole party.

(5) Clauberg. Epiſt. Dedicator. Logicæ.

[D] ... and after the death of that illuſtrious Philoſopher.] He wrote in defence of him againſt a Profeſſor of Leyden, whoſe name was Revius, and publiſhed a vigorous Anſwer to him in 1653, intitled Methodi Carteſianæ Aſſertio, oppoſita Jacobi Revii.... Præf. Methodi Carteſianæ conſiderationi Theologicæ. The ſecond part of this Anſwer appeared the year following. He wrote likewiſe in 1653 againſt Mr. Regius, in defence of the remarks of Mr. Des Cartes upon a Programma, which contained an explication of the human mind (6). He taught the Carteſian Philoſophy in his own houſe, tho' his Profeſſorſhip did not oblige him to that, and even when his age had quite weakened him. Mr. Des Marets acquaints us with theſe particulars on occaſion of a Suiſſe Student, who dared not venture to attend upon the Philoſophical Lectures of Tobias Andreas, for fear it ſhould be known in his own country, and that might be an obſtacle to his promotion to the Miniſtry. Nec defuit unus ex illis, cujus nomini parco, benè alias doctus, & in Philoſophiam Carteſianam valde propenſus, qui dum hic eſſet, profeſſus eſt non audere ſe frequentare Collegia Carteſiana Cl. Tobiæ Andreæ (qui Clinicus licet, quod ſummopere doleo, Deumque veneror ut illi ſuas vires reſtituat, ea ſolet habere in ſuo perpondium ſuæ profeſſionis, nec enim ad Philoſophiam, ſed ad linguam Græcam & Hiſtorias eſt vocatus) ne hoc in ſuâ patriâ reſciretur, & ſuæ promotioni obeſſet (7).

(6) The title of this piece is Brevis Explicatio brevi Explicationi Mentis humanæ Dn. Henrici Regii repoſita.

(7) Mareſius in Judicio de Theologiâ pacificâ Wittichii, printed in 1671.

☞ANDREAS (JAMES) a famous Lutheran Divine in the ſixteenth Century, was born at Waibling, a town in the Duchy of Wirtemberg on the 25th of March 1528. His father, whoſe name was James Endris, was a Smith [A]. He applied himſelf to Letters with great ſucceſs for three years; but his parents being poor reſolved to bring him up to ſome mechanical profeſſion, and agreed with a Carpenter for that purpoſe; but ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who diſcovered the marks of a very good genius in the body, contributed to ſupport him in the proſecution of his ſtudies, in which he made a conſiderable advance [B]. In the year 1546 he was appointed Miniſter of the church of Stutgard, the Metropolis of the Duchy of Wirtemberg; and his ſermons were ſo well approved of, that his fame reached the Duke, who ordered him to preach before him, which he performed with great applauſe. The ſame year he married a wife

[A] His father ... was a Smith.] This we are informed of by Melchior Adam (1), who tells us that our Author was upon that account called James Smidlin, when he was a boy. But when he gave in his name to the Rector of the Univerſity at Tubing, who was at that time the Baron Arbogaſt ab Hewen, he called himſelf James Andreas; which name was entered into the Matricula of the Univerſity. Exercuit autem ille artem fabrilem; unde huic Jacobo Smidlini nomen adhæſit, & Smidlin ab æqualibus in pueritiâ fuit dictus. Verum ipſe, cum nomen ſuum Tubingæ ad Rectorem, generoſum tunc Baronem Argobaſtum ab Hewen, profiteretur, Jacobum Andreæ ſe nominavit; & ſic in catalogum ſtudioſorum, quem matriculam vocant, relatum eſt nomen.

(1) Vitæ Germanor. Theolog. p. 636.

[B] In the proſecution of his ſtudies, in which he made a conſiderable advance.] He was educated in the School of Stutgard under Alexander Marcoleon, a man wife at Tubing, by whom he had nine ſons and nine daughters, nine of which children ſurvived him (a). During the war, in which Germany was about the ſame time involved, he met with great civilities even from the Emperor's party [C], till he was obliged upon the publication of the Interim to retire to Tubing, where he executed the function of Miniſter (b). In the year 1553 he took his degree of Doctor of Divinity, and was appointed Paſtor of the Church of Gopping, and Superintendant of the neighbouring Churches. He was afterwards ſent for to ſeveral parts [D]; and in 1557 he went to the Diet of Ratiſbon with Chriſtopher Duke of Wirtemberg; and was appointed one of the Secretaries at the conference at Worms between the Papiſts and the Divines of the Auguſtan Confeſſion. The ſame year he publiſhed his firſt work de Cænâ Domini, i. e. "Of the Lord's Supper," in which he propoſed a method of agreement upon that difficult point of controverſy. In June the ſame year he went with the Duke abovementioned to Francfort upon the Maine, where he preached a ſermon, though he was publickly oppoſed by a Romiſh Prieſt [E]. In 1558 he replied to Staphylus's book againſt Luther, which was intitled, Epitome trimembris Theologiæ Lutheranæ, and in which he had collected the opinions of ſeveral Sects, and aſcribed them all to that Reformer, as the original author of them (c). In 1559 he was ſent to Augſburg, where the man extremely converſant in polite Learning, and in two years time he made himſelf Maſter of the Grammar of the Latin and Greek tongues, and of Logic; ſo that in the year 1541 he was ſent to Tubing, where two years after he was made Batchelor of Arts. In 1545 having finiſhed his courſe of Philoſophy, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts. With his Philoſophical Studies he had likewiſe joined thoſe of Divinity and the Hebrew tongues (3).

(a) Melchior. Adami Vitæ Germanor. Theolog. p. 636. edit. Heidelbergæ 1620, in 8vo.

(b) Id. p. 638.

(c) Id. p. 642.

(3) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, p. 636, 637.

[C] Met with great civilities even from the Emperor's party.] Charles V having engaged the Proteſtant Princes of Germany in a war, was very ſucceſsful in the proſecution of it, and ſeized upon the Duchy of Wirtemberg, which by that means was the ſcene of the moſt dreadful calamities. However our Author continued at Stutgard with his wife, and diſcharged his duty even in the midſt of the Spaniards both by preaching, and adminiſtring the Sacraments; and met with no oppoſition from them; ſo that when an Herald belonging to the Emperor was deſired by one of the Duke of Wirtemberg's ſervants to ſtand Godfather to a child of his, who was to be baptized by our Andreas, he immediately agreed to it; and when the ceremony was concluded, made him a preſent, and told him, that he thank'd God, that he had found him baptized in the faith of the Catholic Church, (for he had heard him repeat the Apoſtle's Creed;) and aſſured him, that he would acquaint the Emperor with it; "for, ſays he, all of us of the "Emperor's party were before perſuaded, that you "had thrown off all Faith and Religion; that you "had no Sacraments among you, and paid no man"ner of regard to the Saints. And therefore I want "to talk with you, and deſire you would come to "the dinner, which is provided by the Senate." Certè apud nos Cæſarianos perſuaſiſſimum eſt, vos & fidem & religionem omnem abjeciſſe; nulla apud vos eſſe ſacramenta; nullam ſanctorum venerationem. Qua de re cuperem tecum colloqui; ideoque peto, ut ad prandium venias in prætorio à ſenatu paratum (4). Our Author went thither accordingly, and was treated by him with the utmoſt humanity, and diſmiſſed with this caution, that if he had any of the ſcholaſtic Divines, as Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, Holcot, Bricot, Mephret, and others of that ſtamp, he ſhould put them into the room of his Lutheran books, which he ought to remove immediately; by which means he would be ſecure from any violence from the Spaniards. But a few days after a peace was concluded between the Emperor, and the Duke of Wirtemberg, who returned to his Duchy.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 638.

[D] He was afterwards ſent for to ſeveral parts.] He was ſent for by Lewis Count Oeting in order to reform the Churches of his Dominions from Popery. It is remarkable, that Chriſtopher Duke of Wirtemberg gave particular orders to our Andreas in writing, that if Count Lewis undertook this deſign, in order that under the pretence of Religion he might ſeize upon the Church revenues, eſpecially thoſe of the Monaſteries, for his own uſe, our Author ſhould not be preſent at any more conſultations, but return home immediately. This writing was delivered to the Count by his Chancellor, with a grave admonition not to pollute his hands with the profanation of the eccleſiaſtical revenues. Ubi memorabile eſt, quod dux Chriſtophorus D. Jacobo peculiari ſcheda in mandatis dedit; ut ſi Comes Ludovicus hoc ageret, quò prætextu religionis bona eccleſiaſtica, monaſteriorum inprimis, ad ſe rapere, inque ſuum convertere uſum poſſet; ipſe D. Andreas nulli amplius intereſſet deliberationi; ſed ſtatim domum ſe reciperet. Hæc ſcheda Comiti per cancellarium ejus eſt reddita; additâ graviſſimâ commonefactione, ne manus ſuas eccleſiaſticorum bonorum profanatione pollueret (5). The year following he was ſent for by the Count of Helfenſtain in order to ſettle the Proteſtant Religion in his Territories. But this deſign was attended with many obſtacles; for the College of Canons having ſeized the Church would not ſuffer the Count and our Andreas to enter, and even reſiſted with open force. But the Count removed theſe impediments, and ſubſtituted Proteſtant Miniſters in the room of theſe Prieſts. And tho' he was ſome years after prevailed upon by threats to abandon the Proteſtant Religion, yet his revolt cannot poſſibly be imputed to the neglect of our Divine, who uſed all imaginable methods to animate him to conſtancy and reſolution, and confuted all the arguments, which were urged by him (6).

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 639.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[E] Where he preached a Sermon, tho' he was publicly oppoſed by a Romiſh Prieſt.] The Proteſtant Princes having thought proper to hear a Sermon upon the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt in the great Church of of St. Bartholomew, which belonged to the Roman Catholics, ſo unuſual a circumſtance was reported over all the City. There was a prodigious concourſe therefore of all kinds of people; and after the bell had rung, a Popiſh Doctor mounted the pulpit; upon which the people began to ſing with a loud voice the Hymn of the Holy Ghoſt. This being finiſhed, he read the uſual Goſpel concerning the Nativity of John the Baptiſt, which they heard very attentively; but when he began to explain it, they interrupted him by ſinging another Hymn. The Preacher being aſtoniſhed at this ſtopp'd for ſome time; and when he found they would not ceaſe ſinging, he came down from the pulpit, and went directly to the Duke of Juliers, who was the firſt and only one of the Princes, who was then preſent, and ſolemnly proteſted before him, that he was driven by force from his place and his duty, and deſired him, that he would bear witneſs of this outrage at the laſt judgment. The Duke anſwered him, that it was agreed among the Princes to hear one of their own Divines preach that day, and therefore he ſhould not have attempted to oppoſe their reſolution. But with regard to what he deſired, that he would bear witneſs for him at the laſt day; This, ſays he, is very difficult for me to do; for perhaps either I and you ſhall not meet there, or at leaſt not know each other. Quod autem à me petis, ut tibi in noviſſimo die teſtis eſſe velim, id perdifficile mihi eſt. Aut enim fortaſſis ego & tu ibi non conveniemus, aut alter alterum non agnoſcet (7). The Prieſt hearing this went away with the utmoſt indignation, and threw down the hour-glaſs, which he had in his hand, upon the ground near the altar, and uttered ſome blaſphemous expreſſions.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 641.

the Diet of the Empire was held [F]. In 1561 he was ſent to Paris, in order to be preſent at the conference of Poiſſi, which was broken up before he came thither [G]. Some time after his return he was made Chancellor and Rector of the Univerſity of Tubing (d). In the beginning of the year 1563 he went to Straſburg, where Jerom Zanchius had propagated ſeveral novel opinions, and particularly this, that the regenerate and believers could not poſſibly fall again from grace, or loſe the faith, though they had committed ſins againſt the light of their conſcience. Our Author at laſt engaged him to ſign a form of confeſſion, which he had drawn up (e). In 1565 he was invited to eſtabliſh a church at Hagenaw, an Imperial city, where he preached a great many Sermons upon the principal points of the Chriſtian Religion, which were afterwards printed (f). In 1568 he aſſiſted Julius Duke of Brunſwick in reforming his churches. In 1569 he took a journey to Heidelberg, and Brunſwick, and into Denmark. In 1570 he went to Miſnia and Prague, where the Emperor Maximilian II had a converſation with him upon the ſubject of an agreement in Religion (g). In 1571 he went to viſit the churches at Mompelgard; and upon his return had a conference with Flacius Illyricus at Straſburg, in which he confuted his paradoxical aſſertion, that Sin is a Subſtance (b). He took ſeveral journies after this [H], and uſed his utmoſt efforts to effect an (d) Id. p. 645.

(e) Idem, pag. 645, 646.

(f) Id. p. 646.

(g) Idem, pag. 647, 648.

(h) Idem, ibid.

[F] Sent to Augsburg, where the Diet of the Empire was held.] This Diet was appointed among other reaſons, that the Acts of the Conference at Worms, which had been broken off almoſt as ſoon as it was begun, might be publiſhed. Our Andreas was therefore deputed thither with ſome other perſons to be preſent at the publication of thoſe Acts, where was he charged for having been the occaſion of forcing the ordinary Preacher of St. Bartholomew's Church at Francfort from his duty, and by that means diſturbing the public peace. He was accuſed likewiſe for having publicly contradicted a Roman Catholic Divine in the great Church at Augsburg during the Diet, and charging him with a lie in point of doctrine, and endeavouring to excite a tumult. The occaſion of this complaint againſt him was as follows. A Popiſh Prieſt preaching at Augsburg, our Andreas whiſpered to a perſon, who ſtood next to him, He lies; which being over-heard by another Prieſt, who ſtood behind him, he called out to him with a loud voice, ſo that he might be heard by the Preacher, as well as others, Why don't you ſay publicly to the Preacher that he lies? in order to prevent a tumult among the people, Andreas went away with his friend. Depending therefore upon the goodneſs of his cauſe, he anſwered this charge againſt him, to the ſatisfaction of every unprejudiced perſon, and demonſtrated his own innocence and the malice of his adverſaries. During this Diet he preached two Sermons before all the Princes of the Auguſtan Confeſſion, one upon Juſtification, and the other upon the Lord's Supper; both which were printed at Tubing before the concluſion of the Diet, and a great number of them ſold at Augsburg (8).

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 642, 643.

[G] To be preſent at the Council of Poiſſi; which was broken up before he came thither.] About the end of September 1561 an Embaſſador came from the King of Navarre to the Duke of Wirtemberg with Letters, to deſire him to ſend one of his Divines, whoſe aſſiſtance might be of ſervice to him at that Conference, in which the controverted points of Religion were to be calmly debated in the preſence of Charles IX, King of France, the Queen Mother, the King of Navarre, the Prince of Conde, and the reſt of the States of the Kingdom. This affair being communicated by the Duke to his Council, it was agreed to ſend James Beurlin, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Tubing, our Andreas, and Balthaſar Bidenbach, Preacher to the Court of Wirtemberg, and Melchior à Salhauſen, a Man of Quality, who underſtood the French Language, and other Miniſters. But before their arrival at Paris, the Conference was diſſolved on account of a ſpeech of Beza, who, as Melchior Adam informs us (9), diſcourſing in that Aſſembly before the King and the Nobility concerning the Lord's Supper, made uſe of theſe words: "As far as the "higheſt heaven is diſtant from the loweſt earth, "ſo far is the Body of Chriſt diſtant from the bread "and wine in the Euchariſt." Quantum diſtat ſupremum cælum ab infimâ terrâ, tantum corpus Chriſti diſtat à pane & vino Euchariſtiæ. As ſoon as ever the Papiſts had heard this, they roſe up, and would not hear him ſpeak any longer. But ſilence being ordered by the King's command, Beza was permitted to finiſh his Speech. The Cardinal of Lorrain is ſaid to have propoſed in that Conference that the Auguſtan Confeſſion, which had been exhibited to the Emperor Charles in 1530, ſhould be the ground of peace and agreement between both parties. If Beza therefore and his friends would have ſubſcrib'd this Confeſſion, there would have been a laſting tranquillity with regard to Religion in the Kingdom of France. But this being refuſed by them, all the conſultations about Religion were broke off, and the Aſſembly immediately diſſolved. The King of Navarre was extremely ſorry that the Conference was ended before the Divines of Wirtemberg were arrived. However Andreas and Bidenbach ſent a writing to him at his requeſt concerning the true and genuine Meaning of the Auguſtan Confeſſion in the article concerning the Lord's Supper; but they received no anſwer. However being ſent for to the Queen Mother, they were diſmiſſed with the utmoſt civility, and returned home (10).

(9) Idem, ibid. pag. 644.

(10) Idem, ibid. p. 645.

[H] He took ſeveral journeys.] In 1573 he was ſent to Memming, an Imperial Town, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the Zuinglian doctrine, which was propagated by Euſebius Cleber, the Miniſter of that Church; who being admoniſhed by Andreas before the Senate, and continuing inflexible, was removed from his Miniſtry. In 1575 upon the death of Philip Heerbrand, Paſtor of the Church of Hagenaw, he fixed George Volmar in his room, and upon his return home went to Alen, an Imperial Town, where he preach'd for one month, and having removed the Popiſh Prieſts ſettled Proteſtant Miniſters in their room. He afterwards went to Lindaw, an Imperial Town upon the Maine, and had a conference with Tobias Rupius, Miniſter of that Church, who was involved in the opinions of Flacius Illyricus, and confuted him before the Senate and all the people. In the beginning of the year 1576 he was ſent for by Philip Lewis Count Palatine on the Rhine to conſult upon eccleſiaſtical affairs; and by the Magiſtrates of Ratisbon, to determine a diſpute between the Miniſters of that Church and the Senate concerning Excommunication. While he was abſent upon theſe affairs, Auguſtus Elector of Saxony wrote Letters to Lewis Duke of Wirtemberg to deſire the aſſiſtance of our Author, becauſe he found that the Divines of Wittemberg had introduced the Zuinglian doctrines into that Academy, and propagated them among the youth. Andreas therefore went to Torga in April following, and was preſent at the Aſſembly of Divines, which was held there, in order to ſettle a form of agreement, and put an end to the diſputes, which were raiſed in ſeveral parts. To this Aſſembly the Elector had likewiſe invited ſeveral other eminent Divines, particularly Andrew Muſculus and Chriſtopher Cornerus, the Divines of the Elector of Brandenbourg; Martin Chemnitius, David Chytræus, Profeſſor in the Acadamy at Roſtoch, and Nicholas Selneccer. Theſe Divines wrote in conjunction a book which was afterwards reviſed at Bergen. Andreas was ſent by the Elector of Saxony upon the ſame account to Julius Duke of Brunſwick, Lewis Landgrave of Heſſe, and George Marquis of Brandenbourg. After this he returned to Tubing in oran union of the Churches of the Auguſtan Confeſſion [I]. In 1583 he loſt his firſt wife, with whom he had lived thirty ſeven years; and about an year and half after he married a ſecond wife, who had voluntarily attended her former huſband, when he was obliged to leave his country on account of religion (i). About the ſame time he wrote a controverſial piece, in which he maintained the Ubiquity [K]. In 1586 he was engaged in a conference at Mompelgard with Theodore Beza concerning the Lord's Supper, the Perſon of Chriſt, Predeſtination, Baptiſm, the Reformation of the Popiſh Churches, and Adiaphora or indifferent things; but this had the uſual event of all other conferences, which, though deſigned, as Thuanus obſerves (k), to put an end to diſputes in Divinity, are often the occaſion of ſtill greater. In 1587 he was ſent for to Nordling upon church affairs; and upon his return fell ſick, and publiſhed his Confeſſion of Faith, in order to obviate the imputations of his adverſaries; but he afterwards recovered, and was ſent for again to Ratiſbon, and then to Onolſbach by Frederick Marquis of Brandenbourg (l). Upon the publication of the Conference at Mompelgard above-

(i) Id. p. 652.

(k) Hiſtor. l. 35. apud Melch. Adam. ib. p. 653.

(l) Melch. Ad. p. 653.

der to remove his wife and family to Leipſic, becauſe the Elector of Saxony had occaſion for his aſſiſtance for a conſiderable time in ſettling the Schools and Church, and procuring an agreement in points of Religion; for which purpoſe he ſent Jodocus Didamerus, Counſellor of the Landgrave, to the Duke of Wirtemberg, to obtain leave for Andreas to be abſent (11).

(11) Idem, ibid. p. 648, 649.

[I] Uſed his utmoſt efforts to effect an union of the Churches of the Auguſtan Confeſſion.] This undertaking was a very arduous one, and coſt him a prodigious deal of labour, and ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to be executed. The Papiſts perpetually objected the differences among Proteſtants, and urged, that there were ſcarce two or three to be found among the Miniſters of the Auguſtan Confeſſion, who agreed in all points of doctrine. Andreas therefore took infinite pains in procuring ſeveral thouſands to ſign the Form of Agreement, which he had drawn up; by which means the malicious imputations of their enemies were effectually diſproved. He took a great many long journeys upon that account to Princes, Electors, and others, to Magiſtrates of Towns, and to various Aſſemblies and Conferences, which were continually appointed for this purpoſe for five years together, in which he proſecuted this deſign. It may eaſily be imagined how prodigious a task it muſt have been to collect the conſent and ſubſcriptions of Churches, in which the determination was left free to every perſon, and to ſatisfy the queſtions of every one, who doubted of any part of the Form, and to paſs thro' ſo many journeys, conferences, and diſputations. He travelled ſeveral thouſands of miles, attended with only one ſervant, and yet never met with the leaſt misfortune in all his journeys. In 1580 this book of Concord, which had been ſo impatiently expected, was publiſhed, ſubſcribed, and approved of by three Electors of the Empire, one and twenty Princes, two and twenty Counts, four Barons, thirty five Imperial Cities, and eight thouſand Miniſters; which important work was drawn up by Andreas, under the influence and authority of Auguſtus, Elector of Saxony, after having conferred with the celebrated Divines abovementioned, and gained the free ſuffrages of all the Churches and Miniſters. As our Author's aſſiſtance therefore had been of ſuch great importance in this affair, the Elector of Saxony ſhewed him the utmoſt regard in a variety of inſtances, and preſented him with the Complutenſian Edition of the Bible elegantly bound, with this inſcription in the frontiſpiece of it. D. O. M. Gratia. D. Auguſtus, Dux Saxoniæ, S. Rom. Imperii Archimarſchallus & Elector Landgravius Thuringiæ, Marchio Miſniæ, & Burggravius Magdeburg, hæc ſacro-ſancta Biblia, ſummo Viro, pietate, doctrinâ & virtute ornatiſſimo, D. Jacobo Andreæ, S. Theologiæ Doctori celeberrimo, doctrinæ cœleſtis, ab ultimi Heliæ, D. D. Lutheri Morte, in his regionibus, ab hominibus leviſſimis corruptæ, inſtauratori integerrimo, de eccleſia Chriſti optimè merito, ob grati animi memoriam ſempiternam dono dedit, anno S. M.D.LXXIX, & manu propriâ ſubjunxit & ſubſcripſit ſequentia:

Tandem bona Cauſa triumphat.
Auguſtus Dux Saxoniæ Elector.

i. e. "Thankſgiving to Almighty God. Auguſtus Duke of Saxony, Arch-Marſhal and Elector of "the holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia, "Marquis of Miſnia, and Burggrave of Magdeburg, "preſented this holy Bible to James Andreas, Dr. "of Divinity, a Man of great abilities, adorned with "piety, learning and virtue, the moſt faithful Reſtorer "of the heavenly doctrine, which ſince the death of "Luther, the laſt Elias, has been corrupted by men "of inconſtant minds, and a perſon, who has extremely "deſerved of the Church of Chriſt, as an exter-"nal mark of his gratitude towards him, in the "year of our Lord M.D.LXXIX, and ſubjoined and "ſubſcribed what follows with his own hand.

"At length the good cauſe is triumphant.
"Auguſtus Duke and Elector of Saxony."

Andreas having finiſhed theſe affairs, and ſettled the Churches and Schools took his leave of the Elector at the latter end of the year 1580, after he had laboured almoſt five years upon the Book of Concord. But many perſons objected againſt this performance of his, and ſaid, that he had confounded, or at leaſt was willing to confound Chriſt and Belial, light and darkneſs, good and evil, into one Chaos (12).

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 650, 651.

[K] Wrote a controverſial piece, in which he maintained the Ubiquity.] Thoſe of the contrary party having publiſhed their Orthodox Conſent, the confutation of it was enjoin'd Andreas by public authority. He undertook it therefore in the year 1583 and 1584, and wrote a very large work concerning the univerſal Cauſe, the Perſon of Chriſt, perſonal Union, and the real Preſence of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, not only in the Lord's Supper, but even over the whole world. But the Ubiquity of the Body of Chriſt, which he aſſerted, was not a corporal or local preſence, by which he may be ſeen or felt; but it was the preſence of the whole Chriſt, not only with regard to his Divinity, but likewiſe his human nature; ſo that being intire, God and Man undivided, he is really preſent every where in heaven and earth with all creatures, whether viſible or inviſible, celeſtial or terreſtrial, in an heavenly, ſpiritual, and ſupernatural manner, and ſuch as is inconceivable by human underſtanding; and he ſees, does, hears, and knows all things according to his human nature, being preſent, not abſent, as the King of Spain governs the Indies. Cæterum ubiquitas, quam D. Andreas docuit, non eſt corporalis, ut ipſi loquuntur, vel localis præſentia, qua videtur vel palpari poſſit, ut ſtramen in ſacco; ſed eſt præſentia totius Chriſti, non tantum divinitate, verum etiam adſumptâ humanitate; ita ut totus, Deus & homo indiviſus, ubique in cælo & in terrâ omnibus creaturis, viſibilibus & inviſibilibus, cæleſtibus & terreſtribus, cæleſti tamen, ſpirituali ſupernaturali, humanaque ratione imperveſtigabili modo, adſit verè præſens, omniaque ſecundum naturam humanam videat, faciat, audiat, ſciat; & præſens, non abſens, ut Rex Hiſpaniarum Indiam adminiſtret & regat (13). This doctrine he attempts to eſtabliſh firſt from the Scriptures, and then from the teſtimonies of the orthodox Fathers, and the books of Luther and many other Writers. "Let them therefore, "ſays he, who would ſeem to be of the ſame opinion "with us, concerning the true and real Preſence of "the whole Chriſt in the Supper, conſider how it "is poſſible for them, ſince the Lord's Supper is ce-"lebrated in above a thouſand different places at one abovementioned, he was accuſed of having falſely imputed ſome things to Beza, which the latter had never aſſerted; he therefore went to Bern to clear himſelf of the charge [L]. His laſt publick act was a Conference at Baden in November 1589 with John Piſtorius, who then inclined to Calviniſm, and afterwards revolted entirely to the Papiſts (m). He had a very early preſentiment of his death; and when he found it drawing near, he made a declaration to ſeveral of his friends of his conſtancy in the faith, which he had aſſerted, and ſhewed the moſt undoubted ſigns of a ſincere devotion, till he expired on the ſeventh of January 1590, being ſixty one years and nine months old (n). His funeral ſermon was preached by Luke Oſiander, and afterwards publiſhed. Several falſe reports were propagated concerning his death [M]. His manner of preaching and his Lectures deſerve to be mentioned [N]. We ſhall give his character

(13) Id. ibid. p. 652.

(m) Id. p. 655.

(n) Id. p. 658.

" and the ſame time, to maintain that Chriſt is preſent at them all at once, while they deny his Omnipreſence in all places and every where. And why ſhould they deny this, they have no manner of reaſon, as Peter Martyr juſtly obſerved, that if the Body of Chriſt could be proved to be preſent in two or three places at once, he ſhould diſpute no longer concerning the Ubiquity." Viderint illi, qui de totius Chriſti in cœna præſentia vera & reali nobiſcum ſentire videri volunt, quomodo, cum diverſis locis mille amplius uno & eodem tempore Cœna Domini celebretur, Chriſtum omnibus illis ſimul præſentem ſtatuere, ſicque in cœna retinere, negata ipſius omnipræſentia in omnibus locis vel ubique poſſint. Et cur eam negent, cauſam non habent, ſicut rectè Petrus Martyr dixit; Si Chriſti corpus duobus vel tribus locis ſimul præſens eſſe probetur, ſe de Ubiquitate verbum amplius facturum eſſe nullum (14).

(14) Idem, ibid.

[L] He therefore went to Bern to clear himſelf of the charge.] When the Account was publiſhed of the Conference at Mompelgard. Samuel Huber having read it, obſerved the following aſſertions of Beza; 1, That Chriſt did not die for all men: 2, That the promiſes of the Goſpel were particular, and not univerſal: 3, That by the abſolute decree of God, without any antecedent cauſe, the greateſt part of mankind were reprobated by the mere will of the Deity, who is the cauſe of all things: 4, That no certainty of Salvation is to be ſought for in Baptiſm. Theſe opinions appeared to Huber ſo ſhocking and injurious to the Attributes of God, that he began to diſpute againſt them. Upon which Beza, James Grynæus, William Stuckius, and John Jetzler were ſent for to diſpute with him, who informing the Magiſtrates concerning this affair, intimated, that none of theſe poſitions were propoſed by Beza and Muſculus at the Conference; but that Huber had raſhly credited a falſe and deluſive book publiſhed by Andreas at Tubing, in which thoſe things were maliciouſly imputed to them. This charge reflecting highly upon the honour of our Divine, and likewiſe of Prince Frederic of Wirtemberg and Mompelgard, who had given a ſanction to the Acts of that Conference by a Preface and Teſtimonial, it was thought neceſſary to confute this calumny in perſon. A Deputation was therefore ſent with Andreas to complain of it to the Senate of Bern. On the ſixth of September they were introduced into the Leſſer Senate, which conſiſts of the principal perſons of the Commonwealth, and Dr. Andreas in a long Speech complained of the injury done to him, and deſired that the Helvetian Divines might do juſtice to Prince Frederic's character and his own. He then informed them, that thoſe four articles, which were objected againſt by Huber, were contained in the Theſes written by Beza, and ſigned and approved of by the reſt of the Divines, and that he was ready to produce their own hand-writing. Beſides, that many other opinions, no leſs abſurd than theſe, were propagated by the Calviniſts. After many things had been debated both in public and in private, he ſignified, that no expedient ſeemed to him more proper to put an end to this conteſt, and to preſerve the honour of the Republic of Bern, than that the Helvetian or Wirtemberg Divines ſhould meet together, and compare the original papers with the printed book; for then it would eaſily appear with what ſincerity thoſe Divines had propoſed their cauſe. This ſcheme pleaſed the Conſul and the Senate, and therefore on the ſeventh of September they came to this reſolution, that the propoſal of Dr. Andreas was approved by all of them, and that they would write to the Princes upon that affair, to procure their conſent, and likewiſe to the Helvetian Republics, that they might give their aſſiſtance in appointing an Aſſembly. In ſhort the Senate of Bern omitted nothing in order to effect this affair. But when the Helvetian Divines found, that Dr. Andreas had made a great impreſſion upon that Senate, they uſed their utmoſt efforts to prevent the calling of ſuch an Aſſembly; as appears from a Letter of Abraham Muſculus to Grynæus quoted in Melchior Adam (15). And the reſolution was intirely broke off by the war, in which the Republic of Bern was engaged with the Duke of Savoy. However it was of great advantage to Dr. Andreas's character, that he had ſo favourable an opportunity of explaining in a copious and elaborate Speech his ſentiments with regard to the points controverted between the Divines of Wirtemberg and thoſe of Helvetia, before a body of men remarkable for their wiſdom and piety (16).

(15) Pag. 654, 655.

(16) Idem, ibid. P. 655.

[M] Several falſe reports were propagated concerning his death.] The Popiſh Prieſts in the parts adjacent publicly declared from the pulpit, that before his death he had recanted and condemned all the doctrines, which he had maintained in word or writing. Beſides, there was a Letter diſperſed, in which they affirmed with all the aſſurance imaginable, that he deſired very anxiouſly before his death, that a Jeſuit might be ſent for immediately, to adminiſter the Sacraments to him; which requeſt being denied him, he fell into deſpair, and expired under all the horrors of it. Poſt obitum à ſacrificulis in viciniâ de ſuggeſtu publicè fuit ſparſum, D. Andreæ ante finem vitæ ſuæ univerſam ſuam doctrinam, quam voce ſcriptiſve eſſet profeſſus, revocâſſe & erroris damnâſſe. Fuit & epiſtola diſſeminata, qua omni aſſeveratione confirmare non dubitaverant neſcio cujus ſpiritûs homines, eum ante obitum anxiè à ſuis petiiſſe, Jeſuitam actutum advocarent; qui ſacra ſibi adminiſtret. Quod cum detrectarent illi, in deſperationem incidiſſe, inque eâ vitam finiiſſe (17).

(17) Idem, ibid. P. 658, 659.

[N] His manner of preaching, and his Lectures deſerve to be mentioned.] He had a very eaſy manner of inſtructing the people, ſo that he delivered the moſt obſcure points in ſuch a perſpicuous ſtyle, that they were well underſtood by the generality of the Audience. When he exhorted them to the reformation of their lives, or remonſtrated againſt vice, he made uſe of great energy of language and elevation of voice. He was powerful in refuting the enemies of ſound doctrine; gentle and mild in comforting and raiſing of thoſe, who were depreſſed; and extremely well qualified both by nature and art for moving the paſſions; and when there was occaſion for it, his eloquence was forcible like thunder, and he ſpoke with ſuch vehemence, that he would ſweat all over his body even in the midſt of winter. Fuit is in docendo populo popularis, ut diſtinctè & perſpicuè poſſet etiam obſcura aliàs proponere, & facilè intelligerentur. In exhortando ad vitæ emendationem, increpando, & invehendo in vitia & mores depravatos vehemens, extollens vocem ſuam ſicut tubam. In refutando adverſarios ſanæ doctrinæ potens; in conſolando & perturbatos erigendo mitis; in ciendis & movendis affectibus naturâ & arte inſtructus; & ſi quando opus erat, mera ſonabat tonitrua, tantâque animi & vocis contentione, vehementia & affectu pro concione loquebatur, ut etiam mediâ brumâ toto ſudaret corpore, interulamque madefaceret omnem (18). This happened to him in the laſt Sermon but one, which he preached, on the ſecond Sunday in Advent; which being character in the note [O]. He wrote a great number of books, ſo that a Gentleman of Learning wrote to Tubing after his death, that he had in his Library above an hundred and fifty Works of his upon various ſubjects (o).

(18) Idem, ibid. P. 659.

(o) Id. p. 660.

being finiſhed, tho' the weather was intenſely cold, yet with the other Miniſters of the Church he would adminiſter the Lord's Supper to a great number of Communicants. This he himſelf thought was a principal cauſe of his death; for having been extremely heated by preaching, he caught cold immediately after, which very probably caſt him into the diſtemper, of which he died. As often as he had leiſure from the affairs of importance, in which he was engaged, and the frequent journeys, which he was obliged to take, he employed himſelf in inſtructing the youth of the Academy with the utmoſt care; but he chiefly read to them practical Divinity, tho' he was converſant in all the branches of Theology. He appointed a great many diſputations in the Univerſity of Tubing, in which he explained the moſt difficult and obſcure points relating to the Perſon of Chriſt, the perſonal Union of the two Natures, Predeſtination, Original Sin, and almoſt all the Controverſies agitated at that time; which he examined with the utmoſt accuracy, ſo that he generally ſpent whole days, and ſometimes ſeveral days together in diſcuſſing them.

[O] We ſhall give his character in the note.] It is eaſy to judge of it from the courſe of his actions, which we have related above. But we ſhall conclude it with the following obſervations upon him from Melchior Adam, who extracted his Life from an Oration written by James Heerbrand in honour of his memory, as appears from the cloſe of Dr. Andreas's article in that Author. In executing the ſeveral branches of his duty he ſpared no labour, and was deterred by no fatigue. He was perpetually engaged in compoſing ſome work or other, or writing letters upon all kinds of ſubjects to perſons of all ranks, who conſulted him. Theſe things he diſpatched with admirable quickneſs and ſucceſs. There was no day paſs'd, but he gave advice to ſeveral perſons, who came to deſire it; being ready to gratify all, who ſollicited him. He was in great favour with Princes and Men of the higheſt rank, his converſation being very agreeable and facetious. He had a warm zeal for the Religion which he profeſſed; and was extremely ſorry, whenever he heard, that any perſon had abandoned it. In officio denique toto nullis unquam pepercit laboribus; nullis moleſtiis ſuccubuit, aut oneribus fractus fuit. Scriptis & epiſtolis, non ſolùm familiaribus, ſed & ſeriis diverſiſque ad diverſos varii argumenti, ad omnis ordinis homines, dum de variis interrogatus reſpondit, & conſilia dedit quotidiè, cum dies nulla tranſiret, qua non aliquot magna celeritate & felicitate exaraverit. Nulla dies præteriit, quâ non plures ad eum confluerent, petentes conſilium ab eo, dum omnibus gratificari ſtuderet. Principibus viris fuit gratus & charus, cum in colloquiis eſſet jucundus & ſuavis: in religionis, quam profitebatur, zelo fervens; & qui ſummopere doleret, ſicubi audiviſſet, alibi alios defeciſſe (19). T.

(19) Idem, ibid. p. 659, 660.

ANDREINI (ISABELLA) a native of Padua, was one of the beſt Comedians in all Italy about the end of the ſixteenth Century, and the beginning of the ſeventeenth. She was not only diſtinguiſhed for this, but ſhe likewiſe wrote verſes in perfection. We have proofs of this, not only from the elogiums given her by an infinite number of learned Men and fine genius's, (for that would be but an equivocal kind of proof) but alſo from the works which ſhe publiſhed. The Intenti (a) of Padua thought they did their Academy an honour in making her a member of it. And ſhe, to ſhew her acknowledgment of that favour, always placed among her titles that of Academica Intenta; and without doubt ſhe eſteemed it a particular honour to her. All her titles together are theſe; Iſabella Andreini, Comica Geloſa, Academica Intenta, detta l'Acceſa. She had one advantage, which is not very common among excellent Actreſſes, and that is an extraordinary beauty, ſo that upon the ſtage ſhe charmed the eyes and ears at the ſame time [A]. Cardinal Cinthio Aldobrandini, nephew to Clement VIII, had a great eſteem for her, as appears by ſeveral Poems which ſhe wrote for him, and the Epiſtle Dedicatory of her Works. She came to France, where ſhe was kindly received by their Majeſties, and perſons of the higheſt Quality at Court (b). She wrote ſeveral Sonnets in their praiſe, which are to be ſeen in the ſecond part of her Poems. She died of a miſcarriage at Lyons the tenth of June 1604, in the forty ſecond year of her age. Her huſband Francis Andreini had her interred in the ſame city, and honoured her with an Epitaph [B], which teſtifies that ſhe was adorned with a great deal of piety and chaſtity.

(a) So the Academiſts of Padua are ſtiled.

(b) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the 2d part of her Poems.

[A] She charmed both eyes and ears. This gave occaſion to a variety of fine compliments to her. Under her picture it is written, Hoc hiſtricæ eloquentiæ caput lector admiraris, quid ſi auditor ſies? i. e. "If "you admire, reader, this glory of the theatre, when "you only ſee her, what would you do, if you "heard her? "The Antitheſes and points of Erycius Puteanus turn for the moſt part upon this thought.

Hanc vides, ſays he, & hanc audis?
Tu diſputa, Argus eſſe malis, ut videas,
An Midas, ut audias?
Tantum enim ſermonem vultus,
Quantum ſermo vultum commendat:
Quorum alterutro æterna eſſe potuiſſet,
Cum vultum omnibus ſimulacris emendatiorem,
Et ſermonem omni Suada venuſtiorem poſſideat.

That is,

"Do you ſee her, and hear her likewiſe?
"Diſpute then, whether you would chooſe to be "An Argus, to ſee her,
"Or a Midas to hear her.
"For her beauty as much recommends her voice,
"As her voice does her beauty.
"Either of theſe advantages might procure her immortal honour,
"For her face is more beautiful than the fineſt "ſtatues,
"And her voice more harmonious that that of the "Goddeſs perſuaſion herſelf."

[B] Her husband honoured her with an Epitaph.] Tho' it were only to ſatisfy thoſe, who ſpeak with ſo much ſeverity of the Church, for burying Comedians in conſecrated ground, I ſhould think it worth while to copy here the Epitaph of Iſabella Andreini, wherein we ſee the character of an Actreſs joined to the hope of a reſurrection.

D. O. M.

Iſabella Andreina, Patavina, mulier magnâ virtute prædita, honeſtatis ornamentum, maritaliſque pudicitiæ decus, ore facunda, mente fœcunda, religioſa, pia, Muſis amica, & artis Scenicæ caput, hic reſurrectionem expectat.

Ob abortum obiit 4 Id. Junii 1604, annum agens 42.
Franciſcus Andreinus mœſtiſſimus poſuit.

That is,

"Iſabella Andreini, of Padua, a woman of great vir"tue

chaſtity. He let the Publick know ſince that time, that he extremely regretted the loſs of her [C], and had a great eſteem for her. The death of this Actreſs threw all Parnaſſus into a general concern and lamentation, which they ſhewed by their Latin and Italian Elegies. Several of theſe pieces are printed before her Poems in the edition of Milan in 1605. And they have not forgot to inſert the ingenious inſcription which was wrote in commendation of her during her life by Erycius Puteanus, Profeſſor at that time at Milan (c). Beſides her Sonnets, Madrigals, Songs, and Eclogues, we have a Paſtoral of hers intitled Mirtilla, and Letters, which were printed at Venice in 1610. She ſung extremely well, and was an admirable miſtreſs of inſtrumental muſick; ſhe was not unacquainted with Philoſophy (d), and underſtood French and Spaniſh.

(c) See the Remark [A].

(d) See the verſes in her praiſe prefix'd to her Poems.

" tue, and honour, the ornament of conjugal chaſti-
" ty, of an eloquent charming tongue, and an ele-
" gant mind, religious, pious, beloved by the Muſes,
" and the Glory of the ſtage, here lies in expectation
" of the Reſurrection.
" She died of a miſcarriage the 10th of June
" 1604 in the 42d year of her age.
" Francis Andreini her ſorrowful husband erected
" this Monument to her memory."

The following remark will ſhew the conjugal tenderneſs of Francis Andreini towards her.

[C] Her husband afterwards let the Public know how much he regretted the loſs of her.] The Preface of his Bravure del Capitano Spavento ſhews us, that he was a native of Piſtoia, and that while he belonged to the company of the Comedians Geloſi, he was highly delighted in acting the part of a Bully. He took upon him the title of Capitan Spavento da Vall' Inferna, and left the part, which he was moſt diſtinguiſhed for, which was that of a Lover, Io laſciai di recitare la parte mia principale, la qualle era quella dell' inamorato. This Company of Comedians got a prodigious reputation; but the death of Iſabella Andreini was the beginning of their decline. Her husband upon this left the character of an Actor for that of an Author, and choſe for the ſubject of his writings that which he had exerciſed himſelf in upon the ſtage, the Rodomontades of a bullying Captain. He wrote ſeveral Dialogues or Ragionamenti in proſe, and gave them the title abovementioned. The edition which I make uſe of, is the fourth, printed at Venice in 1623 in 4to; but as the privilege is dated in 1607, the firſt edition may be placed under that year. We find at the beginning of this book the complaints of the Shepherd Corinto alla defunta ſua Fillide (ſo he calls his wife) & alla ſua Boſcarettia Sampogna. Never any Lover carried his paſſionate expreſſions further, nor complained with more warmth againſt the inexorable rigour of fate. Theſe are without doubt the complaints of Andreini upon the death of his Iſabella. But read his words, which leave no room for conjecture. Finito che fu quel termine, e venuto meno il vivere d'Iſabella mia dilettiſſima conſorte, (la quale fu lume e ſplendore di quella virtuoſa e honorata compagnia,) fui da molti amici miei conſigliato à ſcrivere alcuna coſa e donarla alla ſtampa, per laſciar qualche memoria di me, e per ſeguitare l'honorato grido della moglie mia, la quale haveva laſciato all mondo con tanta ſua gloria, e con tanto ſuo honore, il ſuo bellizzimo Canzoniero, la ſua belliſſima Mirtilla Favola Boſcarreccia, e il compendio delle ſue belliſſime Lettere (1). That is, " After the death of Iſabella, my deareſt wife, " (who was the Light and Glory of our excel- " lent and honourable Company,) I was ſollicit- " ed by many of my friends to write ſomething " and publiſh it, in order to leave ſome Memorial of " myſelf, and to follow the glorious ſteps of my " wife, who publiſhed with ſo much reputation to " herſelf her fine Songs, her beautiful Paſtoral of " Mirtilla, and her Collection of excellent Letters." There was one John Baptista Andreini, who wrote a Tragedy intitled La Florinda, printed at Milan in 1606.

(1) Prefat. del Capitano Spavento

ANDRELINUS (P. FAUSTUS) a native of Forli in Italy, was a long time Profeſſor of Poetry in the Univerſity of Paris. Lewis XII made him his Poet Laureat (a). I cannot tell whether Queen Anne of Britany, or ſome other Queen, honoured him with her ſpecial protection; but I find that Eraſmus, who was very well acquainted with him, tells us he was not only Poet to the King but likewiſe to the Queen [A]. He was not ſatisfied only with making verſes; but he wrote in proſe Moral and proverbial Letters, which were printed ſeveral times. There is an edition of them at Straſbourg in 1517, and another reviſed again by the Author in 1519 (b). Beatus Rhenanus added a Preface to them, wherein he commends them extremely [B]. John Arboreus a Divine of Paris wrote Comments upon them. The greateſt part of his Poetry are

(a) Fauſtus Andrelinus item Poeta ſuaviſſimus a Ludovico XII Franciæ Rege laureâ coronatus. Leand. Alberti Deſcript. Ital. p. 478.

(b) Geſneri Biblioth. p. 573.

[A] Eraſmus . . . . tells us that he was Poet to the King and Queen.] He writes thus: Fauſtus Andrelinus, Forolivienſis, poeta non ſolum laureatus, verum etiam regius, atque etiam ſi Diis placet, regineus, vetus congerro meus, qui plus quam triginta jam annos in celeberrima Pariſiorum Academia Poeticen docet, in carmine quod de Pavimento Pariſienſi inſcripſit, adagionem (Syracuſana Menſa) in Anglos derivavit, Menſa, inquiens, Britanna placet (1). That is, " Fauſtus Andrelinus of Forli, not only the Poet " Laureat, but likewiſe Poet to the King and Queen, " my old companion, who has been Profeſſor of Poe- " try in the famous Univerſity of Paris above thirty " years, in his Poem de Pavimento Pariſienſi, has ap- " plied the Adage Syracuſana Menſa, i. e. a Syracu- " ſian Table, to the Engliſh, and ſays Menſa Britan- " na placet, i. e. the Britiſh Table pleaſes me." We find amongſt the Letters of Eraſmus (2) two or three Letters of Andrelinus to him in ſo Laconic a ſtyle, that Brutus's Letters, compared to them, would be thought very prolix. Eraſmus, who anſwered him in the ſame ſtyle, is a little more diffuſe, when he deſired him to recommend his Adages (3), and when he deſcribed to him the pleaſures of England, in order to engage him to come over thither (4). I ſhall obſerve by the bye, that it is a very wrong cuſtom in Authors to fix the time when they write only by the vague uncertain term of nunc, jam, &c. They ſhould mark the year preciſely; for beſides that ſome books are ſeveral years in compoſing, or are not publiſhed till long after the Author has finiſhed them, a great many of them are reprinted ſeveral times. How then can we aſcertain the date, when we meet with hoc anno, i. e. " this year," nunc, i. e. " now," and the like? Thus Eraſmus ſpeaks of Andrelinus as a man ſtill living, and who had been thirty years Profeſſor of Paris. He writes this in a book printed 1546, in which the Preface has no date; but there is an Epiſtle Dedicatory dated the 13th of Auguſt 1528. Is not this apt to make us imagine that Andrelinus was living in 1528? And may we not collect from this, that the greateſt Men, when they reviſe their works for a new edition, leave a thouſand things in them, which are not true? I have obſerved this fault in the laſt edition of the great Hiſtory of France by Mezerai.

(1) Eraſm. Adag. 68. Cent. 2. Chiliad. 2.

(2) Lib. 5. pag. 326. edit. Londinenſ.

(3 and 4) Eraſm. Epiſt. 23. and 10. lib. 5. pag. 321 and 315.

A Censure upon Authors, who make uſe of the vague term of nunc. See the remark [B] of the Article ABULFEDA, num. 4.

[B] Beatus Rhenanus added a Preface to them, wherein he commends them extremely.] Geſner's words are as follows: Beatus Rhenanus in præfatione commendat has epiſtolas tanquam eruditas, lepidas, & utiles; are Diſtichs. They were printed with the Commentary, which Joſſe Badius Aſcenſius did them the honour to write upon them, tranſlated verſe for verſe into French, by a Poet of Paris, who called himſelf Stephen Privé (c). This tranſlation was publiſhed in 1604, and is only fit to expoſe the original to contempt. John Paradin had before tranſlated (d) into French Stanza's of four verſes an hundred diſtichs, which Andrelinus had addreſſed to John Ruzé, Treaſurer General of the Finances of King Charles VIII, in order to thank him for a very conſiderable and honourable penſion, which that Prince ordered to be paid him punctually, and which did not deſerve the contempt which that merry Poet intended to ſhew it, by inſinuating, that his verſes were paid for by the quarter or hundred (e) [C]. The Poems of Andrelinus are inſerted in the firſt tome of the Deliciæ Poet. Italor. though the beſt judges have not eſteemed them very much [D]. His death is placed under the year 1518 [E]. The Letters, which he wrote in Proverbs, have been thought worth a new edition at Helmſtadt in 1662, according to that of Cologne of 1509 (f). The manner of life of this Author was not very exemplary; but he was ſpared on that account, becauſe he gave a luſtre to the Univerſity of Paris. He was ſo fortunate, that though he took the liberty of rallying the Divines, yet he was never brought into trouble about it. It is Eraſmus who acquaints us with theſe little particulars [F].

(c) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, tom. 3. p. 121.

(d) In 1545.

(e) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, quoting Colletet. p. 118, 125, 126. of the Art Poetique.

(f) Morhof Polyhiſtor. p. 258.

Obſerve, that I have left this whole Article in the ſecond edition of this Work juſt as it was in the firſt, though I have been adviſed to correct it in ſeveral places. But utiles; "Etſi enim hic author, (inquit,) in nonnullis "opuſculis genuino poetarum more laſciviuſculus ſit, "hic tamen integrum ac modeſtum oratorem agit (5)." That is, "Beatus Rhenanus in his Preface commends "theſe Epiſtles, as learned, witty, and uſeful; for "tho', ſays he, this Author in ſome of his works, "after the manner of Poets, is a little too looſe and "wanton; yet here he appears like a modeſt and ele- "gant Orator."

(5) Geſner. Biblioth. fol. 573.

[C] He inſinuates that they paid for his verſes by the quarter or hundred.] Mr. Baillet brings for proof of this theſe four verſes tranſlated from the Latin of Andrelinus by Paradin (6).

(6) Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 3. p. 122.

Croiſſez mes vers, ſoyéz en plus grand nombre;
Car c'eſt aux frais & ſalaires du Roi.
Seure Richeſſe, empeſchant tout encombre,
Exige vers en copieux arroi.
That is,
"Ariſe, my Muſe, let copious numbers flow,
"Rich as the penſion be the verſe we owe;
"The royal bounty claims a due regard;
"And ample be the theme, as the reward.

The tenth Eclogue of Andrelinus gives us a very extraordinary thing; and that is a Poet, who is ſo far from complaining of the ingratitude of the age, and accuſing the Muſes of ſtarving thoſe, who apply to them, that he acknowledges his penſion was very noble; and that when he recited his Poem upon the conqueſt of Naples (*) before Charles VIII, he received a bag of ſilver ſo large, that he could ſcarce carry it upon his ſhoulders.

Dum ſtupeo totus viſu defixus in iſto,
Jupiter ecce venit magno ſtipatus honore.
Ipſe olim vultus inter nutritus agreſtes
Admiror primo aſpectu; mox poplite flexo
Ante ipſum quæſita Jovem modulamina fundo,
Scilicet ut bello claram expugnavit aperto
Parthenopem, patrios victorque redivit in agros,
Quamvis Heſperio vetitus foret orbe regreſſus.
Neſcio qua noſtri captus dulcedine cantûs
Ipſe fuit, fulvi ſaccum donavit & æris
Vix iſtis delatum humeris, cunctoſque per annos
Penſio larga datur, qualem non lentus habebat
Tityrus umbroſis reſonans ſua gaudia ſylvis.

§ (*) It muſt be in this Poem, that Andrelinus having ſaid it ſeems, that tho' the conqueſts and victories of King Charles were ſoon vaniſhed, yet the marks (ſtigmata) of them ſtill remained upon the forehead of the Italians; Brantome, who inſtead of vera ſtigmata read vera ſtemmata, repreſents this Poet as ſaying, that the victories and warlike exploits of King Charles VIII were as ſo many marks and enſigns of honour upon the forehead of the Italians. See Brantome, Hommes illuſtres François, Tom. IV, p. 25. CRIT. REM.

[D] The beſt judges have not eſteemed his Poems very much.] Voſſius names three Authors, who are guilty of ſaying pompous nothings in a prodigious multitude of words (7); the firſt is the Orator Anaximenes, the ſecond Longolius, an Orator likewiſe, and the third Andrelinus. With reſpect to the firſt, he tells us, that Theocritus of Chios ſeeing him go to harangue, ſaid immediately of him, We are going to have a torrent of words, and a drop of ſenſe: Ἀεχσιμ λέξεων μὲν ποταμὸς, νοῦ δὲ σταλαγμός. He ſays upon the authority of Francis Luiſinus, that Conſtantine Laſcaris paſſed the ſame judgment upon Longolius; but this is much truer of Andrelinus, in whoſe Poems there wants but one ſyllable, as Eraſmus very ingeniouſly obſerved. That ſyllable was νοῦς, which ſignifies good ſenſe, underſtanding, and genius. If I could tell where Eraſmus ſpeaks in a manner ſo inconſiſtent with the great compliments, which he paid to Andrelinus (8), I would have mentioned it. I doubt not but that the judgment of Julius Scaliger concerning the Poet Fauſtus has more relation to him, than to Gerhardus Fauſtus. Fauſti facilitas, ſays he (9), viventis in ſcribendo ſecundo plauſu exceptа eſt. Scholas tamen ſapit illa juniorum, à qua nihil aliud quam hoc ipſum expectes. That is, "The "facility, with which Fauſtus wrote, was much ap- "plauded, while he was living; but it ſavours too "much of the modern Schools, from which we can "expect nothing but this."

(7) Voſſius, Inſtit. Poet. p. 2.

(8) See the 23d Letter of the fifth book of Eraſmus.

(9) Jul. Cæſ. Scalig. de Poetic. lib. 6. p. 736. See Baillet, Jug. ſur les Poetes, tom. 3. p. 122.

[E] His death is placed under the year 1518.] I ſhall not quote the Bibliotheca of Konig, nor the Letters of the learned Reineſius to Daumius (10). I have a contemporary witneſs of this, who in a Letter dated the 6th of March 1518, obſerves that year had carried off ſeveral Men of Learning: Hic annus multos eximios viros tui ſimiles abſumpſit, Marcum Muſurum Romæ, tum Archiepiſcopum deſignatum, & ante hunc Paleotum Camillum, Lutetiæ Fauſtum immortalitate dignum (11). i. e. "This year has "cut off ſeveral excellent Men of merit like you, "Marcus Muſurus at Rome then Archbiſhop elect, and "before him Paleotus Camillus, and at Paris Fauſtus, "who deſerved immortality." However it would be wrong to conclude from theſe words, that Andrelinus died in 1518; for it is certain that Muſurus died in the year 1517 (12).

(10) Pag. 15.

(11) Eraſm. Ep. 20. lib. 3. ad Petrum Barbirium. See likewiſe Epiſt. 24. of the 2d book.

(12) See the remarks upon his Article.

[F] It is Eraſmus, who acquaints us with theſe little particulars.] The reader will be pleaſed to ſee them in the original. Pariſienſis Academiæ candorem ac civilitatem jam olim ſum admiratus, quæ tot annos Fauſtum tulerit, nec tulerit ſolum, verum etiam aluerit evexeritque. Cum Fauſtum dico, multa tibi (13) ſuccurrunt quæ nolim literis committere. Quâ petulantia ſolitus eſt ille in Theologorum ordinem debacchari? Quam non caſta erat illius profeſſio? Neque cuiquam obſcurum erat qualis eſſet vita. Tantum malorum Galli doctrinæ hominis condonabant, quæ tamen ultra mediocritatem non admodum erat progreſſa (14). That is, "I have long admired the good nature and "eaſineſs of the Univerſity of Paris, which bore "Fauſtus for ſo many years, and even maintained

(13) He wrote this to Ludovicus Vives.

(14) Eraſm. Ep. 20. lib. 21. pag. 1090.

But I thought it more modeſt to give the corrections, which have been ſuggeſted to me, diſtinct by themſelves [G]. You will find them in a remark below.

" and raiſed him. When I mention Fauſtus, many " things will occur to you, which I would not " commit to a letter. With what inſolence did he " uſe to abuſe the whole body of Divines? How " ſcandalous was his manner of life? Every body " knew this very well. And yet the French excuſed " theſe things on account of his learning, tho' even " that was not very conſiderable." Obſerve the difference of ſtyle between the letters, which Eraſmus wrote to Andrelinus, and thoſe, which he wrote to others concerning him. Tho' it is true, he does ſometimes ſpeak of him with commendation in his letters to other perſons (15).

(15) See the remark [E].

[G] I ſhall give.... the corrections, which have been ſuggeſted to me, &c.] Here are word for word the remarks, which Mr. de la Monnoie was ſo kind as to communicate. " I. Inſtead of P. Fauſtus, it " ſhould have been given at length Publius Fauſtus, " leaſt the P. ſhould be miſtaken for Peter, Paul, or " ſome other Chriſtian name. Fauſtus very probably " aſſumed this name of Publius at Rome, after the " example of the Academicians, who are lovers of " antiquities, of whom Pomponius Lætus was the " Head II. It ſhould not be ſaid in the Dictionary, " that Fauſtus was ſimply Profeſſor of Poetry in the " Univerſity of Paris. For he taught there not only Poetry, but Rhetoric, and the Doctrine of the " Sphere. He likewiſe explained David's Pſalms. " III. It was at Rome, long before the reign of " Lewis XII, that Fauſtus, who was then but twenty " two years old, received the crown of Laurel (16). " His Love-Verſes, divided into four books, intitled Livia from the name of his Miſtreſs, were " eſteemed ſo fine by the Roman Academy, that " they adjudged the prize of the Latin Elegy to the " Author above the other Poets his rivals. It is upon this account, that when he printed his Livia " in 4to at Paris in 1490, and his three books of E- " logies four years after in the ſame city, he took " upon him the title of Poeta Laureatus, to which " he added that of Poeta Regius and Regineus, as he " was Poet to Charles VIII, Lewis XII, and Queen " Anne. IV. To make up the thirty years, during " which Fauſtus was Profeſſor at Paris, we muſt ſuppoſe, that Eraſmus made this calculation in the " year 1517. By this means we ſhall carry it to " 1487, which is about the time of Fauſtus's ſettling " at Paris. This Chronology is the more certain, " becauſe there was in 1517 an edition of the Adages " of Eraſmus (17), which he mentions in the Adage " Chænici ne inſideas. V. The Diſtichs of Fauſtus " are not above two hundred, and conſequently but " a very ſmall part of his Poems, ſince beſides the " four books of Love, and the three books of miſ- " cellaneous Elegies, which I mentioned, there are " twelve Eclogues of his, printed in 8vo in 1546 in " the Collection of thirty eight Bucolic Poets publiſh- " ed by Oporinus. Fauſtus promiſed ſeveral other " pieces in proſe and verſe, Decem Satiras morales; " Epiſtolas centum; Chriſtianum Adventum, which is " perhaps the ſame, which is called in another place " Opus de vera Religione; Sphæricum Dialogum; Repertorium, ſive Obſervationes Linguæ Latinæ."

(16) This falls upon Leander Alberti, whom I quoted.

(17) The fault of Eraſmus conſiſts, as I have obſerved in the remark [A], in his not having changed the Chronology in the later editions.

What is wanting to my article of Andrelinus, would have been inſerted here, if I could but have procured the works of this Author. But not having that opportunity, I was obliged to follow thoſe, who have mentioned him without ever conſulting his writings; and thus the blind have led the blind. It is a great misfortune, when a perſon is compoſing ſuch a Dictionary as this, not to have all the neceſſary books; but it is a misfortune, which I cannot poſſibly remedy in the ſituation, which I am in.

☞ANDREWS (LANCELOT) an eminent Engliſh Divine and Biſhop in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in the pariſh of All-hallows Barking in the City of London (a) about the year 1555 (b). He was deſcended from an ancient family of that name in the County of Suffolk; and his father, having moſt part of his life uſed the Sea, was at laſt choſen Maſter of Trinity Houſe (c). He had his firſt education at the Cooper's Free-School in Ratcliff under Mr. Ward, from whence he was ſent to Merchant-Taylors School, where he made a prodigious progreſs under Mr. Mulcaſter in the Greek and Hebrew Languages; ſo that Dr. Thomas Watts, Prebendary and Reſidentiary of St. Paul's, and Archdeacon of Middleſex, who had lately founded ſome Scholarſhips in Pembroke-Hall in Cambridge, beſtowed the firſt of thoſe Scholarſhips upon him (d). He took his Degree of Batchelor of Arts, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo highly, that he was choſen Fellow [A], and continued there, till Mr. Hugh Price, Founder of Jeſus College in Oxford, named him, without his knowledge, for one of his firſt Fellows there (e). During his reſidence in the two Univerſities he ſhewed the moſt intenſe application to his ſtudies imaginable [B]. His merit became now ſo con-

(a) Fuller's Church Hiſtory, Book 11. § 46. and his Abel Redivivus, or Lives and Deaths of the Modern Divines, London 1651, in 4to. The Life of our Author in that collection was written by Mr. Iſaackſon, as appears by Dr. Fuller's Preface.

(b) His epitaph informs us, that he died in 1626, in the 71ſt year of his age.

(c) Abel Redivivus, ubi ſupra.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid. See Wood. Hiſtor. & Antiq. Univerſitat. Oxon. lib. 2, p. 325.

[A] Diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo highly, that he was choſen Fellow.] As ſoon as he was a Batchelor of Arts, and therefore capable of a Fellowſhip, there being then but one place vacant in the Hall, and Mr. Thomas Dove, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, being then a Scholar likewiſe in the ſame College, and extremely well approved of by many of the Society, the Maſter and Fellows put theſe two young men to a trial before them by ſome ſcholaſtical exerciſes; upon the performance of which they preferred our Author, and choſe him into the Fellowſhip. However they formed ſo high an opinion of Mr. Dove's abilities, that being unwilling to loſe him, they made him ſome allowance for his preſent maintenance, under the title of a Tanquam Socius (1).

(1) Abel Redivi. ubi ſupra.

[B] He ſhewed the moſt intenſe application to his ſtudies.] He employed even the uſual vacations in the improvement of himſelf in various parts of uſeful knowledge. For his cuſtom was, after he had been three years in the Univerſity, to go to London once a year to viſit his parents, and this was always a fortnight before Eaſter, ſtaying till a fortnight after. Againſt which time, his father being directed by letters from him prepared a perſon to inſtruct him in ſome language or art, which he had not attained before: ſo that within a few years he had laid the foundations of all arts and ſciences, and had gained a conſiderable knowledge in moſt of the modern languages. It is likewiſe remarkable, that in his journeys between London and Cambridge he always uſed to walk on foot till he was a Batchelor of Divinity; and profeſſed, that he would not even then have rid on horſeback, but to avoid the imputation, that it was merely to ſave charges. He never loved nor uſed any games or ordinary recreations; but his common exerciſe was walking either alone by himſelf or with ſome ſelect companion, with whom he might engage in an agreeable and uſeful converſation. And he would often profeſs, that to obſerve the graſs, herbs, corn, trees, cattle, earth, waters, and heavens, and to contemplate their natures, orders, qualities, virtues, and uſes, was to him the moſt exquiſite entertainment imaginable. After he had been ſome time Maſter of Arts, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, in which he made ſo prodigious an advance, that his reputation grew very extenſive and conſiderable; ſo that when he was choſen Catechiſt in the College, and read upon the Ten Commandments conſpicuous, that Henry Earl of Huntingdon ſent for him to attend him into the North, of which he was Preſident, where he converted ſeveral Recuſants, and among them ſome Prieſts, to the Proteſtant Religion (f). He gained likewiſe the favour of Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth; and that great Man would never ſuffer him to take any country benefice, leſt he with his great Learning ſhould be buried in obſcurity. His intent was to make him Reader of Controverſies in Cambridge; and for his maintenance, he aſſigned to him the leaſe of the Parſonage of Alton in Hampſhire, which after his death he returned to his Lady, which ſhe never knew or thought of (g). By his intereſt he was made Vicar of St. Giles Cripplegate London; then Prebendary and Reſidentiary of St. Paul's; and afterwards Prebendary of the Collegiate Church of Southwell (h). Upon the deceaſe of Dr. Fulke he was elected Maſter of Pembroke-Hall, a place of greater honour than profit, for he always ſpent more upon it than he received by it (i). He was afterwards made Chaplain in Ordinary (of which office there were then but twelve) to Queen Elizabeth, who was ſo highly pleaſed with his preaching and behaviour, that ſhe made him in 1597 Prebendary of Weſtminſter, and Dean of that Church in 1601 (k). He ſoon grew into great eſteem with her Succeſſor King James I, who admired him above all other Divines, on account of his ſolid and extenſive Learning; and conferred upon him in 1605, October 16, the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter, in which he was conſecrated the third of November following (l), and made him Lord Almoner, and ſoon after added the Rectory of Cheyham in Surry, which he held in commendam (m). From this See he was tranſlated to that of Ely Sept. 22, 1609 (n), and made a Privy Counſellor, firſt of England, and then of Scotland, in his attendance on the King thither (o). He was preferred to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter Feb. 18, 1618 (p), and appointed Dean of the King's Chapel. The manner of the acquiſition of theſe dignities was very honourable to him [C]. His ſkill in the controverſies with the Papiſts endeared him to King James, for his Majeſty having in his Defence of the Right of Kings (q) aſſerted the authority of Chriſtian Princes in cauſes, and over Perſons Eccleſiaſtical, Cardinal Bellarmin, under the name of Matthew Tortus, attacked him with prodigious acrimony and virulence. The King ſcorning to reply, our Biſhop took the cauſe upon himſelf, and with great ſpirit and judgment anſwered the Cardinal [D]. In the Life of Mr. Waller the Poet we (f) See his Funeral Sermon by the Biſhop of Ely, ſubjoined to the 2d edition of Biſhop Andrews's Sermons in 1631. p. 18.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Abel Redivivus. ubi ſupra.

(i) Ibid.

(k) Ibid. and Wood, Faſti Oxon. Vol. 1. Col. 122. edit. 2. 1721.

(l) See Le Neve, Faſti Eccleſ. Angl. p. 58.

(m) Abel Rediviv. ubi ſupra.

(n) Le Neve, pag. 70.

(o) Abel Rediv.

(p) Le Neve, p. 287.

(q) Printed among his Works, p. 427.

ments every Saturday and Sunday at three a clock in the afternoon, (which was the hour of catechizing,) a great many perſons of the other Colleges, and even out of the country, duly reſorted to the College Chapel, as a publick Divinity Lecture. He was likewiſe particularly eminent for his skill in Caſuiſtry, and very much conſulted in that point (2).

(2) Ibid.

[C] The manner of the acquiſition of theſe dignities was very honourable to him.] Tho' they were many, and of great importance, yet he never made uſe of any means to obtain them; but they were all conferred upon him without the leaſt ſollicitation on his part. For he was ſo far from ambition or covetouſneſs, that when the Biſhopricks of Salisbury and Ely were ſeveral times offered to him upon ſome propoſitions prejudicial to the ſtate of thoſe Churches, he abſolutely refuſed them (3). It is remarkable, that when he was Almoner, Dean of the Chapel, and Privy Counſellor to King James I, and King Charles I, he interpoſed very little in civil and temporal affairs, eſteeming them foreign to his profeſſion and character; but in cauſes, which related to the Church and the Duties of his function, he exerted himſelf with great vigour (4).

(3) Ibid. and his Funeral Sermon, p. 18.

(4) Funeral Sermon. p. 19.

[D] With great ſpirit and judgment anſwered the Cardinal.] His book was entitled, Tortura Torti: ſive, ad Matthæi Torti Librum Reſponſio, qui nuper editus contra Apologiam ſereniſſimi potentiſſimique Principis Jacobi, Dei Gratia, Magnæ Britanniæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Regis, pro Juramento Fidelitatis. It was printed at London by Roger Barker, the King's Printer in 1609 in 4to, pagg. 402, and dedicated to the King by the Author, who was then Biſhop of Chicheſter. Caſaubon calls it in his Epiſtle to Fronto Ducæus the Jeſuit, a work of the greateſt accuracy and diligence imaginable: Exactiſſimæ fidei & diligentiæ ſcriptum. The preſent Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his Appeal to all the true Members of the Church of England in behalf of the King's Supremacy (5), obſerves, that what our Author aſſerts, and with great force of reaſon and evidence of antiquity defends, is to this effect: "That Kings have power both to "call Synods, and to confirm them; and to do all "other things, which the Emperors heretofore di"ligently did do; and which the Biſhops of thoſe "times willingly acknowledged of right to belong "to them." Ut conſiſtat adhuc poteſtai ſua Regibus, quâ & ſynodos convocare, & confirmare poſſent; & obire reliqua omnia, quæ & olim qui Imperatores diligenter obierunt, & qui tum Epiſcopi libenter agnoverunt (6). And 1, that to Chriſtian Princes belongs the ſole right of calling Synods, the Biſhop evinces from the Hiſtory of the General Councils, which were aſſembled under them (7); and from the examples of thoſe, which were afterwards held under Charles the Emperor (8). 2. That having aſſembled them, they have a right of inſpecting and examining, of approving and rejecting their Acts, he likewiſe proves beyond all poſſible diſpute (9). "You "know, ſays he (10), how Conſtantine wrote to the "Synod of Tyre: All you, as many as made up the "Synod of Tyre, haſten without delay to come to "us, and ſhew us truly how ſincerely and righte"ouſly ye have judged, and that before me, whom "even ye will not deny to be a ſincere ſervant of "God." Scis quid ad (11) Synodum Epiſcoporum Tyri. Cuncti quotquot Synodum Tyri complêſtis, ſine morâ ad pietatis noſtræ caſtra properetis, ac reipſa quam ſincerè ac rectè judicaveritis, oſtendatis, idque coram me, quem ſincerum eſſe Dei miniſtrum neque vos ſanè negabitis. 3. The Biſhop adds, that they may come to, and make a part of the Synod (12), and then ſums up the royal authority in this manner (13); "Put this together: The King aſſembles the "Synod; the Synod preſumes to do nothing with"out his knowledge. The King commits the whole "affair to their power. They by virtue of his "Princely Command proceed to do what was need"ful to be done." Collige jam: Synodum ibi Rex congregat; illa ſine Regis notitiâ nihil præſumit: Rex illorum poteſtati rem committit: illi ſecundum principalia præcepta, quæ hoc illorum tribuunt poteſtati, faciunt quod facto opus eſt. This manner of reaſoning of the Biſhop's is exactly conformable to the doctrine, which he maintained upon another very remarkable occaſion, which was as follows (14): King James being diſſatisfied with the proceedings of the Presbyterian Miniſters in Scotland, for holding a general Aſſembly at Aberdeen contrary to his command, ſent for a certain number of the moſt eminent of them to come up to him at London, and ſatisfy him in ſome things, in which he thought that he had reaſon to complain of them. He delivered to theſe Miniſters three queries relating to his

(5) P. 56, 57.

(6) Tortura Torti, p. 177.

(7) Ibid. p. 165.

(8) Ibid. p. 164.

(9) Ibid. p. 162, 164.

(10) Ib. p. 173.

(11) Socrat. l. 1. c. 34.

(12) Ibi p. 174.

(13) Ib. p. 176.

(14) See Dr. Wake's Appeal, p. 58, &c. and Spotſwood, l. 7. p. 486.

we have a very agreeable ſtory related of him when he was Biſhop of Winchester [E].

his authority in eccleſiaſtical affairs, and demanded their ſeveral anſwers to them. The ſecond of theſe queſtions was this (15); Whether they acknowledge his Majeſty, by the authority of his prerogative royal, as a Chriſtian King, to have lawful and full power, to convocate, prorogate, and cauſe deſert, upon juſt and neceſſary cauſes known to him, the Aſſemblies of the Kirk, within his Majeſty's Dominions? During the courſe of this tranſaction, the King cauſed four of his Engliſh Biſhops on certain days appointed to them, to preach before him at Hampton-Court, and commanded the Scots Miniſters to be preſent at their Sermons. The third of theſe turns fell upon our Author, at that time Biſhop of Chicheſter, whoſe ſubject aſſigned him by the King was to prove the power of Princes in convocating Synods and Councils. We ſhall give an abſtract and ſome paſſages of this Sermon, that the reader may form ſome idea of the genius and manner of the Author. He premiſed theſe two points (16); 1, That when the Prince calls, the Clergy are to meet: And 2, That they are not to meet of themſelves, unleſs he calls them. The proof of theſe points he thus purſues; 1, From the Law of God (17), confirmed by the Law of Nature and Nations (18). 2, From matter of fact before Chriſt, from Moſes to the Maccabees in the Jewiſh Church (19): After Chriſt, from Conſtantine till a thouſand years after Chriſt; 1, By General Councils: 2, By national and provincial Councils, aſſembled: 3, Under Emperors: and 4, Kings, by the ſpace of many hundred years (20). This is the ſubſtance of his Sermon; from whence we ſhall proceed to extract ſome paſſages from it. I. In ſpeaking of the Law of Nations he has this remark (21); "The Law of Nations in this point (both before the "Law written, and ſince where the Law written "was not known) might eaſily appear, if time would "ſuffer, both in their general order for Conventions "ſo to be called, and in their general oppoſing to "all Conventicles called otherwiſe. Verily the "Heathen Laws made all ſuch Aſſemblies unlawful, "which the higheſt authority did not cauſe to meet; "yea, tho' they were ἱερῶν ὀργίων ἕνεκα, ſay Solon's "Laws, yea tho' ſub prætextu Religionis, ſay the "Roman Laws. Neither did the Chriſtian Empe"rors think good to abate any thing of that right; "nay they took more ſtraight order." II. Concluding his account of the Jewiſh ſtate, he has theſe words (22): Thus from Moſes to the Maccabees, we ſee in whoſe hands this power was. And what ſhould I ſay more? There was in all God's people no one religious King, but this power he practiſed. And there was of all God's Prophets no one that ever interpoſed any prohibition againſt it.... What ſhall we ſay then? Were all theſe wrong? Shall we condemn them all?.... Yet to this we are come now, that either we muſt condemn them all, the one after another; the Kings as Uſurpers, for taking on them to uſe more power than ever orderly they received; the Prophets for ſoothers of them in that their unjuſt claim: or elſe confeſs, that they did no more than they might, and exceeded not therein the bounds of their calling. And indeed that we muſt confeſs, for that is the truth. III. In treating of General Councils he thus ſpeaks of that of Nice (23). "At Nice there were together "three hundred and eighteen Biſhops, totius orbis "lumina, (as Victorinus well termeth them) the "Lights of the whole world, the chiefeſt and "choiceſt men for holineſs, learning, virtue, and "valour, that the Chriſtian Religion ever had be"fore or ſince; men, that had laid down their "lives for the teſtimony of the truth. Did any of "them refuſe to come being called by him (Con"ſtantine) as not called aright? Or coming was "there any of them, that did proteſt againſt it, or "pleaded the Church's intereſt to meet of them"ſelves? Not one.... Verily the Council of Nice, "(which is, and ever had been ſo much admired by "all Chriſtians) cannot be excuſed before God or "men, if they thus conſpired (all) to betray the "Church's right; and ſuffered it, contrary to all "equity, to be carried away; leaving a dangerous "precedent therein for all Councils, ever after, to "the world's end..... There is no man of reaſon, "but will think it reaſonable, if this were the "Church's own peculiar, if appropriate unto it, "(and ſo known to them to be) there ought to have "been plain dealing now, at the very firſt Council "of all, that if Conſtantine would embrace Religion, "he muſt needs reſign up one of his trumpets, and "forbear to meddle with their Aſſemblies." IV. But it may be, continues the Biſhop (24), General Councils have a faſhion by themſelves. Thoſe Congregations may be called thus; but National or Provincial ſuch as ours, how? Even ſo too, and no otherwiſe.... Yea I add this, which is a point to be conſidered, that even then when the Emperors were profeſſed Arians, even then did the Biſhops acknowledge their power to call Councils; come to them being called; ſued to them, that they might be called.... And ſometimes they ſped,... and ſometimes not. And yet when they ſped not, they held themſelves quiet, and never preſumed to draw together of their own heads. "But it may be this was ſome Imperial power, and "that the Emperors had in this point more juriſdic"tion than Kings? Not that neither. For about "five hundred years after Chriſt, when the Empire "fell in pieces, and theſe Weſtern parts came into "the hands of Kings, thoſe Kings had, held, and "enjoyed, and practiſed the ſame power,..." If it be excepted then, that there are of the (Provincial and National) Councils, which carry in their Acts no mention how they were called; for them we are to underſtand, that after the Decrees of the firſt Nicene Council were by Conſtantine's Edict confirmed, wherein, as likewiſe in the Council of Chalcedon, it was ordered, that each Province ſhould yearly hold their Synods twice..... We are to conceive the Emperor's authority was in all afterwards, habitually at leaſt. V. "But "what ſay you to the three hundred years before "Conſtantine? How went Aſſemblies then?..... "Truly even as the Jews did before in Egypt under "the Tyranny of Pharaoh. They were then a Church "under perſecution, till Moſes was raiſed up by "God, a lawful Magiſtrate over them.... No Ma"giſtrate did aſſemble them in Egypt, and good rea"ſon, they had none then to do it..... True it is "therefore, that before Conſtantine's time, they "met together as they durſt, and took ſuch order "as they could..... But when Conſtantine came in "Moſes's place, it was lawful for him to do as Moſes "did. And ſo he did; and they never ſaid to him, "..... Look how we have done hitherto, we will "do ſo even ſtill; meet no otherwiſe now, than in "former times we have, by our own agreement.... "No, but they went to him, as to Moſes, for their "meetings. At his hands they ſought them: with"out his leave or liking, they would not attempt "them. Yea (I dare ſay) they bleſſed God from "their hearts, that they had lived to ſee the day, "that they might now aſſemble by the ſound of "the trumpet." To conclude this point then; theſe two times or eſtates of the Church, are not to be confounded. There is a plain difference between them, and a diverſe reſpect to be had of each. If the ſucceſſion of Magiſtrates be interrupted, in ſuch caſe, of neceſſity, the Church of herſelf maketh ſupply, becauſe then God's order ceaſeth. But God granting a Conſtantine to them again, God's former poſitive order returneth, and the caſe is to proceed and go on, as before..... In a word, none can ſeek to have the congregation ſo called (as before Conſtantine) but they muſt ſecretly and by implication confeſs they are a perſecuted Church, as that then was; without a Moſes, without a Conſtantine. Having thus ſtated his judgment in this important point, let us ſee what application he made of what he advanced. "You may "pleaſe to remember, ſays he (25), there was not "long ſince a Clergy in place, that was wholly ad "oppoſitum, and would never have yielded to reform "ought. Nothing they would do; and (in the eye of "Law) without them nothing could be done. They "had encroached the power of aſſembling into their "own hands? How then? How ſhall we do for an Aſ"ſembly? Then—the Prince had this power, and to "him of right it belonged. This was then good Divi"nity. And what Writer is there extant of thoſe times, "but it may be turned to in him? And was it good

(15) See Calderwood, Hiſt. pag. 543.

(16) See his Sermons upon ſeveral Occaſions, p. 105.

(17) Sermons, p. 104, 105.

(18) Ib. p. 106.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Ib. p. 108.

(21) Ib. p. 106.

(22) Ib. p. 107.

(23) Ibid. pag. 108, 109.

(24) Ib. p. 110, 111, &c.

(25) Ib. p. 113.

cheſter [E]. His publick and domeſtick character was great and noble. He was exemplary in his devotions, and his charity was very extenſive [F]. His fidelity and integrity in all parts of life were firm and unſhaken [G]. He had a warm ſenſe of gratitude, which extended " Divinity then, and is it now no longer ſo? Was " the King but licenſed for a while to hold this " power, till another Clergy were in, and muſt he " then be deprived of it again? Was it then uſurp- " ed from Princes; and are now Princes Uſurpers of " it themſelves? Nay I truſt.... we will be better " adviſed, and not thus go againſt ourſelves, and " let truth be no longer truth, than it will ſerve " our turns." Our Author concludes his Sermon with theſe words: It remaineth that as God by his Law hath taken this order, and his people in former ages have kept this order, that we do ſo too; that we ſay, as God ſaith, Erunt tibi. This power pertaineth unto Moſes; and that neither with Core we ſay, Non veniemus, We will not come; nor with Demetrius run together of ourſelves, and think to carry it away with crying, Great is Diana. But as we ſee the power is of God, ſo truly to acknowledge it, and dutifully to yield to it. That ſo they, whoſe it is, may quietly hold it, and laudably uſe it to his glory, that gave it, and to their good, for whom it was given.

[E] A very agreeable ſtory related of him, when he was Biſhop of Wincheſter.] Mr. Waller having been choſen into the laſt Parliament of King James I, in which he ſerved as Burgeſs for Agmondeſham in Buckinghamſhire, and that Parliament being diſſolved, on the day of its diſſolution he went out of curioſity or reſpect to ſee the King at dinner, with whom were our Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Dr. Neal Biſhop of Durham, ſtanding behind the King's chair. There happened ſomething very extraordinary in the converſation, which thoſe Prelates had with the King, on which Mr. Waller often reflected. We ſhall relate it as it is repreſented in his Life (26). " His " Majeſty asked the Biſhops, My Lords, cannot I " take my ſubjects money when I want it, without all " this formality in Parliament? The Biſhop of " Durham readily anſwered, God forbid, Sir, but " you ſhou'd; you are the breath of our noſtrils. " Whereupon the King turned, and ſaid to the Bi- " ſhop of Wincheſter, Well, my Lord, what ſay " you? Sir, replied the Biſhop, I have no skill to " judge of parliamentary caſes. The King anſwered, " No put-offs, my Lord; anſwer me preſently. Then, " Sir, ſaid he, I think it lawful for you to take my " brother Neal's money, for he offers it. Mr. Wal- " ler ſaid the company was pleaſed with this anſwer, " and the wit of it ſeemed to affect the King. For " a certain Lord coming in ſoon after, his Majeſty " cry'd out, O my Lord, they ſay you LIG with my " Lady: No, Sir, ſays his Lordſhip in confuſion, but " I like her company becauſe ſhe has ſo much wit. " Why, then, ſays the King, do not you LIG with " my Lord of Wincheſter there?"

(26) Prefix'd to his Works. 9th edit. 1712. pag. 6, 7.

[F] He was exemplary in devotions, and his charity was very extenſive.] His piety ſhewed itſelf not only in his private and ſecret devotions between God and himſelf, in which thoſe, who attended him, perceived, that he daily ſpent many hours; but likewiſe in his public prayers with his family in his chapel, wherein he behaved ſo humbly, devoutly and reverently, that it could not but excite others to follow his example. His charity was remarkable even before he came to great preferments; for while he continued in a private ſtation of life, he relieved his poor pariſhioners, and aſſiſted the priſoners, beſides his conſtant Sunday alms at his pariſh of St. Giles Cripplegate. But when his fortune became greater, his charity encreaſed to a larger proportion, and he releaſed many priſoners of all ſorts, who were detained either for ſmall debts or the Keeper's fees. One circumſtance in his charity is very obſervable, that he gave ſtrict charge to his ſervants, whom he intruſted with the diſtribution of it, that they ſhould not acknowledge whence this relief came; but directed, that the acquittance, which they, in order to make the charge of their truſt appear, deſired of them, who received ſuch relief, ſhould be taken in the name of a Benefactor unknown. Other large ſums he beſtowed yearly and oftner in clothing the poor and naked, in relieving the neceſſitous, and aſſiſting families in the time of the infection, beſides his alms to poor houſe-keepers at his gate. So that his private alms in his laſt ſix years over and above his publick, amounted to above thirteen hundred pounds. He left in his Will four thouſand pounds to purcha'e two hundred pounds per annum in land for ever, to be diſtributed by fifty pounds quarterly in the following manner: To aged poor men, fifty pounds; to poor widows, the wives of one husband, fifty pounds; to the binding of poor orphans apprentices, fifty pounds; and to the relief of poor priſoners, fifty pounds. Beſides he left to be diſtributed immediately after his deceaſe among maid-ſervants of a good character, and who had ſerved one Maſter or Miſtreſs ſeven years, two hundred pounds; and a great part of his eſtate, after his funeral and legacies were diſcharged, among his poor ſervants (27). To this virtue of his we may add his hoſpitality. From the firſt time of his preferment to the laſt moments of his life, he was always hoſpitable and free in the entertainment of perſons, who deſerved reſpect, eſpecially Scholars and Strangers; his table being conſtantly furniſhed with proviſions and attendance anſwerable. He ſhewed himſelf ſo generous in his entertainments, and ſo gravely facetious, that his gueſts would often profeſs, that they never came to any man's table, where they received more ſatisfaction in all reſpects. He was at a prodigious expence in entertaining all ſorts of people in Scotland, when he attended King James thither; and it coſt him three thouſand pounds in the ſpace of three days, when that King came to viſit him at Farnham Caſtle, one of the ſeats belonging to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter (28).

(27) Abel Rediv. ubi ſupra, and his Funeral Sermon, P. 20, 21.

(28) Ib. p. 20.

[G] His fidelity and integrity in all parts of life were firm and unſhaken.] He was unblemiſhed both in his ordinary tranſactions, and in the diſcharge of his ſpiritual and temporal offices. He was always careful to keep in good repair the houſes of all his eccleſiaſtical preferments, particularly the Vicarage-houſe of St. Giles Cripplegate, the Prebend's and Dean's houſes of Weſtminſter, and the Reſidentiary's houſe of St. Paul's. He ſpent four hundred and twenty pounds upon the palaces belonging to the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter; above two thouſand four hundred and forty pounds upon that of Ely; and two thouſand pounds upon thoſe of Wincheſter, beſides a penſion of four hundred pounds per annum, from which he freed that See at his own charge. With regard to his paſtoral and epiſcopal charge, he was the moſt exact in the execution of it imaginable. He promoted men of character and abilities to the livings and preferments within his own gift. For which purpoſe he took care beforehand to enquire what hopeful young men there were in the Univerſity; and directed his Chaplains to inform him of ſuch perſons, whom he encouraged in the moſt liberal manner. He uſed to ſend for men of eminent learning, who wanted preferment, tho' they had no dependance upon him, nor intereſt in him, and entertain them in his houſe, and confer preferment upon them, and likewiſe defray their charges of a diſpenſation or faculty, and even of their journey. And this he did, that his Dioceſe in general, and his own preferments in particular might be filled with able men. If we conſider him in thoſe temporal affairs, with which he was intruſted, we ſhall find him no leſs faithful and juſt. He diſpoſed of divers conſiderable ſums, which were ſent him to be diſtributed among poor Scholars and others at his diſcretion, with the utmoſt care, and exactly agreeable to the Donor's intent. For his integrity in managing thoſe places, in which he was intruſted for others jointly with himſelf, Pembroke Hall, and the Church of Weſtminſter were ſufficient evidences. For when he became Maſter of the former, he found it in debt, having then but a ſmall endowment; however by his care he left above eleven hundred pounds in the treaſury of that College. And when he was Dean of the latter, he left it free from all debts and extended even to the relations of thoſe who had obliged him [H]. His behaviour was influenced by an open and generous humanity and affability, and an unaffected modeſty [I]. Nor did he, even in the higheſt dignities which he poſſeſſed, remit of his application to ſtudy [K]. He had a particular averſion to three vices above all others, Uſury, Simony and Sacrilege [L]. Dr. Fuller obſerves (r), that King James had ſo great an awe of and veneration for him, that in his preſence he refrained from that mirth and levity in which he indulged himſelf at other times. His reputation for learning and genius was univerſally allowed. He underſtood a great variety of Languages, at leaſt fifteen (s), and was particularly converſant in the Oriental Tongues (t). Caſaubon extols his ſkill in all kinds of learning (u). Spanheim calls him a Prelate of a moſt

(r) Church Hiſtory, Book 11. § 46.

(s) Fuller, Abel Rediv. ubi ſupra.

(t) Idem. Church Hiſtory, ubi ſupra.

(u) Epiſt. ad Fronton. Ducæum.

and encroachments; and took ſuch care of the School, that the Scholars were much improved not only by his direction and ſuperintendence, but even by his own perſonal labours among them. Add to this, that as by virtue of his Deanery of Weſtminſter, his Maſterſhip of Pembroke Hall, and his Biſhoprick of Ely, the election of Scholars into Weſtminſter School, and from thence into the two Univerſities, and of many Scholars and Fellows into Pembroke Hall, ſome in Peter Houſe, and ſome in Jeſus College, were in his power and diſpoſal, he was always ſo juſt, that he waved all letters from great Perſonages for inſufficient Scholars, and diveſted himſelf of all partiality, and choſe only ſuch, as he thought had moſt merit. Being likewiſe often deſired to aſſiſt at the election of Scholars from the Free-ſchools of Merchant-Taylors, St. Paul's, and the Mercers, and perceiving favour and intereſt ſometimes over-ballancing merit with thoſe, to whom the choice belonged, and that divers good Scholars were omitted, and others preferred, he frequently took care of ſuch as were neglected, and ſent them to the Univerſity, where he beſtowed preferment upon them. To conclude this part of his character, let us take a view of his fidelity in that great place of truſt, the Almonerſhip. He never would ſuffer any part of what aroſe to him from that place to be mingled with his own rents or revenues; and was extremely exact in diſpoſing of it. When he found a ſurplus over and above the ordinary charges, he diſtributed it in the relief of the indigent and diſtreſſed; tho' it was in his power to have applied this to his own uſe, (his Patent being ſine computo,) and no perſon could have queſtioned him concerning it (29).

(29) Abel Rediv. ubi ſupra.

[H] He had a warm ſenſe of gratitude, which extended even to the relations of thoſe who had obliged him.] He gave a great many noble inſtances of this virtue. He beſtowed upon Dr. Ward, ſon to his firſt School-Maſter, the living of Waltham in Hampſhire. He ſhewed the utmoſt regard for Mr. Mulcaſter, his other School-Maſter, in all companies, and always placed him at the upper end of his table; and after his death cauſed his picture (though he had but few others in his houſe) to be ſet over his ſtudy door. Beſides theſe external marks of gratitude he ſupplied his neceſſities privately in a very liberal manner, and left his ſon a valuable legacy. He enquired very carefully after the kindred of Dr. Watts, who, as we obſerved in the text of this Article, had ſent him to Pembroke Hall, and having found out one, he conferred upon him preferments in that College. Nor did he forget his patron Dr. Watts in his Will; for he ordered there, that out of the Scholarſhips of his foundation, the two Fellowſhips, which himſelf had founded in that College, ſhould be ſupplied, if the Candidates ſhould be fit for them. To omit the legacies which he left to the pariſh of St. Giles Cripplegate, St. Martin Ludgate where he had lived, St. Andrew's Holbourn, St. Saviour's Southwark, All-Hallows Barking, where he was born, and others; he gave to Pembroke Hall one thouſand pounds to purchaſe lands for two Fellowſhips, and for other uſes in that College, expreſſed in his Will; beſides three hundred ſuch folio books of his own as were not in the Library there, with ſeveral other valuable gifts (30).

(30) Ibid. and his Funeral Sermon, p. 20, 21.

[I] An open and generous humanity and affability, and an unaffected modeſty.] His humanity extended to every perſon who converſed with him; ſo that he was admired not only by the Men of Learning and others in this Kingdom, but even by Foreigners of the greateſt eminence, particularly Caſaubon, Cluverius, Voſſius, who correſponded with him by letters, Grotius, Peter du Moulin, Barclay, the Author of the Argenis, and Erpenius, to whom he offered an annual ſtipend to read Lectures here in the Oriental Tongues, the Profeſſors of which he encouraged very liberally, and particularly Mr. Bedwell, to whom he gave the Vicarage of Tottenham in Middleſex. His modeſty was ſo remarkable, that though the whole Chriſtian world admired his profound Learning, he was ſo far from being elated with the opinion of it, that he often complained of his defects; and when he was preferred to the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter, and urged his own inſufficiency for ſuch a charge, he cauſed theſe words of St. Paul (31), Et ad hæc quis idoneus? i. e. "And who is ſufficient "for theſe things?" to be engraven about his Epiſcopal Seal. One inſtance of his modeſty mixed with his humanity may be added, that after his Chaplains had preached in his Chapel before him, he would ſometimes privately requeſt them, that he might have a ſight of their notes, and encourage them in the kindeſt terms imaginable.

(31) 2 Cor. ii. 16.

[K] Nor did he in the higheſt dignities, which he poſſeſſed, remit of his application to ſtudy.] Even in thoſe days, when it might have been ſuppoſed, that he would have taken ſome eaſe from his former pains, from the hour he roſe (his private devotions being finiſhed) to the time he was called to dinner, which, by his own order, was not till twelve at noon at the ſooneſt, he continued at his ſtudies, and would not be interrupted by any, who came to ſpeak to him, or upon any occaſion, publick prayer excepted. So that he would be diſpleaſed with ſcholars, who attempted to ſpeak with him in the morning, and ſaid, that he doubted they were no true ſcholars, who came to ſpeak with him before noon. After dinner for two or three hours ſpace he would willingly paſs the time, either in diſcourſe with his gueſts or other friends, or in diſpatch of his own temporal affairs, or of thoſe, who by reaſon of his Epiſcopal Juriſdiction attended him. Having diſcharged which he returned to his ſtudy, where he ſpent the reſt of the afternoon, even till bed-time, except ſome friend engaged him to ſupper, and then he eat but ſparingly (32).

(32) Abel Rediv. ubi ſupra.

[L] He had a particular averſion .... to Uſury, Simony, and Sacrilege.] He was ſo far from the firſt, that when his friends had occaſion for ſuch a ſum of money as he could aſſiſt them with, he lent it to them freely, without expecting any thing in return but the principal. Simony was ſo deteſtable to him, that by refuſing to admit ſeveral perſons, whom he ſuſpected to be ſimoniacally preferred, he ſuffered much by Law-ſuits, chooſing rather to be compelled to admit them by Law, than voluntarily to do that, which his conſcience made a ſcruple of. With regard to the livings and other preferments which fell in his own gifts, he always beſtowed them freely, as we obſerved above (33), upon men of merit, without any ſollicitation. So that the ſame character was applied to him, as had been to Robert Winchelſey, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Beneficia Eccleſiaſtica nunquam niſi doctis contulit; precibus ac gratiâ Nobilium fretos & ambientes ſemper repulit. i. e. "He never conferred Ec"cleſiaſtical Benefices upon any but men of learning, "and always rejected thoſe who depended upon the "ſollicitations and favour of the Nobility, and were "eager in their purſuits of preferment." The laſt thing which he had a peculiar averſion to was Sacrilege; ſo that when the Biſhoprick of Sarum and that of Ely were offered to him upon terms, which favoured that way, he abſolutely rejected them. With reſpect to that of Sarum, we may obſerve here a very remarkable paſſage of his, which happened many years

(33) Note [G]. See his Funeral Sermon, p. 21.

(x) Acutiſſimi & acerrimi Judicii ac ſtyli Præſul. See Leigh's Fælix Conſortium, l. 3. c. 3. London 1663.
(y) L. 3. c. 53. Vir longè doctiſſimus.

moſt acute and ſagacious judgment (x), and Voſſius in his book de Vitiis Sermonis (y) gives him the character of a man of moſt accompliſhed learning. What opinion the greateſt men of our own nation at that time had of him, will appear from the note [M]. And to come nearer our own times, Mr. Wood ſtiles him (z) the moſt eminent Divine of our nation in his time. And the preſent Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Wake, in his Appeal to all the true members of the Church of England, &c. (aa), gives him the titles of a learned and great Prelate, and tells us, that there was no man in that time, or perhaps in any other age of the church, that was either fitter to deliver the ſenſe of our Clergy, or better qualified to maintain it. However, his ſtyle and manner of writing are very peculiar, and though generally admired in that age [N], are extremely excepted againſt by the beſt Critics of the preſent. Nay, we even find in Fuller (bb), that a certain Author (cc),

(z) Faſti Oxon. Vol. 1. Col. 122.
(aa) Printed at London 1698. p. 60, 66 and 67.
(bb) Ubi ſupra, § 48.

years after his refuſal of it, and was as follows. At a Parliament under King James, when an Act was to paſs concerning Sherburne Caſtle, it was remarked, that only Biſhop Andrews and another gave their votes againſt the ſame. There was no wonder that the other ſhould do ſo, but that the Biſhop ſhould act thus, when none but the other Lord joined with him, appeared ſo ſurprizing, that he was demanded by a great perſon what his reaſon was for it. He replied, that it could not well be wondered at, why he ſhould now vote againſt that, which if he would have yielded unto (many years before, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth) he might have had this Biſhoprick of Sarum. This reaſon being told to the Prince, afterwards King Charles I, who was preſent at the paſſing of the Act, he blamed him, that when he denied his aſſent, he did not declare the reaſon of his denial alſo; aſſuring him, that if he had been acquainted with the ſtate of the caſe, as now he was, he would with the King his father's permiſſion have laboured againſt paſſing of that Act. To conclude this point, he went yet a degree further in refuſing when he was Biſhop of Wincheſter divers conſiderable ſums to renew ſome leaſes, becauſe he conceived that the renewing of them might be prejudicial to his ſucceſſors (34).

(34) Abel Redivi. ubi ſupra, and his Funeral Sermon, p. 20.

[M] What opinion the greateſt men of our own nation at that time had of him will appear from the note.] We have the following paſſage in his Funeral Sermon (35) preached by Dr. John Buckeridge Biſhop of Ely. " I ſpeake my knowledge of him in many " things. I loved and honoured him for above thirty " years ſpace. I loved him, I confeſs, but yet Ju- " dicio non obſtat amor, qui ex judicio natus eſt; " My love doth not blind or out-ſway my judgment, " becauſe it proceeded from judgment. Of whom " what can I ſay leſſe, than that he was Vitâ innocen- " tiſſimus, ingenio florentiſſimus, & propoſito ſanctiſ- " ſimus; In his life was moſt innocent, in his know- " ledge and learning moſt flouriſhing and eminent, " and in his purpoſe and life moſt holy and devout. " Whoſe carriage was ſo happy, Quem nemo vitu- " perat, niſi etiam laudet; No man could ever diſ- " commend him, but will he nill he, he muſt with- " all commend him. And no man's words were " able to diſgrace him; Vera, neceſſe eſt, benedicat; " falſa vita moreſque ſuperant; they that ſpake truth " of him, could not but ſpeake well of him; and " if they ſpake falſely of him, his life and manners " did confute them." In the dedication of his Sermons to King Charles I, we have the following character of him by Dr. William Laud then Biſhop of London, and the Biſhop of Ely abovementioned. The perſon, whoſe works theſe are, was from his youth a man of extraordinary worth and note. A man, as if he had beene made up of learning and virtue, both of them ſo eminent in him, as 'tis hard to judge, which had precedency and greater intereſt. His virtue (which we muſt ſtill judge the more worthy in any man) was comparable to that, which was wont to be found in the primitive Biſhops of the Church. And had he lived among thoſe ancient Fathers, his virtue would have ſhined even amongſt thoſe virtuous men. And for his learning, that was as well, if not better known abroad, than reſpected at home. And take him in his latitude, we, which knew him well, knew not any kind of learning, to which he was a ſtranger; but in his profeſſion admirable. None ſtronger than he, where he wreſtled with an adverſary. And that Bellarmin felt, who was as well able to ſhift for himſelf as any that ſtood for the Roman party. None more exact, more judicious than he, where he was to inſtruct and informe others. And that, as they knew, which often heard him preach, ſo they may learne, which will read this, which he hath left behinde him. " And yet this fulneſſe of his material learning left " room enough in the temper of his brain for almoſt " all Languages, learned and moderne, to ſeat them- " ſelves. So that his learning had all the helpes " language could affoord; and his languages learning " enough for the beſt of them to expreſſe. His " judgement, in the meane time, ſo commanding " over both, as that neither of them was ſuffered " idly or curiouſly to ſtart from or fall ſhort of their " intended ſcope. So that we may better ſay of " him, than 'twas ſometimes ſaid of Claudius Druſus, " He was of as many and as great virtues, as mortal " nature could receive, or induſtrie make perfect (36).

(35) Pag. 17.

(36) Patercul. Hiſt. lib. 2.

[N] Generally admired in that age.] The Biſhop of Ely in his funeral Sermon upon our Author (37) tells us, that he was, as all our Engliſh world knows, a SINGULAR PREACHER and a moſt famous Writer. He was ſo SINGULAR A PREACHER, and ſo profound a Writer, that you will doubt in which he did excell; whoſe weapons in the mouthes of the adverſarie proved as ſtone in teeth of dogs; while they thought to withſtand or anſwer them, they bit the ſtones, and brake their own teeth; and ſo it is true of him, Reſponſa ejus fine reſponſionibus, his anſwers were anſwerleſſe. Never durſt any Romaniſt anſwer him; as their common uſe is, that which they cannot anſwere and confute, they ſlight it and let it paſſe without any anſwer at all. He tells afterwards (38), that he was a diligent and painful Preacher; in moſt of his ſolemn Sermons he was moſt careful of and exact; I dare ſay, few of them but they paſſed his hand and were thrice reviſed, before they were preached; and he ever miſliked often and looſe preaching, without ſtudie of antiquity; and he would be bold with himſelf, and ſay, when he preached twice a day at St. Giles, he prated once. And when his weakeneſs grew upon him, and that by infirmitie of his body he grew unable to preach, he began to goe little to the Court, not ſo much for weakneſſe, as for inabilitie to preach. He obſerves likewiſe in another place (39), that he was Concionator and Scriptor potentiſſimus, a moſt powerful Preacher and Writer. In the Dedication of his Sermons quoted in the preceding Note, the two Biſhops of London and Ely obſerve to the King, that they need not tell whoſe they are; the Sermons are able to ſpeak their Author. " When the Author died, ſay they, " your Majeſty thought it not fit his Sermons ſhould " die with him. And though they could not live " with all that elegance, which they had upon his " tongue, yet you were graciouſly pleaſed to think " a paper-life better than none. Upon this your " Majeſty gave us a ſtrict charge, that we ſhould " overlooke the papers (as well Sermons as other " Tractates) of that reverend and worthy Prelate, " and print all that we found perfect. There came " into our hands a world of Sermon-Notes, but " theſe came perfect. Had they not come perfect, " we ſhould not have ventured to adde any limme " unto them, leſt mixing a pen farre inferiour, we " ſhould have diſfigured ſuch compleat bodies. Your " Majeſtie's firſt care was for the preſſe, that the work " might be publick. Your ſecond was for the work " itſelf, that it might come forth worthy the Author; " which could not be, if it came not forth as he " left it. In purſuance of theſe two, we have " brought the work to light, and we have done it " with care and fidelity; for as the Sermons were " preached,

(37) Pag. 18.
(38) Pag. 21.
(39) Pag. 22.

Author (cc), who was contemporary with him, cenſured his Sermons as affected and ſurcharged with verbal alluſions. This great and good man, with all his conſpicuous virtues, did not eſcape the attacks of calumny; for Fuller informs us (dd), that after his death he was accuſed of covetouſneſs, though, as we have ſhewn before, he was actuated by a ſpirit of the moſt unbounded generoſity, and left the main of his eſtate to charitable uſes. Mr. Prynne (ee) likewiſe charges him with uſing Popiſh and ſuperſtitious ceremonies and ornaments in his chapel. But Fuller aſſures us (ff), that when he was Miniſter, Dean, and Biſhop, he never innovated in any reſpect, or troubled his Pariſh, College, or Dioceſe with any new ceremonies or uſages. He died at Wincheſter Houſe in Southwark (gg) the 25th of Sept. (hh) 1626, and was buried at St. Saviour's Southwark (ii). He was then in the ſeventy firſt year of his age (kk). Dr. John Buckeridge Biſhop of Ely preached his Funeral Sermon the 11th of November following (ll). His Executors erected him a monument of marble and alabaſter, upon which was inſcribed an epitaph in Latin [O]. We have a beautiful Elegy upon his death written in that language by Milton when he was but ſeventeen years of age (mm). He (cc) Mr. Bayley in his Laudenſium Autocatacriton.

(dd) Church Hiſtory, Book 11. § 47.
(ee) Canterbury's Doom, p. 121, & ſeq. apud Fuller, ubi ſupra, § 48.
(ff) Ubi ſupra.
(gg) Wood, Faſti Oxon. Vol. 1. Col. 122.
(hh) Abel Red, and Le Neve, p. 287, ſays the 21ſt; and Wood, ubi ſupra, the 26th.
(ii) Abel Red. and Le Neve, ubi ſupra.
(kk Abel Rediv.
(ll Le Neve, ubi ſupra.
(mm) See his Elegiar. lib. 1. Eleg. 3.

" preached, ſo are they publiſhed. When he preach" ed them, they had the general approbation of the " Court, and they made him famous for making " them. Now they are printed, we hope they will " have the generall liking of the Church, and in-
" large and indeare his name to them, that knew
" not him." They afterwards obſerve, that theſe works coming from ſo grave, learned and religious an Author, have but two things to do in their publiſhing to the world. The one is to teach the world, what a treaſure they have of them. And the other to tell this Church, what a jewell ſhe loſt, when ſhe loſt their Author. The worke is a body of Sermons. To them he had been moſt bred, and in them he moſt excelled. And he was not a greater Preacher in his age, than he was both great and frequent in his younger and ſtronger time. As for the body of the worke itſelf, were it not that we like not to diſparage any man's endeavours by comparing, we would ſay, the Chriſtian world hath not many ſuch bodies of Sermons, as we here preſent under your Majeſties favour, to the view and uſe of this Church. And if another Nation had them, they would as highly value them. And here we humbly beg leave to tell your Majeſty, that theſe Sermons are in this like their Author, mixed of religion and wiſdom. It is an excellent thing for a man to ſpeak wiſely and eloquently, both at once; but where theſe perfections meet not, there ſaith Auguſtine (40), Dicat ſapienter, quod non poteſt eloquenter, Let the Preacher (of all men) ſpeak that wiſely, which he cannot utter eloquently. And if St. Auguſtine in his time found that fit, out of all doubt it is neceſſary now, that men of our profeſſion ſet themſelves to preach with more wiſdom, than eloquence. With Chriſtian and religious wiſdom, which alone knows how to preſerve truth and peace together; for as all other Churches in the world are moſt happy when theſe meet, ſo is this too. But too many among the people, choſe rather to have their humor fed, than their ſouls edified; and carry partial ears even to the houſe of that God, who is no Accepter of perſons (41). To ſettle therefore the peace of the one, and to abate the humor of the other, nothing certainly under God would be of greater efficacie than Conciones ſapientes, wiſe and diſcreete Sermons, which yet may be as zealous and devout as any other. For he that is zealous according to knowledge, is no leſſe zealous for his knowledge ſake. And true wiſdom, which is not true if it be not Chriſtian, carries no water about it to quench zeale, but only to ſprinkle, that it may burn within compaſſe, and not fire that houſe, which is but intended to warme..... " Theſe Sermons, when " they were preached, gave great contentment to
" the religious and judicious ear of your Royal Fa" ther of ever bleſſed memorie, the moſt able Prince
" that ever his Kingdome had to judge of Church-
" worke. And therefore we hope, that the print" ing of them ſhall be as acceptable to your Ma-
" jeſtie, as the preaching of them was both to your
" ſelf and him. We conceive, that if your liking
" had not continued to them, your Majeſtie would " not have commanded us the printing of them.
" And we aſſure ourſelves, ſince the lines are the " ſame, the preſſe, which hath made them legible,
" hath made no blot upon your gracious favours.
" We have been only ſervants, as we are many waies
" bound to be, to your Majeſties command, in " making them ready for the preſſe, but the Au" thors of nothing in them. And we heartily pray,
" that the publiſhing of them may be honour to
" your Majeſtie, good to the Church, and meanes
" of comfort and ſalvation to them, who read them."

(40) De Doctrin. Chriſt. 4. ch. 28.

(41) Acts x. 34.

In the Dedication likewiſe of his poſthumous Tracts (42) to King Charles, the ſame Biſhops obſerve that this volume of Sermons, which they had publiſhed juſt before by the King's command, was compoſed with the utmoſt accuracy and the moſt happy genius imaginable. " Let that volume, ſay they, paſs with
" ſucceſs thro' the whole extent of your Majeſty's
" Dominions, for the inſtruction and comfort of your " ſubjects. But its being written in our language
" will prevent it from reaching foreign Nations."
Concionum quidem, quas ille fæliciſſimo ingenio elucubratas perpolivit, volumen ſatis amplum, eodem juſſu fulti, nuperrimè in lucem dedimus. Fauſto illud pede Imperii tui ſpatia peragret; doceat ſimul & conſoletur. Sed ejus limites ne egrediatur, lingua, quâ uſus eſt, vernacula obſtat. But however eſteemed his Sermons were in that age, the taſte of the preſent times is ſo extremely altered, that notwithſtanding the learning, wit, and good ſenſe, which runs thro' them in general, yet the affectation in the ſtyle and compoſition of them deters almoſt every perſon now from reading them. Mr. Oldmixon in the Dedication to his Arts of Logick and Rhetorick (43) paſſes the following judgment upon our Biſhop.
" How many great genius's have miſcarried by not " thinking rightly on ſubjects they were otherwiſe
" well able to handle and adorn; and for want of " conſidering, that truth, in all the productions of " the mind, is what only renders them agreeable
" and uſeful; and the falſe brillant of thoughts is " like the glare of lightning, which dazzles and
" hurts the ſight, as that does the underſtanding?
" Thus it was, that Biſhop Andrews, and the moſt
" eminent Divines at the beginning of the laſt Cen" tury, reduced preaching to punning, and the elo-
" quence of the chair to the buffoonry of the ſtage."
And in another place (44) he ſpeaks of him in this manner:

(42) Printed by Felix Kyngſton in 4to, 1629.

(43) Pag. 6.

(44) Arts of Logick, &c. p 20.

The reverend Prelate, who St. Swithin's chair
So fairly fill'd, would pun ye out a pray'r.
At viſitation he'd inſtruct his ſons
In Sermons made of nothing elſe but puns:
The Court itſelf ſo tickled with his chimes,
They called him the beſt Preacher of the times.

[O] An Epitaph in Latin.] It was written by a perſon, who had formerly been his Houſhold-Chaplain, and ſucceeded him in ſeveral of his places in the Church. The Author of the Biſhop's Life publiſhed in Fuller's Abel Redivivus, calls it a moſt excellent, ſignificant, and ſpeaking Epitaph, and Fuller (45) an elegant and true one. Lector, ſi Chriſtianus es, ſiſte: Moræ pretium erit, non neſcire te, qui vir hîc ſitus ſit. Ejuſdem tecum Catholicæ Eccleſiæ Membrum, ſub eadem fælicis Reſurrectionis ſpe, eandem D. Jeſu præſtolans Epiphaniam, ſacratiſſimus Antiſtes, Lancelotus Andrewes, Londini oriundus, educatus Cantabrigiæ, Aulæ Pembroch: Alumnorum, Sociorum, Præfectorum

(45) Church Hiſt. B. 11. § 46.

(nn) See Fuller, Church Hiſt. B. 10. and Collier, Eccleſ. Hiſt. Vol. 2. B. 8. p. 693.

He had a ſhare in the tranſlation of the Pentateuch, and the Hiſtory from Joſhua to the firſt book of Chronicles excluſively (nn). We ſhall mention his other Works in the Note [P].

ANDRI-

Præfectorum unus, & nemini ſecundus. Linguarum, Artium, Scientiarum, Humanorum, Divinorum omnium infinitus Theſaurus, ſtupendum Oraculum; orthodoxæ Chriſti eccleſiæ dictis, ſcriptis, precibus, exemplo incomparabile propugnaculum: Reginæ Elizabethæ à ſacris, D. Pauli London. Reſidentiarius, D. Petri Weſtmonaſt. Decanus, Epiſcopus Ciceſtrienſis, Elienſis, Wintonienſis, Regique Jacobo tum ab Eleemoſynis, tum ab utriuſque Regni Conſiliis; Decanus denique Sacelli Regii. Idem ex indefeſsâ operâ in ſtudiis, ſumma ſapientia in rebus, aſſiduâ pietate in Deum, profuſâ largitate in egenos, rarâ amœnitate in ſuos, ſpectatâ probitate in omnes, æternum admirandus. Annorum pariter & publicæ famæ ſatur, ſed bonorum paſſim omnium cum luctu denatus, cœlebs hinc migravit ad aureolam cœleſtem, Anno Regis Caroli II. Ætatis ſuæ LXXI. Chriſti MDCXXVI. Tantum eſt, Lector, quod te mœrentes poſteri nunc volebant, atque ut ex voto tuo valeas, dicto Sit Deo gloria. i. e. "Reader, if thou art a Chriſtian, ſtay; "it will be worth thy tarrying to know how great "a man lies here; a Member of the ſame Catholic "Church with thy ſelf, under the ſame hope of an "happy reſurrection, and waiting for the ſame ap"pearance of our Lord Jeſus, the moſt pious Prelate, "LANCELOT ANDREWES, who was born at London, "educated at Cambridge, one of the Scholars, Fel"lows, and Maſters of Pembroke Hall, and inferior "to none; an infinite Treaſury, an amazing Ora"cle of Languages, Arts, Sciences, and every "thing of human and divine knowledge; an in"comparable Defender of the orthodox Church of "Chriſt by his words, writings, prayers, and example. "He was Chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, Reſidentiary "of St. Paul's in London, Dean of St. Peter's Weſt"minſter, Biſhop of Chicheſter, Ely, and Winche"ſter, Almoner to King James, and Counſellor to "him for both Kingdoms, and Dean of the Royal "Chapel. His name will be eternally admired on "account of his indefatigable diligence in his ſtu"dies, his conſummate knowledge in things, his "conſtant piety towards God, his profuſe liberali"ty to the poor, his uncommon humanity and affa"bility to his friends and dependants, and his un"ſhaken integrity towards all. Being at laſt full of "years and public fame, to the regret of all good men "he died unmarried, and left this world for a crown "of glory in heaven, in the ſecond year of King "Charles, the ſeventy firſt of his age, and in that "of our Lord MDCXXVI, &c."

[P] We ſhall mention his other works in the note.] In the volume of his Sermons there are ſeventeen upon the Nativity, preached upon Chriſtmaſs Day; eight upon Repentance and faſting, preached upon Aſh-Wedneſday; ſix in Lent; three upon the Paſſion, preached upon Good-Friday; eighteen upon the Reſurrection, preached upon Eaſter Day; fifteen upon ſending of the Holy Ghoſt, preached upon Whitſunday, eight Sermons preached upon the fifth of Auguſt; ten Sermons upon the fifth of November; and eleven Sermons preach'd upon ſeveral occaſions, London 1628 and 1631, in fol. He wrote likewiſe A Manual of private Devotions and Meditations for every day in the week; and A Manual of Directions for the Viſitation of the ſick. Reſponſio ad Apologiam Cardinalis Bellarmini quam nuper edidit contra Præfationem Monitoriam ſereniſſimi ac potentiſſimi Principis Jacobi &c. omnibus Chriſtianis Monarchis, Principibus atque Ordinibus inſcriptam; i. e. "An Anſwer to the Apology of Cardinal Bellarmin, "which he lately publiſhed againſt the Monitory "Preface of the moſt ſerene and potent Prince King "James &c. addreſſed to all Chriſtian Monarchs, "Princes and States." Printed at London by Robert Barker the King's Printer, in 4to, 1610, and dedicated to King James. Tortura Torti, mentioned above in note [D]. Concio ad Clerum pro Gradu Doctoris &c. i. e. "A Sermon to the Clergy for "his Degree of Dr. of Divinity upon Proverbs xx. "25." Concio ad Clerum in Synodo Provinciali Cantuarienſis Provinciæ ad D. Pauli, &c. i. e. "A Sermon preached to the Clergy in the Provincial Sy"nod of the Province of Canterbury at St. Paul's "the 20th of February 1593 upon Acts xx, 28." Concio Latinè habita coram Regia Majeſtate quinto Auguſti MDCVI in Aulâ Grenvici, quo tempore venerat in Angliam, Regem noſtrum inviſurus, ſereniſſimus potentiſſimuſque princeps Chriſtianus quartus, Daniæ & Norvegiæ Rex. i. e. "A Sermon preached in Latin "before the King's Majeſty on the fifth of Auguſt "1606 in the Hall at Greenwich, when the moſt "ſerene and potent Prince Chriſtian IV, King of "Denmark and Norway, came to England to viſit "our King." Upon Pſalm cxliv. 10. Concio Latinè habita coram Regia Majeſtate decimo tertio Aprilis MDCXIII in Aulâ Grenwici, quo tempore, cum lectiſſimâ ſua Conjuge, diſceſſurus jam erat Gener Regis, ſereniſſimus potentiſſimuſque Princeps Fridericus Comes Palatinus ad Rhenum. i. e. "A Latin Ser"mon preached before the King the thirteenth of "April 1613 in the Hall at Greenwich, when the "moſt ſerene and potent Prince Frederic Count Pa"latine on the Rhine, the King's ſon-in-law, was "about to depart with his excellent Lady." Upon Iſaiah lxii. 5. Quæſtionis, nunquid per jus divinum, Magiſtratui liceat à reo jusjurandum exigere? Et id, quatenus ac quouſque liceat? Theologica determinatio, habita in publicâ Scholâ Theologicâ Cantabrigiæ, menſe Julio anni 1591. i. e. "A Theolo"gical Determination of the queſtion, Whether it "be allowed by the Law of God for a Magiſtrate to "require an oath of a guilty perſon; and in what "reſpect or how far it be lawful? delivered in the "public Divinity-School at Cambridge, in July 1591." De Uſuris Theologica Determinatio, habita in publicâ Scholâ Theologicâ Cantabrigiæ. i. e. "A Theologi"cal Determination concerning Uſury, delivered "in the public Divinity-School at Cambridge;" wherein he determines abſolutely againſt the Lawfulneſs of Uſury; Uſuras legitimas eſſe illicitas. De Decimis Theologica Determinatio, habita &c. i. e. "A Theological Determination concerning Tythes, "delivered in the public Divinity-School at Cam"bridge;" wherein he declares expreſly, that Tythes ought not to be abrogated; Decimæ non ſunt abrogandæ. Reſponſiones ad Petri Molinæi Epiſtolas tres, unà cum Molinæi Epiſtolis. i. e. "Anſwers to three "Letters of Peter du Moulin, with du Moulin's Let"ters." STRICTURÆ; or a brief Anſwer to the eighteenth Chapter of the firſt booke of Cardinall Perron's Reply, written in French to King James his Anſwer written by Mr. Caſaubon in Latine. An Anſwer to the twentieth Chapter of the fifth booke of Cardinal Perron's Reply, written in French to King James his Anſwer, written by Mr. Caſaubon to the Cardinall in Latine. A Speech delivered in the Starr-Chamber againſt the two Judaicall opinions of Mr. Traske. The two Judaicall opinions, advanced by Mr. Traske, were as follows: 1. That Chriſtians are bound to abſtain from thoſe meats, which the Jews were forbidden in Leviticus. 2. That they are bound to obſerve the Jewiſh Sabbath. A Speech delivered in the Starr-Chamber concerning Vowes, in the Counteſſe of Shrewſburies caſe. This Lady was convicted of diſobedience, for refuſing to anſwer or be examined, (tho' ſhe had promiſed to do it before,) alledging, that ſhe had made a ſolemn vow to the contrary. The deſign of the Biſhop's Speech is to ſhew, that ſuch vows were unlawful, and conſequently of no force or obligation upon her. Theſe pieces were printed after the Author's death at London by Felix Kyngſton, in 4to, 1629, and dedicated to King Charles I, by Dr. William Laud Biſhop of London, and Dr. John Buckridge Biſhop of Ely. The Moral Law expounded, or Lectures on the Ten Commandments; whereunto is annexed nineteen Sermons upon Prayer in general, and upon the Lord's Prayer in particular; publiſhed by John Jackſon, and dedicated to the Parliament. London, 1642, in fol. Ἀπροτυπώτια ſacra, or a Collection of poſthumous and orphan Lectures delivered at St. Paul's and St. Giles his Church. London, 1657, fol. T.

ANDRINOPLE, as it is called in French, or ADRIANOPLE a city of Thrace. It owes its name to the folly of the Emperor Hadrian. Moreri touches upon this, and has run into great confuſion on that head [A]. Some ſay that this city was founded by Oreſtes, and that it bore his name [B]. It was likewiſe called Uſcudama (a). The two Latin verſes which Moreri has quoted, prove nothing, but that he wrote without any attention [C]. I ſhall not touch upon the other things, which he ſays of Adrianople; the reader may have recourſe to them.

(a) See the Remark [C].

[A] In ſpeaking of the name of this city, Moreri has run into great confuſion.] I ſhall give his own words. Some Pagan Authors ſay that this Emperor having been cured of his dropſy by invoking the mad Oreſtes, took pleaſure in improving and adorning this city. Theſe Pagan Authors are not the two whom Moreri quotes, Spartian and Ammianus Marcellinus; and I am much deceived if they are not to be reduced to Ælius Lampridius only. Let us now ſee a little how this laſt expreſſes himſelf. Et Oreſtam quidem urbem Adrianus ſuo nomini vindicari juſſit, eo tempore, quo furore cœperat laborare, ut ex reſponſo, quum ei dictum eſſet ut in furioſi alicujus domum vel nomen irreperet. Nam ex eo emollitam inſaniam ferunt, per quam multos Senatores occidi juſſerat (1). By comparing theſe words with thoſe of Moreri we find three or four conſiderable errors in the latter. I. It is falſe, that Hadrian was cured in the city of Adrianople. II. It is falſe that the diſeaſe in diſpute here was the dropſy. III. It is falſe that his cure was wrought by his invoking of Oreſtes. IV. It is falſe that after the cure he was pleaſed to adorn that city. Lampridius ſays only, that Hadrian falling into a madneſs gave his name to the city Oreſta in obedience to an Oracle, which adviſed him to ſeize the houſe, or aſſume the name of ſome madman; which, it is ſaid, appeas'd his phrenzy.

(1) Lamprid. in Antonino Heliogabalo, p. 809.

[B] It is ſaid that it was founded by Oreſtes, and bore his name.] Lampridius ſhall be my only witneſs. Et Oreſtem quidem ferunt, ſays he (2), non unum ſimulachrum Dianæ, nec uno in loco poſuiſſe, ſed multa in multis. Poſtea quam ſe apud tria flumina circa Hebrum ex Reſponſo purificavit, etiam Oreſtam condidit civitatem, quam ſæpe cruentari hominum ſanguine neceſſe eſt. Et Oreſtam quidem urbem Adrianus ſuo nomini vindicare juſſit, &c. I have quoted this paſſage at length, in order to ſhew what city of Adrianople is meant here. The Emperor Hadrian gave his own name to ſeveral cities, which are very diſtant from each other (3); but Lampridius leaves us no room to doubt but he means that in Thrace, and that it was founded by Oreſtes, where the Hebrus receives two other rivers into it. Obſerve that Pinedo repreſents Lampridius as ſaying that Heliogabalus built a city near the Hebrus, and called it Oreſta, and that afterwards Hadrian gave it his own name (4). Such are the common effects of hurry and diſtraction of thought. The moſt able writers are ſubject to them.

(2) Idem, ibid. p. 803.

(3) Quum titulos in operibus non amaret; multas civitates Adrianopolis appellavit, ut ipſum Carthaginem & Athenarum partem. Spartianus in Adriano, c. 20. See the Theſaur. Geograph. of Ortelius.

(4) Pinedo in Stephan. Byzant. p. 211. num. 48.

[C] The verſes, which Moreri has quoted to this purpoſe, prove nothing but that he wrote without any attention.] His words are theſe: "It is ſaid that it "was firſt built by Oreſtes, who called it Oreſta "from his own name, which was afterwards changed "to that of Uſcada or Uſcudama.

"Tandemq; Uſcudamæ mutato nomine priſco
"Matricida ſuo de nomine dixit Oreſtam.

Theſe two verſes prove the contrary of what Moreri intended. They prove plainly, that Oreſtes founded this city under the name of Uſcudama, and gave his own inſtead of the former. Ammianus Marcellinus, quoted in the IVth Book by Moreri (5), tells us in the IVth Chapter of his XXVIIth Book, that Adrianople had once the name of Uſcudama. Poſt hanc Æmimontus Hadrianopolim habet, quæ dicebatur Uſcudama.

(5) The thirteen firſt books of this Hiſtorian are loſt.

☞ANDRISCUS, a man of a mean extraction [A], who pretending to be ſon of Perſeus the laſt King of Macedonia, took upon him the name of Philip, for which reaſon he was called Pſeudo-Philippus, the Falſe Philip. The ſtory he invented to impoſe upon the Publick was ſo plauſible [B], that he had reaſon to hope for ſucceſs in his deſign, which was to make himſelf King of Macedonia, eſpecially ſince the Macedonians had been lately (a) ſubdued by the Romans. Andriſcus therefore reſolved to try his fortune; but no body ſtirring at firſt in his favour, he went into Syria to Demetrius King of that Country, expecting that this King, whoſe ſiſter had been married to Perſeus, would aſſiſt him; but he was diſappointed, for Demetrius ſent him priſoner to Rome, but not being very ſtrictly guarded, he eſcaped out of his priſon, and returned into Macedonia, where a great number of people reſorted to him; and having raiſed an army, he made himſelf maſter of the whole Kingdom, part of the inhabitants ſubmitting willingly to him, and the reſt being forced to it by his victorious arms. He intended alſo to invade Theſſaly, but he could not ſucceed in this attempt, the country being defended by the Roman Generals, aſſiſted by the Achæans (b). The Romans at firſt deſpiſed ſuch an enemy, and ſent only the Prætor Juventius againſt him. But Andriſcus

(a) A. M. 3816, and 168 before Chriſt. Petav. and Uſſer. ad hunc Annum.

(b) L. Flori. Hiſt. Rom. lib. 2. cap. 14.

[A] A man of a mean extraction.] In Livy's Epitome (1), and in Florus's Hiſtory (2) he is ſtyled a man of the loweſt rank, Ultimæ ſortis homo. The latter adds, that it is not known, whether Andriſcus was originally a ſlave or a free-man, but that he certainly had been an hireling, (mercenarius). But this was far from being a diſgrace to him, if after having delivered his Country from the Roman yoke, he had known how to govern it with wiſdom and moderation. But what muſt render him deteſtable in the ſight of all good men, is his unbounded avarice and exceſſive cruelty (3): To theſe muſt probably be aſcribed the ſhort duration of his authority.

(1) Cap. 39.
(2) Lib. 2. c. 14.
(3) See the text of this Article, quotation (b).

[B] The ſtory he invented, to impoſe upon the Publick, was very plauſible.] He ſaid he was the ſon of Perſeus by a miſtreſs; that his father truſted him to the hands of a certain perſon called Cyrtheſa, to be carefully brought up by him, in order that whatever might be the event of the war, in which Perſeus was then engaged againſt the Romans, there ſhould ſtill be ſome remains of the royal blood. That after the King's death he was educated at Adramyttium (4), till he was twelve years of age, ſtill believing that Cyrtheſa was his father, and not knowing his real origin; but that his pretended father being near his death, opened the whole matter to him, and ſhewed him a writing ſealed by Perſeus himſelf, and left with his ſuppoſed mother, to be delivered to him, when he ſhould come to years of diſcretion; and that Cyrtheſa earneſtly deſired him to keep this affair very ſecret. He added, that when he was grown up, the writing was delivered to him, in which it was ſaid, that his father left him two treaſures. He added, that Cyrtheſa's wife adviſed him to leave the city before the affair was known to Eumenes, King of Pergamus, leſt that Prince, who had been Perſeus's enemy, ſhould cauſe him to be put to death; and that for this reaſon he went into Syria, hoping that Demetrius, the King of that Country would aſſiſt him; and that there he firſt openly declared who he was (5).

(4) A ſmall City in Myſia, Landrimitti, Andrimitti, or S. Dimitri, in Natolia.

(5) L. Flori Breviar. in T. Liv. lib. 49.

Andriſcus ſupported now not only by the Macedonians, but alſo by the Thracians, gained a complete victory over Juventius, and ſlew him. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to find here Florus's own elegant words on this occaſion. Dum hæc contemnit Populus Romanus, ſays he (c), Juventio Prætore contentus, virum non Macedonicis modo, ſed Thraciæ quoque auxiliis ingentibus validum, temerè tentavit, invictuſque non a veris Regibus, ſed ab illo imaginario ac Scenico Rege ſuperatur. Andriſcus thought himſelf now above the frowns of fortune, he put on the royal garments, and aſſumed a kingly power (d); but he exerciſed his ſovereign authority with the utmoſt cruelty and tyranny, unjuſtly charging the richeſt of his ſubjects with the moſt heinous crimes, and putting them to death under falſe pretences, in order to ſeize upon their eſtates. Nay even his friends felt the dreadful effects of his ſavage temper; he killed a great many of them, and even in his private and familiar converſations, he behaved himſelf with an exceſſive pride and haughtineſs; in ſhort he was immerſed in the moſt ſordid avarice, and in all manner of vice (e). At laſt the Romans reſolved to drive this enemy out of his Kingdom; they ſent Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who was then but Prætor [C], againſt him with a powerful army; and beſides this, Attalus, King of Pergamus, aſſiſted the Romans with his fleet. Andriſcus divided his troops into two bodies, one of which he ſent into Thrace to plunder the country, whilſt he intended to keep the field and defend himſelf with the other. But Metellus attacking him very vigorouſly, he was obliged to retire into Thrace, and having aſſembled all his troops, he engaged the Romans again, but his army being defeated, he fled to Byſes a petty King of Thrace, by whom he was betrayed, and delivered into the hands of Metellus. Thus Macedonia came again into the power of the Romans [D]. This victory, in which the Romans killed twenty five thouſand men (f) of Andriſcus's army, gained Metellus the ſurname of Macedonicus, and the honours of a triumph, which Andriſcus adorned, walking in chains before the General's chariot. In his misfortune he had at leaſt this to comfort him, that the Romans triumphed over him, as over a real King (g). Moreri, according to his cuſtom, has committed ſome errors, in the ſhort account he has given us of Andriſcus [E].

(c) Hiſt. Rom. lib. 2 cap. 14.

(d) This happened in the third year of the 157th Olympiad, that is 149 years before Chriſt.

(e) Diod. Sicul. in excerptis Valeſii, p. 342. apud Uſſerium, Annal. p. m. 356.

(f) Eutrop. Hiſt. Rom. Breviar. lib. 4.

(g) L. Florus, Hiſt. Rom. ubi ſupra.

[C] Metellus was then but Prætor.] Florus, and the Latin Tranſlator of Pauſanias's Achaïca (6) call him Conſul; but Vellerius Paterculus rightly ſtyles him but Prætor. And indeed we don't find, that Q. Cæcilius Metellus Macedonicus was Conſul before the year 610 (7) from the building of Rome, and 143 years before the Chriſtian Æra, when he was Conſul with Ap. Claudius Pulcher.

[D] Thus Macedonia came again into the power of the Romans.] This happened not much above a year after Andriſcus had made himſelf maſter of that country, and 148 years before the Chriſtian Æra, towards the latter end of the fourth year of the 157th Olympiad, 605 years from the building of Rome, and under the Conſulſhip of Sp. Poſthumius, and L. Piſo (8). Hence it appears that there paſſed ſeveral years, ſince Andriſcus went firſt to Demetrius into Syria, and the time when he began to invade Macedonia: For in the paſſage, which we have quoted above from Flora's Breviarium (9), it is ſaid that Andriſcus was adviſed to quit Adramyttium for fear of Eumenes, King of Pergamus; and it appears, that Attalus was King of that Country, when Andriſcus was defeated (10). Now Eumenes died about the year 596 from the building of Rome (11), that is, about nine years before this victory of Metellus; Andriſcus muſt therefore have been ſix or ſeven years priſoner at Rome, before he eſcaped out of his priſon.

[E] Moreri has committed ſome errors in the ſhort account he gives of Andriſcus. I. He ſays, that Andriſcus pretended to be the ſon of Philip the fifth, King of Macedonia; whereas if he had but curſorily read the paſſage which we have tranſlated in the remark [B], he would have ſeen his miſtake, which was probably occaſioned by the name of Philip, which Andriſcus took upon him. II. Moreri ſays, that Andriſcus was put to death by order of the Roman Senate; which none of the Authors, whom he quotes, mention. Indeed he adds an &c. to the liſt of his Authors; thereby intimating perhaps, that if what he ſays, be not found in the Writers he names, it may be ſuppoſed to be in ſome other. But as far as we could conſult the Authors, who ſpeak of Andriſcus, not one of them ſays a word of his death. III. Moreri cites T. Livius, Lib. XLIX, & L, which way of quoting inſinuates that the 49th and 50th books of Livy are extant; whereas every body knows, that the 45th book is the laſt of thoſe we have, and that of the reſt we have only Breviaria, or Abridgments, which are aſcribed to L. Florus, whom ſome think to be the ſame with L. Julius Florus, who wrote a Roman Hiſtory in four books. P.

(6) Ap. Uſſer. Annal. p. m. 357. ad A. M. 4356.

(7) According to Sigonius, or 611 according to Petavius.

(8) Confer. Uſſer. Annal. p. m. 357. cum Sigon. Faſt. Col. 346. ad An. U. 605. not. (2). edit. Argelati, Mediol. 1732.

(9) Quot. (5).

(10) See the text of this Article above the Quotation (f).

(11) Petav. Rat. Temp. Part. 1. lib. 4. cap. 11. p. m. 152. edit. Lugd. Batav. 1724.

ANDROMACHE, the wife of the valiant Hector, was daughter to Eetion, King of Thebes in Cilicia (a). Her marriage was of advantage every way; for beſides that her huſband was conſidered as the bulwark of his country, and the ſtrongeſt ſupport of Troy, he had a great deal of affection for her; and it is ſaid that he never expoſed her to thoſe uneaſineſſes, which the wives of great Heroes are ſo liable to; I mean, that he kept his conjugal faith inviolate [A]. If Euripides does not agree in this point, yet

(a) Homer. Il. lib. 6. This Cilicia was not far from Troy.

[A] Hector kept his conjugal faith towards her.] There are ſome verſes in Euripides, where Andromache declares, that ſhe loved even the miſtreſſes of her husband, that ſhe might oblige him, and even ſuckled the baſtards, which he had by them (1). The Scholiaſt agrees upon this, that Anaxicrates had related, that Hector left behind him two lawful ſons (2), who eſcaped the hands of the Greeks, and one baſtard (3), who was taken priſoner in Troy (4); but he accuſes both Euripides and Anaxicrates of having falſified the Hiſtory, and aſſerts poſitively that Hector never had a baſtard, and that it is very raſh to advance the contrary. Ovid conſiders Hector as the model of a good husband, who never indulged himſelf in any change, and even wink'd at the faults of his wife.

(1) Euripid. in Andromach.

(2) Whoſe names were Amphineus and Scamandrius.

(3) Named Palaterus.

(4) Anaxic. Argolicor. l. 2.

Felix Andromache, certo benè nupta marito!
Uxor ad exemplum fratris habenda fui (5).

(5) Ovid. in Ep. Oenon. ad Parid. ver. 107.

That is,

" Happy Andromache! who juſtly art
" Poſſeſſed of a firm and loyal heart."

It is thus he repreſents Oenone, the wife of Paris, ſpeaking; in another place he ſays that in the opinion of the world Andromache was much too tall: but yet however he ſhews us at the ſame time, that this did diſturb the happineſs of his wife, her temper being very eaſy in that particular [B]. The death of Hector was therefore a terrible blow to Andromache; however ſhe did not die of it, no more than of the extreme affliction, which ſhe ſuffered ſome time after by the deſtruction of Troy, and the loſs of her dear ſon Aſtyanax, who was thrown down headlong from the top of a Tower, and her own captivity. She fell to the lot of a maſter, who as fierce and bloody as he was, uſed his priſoner with great courteſy. Pyrrhus, the cruel ſon of the cruel Achilles, was ſoon induced to reconcile himſelf to Andromache, to take her to his bed [C], and to make her condition ſo happy, that the beautiful Hermione, whom he married after, conceived an extreme jealouſy at it (b). After the death, or even during the life of this Prince, Andromache married Helenus [D] the ſon of Priam, her companion in captivity, and reigned with him over part of Epirus. She had children by Pyrrhus [E], and likewiſe by Helenus. Some Authors are of opinion all the Kings of Epirus to that Pyrrhus, who made war againſt the Romans (c), were deſcended

(b) Euripid. in Andromachâ.

(c) See the remark [E].

but in her husband's eye, ſhe appeared of a very moderate ſtature.

Omnibus Andromache viſa eſt ſpatioſior æquo:
Unus, qui modicam diceret, Hector erat (6).

(6) Idem, lib. 2. de Arte amandi, ver. 645.

" Andromache was tall, yet ſome report,
" Her Hector was ſo blind he thought her ſhort.

(7) Biblioth. Choiſ. p. 169.

Mr. Colomies had reaſon to remark (7), that Mercerus in his Notes upon the fourth book of Dictys Cretenſis, ſhould not have ſaid, that antiquity knew of no other amour, than what Hector had for his wife Andromache, nor of any other children, than thoſe, which he had by her; for he gives us room to ſuppoſe that he forgot the Hiſtorian Anaxicrates and the Poet Euripides. But Mr. Colomies, who obſerves likewiſe that Voſſius knew nothing of this Hiſtorian, would have been in the right to have ſaid, that he collected from Meziriac the paſſages, which he quotes; and that Mallincrot (8) ſpoke of Anaxicrates, without making any mention of the work quoted by the Scholiaſt upon Euripides; he only ſays, that Strabo made uſe of the authority of Anaxicrates in ſpeaking of Arabia in the 16th book.

(8) In his Paralipom. de Hiſt. Græcis, p. 5.

[B] With regard to the gallantries of her husband, her temper was very eaſy.] See the preceding remark. We do not find that Andromache carried this point ſo far as Livia or Cromwell's wife did. The latter out of ambition was very favourable to the amours of her husband (9). Livia ſerved as a procureſs to Auguſtus upon occaſion, in order to maintain her credit. Circa libidines hæſit (Auguſtus), poſtea quoque, ut ferunt, ad vitiandas virgines promptior, quæ ſibi undique etiam ab uxore conquirerentur (10). That is, " He indulged himſelf in gratifying his " luſts; and afterwards, it is ſaid, he was more " fond of debauching young Virgins, who were " procured him from all parts by his wife." Andromache propoſed nothing to herſelf but peace at home, in giving no uneaſineſs to Hector.

(9) Leti's Life of Cromwell in the Journal de Mr. Beauval, in 1692 p. 499.

(10) Sueton. in Aug. c. 71.

[C] Pyrrhus took her to his bed.] Virgil, to preſerve the decorum, has introduced Andromache complaining that her greateſt unhappineſs conſiſted in this; for when Æneas ask'd her whether the widow of Hector was married to Pyrrhus, ſhe caſt her eyes downwards, and told him with great confuſion of mind, that ſhe was forced to ſubmit to it in ſelf-defence, and that ſhe envied the fate of Polyxena, who was exempted by death from ſuch a neceſſity. We are not obliged to take this diſcourſe literally; but to make ſome allowance in it, and conſider it as a modeſt excuſe of her conduct.

Hectoris, Andromache, Pyrrhin' connubia ſervas?
Dejecit vultum, & demiſſâ voce locuta eſt:
O felix una ante alias Priameia Virgo,
Hoſtilem ad tumulum Trojæ ſub mœnibus altis
Juſſa mori; quæ ſortitus non pertulit ullos,
Nec victoris heri tetigit captiva cubile!
Nos, patriâ incenſâ, diverſa per æquora vectæ,
Stirpis Achilleæ faſtus, juvenemque ſuperbum
Servitio enixæ tulimus; qui deinde ſecutus
Ledæam Hermionem, Lacedæmonioſque Hymenæos,
Me famulam famuloque Heleno tranſmiſit habendam (11).

(11) Virg. Æn. lib. 3. ver. 319.

That is,

" Still are you Hector's, or is Hector fled,
" And his remembrance loſt in Pyrrhus' bed?
" With eyes dejected, in a lowly tone,
" After a modeſt pauſe ſhe thus begun,
" Oh only happy maid of Phœbus' race,
" Whom death delivered from the foes embrace!
" Commanded on Achilles tomb to die,
" Nor forc'd, like us, to hard captivity:
" Or in an haughty Maſter's arms to lie,
" In Grecian ſhips unhappy were we born;
" Endur'd the Victor's luſt, ſuſtained the ſcorn:
" Thus I ſubmitted to the lawleſs pride
" Of Pyrrhus, more a handmaid than a bride.
" Cloy'd with poſſeſſion, he forſook my bed,
" And Helen's lovely daughter ſought to wed.
" Then me to Trojan Helenus reſign'd:
" And his two ſlaves in equal marriage join'd."

Dryden.

But we muſt do her juſtice; ſhe is never repreſented to have been of an amorous complexion. Ovid could ſcarce believe, tho' he ſaw her a mother, that ſhe ever lay with her husband.

Nunquam ego te, Andromache, nec te, Tecmeſſa rogarem,
Ut mea de vobis altera amica foret.
Credere vix videor, cum cogar credere partu,
Vos ego cum veſtris concubuiſſe viris (12).

(12) Ovid. de arte Amandi, l. 3. ver. 519.

That is,

" Let ſad Tecmeſſa weep in Ajax' arms:
. . . . . .
" Let Hector in Andromache delight
" Who in bewailing Troy waſtes all the night:
" Had they not both born children, to be plain;
" I ne'er could think they'd with their husbands lain.

[D] After the death, or even during the life of this Prince ſhe married Helenus.] This alternative ſeemed to me neceſſary, becauſe Authors do not agree in the time of Andromache's marriage with Helenus. We ſee from Virgil that this marriage preceded the death of Pyrrhus. Juſtin ſays the ſame (13). But according to Servius ſhe was induced to marry Helenus only by the command of Pyrrhus at his death (14). Pauſanias likewiſe places their marriage after the death of that Prince. Τοῦτῳ γὰρ Ἀνδρομάχη συνῴκησεν ἀποθανόντος ἐν Δελφοῖς Πύρρου (15); i. e. " For " Andromache married Helenus after the death of " Pyrrhus at Delphi.

(13) Juſtinus, lib. 17. cap. 3.

(14) Servius in lib. 3. Æneid. ver. 319.

(15) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 10.

[E] She had children by Pyrrhus.] Some mention three, and call them Moloſſus, Pielus, and Pergamus (16), or Pyrrhus, Moloſſus, and Æacides (17). Others ſpeak only of Moloſſus (18); and it is from him, according to Euripides (19), that the Kings of Moloſſia were deſcended. Pauſanias repreſents them as deſcending from Pielus. With regard to Pergamus, the ſame Pauſanias tells us, that he went into Aſia, and that his mother Andromache followed him; that he killed Areus, Prince of Teuthrania in a duel, which he fought with him for the Kingdom: that he gave a name to the city, and that his tomb was to be ſeen there with that of his mother. Servius ſpeaks very differently of all this in his Comment upon the 72d verſe of the ſixth Eclogue of Virgil. As for her ſon by Helenus, he was named Ceſtrinus, and went to ſettle himſelf with a company of Epirotes, who followed him voluntarily, in a Province, above the river Thyamis. This he performed after the death of his father, when the Kingdom fell to the lot of Moloſſus the ſon of Pyrrhus (20).

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Scholiaſt. Eurip. in Andromach.

(18) Servius in lib. 3. Æneid. ver. 319.

(19) In Andromach.

(20) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 10.

cended from a ſon of Pyrrhus and Andromache. This Princeſs had ſeven brothers, who were killed by Achilles, together with their father, in one day (d). One Author tells us, that ſhe accompanied Priam, when he went to deſire Achilles to ſell him the body of Hector (e); and that to move him to the greater compaſſion, ſhe carried her two ſons with her, who were then infants (f). She has been the ſubject of ſeveral fine Tragedies, both antient and modern [F]. Her large ſtature has been well known to all poſterity [G]. Her dialogue with Hector in the ſixth book of the Iliad is one of the moſt beautiful parts of that Poem [H].

(d) Homer. Il. lib. 6. ver. 414, & ſeq.

(e) Dictys Cretenſis, lib. 3.

(f) Aſtyanacta, quem nonnulli Scamandrum appellabunt, & Laodamanta, parvulos admodum filios pra ſe habens. Dict. Cret. l. 3.

She

[F] She has been the ſubject of ſeveral fine Tragedies, both ancient and modern.] That of Euripides is ſtill extant; and if we would know the ſucceſs of that, which was brought upon the ſtage at Paris, we may read what the Parnaſſe Reformé has put into the mouth of Montfleuri a famous Comedian, to which I ſhall add a paſſage from a modern Poet. Whoever wants to know what was the cauſe of my death, (it is Montfleuri who ſpeaks) he need not ask whether it was a fever, or dropſy, or gout; let him only know that it was the Tragedy of Andromache. ... I wiſh all thoſe writers of Tragedy, theſe inventors of paſſions in order to kill people, had like Corneille an Abbot d'Aubignac to deal with, they would not be ſo furious. But what vexes me moſt, is, that Andromache will become much more famous by the circumſtance of my death; and that henceforward there will be ſcarce any Poet, but will deſire to have the honour of killing a Player once in his life (21). Add to this the following verſes;

(21) Gueret, Parnaſſe Reformé, p. 108, 109.

——— Un Marquis,
Enflé de ſon ſavoir, ches les Dames aquis,
Ennemi du bon ſens, qu'a grand bruit il attaque,
Va pleurer au Tartuffe, & rire à l'Andromaque.

That is,

" A Marquis,
" Vain of his knowledge gain'd amongſt the Ladies,
" Averſe to ſenſe, impertinent and loud,
" Weeps amidſt all the humour of Tartuffe,
" While ſad Andromache excites his laughter.

[G] Her large ſtature has been well known to all poſterity.] I have quoted two verſes of Ovid upon this ſubject in remark [A]. Here are two other of the ſame Author.

Parva vehatur equo; quod erat LONGISSIMA, nunquam
Thebais Hectorea nupta reſedit equo (22).

That is,

(22) Ovid. de Arte Amandi, lib. 3. ver. 777.

" The nymph that's ſmall ſhould mount the ge-
" nerous ſteed,
" But Hector's wife, whoſe ſtature was too large,
" Was never ſeen on horſeback.

Martial contradicts Ovid as well upon this point, as upon that, which I have already quoted; for he ſays thus;

Maſturbabantur Phrygii poſt oſtia Servi,
Hectoreo quoties federat uxor equo (23).

(23) Martial, Epigram 104. lib. 11. ver. 13.

Juvenal was not ignorant of this large ſtature of Andromache, for ſpeaking of ſome Ladies, who wore their head-dreſs and hair very high upon their heads, he ſays that to ſee them before, you would take them for Andromaches; but behind they appeared very ſhort:

Tot premit ordinibus, tot adhuc compagibus altum
Ædificat caput, Andromachen à fronte videbis,
Poſt minor eſt (24).

(24) Juven. Sat. 6. ver. 500.

That is,

" With curls on curls, they build her head before,
" And mount it with a formidable tower.
" A Gianteſs ſhe ſeems, but look behind,
" And then ſhe dwindles to the pigmy kind."

We ſee ſomething in the faſhions of ancient Rome very like our top-knots. Another Poet expreſſes himſelf thus;

Celſæ procul aſpice frontis honores
Suggeſtumque comæ (25).

(25) Stat. Sylv. 3. l. 1. ver. 113.

The mother of the Gods with her towers upon her head (26), would be nothing compared to our women, if once they ſhould go beyond the preſent mode of their head-dreſs. See the Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ of Mr. Almeloveen; you will find there (27) a great deal of curious learning upon the antiquity of top-knots. See likewiſe the remark [C] of the article CONECTE, and the following paſſage of Syneſius: Μέλλει γὰρ, ſays he (28), ſpeaking of a new married Lady, καὶ εἰς τὴν ἑβδομὴν ἐσόδυμην ταινιώσεως τε καὶ πυργοφόρος καθάπερ ἡ Κυβέλη περιελεύσεως; for till the ſeventh day following ſhe will be adorned with head-dreſs, and go about with her towers upon it like Cybele. But to return to the wife of Hector, I muſt obſerve that Dares Phrygius gives her an hundred good qualities, without forgetting her great ſtature; Andromacham oculis claris, candidam, LONGAM, formoſam, modeſtam, ſapientem, pudicam, blandam; that is, " Andromache had ſparkling eyes, and was " fair, tall, beautiful, modeſt, wiſe, chaſte, and " courteous."

(26) Qualis Berecynthia mater
Invehitur curru Phrygias turrita per urbes. Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 785. That is,
" High as the mother of the Gods....
" Then when in pomp ſhe makes the Phrygian Round,
" With golden turrets on her temples crown'd.
Dryden.

(27) P. 106, & ſeq.

(28) Syneſ. Epiſt. 3.

[H] His Dialogue with Hector in the ſixth book of the Iliad is one of the moſt beautiful parts of that Poem.] This is the judgment of Mr. Perrault. He has tranſlated this Dialogue into French verſe; which he read to the French Academy, when the Abbot Fenelon was received there (29). Before this he read a little Diſcourſe very well turned; he proteſted that he acknowledged Homer for the moſt excellent, the moſt extenſive, and the fineſt genius, that ever appeared in Poetry; and to perſuade the incredulous, that he honoured him according to his merit, he tranſlated that part of the Iliad into French. He confeſſes that he retrenched ſeveral digreſſions, which ſeemed to him too languid. This is the defect of Homer; he is too great a talker, and too ſimple; tho' he is ſo great a genius in other reſpects, and ſo copious in beautiful ſentiments, that if he was living now, he would compoſe an Epic Poem every way compleat. He would have taken care not to have given to Andromache amongſt other complaints upon the death of her husband, this reflection, that the young Aſtyanax would now no more eat the marrow and fat of ſheep upon his father's knees (30). This is painting after nature, I own; but in our age we can never bear ſuch a ſimplicity of manners in an Epic Poem. We ſhould think it too coarſe and rude, and ſuitable only for Comedy. I imagine our Ladies of Quality would be afraid of being thought very unpolite, if they ſhould ſpeak as the Queen of Carthage does in Virgil. B. iv. Æneid. ver. 328.

(29) The 31ſt of March. This tranſlation has been printed in the firſt part of the Recueil de Pieces curieuſes, at the Hague by Moetjens in 1694. JUDGMENT upon the Epic Poetry of the Antients.

(30) See above P. 55. quotation 25.

Si quis mihi parvulus aulâ
Luderet Æneas.

That is,

" Some young Æneas, to ſupply your place;
" Whoſe features might expreſs his father's face."
Dryden.

Theſe are not the defects of the ancient Poets themſelves, but only thoſe of the times they liv'd in. To ſpeak properly, the queſtion is not whether there are better genius's now than among the ancients; but whether our age has juſter ideas of perfection than they, and whether we may not apply to the great Homer what Horace does to another:

Sed ille,
Si foret hoc noſtrum fato delatus in ævum,
Detereret ſibi multa, recideret omne, quod ultra
Perfectum traheretur (31).

That is,

(31) Horat. Sat. x. lib. 1. ver. 67.

" Yet did he now again new life commence,
" He would correct, he would retrench his ſenſe;
" And pare off all that was not excellence."
Creech.

She took ſo great care of Hector's horſes, that ſhe gave them meat and drink before ſhe ſerved him (g). Some have carried this example ſo far, as to ſhew from thence that women are obliged to employ themſelves in the moſt mechanical offices of the houſe [I].

(g) Homer. Il. lib. 8. ver. 188.

[I] Some have carried this example ſo far, as to ſhew from thence, that women are obliged to employ themſelves in the moſt mechanical offices of the houſe.] Read the following words of Tiraqueau: Quæ loca Franciſcus Barbarus in ſuo libello de Re uxoria, quem apud Gallos imprimendum primi omnium dedimus, ſolerter ſciteque annotavit, monens his exemplis uxores ne res hujuſmodi contemnant, quas Andromache &c. ... & hoc quoque è noſtris commèmoravit J. Lupus in rep. rubr. de don. inter vir. & uxor. & Bo. Curtil. in tract. nobilitatis in 38 privilegio (32). Tiraqueau has made no reflection upon this, that Andromache's husband was not ſerved firſt; he ſuppoſed without doubt that this would prove too much, and that it was neceſſary to keep ſuch a thought from the reader's view.

(32) Andr. Tiraquell. de Nobilitate, cap. 20. num. 101. p. 78.

ANDROMACHUS. I ſhall mention only ſix men of this name. The Iſt Andromachus was of Sicily; he was father to Timæus the Hiſtorian, and Founder of the City Tauromenium, now called Taormine. He was a man of reſolution, and very rich. He gathered together (a) upon an eminence called Taurus near Naxus the inhabitants of that City, who had eſcaped from it when it was deſtroyed by the Tyrant Dionyſius. He maintained himſelf a long time in this poſt, and that was the reaſon why he called it Tauromenium. Thoſe who fled from Naxus proſpered ſo much in this new ſettlement, that in a little time it became a conſiderable City (b). Andromachus received Timoleon there, and permitted him to make it a place of ammunition. This Corinthian General came thither only with a deſign to deliver Sicily from the Tyrants who oppreſs'd it. Andromachus declared an open enmity againſt the Tyrants, and ſollicited for a long time the Corinthians to come to the relief of Sicily. Timoleon and he therefore ſoon reſolved to act in concert for the recovery of their liberty (c). The IId Andromachus ſerved under Alexander the Great, and was Governor of Cœlo-Syria. The Samaritans burnt him alive; but Alexander revenged this cruel action upon the Authors of it with the ſeverity they deſerved (d). I can find no other Andromachus in Quintus Curtius, though Moreri pretends there are ſeveral. The IIId Andromachus was brother-in-law to Seleucus Callinicus, King of Syria, and had a ſon (e), who ſeized upon the Provinces ſituated on this ſide Mount Taurus, and proclaimed himſelf King in the time of Antiochus the Great. This Andromachus was detained priſoner a long time in Egypt. The Rhodians obtained his liberty, not of Ptolomy Euergetes, as it is ſaid in the Supplement to Moreri, but of Ptolomy Philopator [A]. The IVth Andromachus was a traytor, who diſcovered all the deſigns of Craſſus to the Parthians, and being choſen Guide, conducted the Roman army into thoſe places, where it was impoſſible but they muſt be cut to pieces. See Plutarch, p. 562 of the Life of Craſſus. The Vth Andromachus was Phyſician to Nero; I ſhall ſpeak of him in the following Article. The VIth Andromachus was a Sophiſt, who taught in Nicomedia under the reign of Diocleſian. It is Suidas who mentions this.

(a) In the 105th Olympiad, about the year of Rome 395.

(b) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. p. 411.

(c) Plutarch. in Timol. pag. 240. See likewiſe Diod. Sicul. lib. 16.

(d) Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 9. Euſebius ad Olympiad. 112.

(e) He was named ACHEUS. See his Article.

[A] The Rhodians obtained his liberty, not of Ptolomy Euergetes, but of Ptolomy Philopator.] The error of the Author of the continuation of Moreri is obvious to every one, who conſiders, that when the Rhodians procured the liberty of Andromachus, it was two years ſince his ſon had paſſed mount Taurus with Seleucus Ceraunus, King of Syria, to make war againſt Attalus, King of Pergamus. Now this expedition was made the ſame year that Ptolomy Euergetes died, and Ptolomy Philopator ſucceeded him (1). It is therefore Ptolomy Philopator, who ſet Andromachus at liberty, out of regard to the Rhodians, who intended to deprive the City of Byzantium of the favour of Acheus, and who thought nothing was more proper to gain them the friendſhip of this Prince, than to preſent him with his father. See the remark [A] of the article ACHEUS.

(1) See Calviſius ad annum 3, Olympiad. 139.

ANDROMACHUS, a native of the Iſland of Crete, Phyſician to the Emperor Nero (a), is chiefly immortalized by the antidote which he invented, by mixing Viper's Fleſh with Mithridate (b). This antidote was named Theriace, on account of this mixture, and it is called in Engliſh Treacle. Θηρίον ſignifies a beaſt; but the Phyſicians underſtand in particular by Θηρία venomous beaſts (c). This antidote quite ſet aſide the uſe of Mithridate, which till then had been in great eſteem (d). Andromachus wrote the Deſcription of his Antidote in Elegiac Verſe, which he dedicated to Nero (e). His ſon, whoſe name was Andromachus, wrote the ſame Deſcription in proſe (f). Damocrates turned it into Iambic verſe in a Poem, which he wrote upon Antidotes (g). We learn from Galen, that Andromachus the father compoſed a Treatiſe de Medicamentis compoſitis ad affectus externos (h), and that he was a man of great learning and eloquence (i). Erotion dedicated his Lexicon to him. I am ſurprized that Meurſius ſhould forget ſo great a Phyſician in the Catalogue which he gives of the illuſtrious men of the Iſle of Crete in the IVth book of his Treatiſe concerning that Iſle. Some Writers pretend that this Phyſician was a good Aſtrologer [A].

(a) Galenus, de Theriaca ad Piſonem.

(b) Voſſius, de Philoſ. c. 12. p. 95.

(c) See Galen, de Theriaca ad Pamphil.

(h) Apud Voſſium, de Philoſoph. p. 96.

(i) Galen. de Antidot. lib. 1. c. 1.

(d) Voſſius, de Philoſ. c. 12. p. 95.

(e) Galen. l. 1. de Antidotis. Tzetzes, Chil. 12. n. 397. p. 224.

(f) Galen, ibid.

(g) Idem, de Theriacâ ad Piſonem.

[A] Some pretend that he was a good Aſtrologer.] I ſhall begin with the words of Voſſius. Circa Olympiadem CXI (the Printer omitted a C, for it ſhould have been CCXI), & deinceps, nempe extremis Neronis temporibus, & ſub Veſpaſiano, magnum ſibi decus hac ſcientiâ peperit Andromachus Cretenſis, qui primus dicitur edidiſſe Theoricas Planetarum. That is, "About the CXI (it ſhould be the CCXI) Olympiad, and afterwards, namely, at the latter end of "Nero's reign, and under Veſpaſian, Andromachus cended from a ſon of Pyrrhus and Andromache. This Princeſs had ſeven brothers, who were killed by Achilles, together with their father, in one day (d). One Author tells us, that ſhe accompanied Priam, when he went to deſire Achilles to ſell him the body of Hector (e); and that to move him to the greater compaſſion, ſhe carried her two ſons with her, who were then infants (f). She has been the ſubject of ſeveral fine Tragedies, both antient and modern [F]. Her large ſtature has been well known to all poſterity [G]. Her dialogue with Hector in the ſixth book of the Iliad is one of the moſt beautiful parts of that Poem [H].

ANDRO-

(d) Homer. Il. lib. 6. ver. 414, & ſeq.

(e) Dictys Cretenſis, lib. 3.

(f) Aſtyanacta, quem nonnulli Scamandrum appellabunt, & Laodamanta, parvulos admodum filios præ ſe habens. Dict. Cret. l. 3.

She

[F] She has been the ſubject of ſeveral fine Tragedies, both ancient and modern.] That of Euripides is ſtill extant; and if we would know the ſucceſs of that, which was brought upon the ſtage at Paris, we may read what the Parnaſſe Reformé has put into the mouth of Montfleuri a famous Comedian, to which I ſhall add a paſſage from a modern Poet. Whoever wants to know what was the cauſe of my death, (it is Montfleuri who ſpeaks) he need not ask whether it was a fever, or dropſy, or gout; let him only know that it was the Tragedy of Andromache. ... I wiſh all thoſe writers of Tragedy, theſe inventors of paſſions in order to kill people, had like Corneille an Abbot d'Aubignac to deal with, they would not be ſo furious. But what vexes me moſt, is, that Andromache will become much more famous by the circumſtance of my death; and that henceforward there will be ſcarce any Poet, but will deſire to have the honour of killing a Player once in his life (21). Add to this the following verſes;

(21) Gueret, Parnaſſe Reformé, p. 108, 109.

——— Un Marquis,
Enflé de ſon ſavoir, chez les Dames aquis,
Ennemi du bon ſens, qu'a grand bruit il attaque,
Va pleurer au Tartuffe, & rire à l'Andromaque.
That is,
" A Marquis,
" Vain of his knowledge gain'd amongſt the Ladies,
" Averſe to ſenſe, impertinent and loud,
" Weeps amidſt all the humour of Tartuffe,
" While ſad Andromache excites his laughter.

[G] Her large ſtature has been well known to all poſterity.] I have quoted two verſes of Ovid upon this ſubject in remark [A]. Here are two other of the ſame Author.

Parva vehatur equo; quod erat LONGISSIMA, nunquam
Thebais Hectorea nupta reſedit equo (22).
That is,
" The nymph that's ſmall ſhould mount the ge-
" nerous ſteed,
" But Hector's wife, whoſe ſtature was too large,
" Was never ſeen on horſeback.

(22) Ovid. de Arte Amandi, lib. 3. ver. 777.

Martial contradicts Ovid as well upon this point, as upon that, which I have already quoted; for he ſays thus;

Maſturbabantur Phrygii poſt oſtia Servi,
Hectoreo quoties ſederat uxor equo (23).

(23) Martial, Epigram 104. lib. 11. ver. 13.

Juvenal was not ignorant of this large ſtature of Andromache, for ſpeaking of ſome Ladies, who wore their head-dreſs and hair very high upon their heads, he ſays that to ſee them before, you would take them for Andromaches; but behind they appeared very ſhort:

Tot premit ordinibus, tot adhuc compagibus altum
Ædificat caput, Andromachen à fronte videbis,
Poſt minor eſt (24).
That is,
" With curls on curls, they build her head before,
" And mount it with a formidable tower.
" A Gianteſs ſhe ſeems, but look behind,
" And then ſhe dwindles to the pigmy kind."

(24) Juven. Sat. 6. ver. 500.

We ſee ſomething in the faſhions of ancient Rome very like our top-knots. Another Poet expreſſes himſelf thus;

Celſæ procul aſpice frontis honores
Suggeſtumque comæ (25).

(25) Stat. Sylv. 3. l. 1. ver. 113.

The mother of the Gods with her towers upon her head (26), would be nothing compared to our women, if once they ſhould go beyond the preſent mode of their head-dreſs. See the Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ of Mr. Almeloveen; you will find there (27) a great deal of curious learning upon the antiquity of top-knots. See likewiſe the remark [C] of the article CONECTE, and the following paſſage of Syneſius: Μέλλει γὰρ, ſays he (28), ſpeaking of a new married Lady, καὶ εἰς τὴν ἡθιεῦσαν ἑβδόμην ταινιώσασθαί τε καὶ πυργοφόρος καθάπερ ἡ Κυβέλη περιελύσασθαι; for till the ſeventh day following ſhe will be adorned with head-dreſs, and go about with her towers upon it like Cybele. But to return to the wife of Hector, I muſt obſerve that Dares Phrygius gives her an hundred good qualities, without forgetting her great ſtature; Andromacham oculis claris, candidam, LONGAM, formoſam, modeſtam, ſapientem, pudicam, blandam; that is, " Andromache had ſparkling eyes, and was " fair, tall, beautiful, modeſt, wiſe, chaſte, and " courteous."

(26) Qualis Berecynthia mater
Invehitur curru
Phrygias turrita per urbes. Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 785. That is,
" High as the " mother of the " Gods....
" Then when in
" pomp ſhe
" makes the
" Phrygian
" Round,
" With golden
" turrets on her
" temples
" crown'd.
Dryden.

(27) P. 106, & ſeq.

(28) Syneſ. Epiſt. 3.

[H] His Dialogue with Hector in the ſixth book of the Iliad is one of the moſt beautiful parts of that Poem.] This is the judgment of Mr. Perrault. He has tranſlated this Dialogue into French verſe; which he read to the French Academy, when the Abbot Fenelon was received there (29). Before this he read a little Diſcourſe very well turned; he proteſted that he acknowledged Homer for the moſt excellent, the moſt extenſive, and the fineſt genius, that ever appeared in Poetry; and to perſuade the incredulous, that he honoured him according to his merit, he tranſlated that part of the Iliad into French. He confeſſes that he retrenched ſeveral digreſſions, which ſeemed to him too languid. This is the defect of Homer; he is too great a talker, and too ſimple; tho' he is ſo great a genius in other reſpects, and ſo copious in beautiful ſentiments, that if he was living now, he would compoſe an Epic Poem every way compleat. He would have taken care not to have given to Andromache amongſt other complaints upon the death of her husband, this reflection, that the young Aſtyanax would now no more eat the marrow and fat of ſheep upon his father's knees (30). This is painting after nature, I own; but in our age we can never bear ſuch a ſimplicity of manners in an Epic Poem. We ſhould think it too coarſe and rude, and ſuitable only for Comedy. I imagine our Ladies of Quality would be afraid of being thought very unpolite, if they ſhould ſpeak as the Queen of Carthage does in Virgil. B. iv. Æneid. ver. 328.

(29) The 31ſt of March. This tranſlation has been printed in the firſt part of the Recueil de Pieces curieuſes, at the Hague by Moetjens in 1694. JUDGMENT upon the Epic Poetry of the Antients.

(30) See above P. 55. quotation 25.

Si quis mihi parvulus aulâ
Luderet Æneas.
That is,
" Some young Æneas, to ſupply your place;
" Whoſe features might expreſs his father's face."
Dryden.

Theſe are not the defects of the ancient Poets themſelves, but only thoſe of the times they liv'd in. To ſpeak properly, the queſtion is not whether there are better genius's now than among the ancients; but whether our age has juſter ideas of perfection than they, and whether we may not apply to the great Homer what Horace does to another:

Sed ille,
Si foret hoc noſtrum fato delatus in ævum,
Detereret ſibi multa, recideret omne, quod ultra
Perfectum traheretur (31).
That is,
" Yet did he now again new life commence,
" He would correct, he would retrench his ſenſe;
" And pare off all that was not excellence."
Creech.

(31) Horat. Sat. x. lib. 1. ver. 67.

She took so great care of Hector's horses, that she gave them meat and drink before she served him (g). Some have carried this example so far, as to shew from thence that women are obliged to employ themselves in the most mechanical offices of the house [I].

(g) Homer. Il. lib. 8. ver. 188.

[I] Some have carried this example so far, as to shew from thence, that women are obliged to employ themselves in the most mechanical offices of the house.] Read the following words of Tiraqueau: Quæ loca Franciscus Barbarus in suo libello de Re uxoria, quem apud Gallos imprimendum primi omnium dedimus, solerter sciteque annotavit, monens his exemplis uxores ne res hujusmodi contemnant, quas Andromache &c. ... & hoc quoque è nostris commemoravit J. Lupus in rep. rubr. de don. inter vir. & uxor. & Bo. Curtil. in tract. nobilitatis in 38 privilegio (32). Tiraqueau has made no reflection upon this, that Andromache's husband was not served first; he supposed without doubt that this would prove too much, and that it was necessary to keep such a thought from the reader's view.

(32) Andr. Tiraquell. de Nobilitate, cap. 20. num. 101. p. 78.

ANDROMACHUS. I shall mention only six men of this name. The Ist Andromachus was of Sicily; he was father to Timæus the Historian, and Founder of the City Tauromenium, now called Taormine. He was a man of resolution, and very rich. He gathered together (a) upon an eminence called Taurus near Naxus the inhabitants of that City, who had escaped from it when it was destroyed by the Tyrant Dionysius. He maintained himself a long time in this post, and that was the reason why he called it Tauromenium. Those who fled from Naxus prospered so much in this new settlement, that in a little time it became a considerable City (b). Andromachus received Timoleon there, and permitted him to make it a place of ammunition. This Corinthian General came thither only with a design to deliver Sicily from the Tyrants who oppress'd it. Andromachus declared an open enmity against the Tyrants, and sollicited for a long time the Corinthians to come to the relief of Sicily. Timoleon and he therefore soon resolved to act in concert for the recovery of their liberty (c). The IId Andromachus served under Alexander the Great, and was Governor of Cœlo-Syria. The Samaritans burnt him alive; but Alexander revenged this cruel action upon the Authors of it with the severity they deserved (d). I can find no other Andromachus in Quintus Curtius, though Moreri pretends there are several. The IIId Andromachus was brother-in-law to Seleucus Callinicus, King of Syria, and had a son (e), who seized upon the Provinces situated on this side Mount Taurus, and proclaimed himself King in the time of Antiochus the Great. This Andromachus was detained prisoner a long time in Egypt. The Rhodians obtained his liberty, not of Ptolomy Euergetes, as it is said in the Supplement to Moreri, but of Ptolomy Philopator [A]. The IVth Andromachus was a traytor, who discovered all the designs of Crassus to the Parthians, and being chosen Guide, conducted the Roman army into those places, where it was impossible but they must be cut to pieces. See Plutarch, p. 562 of the Life of Crassus. The Vth Andromachus was Physician to Nero; I shall speak of him in the following Article. The VIth Andromachus was a Sophist, who taught in Nicomedia under the reign of Diocletian. It is Suidas who mentions this.

(a) In the 105th Olympiad, about the year of Rome 395.

(b) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. p. 411.

(c) Plutarch. in Timol. pag. 240. See likewise Diod. Sicul. lib. 16.

(d) Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 9. Eusebius ad Olympiad. 112.

(e) He was named ACHEUS. See his Article.

[A] The Rhodians obtained his liberty, not of Ptolomy Euergetes, but of Ptolomy Philopator.] The error of the Author of the continuation of Moreri is obvious to every one, who considers, that when the Rhodians procured the liberty of Andromachus, it was two years since his son had passed mount Taurus with Seleucus Ceraunus, King of Syria, to make war against Attalus, King of Pergamus. Now this expedition was made the same year that Ptolomy Euergetes died, and Ptolomy Philopator succeeded him (1). It is therefore Ptolomy Philopator, who set Andromachus at liberty, out of regard to the Rhodians, who intended to deprive the City of Byzantium of the favour of Acheus, and who thought nothing was more proper to gain them the friendship of this Prince, than to present him with his father. See the remark [A] of the article ACHEUS.

(1) See Calvisius ad annum 3, Olympiad. 139.

ANDROMACHUS, a native of the Island of Crete, Physician to the Emperor Nero (a), is chiefly immortalized by the antidote which he invented, by mixing Viper's Flesh with Mithridate (b). This antidote was named Theriace, on account of this mixture, and it is called in English Treacle. Θηρίον signifies a beast; but the Physicians understand in particular by Θηρία venomous beasts (c). This antidote quite set aside the use of Mithridate, which till then had been in great esteem (d). Andromachus wrote the Description of his Antidote in Elegiac Verse, which he dedicated to Nero (e). His son, whose name was Andromachus, wrote the same Description in prose (f). Damocrates turned it into Iambic verse in a Poem, which he wrote upon Antidotes (g). We learn from Galen, that Andromachus the father composed a Treatise de Medicamentis compositis ad affectus externos (h), and that he was a man of great learning and eloquence (i). Erotion dedicated his Lexicon to him. I am surprized that Meursius should forget so great a Physician in the Catalogue which he gives of the illustrious men of the Isle of Crete in the IVth book of his Treatise concerning that Isle. Some Writers pretend that this Physician was a good Astrologer [A].

(a) Galenus, de Theriaca ad Pisonem.

(b) Vossius, de Philos. c. 12. p. 95.

(c) See Galen, de Theriaca ad Pamphil.

(d) Vossius, de Philos. c. 12. p. 95.

(e) Galen. l. 1. de Antidotis. Tzetzes, Chil. 12. n. 397. p. 224.

(f) Galen, ibid.

(g) Idem, de Theriacâ ad Pisonem.

(h) Apud Vossium, de Philosoph. p. 96.

(i) Galen. de Antidot. lib. 1. c. 1.

[A] Some pretend that he was a good Astrologer.] I shall begin with the words of Vossius. Circa Olympiadem CXI (the Printer omitted a C, for it should have been CCXI), & deinceps, nempe extremis Neronis temporibus, & sub Vespasiano, magnum sibi decus hac scientiâ peperit Andromachus Cretensis, qui primus dicitur edidisse Theoricas Planetarum. That is, "About the CXI (it should be the CCXI) Olympiad, and afterwards, namely, at the latter end of "Nero's reign, and under Vespasian, Andromachus "of ANDRONICUS, a Peripatetic Philoſopher, born in the Iſland of Rhodes, came to Rome in the time of Pompey and Cicero [A], and endeavoured vigorouſly to raiſe the character of Ariſtotle, whoſe writings he made known [B], after he had reſcued them from the confuſion which they were in, and reduced them to a more methodical order [C]. The

" of Crete, who is ſaid to have firſt publiſhed Theo" ries of the Planets, gained great honour in this
" ſcience." This is the text of Voſſius, p. 161 of his book De Scientiis Mathematicis; and now follows his Commentary upon it, which is his uſual method. Conſentiunt in eo Lucas Gauricus & Chriſtophorus Clavius, niſi quod Gauricus perperam ANDRONICUM vocat, qui Clavio rectius ANDROMACHUS. Illum vide in Calendario Eccleſiaſtico *, hunc Commentario in Sphæram Joan. de Sacroboſco †. That is, " Lucas
" Gauricus and Chriſtopher Clavius agree in this,
" only Gauricus erroneouſly calls him Andronicus,
" whereas Clavius calls him rightly Andromachus.
" See the former in his Calendarium Eccleſiaſticum;
" the latter in his Commentary upon the Sphere of
" John de Sacroboſco." I am ſurprized that Voſſius has not obſerved, whether he believed or not that this Andromachus the Aſtrologer was the ſame with him who invented the Treacle. The time, in which he makes him live, and the country, which he tells us he was of, would lead us to imagine, that there was but one Andromachus. I am of opinion however that the ſilence of Voſſius was with deſign. He could not determine this point exactly; nor venture to ſay any thing either for or againſt it. Moreri, with more aſſurance, aſſerts, that Andromachus the Phyſician of Nero, and Andromachus the Aſtrologer, who firſt wrote a Theory of the Planets, are one and the ſame perſon. I am eaſily inclined to believe that the Aſtrology of Andromachus is a mere chimera; for Mr. Drelincourt, an Oracle, whom I never conſult without having reaſon to admire the extent and exactneſs of his learning, was ſo kind as to inform me, amongſt other things, which I have made uſe of in this article, that the Inventor Theoricarum of Clavius is an error, which ought to be corrected and read Inventor Theriacarum, i. e. " the Inventor of the Treacles. The two authorities of Voſſius are reduced to nothing by this, as far as regards the Theory of Planets; the one ſpeaks only of Andronicus, and the other only aſcribes to Andromachus the Invention of the Treacle. We have here a clear inſtance of the errors, which Men of Learning are led into by the faults of the Printer and Copier. Blancanus, upon the credit of Clavius, has placed Andromachus among the Mathematicians; Andromachus Cretenſis, quem Theoricarum inventorem facit Clavius (1). I ſay the ſame with regard to Voſſius. We have therefore no other foundation than an error of the preſs, and an alteration of theriacarum into theoricarum, for ſaying that Andromachus was the firſt, who wrote a Theory of the Planets. Mr. Drelincourt confirms his conjecture among other reaſons by this, that the Epithet Inventor has nothing to do with the Theory of the Planets, which was known before Nero's time; but Inventor joined to Theriacarum is the moſt proper imaginable to Andromachus. It is probable ſuch a miſtake as this of the Printer's or Copier's raiſed our Andromachus into an Aſtrologer in the hands of Clavius, or ſome other Author, whom Clavius followed either at the firſt or ſecond hand. As for the Andronicus of Gauricus, or ſome ſuch name, it might poſſibly be printed Andromachus. And upon this account, thoſe, who know that one Andromachus of Crete was Phyſician to Nero, and the Inventor of Treacle, added theſe titles to the name Andromachus in giving a Catalogue of Aſtrologers.

[A] He came to Rome in the time of Pompey and Cicero.] We may collect this from two paſſages in Plutarch; one in the Life of Sylla (1), the other in the Life of Lucullus (2). That in the Life of Sylla acquaints us with three things; 1, That Sylla ſent from Athens to Rome the Library of Apellicon, in which was the greateſt part of Ariſtotle's works; 2, That the Grammarian Tyrannion took from Sylla's Library ſeveral books; 3, That Andronicus the Rhodian had of this Tyrannion the Works of Ariſtotle. The other paſſage of Plutarch tells us that Tyrannion was taken priſoner by Lucullus after the defeat of Mithridates, and that Murena having deſired him of Lucullus made him free. We know from other hands that this Grammarian grew rich at Rome, and formed himſelf a very large Library. It is certain therefore that Andronicus muſt have been at Rome at the time which I have mentioned, becauſe he procured of Tyrannion the works of Ariſtotle. We ſhall ſee in remark [C] whether father Rapin was right in ſaying that Andronicus did not come to Rome till after the death of Tyrannion.

[B] He made the writings of Ariſtotle known.] This ſuppoſes that they were not known at Rome; and there is ground for ſuppoſing this, ſince Cicero aſſures us of it, and Plutarch himſelf intimates to us, that they were but little known to the Athenians, when Sylla ſeized upon the books of Apellicon (3). Father Rapin has remarked this before me. It was this Andronicus, ſays he (4), who firſt made Ariſtotle known at Rome about the time that Cicero raiſed himſelf by his vaſt reputation to the chief poſts of the Commonwealth..... Cicero had learned in Greece what Ariſtotle was; " He knew part of his merit,
" which was not then much known at Rome, as ap" pears by the ſurprize of Trebatius, who in a viſit
" that he paid to Cicero at his Seat of Tuſculum,
" and going with him into his Library, fell by chance
" upon the book of Topics of Ariſtotle, which Ci" cero had a copy of. Trebatius asked him what " that book was, and of what it treated; for though
" he was a man of learning, he never had heard of " Ariſtotle. Cicero anſwered, that he was not to " wonder at this, for that Philoſopher was known
" but by very few (5)." I cannot help ſaying here, that this agreeable writer has not exactly repreſented this paſſage of Cicero. It ſeems he has not done this out of careleſſneſs, but only that his narration might be more eaſy and conciſe. It is an inconvenience inſeparable from every one who writes with exactneſs; they cannot poſſibly avoid ſuch a circumſtantial detail of things as is tedious to the reader. Now people chooſe rather to be deceived by an eaſy and ſhort account, than to be tired with too great an accuracy. But let us ſee how this paſſage of Cicero may be repreſented in a conciſe, though proper and genuine manner. Trebatius turning over ſuch books as he thought fit in Cicero's Library, happened upon Ariſtotle's Topics. He was ſtruck with the title, and asked Cicero immediately what that piece was; and when he knew it, deſired him to explain the ſubject of it. Cicero choſe rather to adviſe him, either to read that book himſelf, or to get it explained to him by ſome able Rhetorician. Trebatius tried both theſe methods without ſucceſs; the obſcurity of the book deterred him. The Rhetorician told him, that he knew nothing of Ariſtotle. Cicero was not ſurprized at this, though this ignorance of his ſeemed inexcuſable to him. He was obliged therefore at the deſire of Trebatius, who was a learned Lawyer, to write upon the Topics of Ariſtotle (6). Utrumque ut a te audiebam, es expertus. Sed à libris te obſcuritas rejecit. Rhetor autem ille, magnus, ut opinor, Ariſtotelica ſe ignorare reſpondit. Quod quidem minimè ſum admiratus, eum Philoſophum Rhetori non eſſe cognitum qui ab ipſis Philoſophis præter admodum paucos ignoretur. Quibus eo minus ignoſcendum eſt, quod non modo rebus iis, quæ ab illo dictæ & inventæ ſunt, allici debuerunt, ſed dicendi quoque incredibili quadam cum copiâ, tum etiam ſuavitate (7). That I may conceal nothing from the reader. I ſhall obſerve, that Strabo acquaints us, that the Library-keeper of Sylla permitted the Librarians to copy Ariſtotle's works; but they employing ignorant Copiers, and never collating them (8), theſe works were publiſhed with a thouſand faults. This cannot confute what I have ſaid above; for I can anſwer to this; that the edition of Andronicus being much more correct excited the curioſity of the Learned, which was abated by the incorrectneſs of the former. See the marginal note (6).

[C] He reduced the works of Ariſtotle to a more methodical order.] Plutarch aſſures us that Andronicus, having

* Folio 16. edit. Venet. apud Juntas, anno 1552.
† Commentar. in cap. 1. p. 4.

(1) Blancan. in Mathematicor. Chronologiâ, pag. 50.

(1) Pag. 468.
(2) Pag. 584.

(3) Ὥυπω τότε σαφῶς γνωριζόμενα τοις πολλοις. i. e. " They " were not then
" known much
" to the common
" people." Plut. in Sylla, p. 468.
(4) Rapin, Comparaiſon de Platon & d'Ariſtote, P. 374.

(5) Father Rapin quotes in the margin what follows. Quod quidem minime ſum admiratus, eum Philoſophum Trebatio non eſſe cognitum, qui ab ipſis Philoſophis, præter admodum paucos, ignoretur, Cicero Topicor. initio.

(6) He compoſed this piece after the death of Cæſar; from whence we may conclude that even the edition of Andronicus had not at firſt made Ariſtotle's Works very common at Rome.
(7) Cicero initio Topicor.

(8) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 419.

The fate of these writings has been very extraordinary, as I shall observe in another place (a). We cannot fully represent the great service which he did then to the Sect of the Peripatetics. Perhaps they would never have become so famous, if he had not taken so particular a care of the works of their founder. This care of his procured a great deal of honour to Andronicus (b). Some learned men do not allow him to be the Author of the Paraphrase upon the Ethics of Aristotle [D]; others ascribe it to him, and pretend that he likewise composed the little Treatise upon the Passions, which David Hoeschelius published in 1593. It is certain, that Andronicus published some piece or other; for Aulus Gellius, in a chapter of his (c) upon the two kinds of Lectures which Aristotle read to his scholars, gives word for word a Letter, which Alexander wrote to Aristotle, and Aristotle's answer to it; and tells us, that he found these two letters in a work of the Philosopher Andronicus. It is impossible to say, whether this work was his Paraphrase upon the Categories, or that upon the Physicks. We are assured that Andronicus

(a) In the Remarks upon the Article TYRANNION.

(b) Quam cum unitum diligentemque Aristotelicorum librorum & judicem & repertorem judicaverit antiquitas. Boetius, Proœmio Libri de Interpretat.

(c) It is the fifth of the xxth book.

having obtained of Tyrannion the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, published them with proper Indexes: Παρ' αὐτοῦ τον Ῥόδιον Ἀνδρονίκον εὐπορήσαντα τῶν ἀντιγράφων εἰς μέσον θεῖναι, καὶ ἀναγράψαι τοὺς νῦν φερομένους πίνακας (9). Amyot has translated the Greek thus; Andronicus the Rhodian having by the hands of Tyrannion recovered the originals, published them, and wrote the Summaries, which we have still extant. It is proper to join to this the following passage of Porphyrius: Μιμησάμενος δ' Ἀπολλόδωρον τον Ἀθηναῖον, & Ἀνδρόνικον τον Περιπατητικόν, ὧν ὁ μὲν Ἐπίχαρμον τὴν κωμῳδογραφον εἰς δέκα τόμους φέρων συνήγαγε, ὁ δ' Ἀριστοτέλης καὶ Θεόφραστος βιβλία εἰς πραγματείας διῃρε, τὰς οἰκείας ὑποθέσεις εἰς ταυτὸ συναγάγων, οὕτω δὴ & ἐγώ (10): That is, I have followed the Example of Apollodorus "the Athenian and Andronicus the Peripatetic, the "former of whom collected Epicharmus's Comedies "into ten tomes, and the latter divided the books of "Aristotle and Theophrastus in their several distinct "treatises; proprias suppositiones in idem conducens, "as the Latin translation expresses it." I own, I do not sufficiently understand the force of the Greek words, τὰς οἰκείας ὑποθέσεις εἰς ταυτὸ συναγάγων. I much less understand the translation, proprias suppositiones in idem conducens; but I imagine one of these senses may pass. Porphyrius means either, that Andronicus collected into one body all the treatises upon the same subject, or that he added to every treatise a proper summary. The former sense seems to me the truest, and agrees better with Plutarch, and with the comparison which Porphyry makes between Andronicus and himself; for Porphyry did nothing to his Master Plotinus's writings, but give their proper titles to them, and range them under distinct classes. I have met with no Author, who tells us all that I have read in Father Rapin; and as he quotes only Plotinus, I am at a loss to know whether he takes it from some book, which I have not consulted, or only Paraphrases upon Plotinus and Plutarch. However that be, he speaks in this manner; which Moreri has only copied. After the Death of TYRANNION, Andronicus the Rhodian coming to Rome, and understanding very well the merit of Aristotle, as he had been educated in the Lyceum, he treated with the heirs of Tyrannion for these writings; and having got possession of them, he applied himself with so much vigour to examine and correct them, that he was in some measure the first restorer of them, as Porphyry assures us in the Life of Plotinus. For he not only restored what was injured by length of time, and the negligence of those, who had them in their hands, but he likewise recovered them from that strange confusion, in which he found them, and caused them to be copied (11). The beginning of this passage contradicts Plutarch, who assures us that Andronicus got these writings of Aristotle from the hands of Tyrannion. Plutarch, I confess, is not so exact, that we ought to venture to contradict any of the circumstances of an action that he mentions; but when there is not one Author, who assures us, that the heirs of Tyrannion, and not Tyrannion himself, sold the writings of Aristotle to Andronicus, I think we ought to follow Plutarch, since the reasons of Chronology are not contrary to his account. See the remarks upon the article TYRANNION. We are told by a certain Author, that Andronicus was the tenth Successor of Aristotle, and that he flourished in the 180th Olympiad (12).

[D] The Paraphrase upon Aristotle's Ethics is not absolutely attributed to him.] Daniel Heinsius, who translated this Paraphrase into Latin, intimates very clearly that he thought it to be written by this famous Peripatetic. He published it in Greek and Latin at Leyden in 1607 in 4to. It was never before printed either in Greek or Latin. There was a prodigious number of errors in this edition, which were corrected, at least in part, in that of 1617 in 8vo. Heinsius placed the name of Andronicus Rhodius in the title-page of his second edition. He contented himself in the former with only ascribing it to some ancient Philosopher, an excellent Peripatetic. He confined himself to those general forms. A Parenthesis may justify Gabriel Naudé against Mr. Placcius: Cui se Danielis Heinsii . . . . diligentiâ socium non ita pridem adjunxit Andronicus Rhodius (aut potius Olympiodorus:) talem enim appellationem in posteriore editione consultò sortitus est, cum in priori ab eodem Heinsio factâ Lugduni Batavorum sub anonymi nomine latens . . . . fuisset . . . . avide à cunctis receptus. That is, "To this was added some time ago, "by the care of Daniel Heinsius, Andronicus Rho- "dius (or rather Olympiodorus:) for that name he "received in the latter edition; whereas the former "published by the same Heinsius at Leyden was "without any name; and this piece was received "with great pleasure every where." Thus speaks Naudé in his Bibliographia Politica, upon which Mr. Placcius makes this remark, Ubi lapsus memoriæ sit oportet, quod de Olympiodoro memorat, cum ejus nullam unquam in alterutra editione mentionem Heinsius fecerit (13); that is, "Mr. Naudé must have made a "slip of memory here with regard to Olympiodorus, "for Heinsius says nothing of him in either of the "Editions." The Parenthesis shews, that we ought to ascribe to Heinsius only the name of Apollonius Rhodius. Meursius does not the least doubt but that Andronicus wrote this Paraphrase, and the treatise Περὶ Παθῶν, i. e. "Of the Passions," which David Hœschelius published from the two manuscripts, one, which he had from Margunius, the other, which Andrew Schottus sent from Spain to Sylburgius (14). Vossius ascribes this last book to an Andronicus, who who was not so ancient as he, of whom I am speaking in this article (15). Reinesius is of the same opinion as Meursius (16); but Salmasius positively affirms, that Andronicus the Rhodian is not the Author of the Paraphrase translated by Daniel Heinsius. It is without any reason or judgment, says he (17), that the first publishers of this Paraphrase, have attributed it to Andronicus; and he ridicules those, who boast, that they had found several strong proofs of this fact in the ancient Interpreters of Aristotle (18). He shews that the true Andronicus in Aulus Gellius explains in another manner, than what the Paraphrast does, the difference, which there was between the ἐξωτερικὰ, and the ἀκροατικὰ of Aristotle. He insists very much upon this. He adds, that in several points the Paraphrastic is not of Aristotle's opinion (19). In tam multis abit à mente Aristotelis, ut Andronici esse genuinum opus soli possint credere qui nihil in literis his vident. He cannot be induced to believe that so great a Philosopher as Andronicus would mispend his time in writing a Paraphrase upon a Book, which is the clearest and most perspicuous in the world: Quis credat tanti nominis Peripateticum otium suum occupâsse in Ethicis Aristotelis Paraphrasi elucidandis, quo libro nihil lucidius? This last proof seems to me very weak and inconclusive.

(9) Plutarch. in Sylla, p. 468.

(10) Porphyr. in vit. Plotini.

(11) Rapin, Comparaison de Platon & d'Aristote, p. 373, 374.

(12) Ammonius, apud Jonsium de Scriptor. Hist. Philosoph. p. 60.

(13) Placcius de Anonymis, p. 62.

(14) Meursius, de Rhodo, lib. 2. cap. 5. p. 88.

(15) Vossius, de Philosoph. cap. 5. p. 36.

(16) Reines. Epist. ad Rupertum, p. 312.

(17) Salmasius in Epictet. & Simplic. p. 227.

(18) Id. ibid. p. 228.

(19) Idem, ibid. p. 241.

Andronicus wrote a Paraphraſe upon both theſe Treatiſes of Ariſtotle [E]. I am not of opinion that he was Strabo's maſter [F].

[E] He wrote a Paraphraſe upon the Categories and Phyſicks of Ariſtotle.] Simplicius aſſures us of this in ſeveral parts of his Commentaries. See Francis Patricius (20).

(20) Diſcuſſionum Peripateticarum, tom. 1. l. 4. p. 40, 41.

[F] I am not of opinion that he was Strabo's Maſter.] I cannot tell whether the Printers have omitted ſome words or lines of the copy of Reineſius, or whether Reineſius is the real Author of theſe words in p. 312 (21). Amaſiæ Magiſter (Andronicus Rhodius) Strabonis : hic. l. xiv. That is, "Strabo in his 14th "book tells us, that he was Scholar to Andronicus "Rhodius at Amaſia.". I find indeed that he was a Scholar to the Grammarian Ariſtodemus at Nyſa (22), and to the Philoſopher Xenarchus at another place (23) : but I am very much deceived, if he ſays any thing elſe of Andronicus in his 14th book, than to rank him among the illuſtrious men of the Iſle of Rhodes (24) ; and I dare affirm, that he ſays nothing in any part of his works, either that he was a Scholar of Andronicus, or that Andronicus ever taught in Amaſia.

(21) Of his Letters to Rupert.

(22) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 447.

(23) Idem, ibid. p. 461.

(24) Idem, ibid. p. 451.

ANDRONICUS (MARCUS POMPILIUS) a Syrian by nation, taught Grammar at Rome. Applying himſelf too much to the ſtudy of Philoſophy [A], he was not able to keep up his profeſſion of a Grammarian with the diligence that was neceſſary, ſo that his ſchool was neglected. As ſoon as he found that they preferred before him not only Anthony Gnipho, but even other Grammarians inferior to the latter, he reſolved to continue his ſchool no longer, nor to ſtay at Rome, but retired to Cumæ, where he employed his leiſure in writing books. This employment however did not ſecure him from neceſſity, for he was ſo poor, that he was obliged to ſell the beſt of his works at a very low price [B]. This work was ſuppreſſed for a time ; but Orbilius recovered it, and publiſhed it under the Author's name ; at leaſt he boaſted ſo. Andronicus was of the Sect of Epicurus, and lived in the time of Cicero (a). Moreri has committed a great many errors here [C].

(a) Ex Suetonio de Illuſtrib. Grammat. c. 8.

[A] He applied himſelf too much to the ſtudy of Philoſophy.] The words of Suetonius are very expreſſive : Studio Epicureæ ſectæ deſidioſior in profeſſione Grammaticæ habebatur, minuſque idoneus ad tuendam Scholam. This is a leſſon to all thoſe, who are deſirous of having a great number of Scholars. It is neceſſary either that they ſhould apply themſelves entirely to their profeſſion, or that the world ſhould not know that they apply themſelves to any thing elſe. A Profeſſor of Humanity-ſtudies, who would appear as a Philoſopher, who is curious in experiments of Natural Philoſophy, who examines with great zeal whether Mr. Des Cartes has ſucceeded better than Gaſſendi, runs a great riſque of ſeeing his School deſerted. A Phyſician very fond of medals, the Mathematics, Genealogies, will find the number of his patients diminiſh every day. It is upon this account, that Mr. Spon thought proper to tell the world, that they would be much miſtaken, to ſuppoſe that the ſtudy of Antiquity was his chief employment (1). He found by experience that ſuch a notion would be very prejudicial to him, with regard to the practice of Phyſic. It is even certain, that a Profeſſor, who is known to be engaged in writing many books, never is conſidered as very proper to make good Scholars ; it is immediately ſuppoſed that he has not time to do it. And for this reaſon, thoſe, who would make their fortune by teaching the youth, would do very wrong to become Authors.

ADVICE to thoſe, who exerciſe any particular profeſſion.

(1) See the Letter which he wrote to the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of Jan. 1685, Article 5.

[B] He was obliged to ſell the beſt of his works at a very low price.] Suetonius calls it Opuſculum, a little Tract. Opuſculum, ſays he (2), Annalium Elenchorum. The title therefore was Elenchi Annalium. There are ſome good manuſcripts of Suetonius, which give us this reading, Opuſculum ſuum Annalium Ennii elenchorum (3). Achilles Statius (4), and Voſſius (5), declare for this reading, which ſeems to me the true one. But in what manner ſoever we read it, we find that Andronicus wrote a Criticiſm upon ſome Annaliſt or other.

(2) Sueton. de Illuſt. Grammat. c. 8.

(3) See Caſaubon upon this paſſage of Suetonius.

(4) In Sueton. ibid.

(5) De Hiſt. Latin. p. 47.

[C] Moreri has committed a great many errors here.] I. He writes Pompinius inſtead of Pompilius. II. He is miſtaken in aſſerting, that Andronicus had been Preceptor to Julius Cæſar ; and that Cicero, being then Prætor, was highly pleaſed in being one of his Auditors. III. He tranſlates Annalium Elenchi, Annals diſpoſed into tables. IV. He ſays, that ſome have aſcribed theſe Tables to Ennius. This is what he underſtands by theſe words of Voſſius, in quibuſdam tamen libris eſt Annalium Ennii elenchorum. V. He deſtroys the reaſoning of Suetonius. That Hiſtorian had touched upon two circumſtances, which prove ſufficiently the poverty of Andronicus ; one was from the worth and importance of what he ſold ; it was the chief work of the Author ; the other was drawn from the low price, which that piece was ſold for. Moreri imagines that he has expreſſed the whole affair in this manner : He was ſo poor, that he was obliged, in order to ſupport himſelf, to ſell a little treatiſe, which he had written. How could he avoid ſeeing, that this manner of repreſenting took away almoſt all the force of the proof of the Latin Hiſtorian ? It will be worth while to ſee what was the occaſion of his ſecond error, which contains two or three remarkable falſities. He did not at all comprehend the reaſoning of Voſſius. The point was to prove that Andronicus lived in the time of Siſenna, Quadrigarius, and ſeveral others. Voſſius proves it by this reaſon, that Anthony Gnipho and Andronicus lived at the ſame time, and that this Gnipho, according to Suetonius, taught in Julius Cæſar's houſe, and had Cicero for one of his Auditors. He taught there, when Julius Cæſar was but a child ; and Cicero, then Prætor, went to hear him. Here are two circumſtances of time, which Voſſius takes from Suetonius, to fix the age of Pompilius Andronicus, by joining to them another fact teſtified by Suetonius ; and that is, that Andronicus and Anthony Gnipho taught a School at the ſame time. Moreri has loſt himſelf in this plain path ; he underſtands that of Andronicus which Voſſius ſpeaks of Gnipho. Beſides he ſuppoſes that to teach School in a perſon's houſe, is the ſame thing as to be Preceptor to his ſon.

ANDRONICUS of Theſſalonica was one of the Greek Refugees who brought Learning into the Weſt in the fifteenth Century. He was conſidered as the beſt Profeſſor next to Theodorus Gaza, and perhaps he exceeded him in the knowledge of the Greek Tongue ; for he had read all the Authors who wrote in that Language, and was well ſkilled in Ariſtotle's Philoſophy. He taught at Rome, and lived with Cardinal Beſſarion. The ſtipend which was given him was ſo ſmall, that he was obliged by poverty to depart from Rome. Upon this he went to Florence, where he was Profeſſor a long time, and had a prodigious number of Auditors ; but upon the expectation of meeting with a better fortune in France, he took a journey thither, where he died a little after in a very advanced age. He pronounced very ill, and applied himſelf to nothing but his ſtudies (a). Platina gives him the Elogium of having underſtood the Greek

(a) Græca & Latina linguâ apprime eruditus. Platina in Panegyric. Beſſarionis.

Greek and Latin Tongues to great perfection (b). We ſhall ſee in the remarks an error of Gabriel Naudé [A]. There was at the ſame time another Andronicus who taught at Bologna, and was of Conſtantinople [B].

(b) Taken from Volaterran. lib. 21. p. 775.

[A] Here is an error of Gabriel Naudé with regard to Andronicus.] Having ſaid that one Hieronymus of Sparta taught at Paris, he adds, after this, there came another, named Tranquillus Andronicus a Dalmatian, who was the laſt of thoſe, who arrived during the reign of Lewis XI (1). It is plain he confounds Andronicus of Theſſalonica with him, whom I ſhall ſpeak of in the next Article. Moreri has committed the ſame fault, and endeavouring to make a diſtinction, has embarraſs'd himſelf the more. He pretends, that Tranquillus Andronicus Profeſſor of Greek at Paris, is not the ſame, who had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of Cardinal Beſſarion; and yet it is very certain, that the friend and client of that Cardinal is the ſame with the Profeſſor at Paris. His name was not Calixtus Andronicus, as Moreri calls him, but Andronicus Calliſtus. Conſider the following words, which ſhew us that he was a relation of the famous Theodorus Gaza. Gaudeo equidem plurimum, (it is Philelphus who ſpeaks in a Letter, which he wrote from Milan to this Theodorus the 21ſt of January 1469,) erudutiſſimum virum mihique amiciſſimum Andronicum Kalliſtum neceſſarium tuum apud vos agere, id eſt in Muſarum & ſapientiæ domicilio, quem ut verbis meis ſalvere jubeas abs te peto, meque τοῖς περὶ Βησσαρίωνα τὸν δεσπότην commenda (2). This Andronicus Calliſtus was a Peripatetic, and wrote a book de Phyſica Scientiâ & Fortunâ, a Monody de miſerâ Conſtantinopoli, and ſome other pieces mentioned by Father Labbe (3). Once more, Moreri ought not to diſtinguiſh him from the Profeſſor at Paris, nor to ſay that this was a Profeſſor at Baſil. The Author of Athenes ancienne & nouvelle places Andronicus in the number of the learned Greeks, who paſſed into Italy about the middle of the fourteenth Century (4). He means without doubt Andronicus, and has put the fourteenth inſtead of the fifteenth.

(1) Naude Addit. a l'Hiſtoir. de Louis XI. p. 187.

(2) Philelph. Ep. lib. 29. See likewiſe a paſſage in lib. 16, and another in the 17th. Theſe paſſages were pointed out to me by Mr. de la Monnoie.

(3) In his Bibliotheca nova Manuſcriptorum. I received this of Mr. de la Monnoie, as alſo what is contained in the following remark.

(4) Athen. ancienne & nouvel. p. 239 of the 3d edit. at Paris in 1676.

[B] There was at the ſame time another Andronicus, who taught at Bologna, and was of Conſtantinople.] Philelphus ſpeaks of him with commendation in ſeveral of his Letters. The following paſſage in the firſt Letter of the 24th book, dated the laſt of October 1464, will be ſufficient: Quare non poſſum vos omnes, qui Bononiæ agitis, non mirari plurimum, quod cum vobis viri doctiſſimè eruditi copia data ſit ad Græcam diſciplinam penitus conſequendam, malitis indocti eſſe quam docti. Nunquam equidem diſcendi gratiâ trajeciſſem in Græciam Conſtantinopolim, qua in urbe ſeptennium egi, ſi iſtiuſmodi mihi Andronicus Byzantinus eſſet oblatus. That is, "I cannot but "wonder at you, who live at Bologna, very much, "that ſince you have the opportunity of learning "Greek under ſo learned a man, you chooſe rather "to be ignorant than skilled in it. I ſhould never "have paſſed over to Greece to Conſtantinople, in "which city I lived ſeven years, if I could have had "ſuch a Maſter as Andronicus of Bizantium."

ANDRONICUS (TRANQUILLUS) born in Dalmatia towards the end of the fifteenth Century, was engaged in a work, which he gave the world expectation of publiſhing [A]. He taught in the Univerſity of Leipſic at the ſame time as Moſellanus did [B]. My remark will ſhew that he publiſhed ſomething (a). Eraſmus wrote him a Letter, which is the tenth of the fourth book.

(a) See Remark [B].

[A] He engaged in a work, which he gave the world expectation of publiſhing.] Paulus Jovius, having given an account that the ſad condition, to which the Turks had reduced Dalmatia, would not ſuffer them to cultivate the ſtudy of polite Learning, and for this reaſon his Collection of Elogiums would contain none of the men of that country, adds, unleſs Tranquillus Andronicus ſhould undertake to ſhew the merits of his countrymen. I ſhall give the very words of Paulus Jovius. Sic ut nemo dignus elogio compareat, niſi in lucem ſtudioſe producat cives ſuos Tranquillus Andronicus præclarus Ciceronis æmulator, dum graviſſimarum actionum ac Othomannicæ legationis, obſcurorumque nobis itinerum Commentaria perſcribat (1). This paſſage intimates that Andronicus had made a voyage to Conſtantinople, either as an envoy, or in the train of an Ambaſſador. Konig does not uſe ſo much reſerve; he aſſerts, that Andronicus was an Envoy in Turky, and wrote a book concerning his negotiation; Legationem ad Turcam obiit, eamque ſuis Commentariis illuſtravit. We cannot too often remark upon Authors, who enlarge upon every thing they quote. Paulus Jovius ſpeaks but of one work, in which Andronicus was engaged; Konig converts this into a book, which was publiſhed.

(1) Jovius in Elogiis, p. 299.

[B] He taught at Leipſic at the ſame time with Moſellanus.] It is Simler, who tells us this: Hic, ſays he (2), literas docuit Lipſiæ, Petri Moſellani tempore. He calls him Tranquillus Parthenius Andronicus Dalmata, and aſcribes to him an Oration printed at Augsbourg in 1518, and at Vienna in 1541. The ſubject of this Oration is to exhort all the Princes of Germany to a war againſt the Turks. We have another Oration of his De Laudibus Eloquentiæ, i. e. "in praiſe of Eloquence," and ſome Latin verſes (3). The Supplements of Du Verdier mention a Dialogue of the ſame Author. It is intitled Sylla; the Interlocutors are Cæſar, Sylla, Pompey, Minos. It was printed at Leipſic in 8vo (4). The year when it was printed is not marked in the Supplements Du Verdier.

(2) Epitom. Biblioth. Geſneri, p. 806.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, ibid.

☞ANEAU, in Latin ANULUS (BARTHOLOMEW) a man of eminent learning in the ſixteenth Century, was born at Bourges in France, and educated under Melchior Volmar, who had an excellent talent in the inſtruction of youth. He made great advances under him in polite Literature, and embibed the principles of the Proteſtant Religion, which Volmar profeſſed, and Aneau afterwards embraced. The great reputation which he ſoon gained by his ſkill in the Latin and Greek Languages and Poetry, induced ſome of the old Echevins of Lyons, who were his countrymen, to offer him a Profeſſorſhip in Rhetoric in the College, which they were going to erect in that city. Aneau accepted this offer with pleaſure, and went thither to take poſſeſſion of his place, which he kept above thirty years till his death (a), He wrote ſeveral works [A], and diſcharged his Profeſſorſhip with ſuch applauſe, that in 1542 he was choſen Principal of the

(a) Memoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 22. p. 170, 171. edit. Paris 1733.

[A] He wrote ſeveral works.] I. Chant Natal, contenant ſept Noels, un Chant Paſtoral, & un Chant Royal, avec un Myſtere de la Nativité per perſonnages; compoſé en imitation verbale & muſicale de diverſes chanſons, recueilli ſur l'Ecriture Sainte, & d'icelle illuſtré; i. e. "A Birth-day Song, containing ſeven Poems upon "Chriſtmas, and a Royal Song, &c." printed at Lyons by Sebaſtian Gryphius 1539 in 8vo. II. Lyon marchant, Satyre Françoiſe, ſur la Comparaiſon de Paris, Rouen, Lyon, Orleans, & ſur les choſes memorables advenues depuis l'an 1524, ſous Allegories & Enigmes; par perſonnages myſtiques. Joué au College de la Trinité de Lyon en 1541; i. e. "Lyon marchant, a Satyr "in French, upon the Compariſon of Paris, Roan, "Lyons, and Orleans; upon the remarkable things, "which have happened ſince the year 1524, under Al"legories and Enigma's, by myſtical perſonages. Re"preſented at Trinity-College in Lyons in 1541." Printed the College. In this ſituation he propagated the doctrines of the Reformation among his ſcholars, which was done ſo ſecretly for a long time, that it was not perceived, and at firſt it was only complained of; but an accident which happened on the feſtival of the holy Sacrament in the year 1565, put a period to all his attempts in favour of Proteſtantiſm by a very fatal cataſtrophe. Upon that day, which was the 21ſt of June, as the proceſſion was paſſing on towards the College, there was a large ſtone thrown from one of the windows upon the Hoſt and the Prieſt who carried it. Whether Aneau was the Author of this inſult or not, is not certain; however the people being enraged at it, broke into the College in a body, and aſſaſſinated our Author, whom they imagined to have been the occaſion; and the College itſelf was ſhut up the next day by order of the City (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 171, 172.

Printed at Lyons by Peter de Tours 1542, in 8vo. III. Oraiſon ou Epitre de M. Tulle Ciceron à Octavius, depuis ſurnommé Auguſte Ceſar; avec des vers de Corneille Severe, Poete Romain, ſur la mort de Ciceron. Le tout tourné de Latin en François, à ſavoir, la dite Epitre en proſe, & les dits vers in rime; i. e. "An "Oration or Epiſtle of M. T. Cicero to Octavius, afterwards ſurnamed Auguſtus Ceſar, with the verſes "of Cornelius Severus, a Roman Poet, upon the death "of Cicero. The whole tranſlated from Latin into "French, that is, the ſaid Epiſtle in proſe, and the "Verſes in rhime," printed at Lyons by Peter de Tours 1543 in 8vo. IV. Les Emblêmes d'André Alciat traduits vers pour vers, jouxte la diction Latine, & ordonnés in lieux communs, avec Sommaires, Inſcriptions, Schemes, & brieves expoſitions Epimythiques, ſelon l'allegorie naturelle, morale, ou hiſtoriale; i. e. "The Emblems of Andrew Alciat tranſlated verſe for "verſe, according to the Latin ſtyle, and diſpoſed in"to common heads, with Summaries, Inſcriptions, "Schemes, and brief epimythical Expoſitions, accord"ing to the natural, moral, or hiſtorical Allegory." Printed at Lyons by Will. Roville 1549 in 8vo, and in the ſame city in 1558 in 16mo. There is another tranſlation of Alciat's Emblems into French verſe by John le Fevre of Dijon, Canon of Langres, printed at Lyons by John de Tournes in 1556 in 16mo. V. Paſquil Antiparadoxe; Dialogue contre le Paradoxe de la faculté du Vinaigre: i. e. "An antiparadoxical "Paſquil; or a Dialogue againſt the Paradox of the "Faculty du Vinaigre." Printed at Lions 1549 in 8vo. VI. Exhortation rationale de S. Euchier à Valerian, le retirant de la Mondanité & de la Philoſophie profane, à Dieu, & à l'étude des ſaintes Lettres; traduite en vers François, jouxte l'Oraiſon Latine; i. e. "A rational Exhortation of S. Euchier to Vale"rian, in order to reduce him from the purſuit of "the world and profane Philoſophy, to God and the "ſtudy of the holy Scriptures, tranſlated into French "verſe, according to the Latin original." Printed at Lyons by Macé Bonhomme, 1552, in 4to. VII. Picta Poeſis. Lyons 1552 in 8vo This piece is a collection of Latin and Greek verſes, which ſerve for an explication of a Century of Emblems. Aneau tranſlated them into French, and publiſhed them under the following title. VIII. Imagination poetique, traduite en vers François, des Latins & Grecs par l'Auteur même d'iceux; i. e. "Poetical Imagination, tranſ"lated into French verſe from the Latin and Greek "by the Author of thoſe Poems." Printed at Lyons by Macé Bonhomme 1552 in 8vo. With wooden cuts. IX. Le Treſor d'Evonime Philiatre, des Remedes ſecrets, livre Phyſic, Medical, Alchimic, & diſpenſatif de toutes ſuſtantiales liqueurs, & appareils de Vins de diverſes ſaveurs, neceſſaires à toutes gens, principalement a Medecins & Apoticaires, traduict du Latin: i. e. "The Treaſure of Evonimus Philiater con"cerning ſecret Remedies, a phyſical, medical, chy"mical, and diſpenſatory Treatiſe of all ſubſtantial "Liquors, and preparations of Wines of divers fla"vours, neceſſary to all perſons, eſpecially Phyſicians "and Apothecaries; tranſlated from the Latin." Printed at Lyons by Balthaſar Arnoullet 1555 in 4to. This work was tranſlated from the Latin of Conrad Geſner. X. Art poetique François pour l'inſtruction des jeunes ſtudieux & encore peu avancez en la Poeſie Françoiſe. Avec le Quintil Horatian ſur la defenſe & illuſtration de la language Françoiſe faite par Joachim du Bellay; i. e. "The French Art of Poetry "for the inſtruction of young Students, and thoſe "who are but little acquainted with French Poetry: "with Joachim du Bellay's Horatian Quintilius con"cerning the Defence and Illuſtration of the French "Language." Printed at Lyons by John Temporal 1556, in 16mo. Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who had placed this piece at firſt among the books of uncertain Authors, becauſe it was publiſhed without a name, was afterwards informed, that Aneau was the Author of it. This induced him to place it among his works. "Some perſons, adds Du Verdier, have "aſcribed it to Charles Fontaine; but with regard to "my own opinion, I do not think that it belongs to "either of them, but rather to Thomas Sibyle, who "afterwards in an Epiſtle prefixed to his tranſlation "of the Anteros of Baptiſta Fulgoſo, mentions a "French Art of Poetry, which was written by him"ſelf, and printed. And I never have ſeen any o"ther, except that of James Peletier." XI. Le tiers Livre de la Metamorphoſe d'Ovide, traduit en vers François; avec les Mythologies & Allegories hiſtoriales, naturelles, & morales ſur toutes les Fables & Sentences; i. e. "The third book of the Metamor"phoſes of Ovid, tranſlated into French verſe; with "the mythology and hiſtorical, natural and moral Al"legories upon all the Fables and Sentences." Printed at Lyons by Macé Bonhomme 1556, in 8vo. With the two firſt books of the Metamorphoſes tranſlated by Clement Marot, to which, as we are informed by Du Verdier, Aneau added the proper Mythologies collected from the beſt Greek and Latin Authors. XII. Genethliac muſical & hiſtorial de la Conception & Nativité de Jeſus Chriſt par vers & chants divers, entreſemez & illuſtrez des noms Royaux & de Princes, anagrammatiſés en diverſes ſentences, ſous myſtique alluſion aux perſonnes divines & humaines. Avec un Chant Royal pour chanter à l'acclamation des Rois. Enſemble la quatre Eglogue de Virgile, intitulée Pollion ou Auguſte, extraite des vers de la Sibylle Cumée, prophetiſant la Nativité de Jeſus Chriſt advenue bientôt après, & au même tems & Empire d'Auguſte; i. e. "A muſical and hiſtorical Ge"nethliacon upon the Conception and Nativity of "Jeſus Chriſt in verſe and various cantos, inter"ſperſed and illuſtrated with the names of Kings "and Princes, anagrammatized in divers ſentences, "under a myſtical alluſion to perſons divine and "human. With a Royal Canto to be ſung at the "acclamation of the Kings; and likewiſe the fourth "Eclogue of Virgil, intitled Pollio or Auguſtus, ex"tracted from the verſes of the Cumean Sybil, pro"pheſying of the Birth of Chriſt, which happened "ſoon after, under the reign of Auguſtus." Printed at Lyons by Godfrey Beringen, 1559, in 8vo. XIII. Alector, ou le Coq; Hiſtoire fabuleuſe, traduite en proſe Françoiſe d'un fragment Grec; i. e. "Alector, or the Cock; a fabulous Hiſtory, tranſ"lated into French proſe from a Greek Fragment." Printed at Lyons by Peter Fradin, 1560, in 8vo. XIV. La Republique d'Utopie, œuvre grandement utile, demonſtrant le parfait état d'une bien ordonnée police, traduicte du Latin de Thomas More, Chancelier d'Angleterre: i. e. "The Commonwealth of Utopia, "a work of great uſe, ſhewing the perfect ſcheme "of a well-regulated Government, tranſlated from "the Latin of Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of "England." Printed at Paris in 8vo, and at Lyons in 16mo (1).

T.

(1) Ibid. p. 172-177. See the Bibliotheq. Françoiſ. of La Croix du Maine and Du Verdier; and the Hiſt. Litteraire de Lyon du P. Colonia. tom. 2. p. 668.

The End of the FIRST VOLUME.